Amongeſt other things this King Ethelbert with the aduice of his Councell ordeyned diuerſe lawes and ſtatutes, according to the whiche, decrees of Judgements ſhoulde paſſe: and thoſe decrees hee cauſed to be written in the Engliſhe tongue, which remayned and were in force vnto the dayes of Bede) as he declareth.

And fyrſt it was expreſſed in thoſe lawes, what amendes hee ſhoulde make that ſtale anye thing that belonged to the Churche, to the Biſhop, or to any eccleſiaſticall perſon, willing by all meanes to defend them whoſe doctrine he had receyued.

After the deceaſe of Ethelbert, his ſon Eadbalde ſucceeded in the gouernment of his kingdom of Kent, the which was a greate hinderer of the increaſe of the newe Churche amongeſt the Engliſhe men in thoſe parties: for hee did not onely refuſe to bee baptiſed himſelfe, but alſo vſed ſuche kinde of fornication, as hath not beene heard (as the Apoſtle ſayth) amongeſt the Gentiles, for he tooke to wife his mother in lawe, that had beene wife to his father. By which two euill examples, many tooke occaſion to returne to theyr heathenilh religion, the which whileſt his father raigned, either for the Prince his pleaſure, or for feare to offend him, did profeſſe the Chriſtian fayth.

But Eadbalde eſcaped not worthie puniſhment to him ſent from the lyuing God for hys euill deſertes, in ſo muche that hee was vexed with a certaine kinde of madneſſe, and taken with an vncleane ſpirite.

The foreſayde ſtorme or diſquiet troubling of the Chriſtian Congregation, was afterwards greatly encreaſed alſo by the death of Sabert, or Sebert King of the Eaſt Saxons, who departing this life to goe to a better, in the bliſſefull kingdome of heauen, left behind him three ſonnes as ſucceſſours in the eſtate of his earthly Kingdome, whiche ſonnes likewyſe refuſed to bee baptiſed.

This Sabert, or Sebert, was conuerted to the fayth of Chriſt, and baptiſed by Mellitus Biſhop of London (as before is mentioned) vnto whome ſome aſcribe the firſt foundation of Weſtminſter Church, but other aſcribe it to Lucius the firſt Chriſten king of the Brytaynes (as before ye haue heard) though there bee alſo that write that the Church was firſt buylded there by a Citizen of London (as before is alſo touched.)

SAbert left behind him in the kingdome of the Eaſt Saxons three ſonnes, named Serred, Seward, and Sigebert, in whome remayned no vertue, no feare of God, nor any reſpect of religion, but eſpecially they hated the profeſſors of the Chriſtian fayth. For after theyr father was dead, they began to fall to theyr olde Idolatrie, the whiche in his life time they ſeemed to haue giuen ouer. But now they openly worſhipped Idols, and gaue libertie to their ſubiects for to do the like.

Ran. Ceſtren. Beda. li. 2. ca. 5

Serred, Seward, and Sigebert, the ſonnes of Sabert.

And when the Biſhop Mellitus at the ſolemniſing of Maſſe in the Churche diſtributed the Euchariſticall breade vnto the people, they aſked him (as it is ſayde) wherefore he did not deliuer of that bryght white breade vnto them alſo, as well as hee had beene accuſtomed to doe to theyr father Saba, (for ſo they vſed to call hym) vnto whome the Biſhoppe made thys aunſwere: if you wyll bee waſhed in that wholeſome Fountayne wherein youre father was waſhed, ye maye bee partakers of that holye breade whereof hee was partaker, but if you deſpiſe the waſhpoole of lyfe, ye may by no meanes taſte of the breade of ſaluation.

But they offended herewith, replyed in this wiſe: we will not enter into that Fountayne, for wee knowe wee haue no neede thereof: but yet neuertheleſſe we will be refreſhed with that breade.

After

After this when they had beene earnestly and many tymes tolde, that without they woulde be baptised, they might not be partakers of the sacred oblation: At length in a great displeasure they told him, that if he would not consent vnto them in so small a matter, there shoulde be no place for him within the boundes of their Dominion. And so he was constrayned to depart. Whereupon hee being expulsed, resorted into Kent, there to take aduise with his fellowe Bishoppes, Laurence & Justus, what was to be done in this so weightie a matter.

They finally resolued vpon this poynt, that it shoulde be better for them to returne into theyr Countrey, where with free myndes they might serue Almightie God, rather than to remayne amongest people that rebelled agaynst the fayth, without hope to do good amongst them.

Therefore Mellitus and Justus did first departe, and went ouer into Fraunce, mynding there to abyde till they might see what the ende would be.

But shortly after, those brethren the kings of Esser, whiche had expulsed their Bysshoppe in maner aboue sayde, suffered worthily for theyr wicked doings: For going forth to battayle agaynst the West Saxons, they were ouerthrown and slaine togither with all theyr armie, by the two Kings, Kinigils, and Quichelme. But neuertheless, for all that the Authours of the mischiefe were thus taken away, the people of that Countrey woulde not as yet bee reduced againe from theyr diuelish worshipping of false Goddes, being eftsones fallen thereto in that season by the encouragement and perillous example of theyr Rulers. Wherefore the Archebishop Laurence was in minde also to haue followed his fellowes Mellitus and Justus: but when he minded to set forwarde, he was warned in a dreame, and cruelly scourged (as hath beene reported by the Apostel saint Peter, who reproued him) for that hee would so vncharitably forsake his flock, and leaue it in daunger without a shepherde to keepe the Wolfe from the folde.

The sonnes of king Sebert slaine.

The Archbishoppe enboldned by this vision, and also repenting him of his determinatiō, came to king Eadbald, and shewed to him his scrypes, and the maner of his dreame.

The king being herewith put in great feare, renounced his heathenish worshipping of Idols, and was baptized, and as muche as in him lay, from thence forth succoured the Congregation of the Christians, and aduaunced the Churche to his power.

He sent also into Fraunce, and called home the Bishops Mellitus and Justus, so that Justus was restored again to his Sea of Rochester. But the East Saxons woulde not receyue Mellitus to his Sea at London, but continued in theyr wicked Mawmetrie in obeying a Bishop of theyr Pagan lawe, whom they had erected for that purpose. Neyther was King Eadbalde of that authoritie and power in those parties, as his father was before, whereby he might constrayne them to receyue theyr lawfull Bysshop. But surely the sayde King Eadbalde with his people after hee was once conuerted againe, gaue himselfe wholye to obey the lawes of God, and amongest other deedes of godly zeale, he buylded a Church of our Ladie at Cantorburie, within the Monasterie of Saint Peter, afterwardes called Saint Agnes. Beda.li.2.

This Churche was consecrated by Mellitus, who after the death of Laurence succeeded in gouernaunce of the Archebishoppes Sea of Canterburie.

After Mellitus whiche departed this lyfe in the yeare of our Lorde. 624. Justus that before was bishop of Rochester, was made Archbishop of Canterburie, and ordeyned one Romanus to the Sea of Rochester. Beda.li.2.

About the same tyme, the people of the north partes beyond Humber receyued the fayth, by occasion (as after shall appeare.)

Ye haue heard how Edelfred the king of Northumberlande was slaine in battaile, neare to the water of Idle, by Redwald king of the East Angles, in fauour of Edwin, whom the sayd Edelfred had confined oute of hys Dominion. xxiij. yeares before.

The forsayde Redwald therefore hauing obteyned that victorie, founde meanes to place Edwyne in gouernment of that Kingdome of the Northumbers, hauing a tytle thereto as sonne to Alla, or Elle, sometyme King of Northumberlande.

Edwyn.

THis Edwyn proued a ryght valiant prince, and grewe to be of more power than any other King in those dayes of the English Nation: not onely ruling ouer a great parte of the Countreys inhabited with Englishe menne, but also with Brytaynes, which Brytaynes inhabyted not onelye in Wales, but also as yet in parte of Chesshire, Lancashire, Cumberlande, and alongest by the West Sea coast in Galloway, and so forth eue vnto Dunbrytain in Scotland: which I haue thought good to note, that it may appeare in what Countreys Cadwallo bare rule, of whome so often mention is made in this part of the Hystorie. Beda.li.2.

But as concerning Edwyn: his reputation was such, as not onely the English men, Brytaynes and Scottes, but also the Iles of Orkney, and those of Man, and other the West Iles of auncient tyme called Meuania, had him in reuerence uerence, and feared his mightie power, ſo as they durſt not attempt any exployte to the offence of him.

Wil. Malmesb. Mat. Westm. to be Angl.

It chaunced alſo that ſhortly after king Redwalde had aduaunced him to the Kingdome of Northumberlande, by. aboute fiue yeares, the ſame Redwalde deceaſſed, whiche made greatly for the more augmentation of Edwyns power. For the people of the Eaſt Angles, which whileſt Edwyn remayned amongeſt them as a baniſhed man, had conceyued a good opinion of him, for his approued valiancie and noble courage, offered themſelues to bee wholy at his commaundement.

But Edwyn ſuffering Carpwalde or Erpwalde the ſonne of Redwalde to enioy the bare tytle and name of king of that Countrey, ruled al things at his owne will and pleaſure. Neither was there any Prouince within Brytaine that did not obey him, or was not ready to do him ſeruice (the kingdome of Kent onely excepted) for he ſuffered the Kentiſhmen to liue in quiet, becauſe he began to haue a lyking vnto the ſiſter of king Eadbald, the Lady Ethelburga, otherwiſe named Tate, or Tace.

He made requeſt therefore by ſending Ambaſſadours to hir brother, to haue the fayde Ladie in mariage: and at length obteyned hir, with condition that ſhee being a Chriſtian woman, might not onely vſe the Chriſtian religion, but alſo that all thoſe, whether men or women, prieſtes or miniſters, which came with hir, might haue licence to doe the ſame, without trouble or impeachment of any maner of perſon. Hereupon ſhe being ſent vnto him, there was appoynted to goe with hir, (beſide many other) one Pauline, which was conſecrated Biſhop, by the Archbiſhop Juſtus, the xxj. of July, in the yeare of our Lorde. 625.

At his comming into Northumberlande, thus in companie of Ethelburga, hee trauayled earneſtly in his office, both to preſerue hir and ſuch Chriſtians in the fayth of Chriſt, as were appoynted to giue theyr attendaunce on hir, leaſt they ſhoulde chaunce to fall: and alſo ſought to winne ſome of the Pagans if it were poſſible vnto the ſame fayth, though at the firſt he little profited in that matter.

In the yeare following, there came a murtherer vnto the Court of King Edwyn, as then ſoiourning in a Palace whiche ſtoode vppon the ſyde of the Ryuer of Dorwent, being ſent from Quichelme King of the Weſt Saxons, to the intent to murther Edwyn, becauſe hee had of late ſore endomaged the Countreys of the weſt Saxons.

This murtherer was called Eumerus, and caried vnder his cote a ſhort double edged Woodknife enuenomed of purpoſe, that if the King beeing but a little hurt therewith, ſhoulde not die of the wound, yet he ſhould not eſcape the daunger of the poyſon.

On Eaſter Monday this Eumerus came to the King, and making forth to hym as it had beene to haue declared ſome meſſage from his Maiſter, when hee had eſpyed his tyme, he drewe hys weapon, and offered to ſtryke the King. But one of the Kings ſeruaunts named Lylla, perceyuing thys, ſtept betwixt the King and the blowe. But yet the murtherer ſette the ſtryke forwarde wyth ſuche force, that the knife running through the bodie of Lylla, wounded alſo the King a little: and before this murtherer coulde bee beaten downe, he ſlue another of the Kings ſeruaunts, a knight that attended vpon him called Forther. Eumerus.

The ſame night Queene Ethelburga was delyuered of a daughter named Euſted, for the whiche when King Edwyn gaue thankes vnto his Goddes, in the preſence of Biſhop Paulyne, Euſted borne.

the Biſhop did admoniſh him, rather to giue thankes vnto the true and onely God, by whoſe goodnes it came to paſſe that ỹ Queene was ſafely and without daunger delyuered. The King giuing good eare vnto the Biſhops wholeſome admonition, promiſed at that preſente to become a Chriſtian, if hee myghte reuenge hys iniuryes receyued at the handes of the Weſt Saxons, and to aſſure Pauline that his promiſe ſhoulde take place, hee gaue vnto him hys newe borne daughter to be made holy to the lord, that is to ſay, baptiſed.

The Biſhoppe receyuing hir, on Whitſunday nexte following baptyſed hir, with twelue other of the Kings houſeholde, ſhee beeyng the fyrſte of the Engliſhe Northumbers that was ſo waſhed in the Fountayne of Regeneration.

In the meane tyme King Edwyn being recouered of his hurt, aſſembled an army, and went agaynſt the Weſt Saxons, with whom encountring in battaile, he eyther ſlue or brought to his ſubiection all them that had conſpyred his death. And ſo returned as a conquerour into his cuntry. But yet he delayed time for performance of his promiſe to become a chriſtian: howbeit he had left his doing of sacrifice to Idols, euer since he made promise to be baptised.

He was a sage Prince, and before he would alter his Religion, he politikely thought good to heare matters touching bothe hys olde Religion, and the Christian Religion throughlye examined.

And whilest he thus hangeth in doubt to whether part he should encline, there came letters to him from Pope Boniface the fift of that name, exhorting him by sundrie kinds of gentle perswasions, to turne to the worshipping of the true and liuing God, and to renounce the worshipping of Mawmets and Idols.

Beda lib. 2. cap. 10.

The Pope likewise wrote to Queene Ethelburga, praying hir to cõtinue in hir good purpose, and by all meanes possible to doe what might bee done for the converting of hir husbande vnto the fayth of Christ.

Bede. lib. 2. cap. 11.

But the thing that most moued the king, was a vision which sometime he had while hee remained as a banished man in the Court of Redwald king of the East Angles, as thus:

A vision.

After that king Ethelfred was informed howe that the forsayde Redwalde had receyued Edwin, he ceassed not by his Ambassadours to moue Redwalde eyther to deliuer Edwyn into hys handes, or else to make him away.

Bede. cap. 12.

At length by often sending, and promises made of large summes of money, mixed with threatnings, he obteyned a graunt of his sayte, so that it was determined that Edwyn should eyther bee murthered, or else deliuered into his enimyes handes.

One of Edwynes friendes hauing intelligence hereof, in the night season came to Edwyns Chamber, and taking him forth abroade, tolde him the whole practise, and what was purposed agaynst him, offering to helpe him out of the countrey, if he would so aduenture to escape.

The honorable consideration of Edwin.

Edwyne being wonderously amazed, thanked his friend, but refused yet to depart the Countrey, sith hee had no iust cause outwardly giuen to play suche a slipper parte, chosing rather to ieoparde his lyfe wyth honour, than to giue men cause to thinke that hee had first broken promise with such a Prince as Redwalde was, to whom he had giuen his fayth.

Herevpon his friende departing from him, left him sitting without the doores: where after hee had reuolued many things in his mind, & thought long vpon this matter, at length he perceyued one to come towards him vnknowne, & in straunge apparell, seeming to him in euery point a straunger, at which sight for that he could not imagine who he should be, Edwyn was much afrayde: but the man comming to him saluted him, and asked of him what he made there that time of the night when other were at rest. Edwyn on the other part asked what hee had to doe therewith, and whether he vsed to lie abroade in the night, or within house: who aunswering sayde: Thinke not Edwyn that I am ignorant of thy heauinesse, of thy watching, and this thy solitarie sitting here withoute dores. For I knowe who thou art, wherefore thou art thus pensife, and what euilles thou feareſt to be towardes thee at hande. But tell me, what wouldest thou giue him, that coulde deliuer thee out of this heauinesse, and perswade Redwalde that hee should neyther do thee hurt nor delyuer thee to thine enimyes? Herewith when Edwyn sayde, that he would gladly giue all that in him might lye to suche a one in rewarde: the other added: what wouldst thou thē giue, if he should promise in good sooth that (all thy enimies beeing destroyed) thou shouldest be king, and that thou shouldest passe in power all the Kings whiche haue raigned in the English nation before thy time?

Edwyn then beyng better come to himselfe by such demaundes, did not sticke to promise that he would requite his friendship with worthy thāks.

Then replyed he to his wordes and sayde. If he that shall prophecie to thee this good happe to come, shall also be able to enfourme thee such coũsail for thy health & life as neuer any of thy forefathers or kinsfolke yet haue heard, wouldest thou obey him, and consent to receiue his wholsom aduertisement? Wherevnto without further deliberation Edwin promised, that he would in all points folow the instruction of him that should deliuer him out of so many and greate calamities, and bring him to the rule of a kingdome. Which answere being got, this person that thus talked with him, layde his hande vppon his heade, saying, when thys thereforе shall chaunce to thee, bee not forgetfull of this tyme, nor of this communication, and those things that thou nowe doest promise, see thou performe. And therewyth he banished away, so that Edwin might well perceyue it was no manne but a vision that thus had appeared vnto him.

And as he satte still reioysing of this comfortable talke, but yet thoughtfull in his mynde what he should be, or from whence he came that had talked in this sort with him. Beholde hys friende returned that first had brought him forth of his Chamber, and declared vnto him good newes, howe the King by the perswasion of the Queene had altered his determination, and minded to maintayne his quarell to the vttermost of his power: and so hee did in deede: for wyth all diligence hee raysed an armie, and went agaynst Edelfride, banquished him in battaile, and placed Edwyn in the Kingdome (as before yee haue heard.)

Herevpon

Hereuppon whileſt King Edwyn (as before is mentioned) deferred tyme ere he would receyue the Chriſtian fayth, Pauline one dayt came vnto him as he ſat muſing what hee were beſt to do, and layd his hand vpon his head, aſking him if he knew that ſigne: whereupon when the king would haue fallen downe at his feete, he lift him vp, and as it were in familiar wiſe thus ſayd vnto him: Behold, by the aſſyſtance of Gods fauour thou haſt eſcaped the handes of thyne enimyes, whom thou ſtoodeſt in dread of: Behold through hys bounteous liberalitie, thou haſt atteyned the Kingdome which thou diddeſt deſire, remember then that thou delay not time to perfourme the thirde thing that thou diddeſt promiſe, in receyuing his fayth, and keeping his cõmaundements, which deliuering thee from worldly aduerſities, hath thus aduaunced thee to the honor of a king: and if from henceforth thou wilt obey his will, which by my mouth hee ſetteth forth & preacheth to thee and other, he will deliuer thee from euerlaſting torments, and make thee partaker wyth him in his celeſtiall kingdome.

It is to be thought that the viſion which the K. had in times paſt receiued, was in ſpirite reuealed vnto Pauline, whereupon without delay of time he put him in remembrance of it in maner as aboue is mentioned.

The king hauing heard his words, anſwered, that he would & ought to receyue the fayth which he taught, but firſt he woulde conferre with hys nobles, and if they would agree to do the like, then would they be baptiſed altogither at one time.

Pauline ſatiſfied herewith, Edwin did as hee had promiſed, calling togither the wiſeſt men of his realme, and of them aſked the queſtion what they thought of this diuinitie, which was preached vnto them by Paulyn, vnto whom his chief Biſhop named Coifi, incontinently made this anſwere, that ſurely the religion which they had hytherto followed was nothing worth. For ſayth he, there is none of thy people that hath more reuerently worſhipped our Gods than I haue done, and yet be there many that haue receyued farre greater benefites at thy handes than I haue done: and therefore if our Goddes were of any power, then would they rather helpe me to high honours and dignitie than others.

Therefore if it may be founde that this newe Religion is better and more auaileable than oure olde, let vs wyth all ſpeede embrace the ſame. Finally, when other of the Kings Counſayle and men of high authoritie gaue theyr conſents, that this doctrine which Pauline taught ought to be receyued, if therein appeared more certaintie of ſaluation than could be found in the other: at length the king gaue licence to Pauline openly to preach the Goſpell, and renouncing his worſhipping of falſe gods, profeſſeth the chriſtian fayth.

And when he demaunded of his Biſhop Coifi who ſhoulde firſt deface the aulters of their Idols and the tabernacles with the whiche they were compaſſed about, he anſwered, that hee himſelfe would do it. For what is more meete (ſayth hee) thã that I, which through fooliſhneſſe haue worſhipped them, ſhould nowe for example take deſtroy the ſame, through wiſedome giuen me from the true & liuing God? And ſtreight ways throwing away the ſuperſtition of vanitie, required armour and weapõ of the king, with a ſtoned horſe, vpon the which he being mounted, rode forth to deſtroy the Idols.

This was a ſtraunge ſight to the people: for it was not lawfull to the Biſhop of their lawe to put on armour, or to ride on any beaſt, except it were a Mare. He hauing therefore a ſwore gyrde to him, toke a ſpeare in his hande, and riding on the kings horſe, went to the place where the Idols ſtode. The common people that beheld him had thought he had beene ſtarke mad, and out of his wittes: but hee without longer deliberation, incontinently vpon his comming to the temple, began to deface the ſame, and in contempt threw his ſpeare againſt it, and reioyſing greatly in the knowledge of the worſhipping of the true God, commaunded his company to deſtroy and burne downe the ſame temple with all the aulters.

This place where ẏ Idols were ſomtime worſhipped was not farre from Yorke, towardes the Eaſt part of the riuer of Derwent, and is called Gotmundin Gaham, where the foreſayd Biſhop by the inſpiration of God defaced and deſtroyed thoſe aulters which he himſelfe had hallowed.

King Edwyn therefore with all the nobilitie, and a great nũber of his people, receyued the faith and were baptized, in the yeare of our Lorde. 627. in the tenth yeare of his raigne, and about the. 178 yeare after the firſt comming of the Engliſh men into this lande. Hee was baptiſed at Yorke on Eaſter day (which fel that yere the day before the Ides of Aprill) in the Church of S. Peter the Apoſtle, which hee had cauſed to bee erected vp of timber vpon the ſodaine for that purpoſe, and afterwards began the foũdation of the ſame church in ſtone worke of a larger compaſſe, comprehending within it that Oratorie which hee had firſt cauſed to be built: but before he coulde finiſh the worke, he was ſlaine (as after ſhall bee ſhewed, leauing it to be perfourmed of his ſucceſſor Oſwalde. Pauline continued from thenceforth during the kings life, which was fiue yeares after, in preaching the goſpel in that prouince, conuerting an innumerable nũber of people to the fayth of Chriſt, amongeſt the whiche were Oſtride, and Eadfride, the ſonnes of Edwyn, which he begotte in tyme of hys baniſhment, of his wife

Quinburge, the daughter of Ceorlus King of Mercia. Also afterwardes his children begot on his seconde wife Ethelburga, that is to say, a son called Edilhunus, and a daughter named Edil-Ediltrudis. trudis: and another sonne called Buttfrea; of the which the two first died in theyr Cradels, and were buryed in the Church at Yorke. To bee briefe: by the kings assystance and fauour shewed vnto Pauline in the worke of the Lorde, greate multitudes of people daply receyued the fayth, and were baptised of Pauline in manye places, but specially in the Ryuer of Gleuy wythin the Prouince of Bernicia, and also in Swale in the Prouince of Deira: For as yet in the begynning this of the Church in those Countreys, no temples or fountes could be buylded or erected in so short a time.

Of such great zeale was Edwyn (as it is reported) towards the setting forth of Gods truth, that hee perswaded Carpwalde the Sonne of
This chaunced in the yeare 632 as hath Math. West. Redwalde King of the Eastangles to abandon the superstitious worshypping of Idolles, and to receyue the fayth of Christ with all hys whole Prouince.

His father Redwalde was baptised in Kent long before this time, but in vaine: for returning Redwald king of Eastangles baptised. home, through counsayle of his wife and other wicked persons, he was seduced, and being turned from the sincere puritie of fayth, his last doings were worse than his first, so that according to Carpwalde woulde serue God and the diuell. the manner of the olde Samaritanes, he would seeme both to serue the true God, and his false Goddes (which before time he had serued) and in one selfe Churche, had at one time both the Sacraments of Christ ministred at one aulter, and Sacrifice made vnto Diuels at another.

But Carpwalde within a while after he had receyued the fayth, was slaine by one of his owne Countrey men that was an Ethnicke, called Richbert, and then after his death, that Prouince for the terme of three yeares was wrapped eftsones in errour, tyll that Sybert, or Sigibert, Sibert or Sigibert. the brother of Carpwalde, a moste Christian Prince, and verie well learned, obteyned the rule of that kingdome, who whilest hee liued a banished man in France during his brothers life time, was baptised there, and became a Christian: and when he came to be king, hee caused all his Prouince to be partaker of the same fountaine of life wherein he had beene dipped himselfe.

Unto his godly purpose also, a Bishop of the parties of Burgoigne named Felix was a great furtherer, who comming ouer vnto the Archebishop of Canterburie Honorius that was successour vnto Justus, and declaring vnto him his earnest desire, was sent by the same Archbishop to preache the worde of life vnto the Eastangles, which he did with such good successe, that he conuerted the whole countrey to the fayth of Jesus Christ, and placed the Sea of his Bishoprike at
A Bishop ordeyned at Dunwich. Dunwich, ending the course of his life there in peace, after he had continued in that his Bishoplyke office the space of .xvij. yeares.

Moreouer Pauline after that he had conuerted the Northumbers, hee preached the worde of Beda.li. cap.16.

God vnto them of Lindsey, whiche is a parte of Lincolnshire: and first he perswaded Blecca
This ch in the ye 628. as Mat. P the gouernor of the Citie of Lincoln to turne vnto Christ togither with all his familie.

In that Citie he also buylded a Churche of stone worke.

Thus Pauline trauailed in the worke of the lord, the same being greatly furthered by the help of Edwin, in whose presence he baptised a greate number of people in the riuer of Trent, neare to a towne the which in the olde English tongue was called Tiouulfingaceaster. This Pauline had with him a deacon named James, the which shewed himselfe verie diligent in the ministerie, and profited greatly therein.

But now to returne to king Edwin, who was a prince verily of worthy fame, and for the politike ordering of his Countreys and obseruing of Vvil. iustice, deserued highly to be commended: for in his time all robbers by the high way were so banished out of his dominions, that a woman with hir new borne childe alone without other companie might haue trauayled from sea to sea, and not haue encountred with any creature that durst once haue offered hir iniurie.

He was also verie carefull for the aduaunce-Mat.P ment of the commoditie and common wealth of Beda.li. his people, insomuch that where there were any touch the same but for that vse: he vsed whersoeuer he went within the Cities or elsewhere abrode, to haue a banner borne before him, in token of Iustice to be ministred by hys royall authoritie.

In the meane season, Pope Honorius the fift, hearing that the Northumbers had receyued the fayth as before is mencioned at the preaching of Pauline, sent vnto the sayde Pauline the Pall, confirming him Archbishop in the Sea of Yorke.

He sent also letters of exhortation vnto king Edwin, to kindle him the more with fatherly admonicion, to continue and proceede in the waye of vnderstanding, into the which he was entered.

At the same time also, because Iustus the Archbishop of Canterburie was deade, and one Honorius elected to that Sea, Pope Honorius sente vnto the foresayde Honorius the elect Archbishoppe of Canterburie, his Pall, with letters, wherein was contayned a decree by him of made, that when eyther the Archbishoppe of Canterburie or Yorke chaunced to depart thys life, he that survived should haue authoritie to ordeyne another in place of him that was deceassed, that they shoulde not neede to wearie themselues with going to Rome, being so farre distant from them. The copie of whiche letter is regystred in the Ecclesiasticall Hystorie of Beda, bearing date the thirde Ides of June in the yeare of our Lorde. 633.

The same Pope sent letters also to the Scottish people exhorting them to celebrate the feast of Easter in such due time as other Churches of the Christian world observed: and also because the Heresie of the Pelagians began to renue againe amongest them, (as he was enformed) hee admonished them to beware therof, and by all meanes to auoyde it.

The feast of Easter.

The heresie of the Pelagians.

But now that the Kingdome of Northumberland flourished, as before is partly touched, in happie state vnder the prosperous raigne of Edwyn, at length after he had gouerned it the space of .xvij. yeares, Cadwalline, or Cadwallo King of Brytaynes, who succeeded Cadwane, as Gal. Mon. hath, rebelled against him: for so it commeth to passe, that nothing can be so sure conteyned by mans power, but the same by the lyke power may be againe destroyed.

Cadwallin, or Cadwallo king of Brytayne.

Penda king of Mercia.

Penda king of Mercia enuying the prosperous proceedings of king Edwin, procured Cadwallo to moue this rebellion against Edwin: & ioyning his power with Cadwallo, they inuaded the countrey of Northumberland lewdly togither. Edwyn hereof aduertised, gathered his people, and came to encounter them, so that both the armies met at a place called Hatfield, where was fought a right sore and bloudie battaile. But in the end Edwin was slain with one of his sonnes named Osfrid, and his army beaten downe & dispersed. Also there was slain on Edwyns part, Godbald K. of Orkney. Moreouer there was another of Edwyns sonnes named Edfride, constrayned of necessitie to gyue himself into the hands of Penda, and was after by him cruelly put to death (contrarie to his promised fayth) in king Oswaldes dayes, that succeeded Edwyn.

Thus did king Edwin end his life in that battaile, fought at Hatfield afforesayde, on the fourth Ides of October, in the yeare of our Lorde. 633. Mat. VVest. hee being then aboute the age of .xlvij. yeares and vpwardes.

Cadwal and Penda hauing obteyned this victorie, vsed it most cruelly. For one of the Captaynes was a Pagan, and the other wanting all ciuilitie, shewed himselfe more cruell than any Pagan coulde haue done. So that Penda being a worshipper of false Goddes with all his people of Mercia, and Cadwallo hauing no respect to the christian religion which lately was begonne amongst the Northumbers, made hauocke in all places where they came, not sparing man, woman nor childe: and so continued in their furious outrage a long time, in passing through the countrey, to the great decay and calamitie of the christian congregations in those parties. And still the Christian Brytaines were lesse mercifull than Penda his heathenish souldiers. For euē vnto the dayes of Beda (as he affyrmeth) the Brytains made no account of the fayth or religion of the Englishmen, nor would communicate with them more than with Pagans, because they differed in rites from their accustomed traditions.

The Archbishop Pauline fleeth into Kent.

When the countrey of the Northumbers was brought into this miserable case by the enimies inuasion, the Archbishop Pauline taking wyth him the Queen Ethelburga, whō he had brought thither, returned nowe againe with hir by water into Kent, where he was honourably receyued of the Archbishop Honorius, and king Eadbald. He came thither in the conduct of one Bassus a valiant man of warre, hauing with him Eaufred the daughter, & Vulfrea the son of Edwyn and also Yffi the son of Osfride Edwins sonne, whō their mother after for feare of the kings Edbold & Oswald did send into France, where they died.

The Church of Rochester at that time was destitute of a Bishop, by the death of Romanus, who being sent to Rome vnto Pope Honorius, was drowned by the waye in the Italian Seas. Wherevppon at the request of the Archebyshoppe Honorius, and King Eadbald, Pauline toke vpon hym the charge of that See, and helde it till he dyed.

Beda lib. 3. cap. 1.

Ostrike king of Deira.

After that Edwyn was slaine in battaile (as before yee haue hearde) Ostrike the sonne of his Uncle Elfricke, toke vpon hym the rule of the Kingdome of Deira, which had receyued the sacrament of Baptisme by the preaching and vertuous instruction of Pauline.

Eufred king of Bernicia.

But the other kingdome of Northumberlande called Bernicia, Eaufride the sonne of Edelfred or Edelfride, toke vpon him to gouerne.

This Eaufride during the time of Edwins raigne, had continued in Scotland, and there being conuerted to the Christian fayth was baptised. But both these Princes after they had obteyned possession of theyr earthly kingdomes, dyd forget the care of the heauenly kingdome, so that they returned to their olde kind of Idolatrie. But the almightie God did not long suffer this theyr vnthankfulnesse without iust punishment: for first in the next Sommer, when Ostrike had rashlye besieged Cadwallo King of the Brytaynes, within a certayne Towne, Cadwallo brake forth vpon hym, and fynding him vnprouided to make resystance, slue him with all his armie.

The two kings of Northumberland slain.

And after thys, whilest Cadwallo not like a Conquerour gouerned the Prouynces of the Northumbers, but lyke a Tyran wasted and destroyed them, in slaying the people in tragicall manner, hee also slue Eaufride, the whiche with twelue menne of warre, came vndiscretely vnto him to sue for peace, and thus within lesse than twelue Monethes space both these renegate kings were dispatched.

Then Oswalde, the sonne of Edelfred, and brother to the foresayde Eaufride was created K. of the Northumbers, the first in number from Ida.

Oswa... begannet raigne in yeare. 63... Beda lib. cap. 3.

This Oswalde after that his father was slaine, liued as a banished person a long time within Scotlande, where he was baptised, and professed the christian religion, and passed the flower of his youth in good exercises, both of minde and bodie.

Amongst other things, he practised the vnderstanding of warlike knowledge, minding so to vse it, as it might stande him in steade to defende himselfe from iniurie of the enimies that shoulde prouoke him, and not otherwise.

Herevpon Cadwallo King of the Brytayns made in maner no account of him: for by reason that he had atchieued such great victories agaynst the Englishe men, and hauing slaine theyr two Kings (as before is expressed) he ceassed not to proceede in hys tyrannicall doynges, reputing the Englishe people for slouthfull, and not apt to the warre, boasting that he was borne to their destruction.

And thus being set vp in pryde of courage, he feared no perilles, but boldely without considering at al the skilful knowledge which Oswald had sufficiently learned in feates of warres, toke vppon hym to assayle the foresayde Oswalde, that had broughte an armie agaynst hym, and was encamped in a playne fielde, neare vnto the Wall whiche the Romaines had buylded in tymes past agaynst the inuasion of Scottes and Pictes.

Cadwallo straight prouoked Oswald to trie the matter by battaile, but Oswalde forbare the first day, and caused a Crosse to bee erected in the same place where he was encamped, in full hope that it should be an ensigne or trophy of his victorie, causing all souldiers to make their prayers to God, that in time of such necessitie, it might please him to succour them that worshipped him.

It

It is ſayde, that the Croſſe being made, and the hole digged wherein it ſhoulde be ſet, he toke the Croſſe in his owne handes, and putting the foote thereof into that hole, ſo helde it till his ſouldiers had filled the hole, and rammed it vp: And then cauſed al the ſouldiers to kneele downe vpon their knees, and to make interceſſion to the true and liuing God for his aſſiſtãce agaynſt ỹ proud enimie, with whõ they ſhould fight in a iuſt quarel for the preſeruation of their people & countrey.

After this, in the next morning he boldly giueth battaile to his enimies, ſo that a ſore and cruell fight enſued betwixt them. At length Oſwald perceyued that the Brytaynes beganne ſomewhat to faint, and therfore he cauſed his people to renue their force, and more luſtily to preaſſe forwarde, ſo that firſt he put that moſt cruell enimie to flight, and after purſuing the chaſe, ouertoke him, and ſlue him with the moſt part of all his huge and mightie armie, at a place called Beda. VVil. Malm.

Denilleborne, but the place where hee cauſed the Croſſe to be erected, height Heuenfield.

And thus Cadwallo the moſt cruell enimie of the Engliſh name ended his life: He was terrible both in nature & countenance, for the which cauſe they ſay the Brytaynes did afterwards ſet vp his Image, that the ſame might bee a terrour to the enimies when they ſhoulde beholde it.

But here is to bee remembred by the Britiſh Hiſtorie of Eal. Mon. it ſhoulde appeare that Cadwallo was not ſlaine at all, but raigned victoriouſly for the ſpace of. xlviij. yeares, and then departed this life, as in place afterwards it ſhall appeare. But for that the contrarietie in writers in ſuch poyntes may ſooner be perceyued than reformed to the ſatiſfying of mennes fancies whiche are variable, wee will leaue euery man to his libertie to thinke as ſeemeth him good, noting now and then the diuerſitie of ſuche writers, as occaſion ſerueth.

mind banquiſhed with greatneſſe of buſineſſe, but theſe his vertues were matched with notable vices, as firſt with ſuch bitterneſſe of maners as had not beene heard of, crueltie of nature, lack of curteſie, great vnſtedfaſtneſſe in performing of word and promiſe, and of vnmeaſurable hatred toward the Chriſtian religion.

Vpon confidence put in theſe his great vertues and vices from time that he was made king as though the whole Ile had beene due to him, he thought not good to let any occaſion paſſe that was offered to make warre, as well agaynſt his friendes and confederates, as alſo agaynſt hys owne ſworne enimyes. Part of his doings ye haue heard, and more ſhall appeare hereafter.

Of the kings of the Eaſt Saxons and Eaſt Angles, ye haue heard before: of whom in places conuenient yee ſhall finde further mention alſo, and ſo likewiſe of the kings of the South Saxons: but bycauſe theyr kingdome continued not paſt fiue ſucceſſions, little remembrance of them is made by writers.

Penda the ſon of Wilba ſucceeded in the gouernmẽt of the kingdom of Mercia, after Ciarlus, & beganne hys raigne in the yeare of oure Lord. 626.

He was fiftie yeares of age before he came to bee king, and raigned. xxx. yeares, he was a Prince right hardie and aduenterous, not fearing to ieopard his perſon in place of danger, aſſured & rather of remembrance in time of greateſt perill. His body could not be ouercome with any trauaile, nor his Cadwallo or Cadwalline.

Cadwallo, or Cadwalline, for we finde him ſo alſo named, began his raigne ouer the Britains in the yere of our Lord. 635. in the yeare of the raigne of the Emperour Heraclius. 35. and in the. xij. yeare of Dagobert king of France.

Of this man ye haue heard partly before touching his dealings and warres agaynſt the Northumbers, thumbers, and other of the Engliſh Nation: but forſomuch as diuerſe other things are reported of him by the Brytiſh writers, wee haue thought good in this place to rehearſe the ſame in part, as in Gal. Mon. we finde written, leauing the credite ſtill with the authour, ſith the truth thereof may the more be ſuſpected, becauſe other Authours of good authoritie, as Beda, Henrie Huntington, William Malm. and other, ſeeme greatly to diſagree from him herein. But thus is it written.

This Cadwallo, and Edwyn the ſonne of Ethelfred, as Galfride ſayth, were brought vp in Fraunce, being ſent thither vnto Salomon king of Brytaine, by king Cadwane, when they were verie yong: and that after their returne into thys lande, when they were made kings, Cadwall of the Brytaynes, and Edwyne of the Northumbers, there continued for the ſpace of two yeares great friendſhip betwixt them, till at length Edwyn requyred of Cadwallo that he might weare a Crowne, and celebrate appointed ſolemnities within his dominion of Northumberlande, as well as Cadwall did in his Countrey. Cadwall taking aduice in this matter, at length by perſwaſion of his nephew Brian, denied to graunt vnto Edwin his requeſt, wherwith Edwin tooke ſuch diſpleaſure, that he ſent word vnto Cadwal, that he would be crowned without his leaue or licence, ſith he would not willingly graūt it: whervnto Cadwal anſwered, that if he ſo did, he wold cut off his head vnder his diademe, if he preſumed to weare any within the cōfines of Britain. Hereof diſcord ariſing betwixt theſe two princes, they began to make fierce and cruell warre either of them againſt the other, and at length ioyning in battail with their maine armies, Cadwall loſt the field, with many thouſands of his men, and being chaſed, fled into Scotlande, and from thence got ouer into Ireland, and finally paſſed the ſeas into Brytain Armorike, where of his couſin king Salomon he was curteouſly receyued, and at length obteyned of him. x. M. men to go with him backe into his cūtry to aſſiſt him in recouery of his lāds and dominions, the which in the meane time were cruelly ſpoiled, waſted, & haried by king Edwin.

Edwin was not ſonne to Ethelfred but to Alla, or Elle, as in other places it plainly ap-

Cadwall quiſhed Edwyn.

Cadwal fleeth to Iande.

The ſame time, Brian the nephew of Cadwallo whom he had ſent into Britain a little before for to lea a certaine wiſard or ſouthſayer, which K. Edwin had gotte out of Spain, named Pelitus, that by diſcloſing the purpoſe of Cadwallo vnto Edwin greatly hindred Cadwallocs enterpriſes, had fortified the Citie of Exeter, meaning to defende it till the comming of Cadwallo, wherupon Penda king of Mercia beſieged that Citie with a mightie armie, purpoſing to take it, and Brian within it. Cadwallo then aduertiſed hereof, immediately after his arriuall haſted to Exeter, and deuiding his people into foure parts, ſet vpon his enimies, & tooke Penda, and ouerthrew his whole armie. Penda hauing no other ſhift to eſcape, ſubmitted himſelf wholy vnto Cadwallo, promiſing to become his liegemā, to fight againſt the Saxons in his quarell. And this Penda being ſubdued, Cadwallo called his nobles togither which had bene diſperſed abrode a long ſeaſon, and with all ſpeede went againſt Edwyn king of Northumberlande, and ſlue him in battaile at Hatfielde (as before is mencioned) with his ſonne Offride, and Godbold, king of the Iles of Orkney, which was come thither to his ayde.

By this it ſhould appeare, that Fabian hath gathered amiſſe in the account of the raignes of the Brytiſh kings: for it appeareth by Beda and others, that Edwyn was ſlayne in the yeare of our Lorde. 634. 634

And where Fabian (as before is ſayd) attributeth that acte & diuerſe other vnto Cadwan the father father of this Cadwallo: yet both Gal. Mon. and Beda, with the most part of all other writers, signifie that it was done by Cadwallo.

Harding assigneth but. xiij. yeares vnto the raigne of Cadwan, and declareth that he dyed in the yeare of our Lorde. 616. in the which yeare as he sayeth) Cadwallo began his raigne, which his opinion seemeth best to agree with that which is written by other authors.

But to returne to the other doings of Cadwallo, as we finde them recorded in the Brytishe Hystorie.

After hee had got this victorie agaynste the Northumbers, he cruelly pursued the Saxons, as though he ment so farre as in him lay, to destroye the whole race of them oute of the landes of all Brytayne: and sending Penda agaynst King Oswalde that succeeded Edwin, though at the first Penda receyued the ouerthrowe at Heauenfielde, yet afterwardes Cadwallo hymselfe highlye displeased with that chaunce, pursued Oswalde, and fought with hym at a place called Bourne, where Penda slue the sayd Oswalde.

After that Oswalde was slayne, his brother Osuius succeeded him in gouernment of the Northumbers, and sought the fauour of Cadwallo, now ruling as King ouer all Brytayne, and at length by great gyftes of golde and syluer, and vppon his humble submission, hee obteyned peace, tyll at length vpon a spyte, Penda King of Mercia obteyned lycence of Cadwallo to make warres agaynst the sayde Osuius, in the which (as it happened Penda himselfe was slaine.

West.

Then Cadwallo after two yeres graunted that Ulfridus the sonne of Penda shoulde succeede in the kingdome of Mertia.

And thus Cadwallo ruled things at his appoyntment within this lande. And finally when he had raigned. xlviij. yeares, hee departed thys lyfe the. xxij. of Nouember.

West.

His bodie being embalmed and dressed with sweet confections, was put into a brasen Image, by maruellous arte melted and cast, the whiche Image beeing set on a brasen Horse of excellente beautie, the Brytaynes erected aloft vppon the West gate of London called Ludgat, in signe of his victorious conquestes, and for a terror to the Saxons.

And moreouer the Church of Saint Martine standing vnderneath the same gate, was by the Brytains then builded.

Thus haue the Brytaynes made mention of theyr valiaunt Prince Cadwallo, but diuerse men thinke that much of that Hystorie is but fables, because of the dissonance founde therein so manifestly varying both from Beda and other autentike writers (as before I haue sayde.)

But nowe to the truth of the Hystorie touching Oswalde King of the Northumbers, wee finde after that he had tasted of Gods high fauour extended to hymwardes, in vanquishing hys enimyes, as one myndyng to be thankfull therefore, was desirous to restore agayne the Christian fayth through hys whole Kingdome, sore lamenting the decaye thereof wythin the same, and therefore euen in the beginning of his raigne, he sente vnto Donwalde the Scottishe King (with whome hee had beene brought vp in tyme of his banishment the space of. xviij. yeares) requiring him to haue some learned Scottish man sent vnto him, skilfull in preaching the worde of lyfe, that with godly Sermons and wholesome instructions, hee might conuerte the people of Northumberland vnto the true and liuing God, promising to entertaine him with such prouision as apperteyned.

Oswald meaneth to bee thankfull to God for his benefites. Beda. li. 3. ca. 3. 5. 6. Hector. Bo.

At his instance there was sent vnto him one Corman. Corman, a Clerke singularly well learned, and of great grauitie in behauiour: but for that he wanted such facilitie, and plaine vtterance by waye of gentle perswading, as is requisite in him that shal instruct the simple, onely setting forth in his Sermons high mysteries, & matters of such profound knowledge, as vnethe the verie learned might perceyue the perfect sense and meaning of his talke, his trauaile came to small effect, so that after a yeares remayning there, he turned into his countrey declaring amongest his brethren of the clergie, that the people of Northumberlande was a froward, stubburn & stiffe harted generatiō, whose minds he could not frame by any good meanes of perswasion to receiue the christian faith: so that he iudged it lost labor to spende more time amongst them being so vnthankfull & intractable a people, as no good might be done vpon them.

Amongst other learned and vertuous prelates of the Scots, there chaunced one to be there present at the same time called Aydan, a man of so perfite life, that as Beda writeth) he taught no otherwise than he liued, hauing no regarde to the cares of this world, but whatsoeuer was giue him by kings or men of welth and riches, that he freely bestowed vpon the poore, exhorting other to do the lyke. Aydan.

This Aydane hearing Cormans words, perceiued anon that the fault was not so much in the people, as in the teacher, & therefore declared, ỹ (as he thought) although it were so that the people of Northūberland gaue no such attentiue eare vnto the preaching of that reuerend prelate Cormā, as his godly expectation was they should haue done, yet might it be that his vttring of ouer many mystical articles amongst the, far aboue the capacity of the vnderstanding of simple men, was ỹ cause why they so lightly regarded his diuine instructions, whereas if he had (according to the counsaile of Saint Paule) at the first ministred vnto theyr tender vnderstādings, only milke without harder nourishments, he might happely haue wonne a farre greater number of them vnto the receyuing of the fayth, and so haue framed them by lyttle and lyttle to haue disgested stronger foode. And therefore hee thought it necessarie in discharge of theyr duetyes towardes God, and to satisfie the earnest zeale of King Oswalde, that some one amongest them myght bee appoynted to goe againe into Northumberlande, to trie by proceeding in this maner afore alledged, what profite woulde thereof ensue.

The Bysshoppes hearing the opinion of Aydane, and therewith knowing Colmans maner of preaching, iudged the matter to bee as Aydane had declared, and therevppon not onely allowed his wordes, but also willed him to take the iourney vppon him, sithe they knewe none so able, with effect to accomplish theyr wished desires in that behalfe.

Aydan commeth into England to preach the gospell.

Aydane for that he would not seeme to refuse to take that in hande whiche he himselfe had motioned, was contented to satisfie their request, and so set forwarde towardes Northumberland, and comming thither, was ioyfully receyued of King Oswalde, who appoynted him the Ile of Lindelfarne wherein to place the Sea of his newe Bishoprike.

Beda.li.3.ca.3. Hector.Bo.

This Aydane in one point varied from the vse of the newe begon Church of England, that is to witte, touching the time of obseruing the feast of Easter, in like maner as all the Bishoppes of the Scottes and Pictes inhabiting within Brytaine in those dayes did, following therein (as they tooke it) the doctrine of the holy and prayse worthie father Anatholius. But the Scots that inhabited in the South partes of Irelande, alreadie were agreed to obserue that feast, according to the rules of the Church of Rome. But Aydane being thus come into Northumberlande, applyed himself so earnestly in prayer and preaching, that the people had him within short whyle in wonderfull estimation, chiefely for that hee tempered his preachings with suche sweete and pleasaunt matter, that all men had a great desire to heare him, insomuche that sometyme hee was glad to preache abrode in Churche yardes, because the audience was more than coulde haue rowmth in the Church.

One thing was a great hinderance to him, that he had not the perfite knowledge of the Saxons tongue. But Oswald himselfe was a great helpe to him in that matter, who beeing of nothing so much desirous, as to haue the fayth of Christ rooted in the heartes of his subiects, vsed as an interpreter to report vnto the people in their Saxon tongue, such whole Sermons as Aydan vttered in his mother tongue. For Oswalde hauing bene brought vp (as ye haue heard) in Scotlande during the time of his banishment, was as readie in the Scottishe, as he was in the Saxon tongue. Beda. Oswalde an interpreter to the preacher.

The people then seeing the kings earnest desire in furthering the doctrine set forth by Aydan, were the more inclined to heare it: so then it was a maruellous matter to note, what numbers of people dayly offred themselues to be baptised, insomuch that within the space of seauen dayes (as is left in writing) he christened. xv. thousande persons, of the whiche no small parte forsaking the world, betoke thēselues to a solitarie kind of life. Hec. Boet.

Thus by his earnest trauail in continual preaching and setting forth the Gospell in that country, it came to passe in the ende, that the faith was generally receyued of all the people, and such zeale to aduaunce the glorie of the Christian Religion dayly increased amongest them, that no where could be found greater.

Oswaldes zeale to aduaunce religion.

Herevpon were no small number of Churches buylt in all places abrode in those parties by procurement of the king, (all men liberally cōsenting according to the rate of their substance) to be contributaries towardes the charges.

By this meanes the kingdome of the Northumbers flourished, as well in fame of increase in religion, as also in ciuill policie and prudent ordinances: insomuch that (as Bede writeth) Oswald atteyned to suche power, that all the nations and prouinces within Brytaine which were deuided into four tongues (that is to say) Britains, Picts, Scots, and Englishmen, were at his cōmaundement. But yet was he not lift vp in any pride or presumption, but shewed himselfe marueylous curteous and gentle, and very liberal to poore people, and to straungers. Beda.li.3. Oswald his estimation with his subiects.

It is sayde that he being set at the table vppon an Easter day, hauing Bishop Aydan at diner then with him, his Almoner came in as ỹ Bishop was about to say grace, and declared to the king that there was a great multitude of poore folke set before the gates to loke for the kings almes. The king herewith toke a siluer dish which was set on the table before him with meate, & cōmanded the same meat streightways to be destributed amōgst the poore, and the dish broken into small peeces, & deuided amongst thē: for which act he was highly commended of the Bishop, as he well deserued.

By the good pollicie and diligent trauail of this king, the prouinces of Deira and Bernicia, which hitherto had beene at variaunce, were brought to peace and made one.

About the same time, the West Saxons were conuerted to the Christian fayth, by the preaching of one Birinus a Bishop, the whiche came into this lande at the exhortation of Pope Honorius, Beda.li.3. Birinus conuerteth the West Saxons to christian fayth.

Honorius, to ſet forthe the Goſpell vnto thoſe people which as yet were not baptiſed. By his diligent trauell in the Lordes harueſt, Cynigilſus or Kynigils one of the Kings of that countrey receyued the faithe, and was baptiſed about the fiue and twentith yeare of his raigne. King Oſwald that ſhould haue his daughter in marriage, was preſent the ſame time, & firſte ere hee became a ſonne in law, was made a Godfather vnto Kinigils (that ſhould be his father in lawe) by receyuing him at the fontſtone, in that his ſeconde birth of regeneration. This Birinus was an Italian, & now that King Kinigils was become a Chriſtian, he appoynted vnto the ſayd Byrinus the citie of Dorcester, ſituate by the Thames, diſtaunt from Oxforde about ſeuen miles, to be the See of his Biſhoprieke, where he procured Churches to be buylt, and by his earneſt trauell and ſetting forth the word of life, conuerted much people to the right beleefe.

In the yeare folowing, Quichelmus the other King of the Weſt Saxons, and ſonne to Kinigils was alſo chriſtned, and dyed the ſame yeare, and ſo then Cinigilſus or Kinigils raigned alone.

In this meane while Penda King of Mercia that ſucceeded next after Ciarlus, being a mã Hen. Hunt.
giuen to ſeeke trouble in one place or other, leaued warre againſt the Kings of Weſt Saxon, Kinigils and Quichelme, the whiche gathering their power, gaue hym battell at Cirencheſter, where both the parties fought it out to the vttermoſt, as though they had forſworne to giue place one to another, in ſo much that they continued in fighte and in making of cruell ſlaughter till the night parted them in ſunder. And in the morning when they ſaw that if they ſhould buckle together againe, the one parte ſhoulde vtterly deſtroy the other, they fell to agreemente in moderating eache others demaundes.

After this in the yeare of our Lord. 640. Eadbald King of Kent departed this life after hee had raigned. 24. yeares, leauing his Kingdome to hys ſonne Earconbert. This Earconbert was the firſte of the Engliſhe Kings, whiche toke order for the vtter deſtroying of all Idols throughout his whole Kingdome.

He alſo by his royall authoritie, commaunded the faſt of fortie dayes in the Lente ſeaſon to bee kept and obſerued, appoynting worthy and competent puniſhmente againſte the tranſgreſſors of that commaundemente. Hee hadde by hys wife Segburg, that was daughter vnto Anna King of the Eaſt Angles, a daughter named Earcongatha, the whiche was profeſſed a Nonne within the Monaſterie of Brige or Cala in Fraunce: For in theſe dayes, byeauſe there were not many Monaſteries as yet buylded within this land, a great number of Engliſhmen that toke vppon them the profeſſion of a Religious life, gote them ouer vnto Abbeyes in France, and there profeſſed themſelues Monkes: and many there were which ſente their daughters ouer to be profeſſed Nonnes within ye Nunneries there, and ſpecially at Brige, Cale, and Andeley: amongſt other, there were Sedzike the lawfull daughter, and Edelburgh the baſtard daughter of the ſayd King Anna, the whiche both in proceſſe of time were made Abbeiſſes of the ſaide Monaſterie of Brige.

Yee haue hearde already, how Oſwald King of Northumberland bare himſelfe in all poyntes like a moſt worthy Prince, not ceaſing to releeue the neceſſitie of the poore, aduaneing the good, and reforming the euill, whereby hee wanne to hymſelfe exceeding prayſe and commendation of all good men, and ſtill his fame encreaſed for his vertuous doings, namely, for the ardent zeale he had to the aduaneing of the Chriſtian fayth. Hereupon Penda King of Mercia, enuying the proſperous ſperous proceedings of Oſwald, as he that could neuer abyde to heare the good repoꝛt of other mẽs well doings, began to imagine howe to deſtroy hym, and to conquere his Kyngdome that hee might ioyne it to his owne. At length he inuaded his countrey by open warre, met with him in the field at a place called Maſerfield, & there in ſharp and cruell fight Oſwald was ſlayne on the fifth Oſwy King of Northumberland.

Beda.lib.3. cap.14. After that Kyng Oſwalde was ſlaine, his bꝛother Oſwy being about a.30.yeres of age, toke vpon him the rule of the Kingdom of Noꝛthumberland, gouerning ẏ ſame ẅ great trouble foꝛ the ſpace of eyght and twentie yeares, beeing ſoꝛe vexed by the foꝛeſayde Penda Kyng of Mercia and his people, whiche as yet were Paganes.

In the firſt yeare of his raigne, whiche was in the yeare of our Loꝛde. 644. Pauline the Biſhop of Rocheſter whiche had bin alſo Archbiſhoppe of Yoꝛke departed this life, and then one Thamar an Engliſhman of the parties of Kente was oꝛdeyned Biſhoppe of Rocheſter by Honoꝛius the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury. Kyng Oſwy had a partner with hym in gouernement of the Noꝛthumbers in the firſt beginning of his raigne one Oſwin, which was ſonne to Oſrick, ſo that Oſwy gouerned in Bernicia, and Oſwin in Deira, and continued in perfect friendſhip foꝛ a ſeaſon, till at length, thꝛough the counſell of wicked perſons, that coueted nothing ſo muche as to ſowe diſcoꝛde and variance betwixte Pꝛinces, they fell at debate, and ſo beganne to make warres the one agaynſte the other, ſo that finally when they were at poynte to haue tried theyꝛ quarrell in open battayle, Oſwin percеyuing that he had not an army of ſufficient foꝛce to encounter with Oſwy, he ꝛake vp hys campe at Wilfareſdowne, a tenne mile by Weſt the Towne of Cataractone, and after withdꝛewe hymſelfe onely with one ſeruant named Condhere vnto the houſe of Erle Hunwald, whome he toke to haue bin hys truſty friende: but contrary to his expectation, the ſayde Hunwalde did betray hym vnto Oſwy, the whyche by his Captayne Edelwine ſlewe the ſayde Oſwin and hys ſeruaunte the foꝛeſayde Conhere, in a place called Ingethling, the thirteenth Calends of September, in the ninth yeare of his raigne, whyche was after the birth of oure Sauioure. 651.

Thys

This Oswin was a goodly Gentleman of person, talle, and beautifull, and very gentle of speeche, ciuill in manners, and very liberall both to high and lowe, so that he was beloued ouer al. Suche a one he was, to bee briefe, as Bishop Aydan gessed, that hee shoulde not long continue in life, for that the Northumbers were not worthy of so good & vertuous a gouernor. Such humblenesse and obedience hee perceyued to rest in hym towards the law of the Lorde, in taking ẏ which was tolde him for his better instruction in good part, that he sayd, he neuer sawe before that tyme an humble King.

The same Aydan lyued not past twelue days after the deathe of the sayd Oswin, whome hee so much loued, departing this worlde the last day of August, in the seuententh yeare after he was ordeyned Bishop. His body was buried in the Isle of Lindesferne.

After Aydan, one Finan was made Bishop in his place, a Scottishman also, and of the Isle of Hui, from whence his predecessor the foresaid Aydan came, being first a man of Religion professed in the Monasterie there (as some writers doe report.)

Cenwalch King of VVest Saxons.

IN the meane time, after ẏ Kinigils or Cinigillus Kyng of the West Saxons hadde raigned one & thirtie yeares, he departed this life anno. 643. leauyng hys Kingdome to his son Cenwalch or Chenwald, who helde the same Kingdome the tearme of. 30. yeares, or. 31. (as some write) in manner as his father had done before him. In the thirde, or as others haue in the fifth yere of his raigne, Penda K. of Mercia made sharp warre against him, bycause he had put away his wife ẏ sister of ẏ same Penda, and in this warre Cenwalde was ouercome in battell, and driuen out of his countrey, so that hee fledde vnto Anna King of the East Angles, with whome hee remayned the space of 3 yeare, or as other haue three yeares, to his great good happe: for before he was growen to be an enimie to the Christian Religion, but now by the wholesome admonitions and sharpe rebukes of King Anna, he became a Christian, and receiued his wife againe into his company, according to the prescript of Gods lawe, and to be briefe, in all things shewed himselfe to be a new man, embracing vertue, and auoyding vice, so that shortly after through the help of God, he recouered again his Kingdome. After that he was returned into his Kingdome, & had recouered the same, there came a Bishop named Agilbertus out of Irelād, a Frenchmā borne, but hauing remayned in Ireland a long time to reade the Scriptures. Thys Agilbert coming into the prouince of the West Saxōs, was gladly receyued of King Cenwald, at whose desire he toke vppon him to exercise the rowmth of a Bishop there, but afterwardes, when the sayd King admitted an other Bishop named Wini, which had bin ordeyned in Fraunce, and knewe the tong better than Agilbert, as hee that was borne in Englande: Agilberte offended for that the King had admitted him without making him of any counsell therein, returned into Fraunce, and there was made Bishop of Paris: within a few yeares after, the foresaid Wini was expulsed also by King Cenwald, who gote hym into Mercia vnto King Vulkhere, of whome hee bought the Bishoprick of London, which he held during his life, and so the countrey of West Saxon remayned long without a Bishoppe, till at length the saide Agilberte at the request of Kyng Cenwald sent to him Eleutherius that was his Nephew.

Agilbertus a Bishop.

YEe haue heard that after Carpewald, his brother Sigiberte succeeded in rule of ẏ East Angles, a mā of greate vertue and worthinesse, who whilest hee remayned in Fraunce as a banished man, being constreyned to flee his countrey vpon displeasure that King Redwalde bare hym, was baptised there, and after returning into hys countrey, and obteining at length the Kingdom, those things which hee had seene well ordred in Fraunce, he studyed to followe the example of the same at home, and hereuppon considering with himselfe that nothing coulde more aduaunce the state of the common wealth of his countrey than learning and knowledge in the tongs, begannne the foundation of certayne Scholes, and namely at Cambridge, where children might haue places where to be instructed and brought vp in learning vnder appoynted teachers, that there might bee greater numbers of learned men trayned vp than before time had bin within this land, to the furtherance of true Religion and vertue.

The Vniuersitie of Cambridge founded by King Sigibert.

And thus hathe Englande good cause to haue in thankfull remembrance this noble Prince K. Sigibert, for all those hir learned menne why che haue haue bin brought vp and come forth of that famous vniuerſitie of Cambridge, the firſt foundation, or rather renouation whereof was thus begunne by him about the yeare of our Lord.630. Bale hath.636. It length, when this worthy King beganne to growe in age, hee conſidered with himſelfe howe hard a matter, and how painefull an office it was to gouerne a Realme as apperteyned to the duetie of a good King, whereupon he determined to leaue the charge thereof to other of more conuenient yeares, and lyue from thenceforth a priuate kinde of lyfe, and ſo reſigning the adminiſtration vnto his kinſman Egricus, hee became a Monke, and ledde the reſt of his life in a certaine Abbey. But ſhortly after it ſo came to paſſe that Penda King of Mercia that cruell Ethnike Tyrante made ſore warres vppon Egricus, wherevppon the people of Eaſt angles compelled Sigebertus to come forthe of his Monaſterie, and to goe with them into the fielde againſte Penda. Sigebertus beeyng thus conſtreyned againſt his wil, would not put on armour or beare any other kinde of weapon, than onely a wande in his hande in ſteade of a Scepter, and ſo the army of the Eaſtangles in hope of good ſpeede by the preſence of Sigiberte, ioyned in battell with their enimies, but the Eaſt angles were finally vanquiſhed, and the more part of them ſlaine, together with Sigiberte, and his couſin Egricus theyr King.

Sigiberte reſigneth his Kingdome to Egricus.

Sigiberte & Egricus ſlaine.

The yeare in the which Sigiberte and Egricus were ſlayne in manner as is aboue rehearſed, was after the birth of our Sauioure as ſome haue 652. In the dayes whileſt Sigibert as yet ruled the Eaſt angles, there came out of Irelande a deuoute perſon named Furſeus, who comming into the countrey of the Eaſt angles, was gladly receyued of King Sigiberte, by whoſe help afterwardes hee buylded the Abbey of Cumbreſburge, in the which Sigibert (as ſome haue written) when he renounced his Kingdome, was profeſſed a Monke. Of this Furſeus, many thyngs are writte, the which for breefeneſſe we ouerpaſſe.

After that Felix the Biſhop of the Eaſt angles was dead, one Thomas was ordeyned in his place, who after he had bin Biſhop fiue yeres, dyed, and then one Beretgils was ordeyned in his rowme by Honorius the Archbiſhop of Canterburie. After Egricus ſucceeded Anna the ſonne of Enus in the Kingdome of Eaſt Angle, and was likewiſe ſlayne by Penda King of Mercia, with the moſt parte of his army, as he gaue battell vnto the ſayde Penda that inuaded his countrey. He lefte behynde him many children, but his brother Edelhere ſucceeded him in gouernemente of the Kingdome, who was ſlaine by Oſwy the King of Northumberlande, togyther with the forenayd Penda, and worthely, ſith that hee woulde ayde that Tyrante whyche hadde ſlayne hys kinſmen, and hys brother that were predeceſſors with him in his Kingdome.

After this, when the Sea of Canterbury had bene vacant by the ſpace of one whole yeare and fiue Monethes, one Deus Dedit of the countrey of the Weſt Saxons, was elected and conſecrated by Ithamar the Byſhop of Rocheſter the. 7. Calends of April. He gouerned the Church of Canterbury by the tearme of nine yeres, four moneths, and two dayes. When he was departed this life, the forenayd Ithamar conſecrated for him one Damianus of the countrey of Suſſex.

Mercia receyueth the fayth.

ABout this time, the people of Mercia cõmonly called midle Angles, receyued the Chriſtian fayth vnder theyr Kyng named Peda, or Peada the ſonne of Penda King of Mercia, the which being a towardly yong Gentleman, and worthy to haue the guyding of a kingdome, his father Penda aduaunced him to the rule of that Kingdome of the middle angles during his own life. Heere may you note, ẏ the Kingdome of the midle angles was one, & the Kingdome of Mercia another, though moſt commonly the ſame were gouerned by one king. This yong Peda came to the king of Northumberlande Oſwy, to require of him to haue hys daughter Alchfled in marriage: but when he was enformed that he might not haue hir except hee would become a Chriſtian, then vppon hearyng the Goſpell preached, with the promiſe of the celeſtiall ioyes and immortalitie, by the reſurrectiõ of the fleſhe in the life to come, he ſayde, that whether hee had King Oſwyes daughter to wife or not, he woulde ſurely be baptiſed, and chiefly hee was perſwaded thereto by his kinſman Alchfride which had in marriage his ſiſter the daughter of Penda named Cimburgh. He was therfore baptiſed by Biſhop Fynnan, with all thoſe whyche came thither with him, at a place called at ẏ wal. And taking with him foure prieſtes whiche were thought meete to teache and baptiſe his people, he returned with great ioy into his owne countrey. The names of thoſe Prieſtes were as followeth, Cedda, Adda, Betti, and Diuna, of the whyche, the laſt was a Scotte by nation, and the other were Engliſhmen. Theſe Prieſtes commyng into the prouince of the middle angles, preached the worde, and were well hearde, ſo that dayly a greate number, both of the nobilitie and communaltie renouncing the filthy dregges of Idolatrie, were chriſtned. Neyther dyd King Penda forbidde the preachyng of the Goſpell within his prouince of Mercia, but rather he hated and deſpiſed thoſe whome hee knewe to haue profeſſed themſelues Chriſtians, and yet ſhewed not ẏ workes of faythe, ſaying, that thoſe were wretches, and not to be regarded, which woulde not obey theyr God in whome they beleeued. This alteration of things began, about two yeares before the deathe of King Penda.

ABout the ſame tyme, Beda.lib.3. cap.22. the Eaſt Saxons at the inſtãce of Oſwy King of Northumberlande, receyued eſteſoones the faith which they had renoũced, whẽ they baniſhed their Biſhop Melitus. Ye haue hearde that Serred, Siward and Sigibert brethrẽ, and ẏ ſonnes of King Sabert (which brethren occaſioned the reuolting of that prouince from ẏ faith of Chriſt) were ſlayne in battel by the kings of Weſt Saxon, after whome ſucceeded Sigibert ſurnamed ẏ little ſonne to the middlemoſt brother Siwarde as ſome write. This Sigibert the little lefte the Kingdome to an other Sigibert that was ſonne to one Sigebald ẏ brother of king Sabert, which second Sigibert raigned as king in that prouince of the East Saxons, being a most especiall friend of King Oswy, so that oftentimes he repaired into Northumberlande to visit him, whereuppon king Oswy ceassed not most earnestly at tymes conuenient to exhort him to receyue the fayth of Jesus Christ, and in the ende by suche effectuall perswasions as he vsed, Sigibert gaue credite to his words, and so beeing conuerted, receyued the Sacrament of Baptisme by the hands of Bishop Finan, at the Kings house called, At the wall, so named, bycause it was built neere to the wall which the Romaynes had made ouerthwarte the Ile, as is often before remembred, being a twelue miles distant from the East Sea.

King Sigibert receyued the fayth.

This was about the yeare 649 as Math. West. hath noted.

King Sigibert hauing now receiued the Christian faith, when he should returne into his countrey, required king Oswy to appoynte hym certayne instructors and teachers which might conuert his people to the faith of Christ. King Oswy desirous to satisfie his request, sente vnto the prouince of the middle angles, calling from thence that vertuous man Cedda, and assigning vnto him another Priest to be his associate, sente them vnto the prouince of the East Saxons, there to preache the Christian faithe vnto the people. And when they had preached and taughte throughe the whole countrey to the great increase and enlarging of the Church of Christ, it chaunced on a time that Cedda returned home into Northumberlande to conferre of certaine things with Bishop Fynan which kept his See at Lindesferne, where vnderstãding by Cedda the great fruite whiche it had pleased God to prosper vnder his handes in aduancing the fayth amongst the East Saxons, hee called to him two other Bishops, and there ordeyned the forsayde Ced Bishop of the East Saxons.

Ced or Cedda Bishop of the East angles.

Hereuppon, the same Ced returning vnto hys cure, wente forewarde with more authoritie to perfourme the worke of the Lord, buildyng Churches in diuers places, ordeyned Priests and Deacons whiche might helpe him in preaching, and in the ministerie of Baptising, specially in the Citie of Ithancester vpon the riuer of Pentt, and likewise in Tileburg on the riuer of Thames.

Tilbery.

Whilest Ced was thus busie to the great comfort and ioy of the King and all hys people in the setting forwarde the Christian Religion with great increase dayly proceedyng, it chaunced thorough the instigation of the enimie of mankynde the Deuill, that King Sigibert was murthered by two of his owne kinsmen which were brethrẽ, the which when they were examined of the cause that shoulde moue them to that wicked fact, they had nothing to alledge, but that they did it bycause they had conceyued an hatred againste the King, for that he was to fauorable towards his enimies, and would with great mildnes of mind forgiue iniuries committed againste him: suche was the kings faulte, for the which he was murthered, bycause he obserued the commaundements of the Gospell with a deuoute hart: in the whyche his innocent death yet, his offence was punished, wherein hee had surely transgressed the lawes of the Churche. For where as one of them whyche slewe him kept a wife whiche he had vnlawfully married, and refused to put hir away at the Bishops admonition, he was by the Bishop excommunicated, and all other of the Christian congregation commaunded to abstayne from hys company. This notwithstanding, the Kyng being desired of him, came to his house to a banquet, and in his comming from thence met with the Bishop, whome when the King beholde, hee wared afrayde, and alight beside his horse, and fell downe at his feete, beseeching him of pardon for his offence. The Bishop which also was on horsebacke likewise alight, and touching the K. with his rodde which he had in his hande, as one something displeased, and protesting as in the authoritie of a Bishop, spake these words, bycause (saith he) thou wouldest not abstayne from entring the house of that wicked person being accursed, thou shalte die in the same house; and so it came to passe.

Swidhelme.

After Sigbert succeeded one Sudhelme in the kingdome of ỹ East Saxons, he was the son of Serbalde, & baptised of Ced in the prouince of ỹ East Angles, at a place of the kings there called Rendlesham. Edelwald King of the East Angles (the brother of King Inna) was his Godfather at the fontstone. Ced the Bishop of the East Saxõs vsed oftentimes to visit his countrey of Northũberland, where he was borne, to exhort by Preaching the people there vnto godly life: whereuppon it chanced that King Edilwalde the sonne of K. Oswald whiche raigned in the parties of Deira, moued with the fame of his vertuous trade of liuing, had him in great reuerence: and therefore vpon a good zeale and great deuotion, willed him to chose forth some plotte of grounde, where hee might build a Monasterie, in the which the kyng himselfe and other, might make prayer, and heare Sermons the oftner, and haue place where to burie the dead. The Bishop consenting to the kings minde, at length espied a place amongst high and desert mountaynes, where he began the foundation of a Monasterie, afterwardes called Lestingham, and firste meaning to purge the place with prayers and fasting, he desired licence of the king that he might remayne there all the Lent season, whiche was at hande, and so continuing in that place for that time, fasted euery day (Sunday excepted) from the morning till euening, according to the manner, nor receyued any thing then, but only a little bread, and an Hennes egge, with a little milke mixed with water; for he sayde, that this was the custome of them of whome hee had learned the forme of his regular order, that they should consecrate those places to the Lorde with prayer and fasting, whiche they lately had receyued, to make in the same eyther Church or Monasterie. And when there remayned tenne dayes of Lent yet to come, he was sent for to the king: wherefore he appoynted a brother whiche he had, being also a Priest named Cimbill, to supply his rowth, that his begun Religious worke should not be hindred for the Kings businesse. After that the time was accomplished, hee ordeyned a Monasterie there, appoynting the Monkes of ẏ same to liue after ẏ rules of them of Lindesferne where hee was brought vp. Finally this Bishop Ced comming vnto this Monasterie afterwardes, by chance in the time of a sickenesse, dyed there, and left that Monasterie to the gouernance of another brother which he hadde, named Ceadda, that was after a Bishop, as afterwardes shall be shewed. There were foure brethren of them, and all Priestes, Ced, Cimbill, Ceulin, and Ceadda, of the which Ced and Ceadda were Bishops, as before is sayd. About the same time, Oswy King of Northumberlande was sore oppressed by the warres of Penda the King of Mercia, so that hee made great offers of high giftes, & great rewards vnto the sayd Penda for peace, but Penda refused the same, as he that meant vtterly to haue destroyed the whole nation of Oswies subiectes, so that Oswy turning himselfe to seeke help at the hands of the Almighty, sayd, if the Pagane refuse to receyue the giftes which we offer, let vs make offers to him that knoweth to accept them: and so binding himselfe by vowe, promised, that if hee might obteine victorie, he would offer his daughter to be dedicate to the Lord in perpetuall virginitie; and further, would giue twelue manors, Lordships or farmes, to the building of Monasteries: and so with a small army he put himselfe in hazard of battell. It is sayd, that Penda hadde thirtie companies of men of war, furnished with thirtie notable Captaines or Colonels, agaynste whom came Oswy with his sonne Alchfride, hauing but a small army, but confirmed yet with hope in Christ Iesus. His other sonne Ecgfrid remayned in hostage at that time with Queene Cinuise. Edilwald the sonne of Oswald ẏ gouerned Deira, and ought to haue ayded Oswy, was on the part of Penda against his countrey, and against his Uncle, but in time of the fight he withdrew himselfe aside, to behold what chaunce would follow. The battell being begun, the .xxx. Pagane Captaines were ouerthrowen, & put to flight, & those ẏ came to aide Penda, wer almost

Thys battell was fought neere to the water of Inwet, the whiche being risen as then by reason of greate raine, drowned more of the enimies, than died of ẏ Northumbers swords. After that Oswy had obteyned this victory, hee performed promise in bestowing his daughter to ẏ profession of virginitie, & also gaue ẏ .xij. manors, whereof, v. were in Deira, & vij. in Bernicia, conteining euery of the .10. houshelds a peece. The firſt Biſhop of Mercia

The firſt Biſhop in the prouince of Mercia, and alſo of Lindeſkrene and the middle angles was one Diuma, who died amongſt the middle angles. The ſeconde was Cellach, the Whyche leaning his Biſhoprick, returned into Scotland, for they were both of the nation of the Scottes. The third was an Engliſhman named Trumhere, but inſtructed and ordeyned of the Scottes.

He was Abbot of the Monaſterie of Jugethlingum, beeing builded in that place where King Oſwin was ſlaine (as before is mentioned.) For Q. Eaufled that was his kinſwoman gote of hir huſband King Oſwy a place there for ỳ foreſayd Trumhere to build that Abbey.

After that Edelhere king of Eaſtangles was ſlayne layne as before is mentioned, his brother Edelwald succeeded him in that kingdome, raigning as king thereof by the space of nine yeres. Then after Ethelwald, succeeded Aldulfe ẏ sonne of Edelhere in gouernement of that kingdome, and raigned fiue and twentie yeares. After Finan the Bishop of the Nothumbers that held his see at Lindesferne, as Aydan did before him, one Colman was ordeyned Bishop, a Scot borne, and an earnest obseruer of the customes vsed amongst thē of his nation, so that when the controuersie beganne to be reuiued for the holding of the feast of Easter, he would by no meanes yeld to them that would haue perswaded him to haue followed ẏ ryte of ẏ Romane Church. There was a great disputatiō kept about this matter, and other things, as shaning or cutting of heares, and such like in the monasterie of Whitby, at the which K. Oswy & hys sonne Alefrid were present, where Colman for hys part alledged the custome of John ẏ Euangelist, & of Anatholius, and the contrary side brought in proofe of their opiniō, ẏ custome of Peter & Paule. At length, whē Bishop Colman perceyued ẏ his doctrine was not so much regarded as he thought of reason it ought to haue bene, he returned into Scotlād with those, which taking part with him, refused to obserue the feast of Easter according to the custome of the Churche of Rome, nor would haue their crownes shauen, about whiche poynte, no small reasoning had bin kept. This disputation was holden in the yeare of our Lord. 664. and in the yeare of the raigne of K. Oswy. 22. and in the. xxx. yeare after that the Scottishmen began first to beare the office of Bishops within Northumberland, which was as Harrison sayth. 634. For Aidan gouerned. 17. yeares, Finan. 10. yeres, and Colman. 3. yeares. After that Colman was returned into his countrey, one Tuda that hadde bin brought vp amongst ẏ Southerne Scottes, & ordeined Bishop by them, succeeded in his rowmth, hauing his crowne shauen, & obseruing the feast of Easter according to ẏ custome of the prouince & rite of ẏ Romane Church. The same yere, there chanced a great Eclipse of the sunne. The thirde of May about ten of the clocke in the day, a great dearth & mortalitie ensued, both in all the parties of this our Britayne, and likewise in Ireland. Amongst other, the foresayd Bishop Tuda dyed, & was buried in the Abbey of Pegnalech. After thys Tuda succeeded in gouernment of the Church of Lindesferne, otherwise called holy Ilād, one Wilfrid which was sent by K. Alefride into Fraunce, to be ordeyned there. About the same time Kyng Oswy, the father of K. Alefride, moued with the good exāple of his son, sent Ceadda, the brother of Ced sometime Bishop of ẏ East Saxons into Kent to be ordeyned Bishop of Yorke, but at hys comming into Kent he found that Deus dedit, the Archbishop of Canterbury was dead, and none other as yet ordeyned in his place, so that Ceadda repaired into the prouince of the West Saxons, where hee was ordeined by Bishop Winy, who toke two other Bishops of the Brittish natiō vnto him to be his associates, whiche vsed to obserue the feast of Easter contrary to the custome of the Romane Church: but there was no other shifte, for there was none other Bishop canonically ordeined in ẏ prouince of the West Saxōs in those dayes, this Wini only excepted, & therfore was he constreyned to take such as he might get. After ẏ Ceadda was thus ordeyned, hee began forthwith to follow ẏ true rules of ẏ Church, he liued right chastly, shewed himselfe humble & continent, applyed his study to reading, and trauelled abroade on foote and not on horsebacke through the countreys, townes and villages, for to preache ẏ word of God. He was the Disciple of Aydan, & counted by his example, & also by the example of his brother Ced, to instruct his hearers with the like doings and manors as he had knowen them to do. Wilfrid also being consecrated Bishop, and returned into England, indeuored to plant the orders of the Romane Churche in the Churches of England, whereby it came to passe, that ẏ Scots which inhabited amongst the Englishmen, were constreyned eyther to followe the same, or else to returne into their owne countrey.

Ceadda ordeined Archbishop of Yorke

Egbert.

IN this mean time, K. Ercombert being departed this life after hee had gouerned the Kentishmen by the space of twentie yeres, his sonne Egbert succeeded hym in the Kingdome, and raigned nine yeares.

Egbert King of Kent.

There is little remēbraunce of his doyngs, which in that short time were not much notable, except ye will ascribe the comming into this land of the Archbishop Theodorus, and the Abbot Adrian, vnto his glory, which chanced in his tyme. For in the yere of ẏ great eclipse, & sore mortalitie that ensued, it chanced, that both K. Ercombert, and the Archbishop Deus dedit departed this life, so that the See of Canterbury was voyde a certayne time, in so muche, that King Egbert that succeeded his father Ercombert, togither with King Oswy, did sende one Wighart a Priest of good reputation for his excellent knowledge in the Scriptures, vnto Rome with great gifts, and riche vessell of gold and siluer to be presented vnto the Pope, requiring him that he would ordeine the foresayde Wighard Archbishop of Canterbury to haue rule of the English Church. But thys Wighart comming vnto Rome, and declaring his message vnto Vitalianus that then gouerned the Churche of Rome, immediately after he dyed of the pestilẽce (that then raigned in that citie) with all those ẏ came with him. The Pope then taking aduice whome hee might ordeyne to the See of Canterbury, beeing thus destitute of an Archbishop, he appoynted a Monke named Adrian to take that office vpon him, but Adrian excused himselfe as not sufficiente for suche a romth, and required the Pope to ordeyne one Andrew a Monke also, wherevnto the Pope consented, but when Andrew was preuented by death, ẽtsoones Adrian should haue bin made Archbishoppe, but that he named one Theodore an other Monke that abode as then in Rome, but was borne in the Citie of Tharsus in Cilicia, very wel learned both in the Greeke and Latine, and being of reuerend yeres, as of .76. This Theodore by ẏ presentimen of Adrian, was appointed to be ordeined Archbishop of Canterbury, with condition, that Adrian should neuertheless attend vpon him into England, both for ẏ he had bin twice before thys time in Fraunce, and so knew the coastes, and againe, for that he might assist him in all thyngs, and loke well to ẏ matter, that Theodore should not bring into the Church of England any ryte or custome of the Greekes, contrary to the vse of the Romane Churche. Theodore being first ordeyned subdeacon, tarried four monethes till hys heare wer growẽ, that he might haue his crowne shauen, after the manner of Peter. For he was rounded or shauen after the manner of the East Church, which was as they perswaded thẽselues, according to the vse of S. Paule the Apostle. And so at length was this Theodore ordeyned Archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalianus in the yere of our Lord .668. the sixth Kalends of June, and with Adrian sente into Britaine, they toke their iourney to come through Fraunce, and so being come thither, shortly after K. Egbert hadde knowledge thereof: wherevpon with all conuenient speede, hee sente ouer one of his nobles named Redfrid to bring the Archbishop into England, and so he did: but Adrian was stayed for a tyme, bycause he was suspected to haue had some commission frõ the Emperour to haue practised with the Englishmen, for the disquieting of ẏ Realme of France. But after it was perceiued that thys suspition was grounded of no troth, he was also suffered to folow ẏ Archbishop, and so comming vnto Canterbury, he was made Abbot of ẏ Monasterie of S. Augustines. The Archb. Theodore came thus to his Churche of Canterbury in the seconde yeare after his consecration, about the second Kalends of June, being Sunday.

He gouerned the same Churche .21. yeres and 16. dayes, and was the first Archbishop to whome all the Churches of Englande did acknowledge their obeysance. He being accompanyed with the foresaid Adrian, visited all the parts of this land, ordeyned Bishops and Ministers in Churches where he thought conuenient, & reformed ẏ same Churches as seemed to him needefull, as well in other things which he misliked, as also in causing them to obserue the feast of Easter, according to the ryte and vsage of the Church of Rome. Ceadda that was Bishop of Yorke, bicause hee was not lawfully ordeyned, as he himselfe confessed, was remoued from the See of Yorke, and Wilfrid was thereto restored, so that Ceadda (though he were not disgraded of his degree of Bishop) liued yet a priuate kind of life, till he was admitted Bishop of Mercia, as after shall be shewed. Also whereas before time there was in maner no singing in the Englishe Churches, except it were in Kent, now they begã in euery Church to vse singing of diuine seruice after the ryte of the Church of Rome. The Archbishop Theodore finding the Church of Rochester voyde by the death of ẏ last Bishop named Damian, he ordeyned one Putta a simple man in worldly matters, but well instructed in ecclesiasticall discipline, & namely well seene in song and musicke, to be vsed in ẏ Church after the manner as he had learned of Pope Gregories disciples. To be briefe, ẏ Archbishop Theodore, and the Abbot Adrian deserued great commendation in this, that where they were notably well learned themselues in the Greeke and Latine tongues, and also hadde good knowledge as well in the liberall artes, as in the Scripture, they toke great paines to train vp Scollers in knowledge of the same, so that the Englishmen had not seene more happy times than in those dayes, hauing as then kings of great puissãce, so as strangers stode in feare of them, and againe, those that coueted learning, had instructors at hand to teach them, by reason whereof, diuers being giuen to studie, proued excellent both in knowledge of the Greeke and Latine. There came in company of the said Archbishop from Rome, an Englishman named Benedict Biscope, which had taken vppon him the habite of a Monke in Italy, and nowe returning into his countrey, builded two Abbeyes, the one named Wyremouth, bycause it was placed at the mouth of the Riuer of Wire, and the other Girwy, distante from Wiremouth about fiue miles, and from the towne of Newe-Castell foure miles, situate neere to the mouth of Tine. Wiremouth was builte in the yeare. 670. and Girwy in the yeare. 673. There were a. 600. Monkes founde in those two houses, and gouerned vnder one Abbot.

The sayd Benedict was the first that brought Glasiers, Painters and other such curious craftsmen into Englãd. He went fiue times to Rome, and came agayne.

ABout the ſame time, after that Suidhelm K. of the Eaſt Saxons was dead, Sighere the ſonne of Sigbert the little, and Sebby the ſonne of Suward ſucceeded him in gouernemẽt of that kingdome, albeit they were ſubiect vnto Vulkhere the king of Mercia. Sighere in that time, when the great mortalitie raigned, renounced the fayth of Chriſt, with that part of the people whiche hee had in gouernemente, for both the ſame Sighere and other of his chiefeſt Lordes, and alſo parte of hys commons louing this life, and not regarding the life to come, began to repaire their Idoliſhe Churches, and fell to the worſhipping of Idols, as though thereby they ſhould haue bin defended from that mortalitie. But his aſſociat Sebby with greate deuotion continued ſtedfaſt in the faith which he had receiued. King Vulkhere being enformed of Segheres apoſtacie, and howe the people in his part of the prouince of Eaſt Saxõs were departed from the fayth, he ſente thither Biſhop Jaruman or Jaroman, that was ſucceſſor vnto Trumhere, which vſed ſuch diligence & godly meanes, that he reduced the ſaid K. and all his people vnto the right beleefe, ſo as the Idoliſhe Sinagogues were deſtroyed, and the Idols with their aulters beaten down, ẏ Chriſtian Churches again ſet opẽ, & the name of Chriſt eſtſones called vpõ amongſt ẏ people, coueting now rather to die in him vẽ hope of reſurrectiõ in ẏ world to come, than to liue in ẏ ſeruice of Idols, ſpotted with the filth of errors and falſe beleefe. And thus whẽ Biſhop Jaroman had accompliſhed the thing for ẏ which he was ſent, he returned into Mercia.

After this, when the ſaid Jaruman was departed this life, K. Vulkhere ſent vnto ẏ Archbiſhop Theodorus, requiring him to prouide ẏ prouince of the Mercies of a new Biſhop. Theodorus not minding to ordeyne any new Biſhop at ẏ time, required of Oſwy K. of Northumberlande, that Biſhop Cead might come into Mercia, to exerciſe the office of Biſhop there. This Cead lyued as it were a priuate life at that time in his Monaſterie of Leſtingham, for Wilfrid held the Biſhoprike of Yorke, extending his authoritie ouer all Northumberland & amõgſt the Pictes alſo, ſo farre as K. Oſwies dominion ſtretched. Therefore Cead hauing licẽce to goe into Mercia, was gladly receyued of K. Vulkhere, & wel entertayned, in ſo muche, that the ſaide K. gaue vnto him lands and poſſeſſions conteining fiftie families or houſholds to build a monaſterie in a certain place within the countrey of Lindſey called Etbearue. But the See of his Biſhoprieke was aſſigned to him at Litchfield in Staffordſhire, wher he made him a houſe neere to the Church, in the whych he with .7. or .8. other of his brethren in Religion, vſed in an oratory, there to pray and reade ſo often as they had leaſure from labour and buſineſſe of the world. Finally, after he hadde gouerned the Church of Mercia by ẏ ſpace of two yeres and an halfe, hee departed this life, hauing .7. dayes warning giuen him (as it is reported) from aboue, before he ſhould die, after a miraculous maner. His body was firſt buried in the Churche of our Lady, but after that the Churche of Saint Peeter the Apoſtle was builded, his bones were tranſlated into the ſame.

In the yeare of our Lord. 671. whiche was the ſeconde yeare after that Theodorus the Archbyſhop came into this lãd, Oſwy K. of Northumberland was attached with a greeuous ſickneſſe, and dyed thereof the fiftenth Kalends of March, in the .58. yere of his age, after he had raigned .28. yeares complete. 671 Mat. VVeſt.

Ecgfrid.

After Oſwy, hys ſonne Ecgfrid ſucceeded in rule of ẏ kingdome of Northumberlande, in the thirde yeare of whoſe raigne, that is to witte, in the yeare of oure Lorde. 673. Theodorus the Archbiſhop of Canterbury kept a Synode at Herforde, the firſt ſeſſion wherof began the .24. of September, all the Biſhops of this land being preſent, either in perſon or by their deputies, as Bili the Biſhop of Eaſt angles, Wilfrid the Biſhoppe of the Northumbers by his deputie, Putta Biſhop of Rocheſter, Leutherius Biſhop of the Weſt Saxons, and Winfrid Biſhop of Mercia. In the preſence of theſe Prelates, the Archbiſhop ſhewed a booke, wherein he hadde noted ten Chapters or Articles taken out of the booke of the Canons, requiring that the ſame might be receyued. Beda. li. 4. ca. 5 Mat. VVeſt. 673 A Synode holden at Herford. Articles proponed by Theodore.

The firſt Chapter was, that the feaſt of Eaſter ſhould be kept, the Sunday following the fourteenth day of the firſt moneth.

The ſecond, that no Biſhop ſhould entermeddle within an others dioceſſe, but bee contented with the cure of his flocke committed to him.

The thirde, that no Biſhop ſhould diſquiet in any thing any Monaſterie conſecrated to God, nor to take by violence any goodes that belonged to the ſame.

The fourth, that Biſhoppes being Monkes ſhould not goe from Monaſterie to Monaſterie, except by ſufferance and permiſſion of their Abbots, and ſhoulde continue in the ſame obedience wherein they ſtoode before.

The fifth, that none of the Clergie ſhould departe from his Biſhop to runne into any other dioceſſe, nor comming from any other place ſhould be admitted, except he brought letters of teſtimonie with him. But if any ſuch chanced to be receiued, if hee refuſed to returne, being ſent for home, both he & his receyuer ſhuld be excommunicated.

The ſixt, that Biſhops & other of the Cleargie being ſtraungers, ſhoulde holde them contented with the benefite of hoſpitalitie, & ſhould not take in hand any prieſtly office, without licence of the Biſhop, in whoſe dioceſſe hee chaunced ſo to bee remaynyng.

The ſeuenth, that twice in the yeare a Synod ſhould be kept, but bycauſe of diuers impediments heerein, it was thoughte good to them all, that in the Kalendes of Auguſt a Sinode ſhoulde bee kepte once in the yere, at a certayne place called Clofeſhough.

The eyght Chapter was, that no one Biſhop ſhould by ambition ſeeke to be preferred afore another, but that euery one ſhoulde knowe the tyme and order of his conſecration.

The ninth, that as the number of the Chriſtians increaſed, ſo ſhoulde there bee mo Biſhoppes ordeyned.

The tenth was touching marriages, that none ſhould contract matrimony with any perſon, but with ſuche as it ſhoulde bee lawfull for hym to doe by the orders of the Churche: none ſhoulde matche with their kinſfolke, no man ſhoulde forſake hys wife, except as the Goſpell teacheth, for cauſe of fornication. But if any man did put away his wife whiche hee hadde lawfully married, if hee woulde bee accounpted a true Chriſtian, hee myght not be coupled with an other, but ſo remayne, or elſe bee reconciled to his owne wife againe.

Theſe Articles being intreated of and concluded, were confirmed with the ſubſcribing of all their hands, ſo as al thoſe that ſhould goe againſt the ſame, ſhoulde be diſgraded of their prieſthood, and bee ſeparated from the company of them all.

Biſi Biſhop of the Eaſt Angles.

The foreſayd Biſi ỳ was Biſhoppe of the Eaſt Angles, & preſente at thys Sinode, was ſucceſſor vnto Bonifacius, whi the Bonifacius helde that ſee. 17. yeares, and then he being departed this life, Biſi was made Biſhop of that prouince, and ordeined by the Archbiſhop Theodor. Thys Biſi at length was ſo viſited with ſickneſſe, that hee was not able to exercile the miniſtration, ſo that then there were two Biſhoppes elected, and conſecrated for hym, the one named Aecci, and the other Baldwin.

In this meane while, that is to ſay, about the yere of our Lord. 872. or beginning of ỳ. 871. as Harriſon noteth, Kenwalch King of the Weſt Saxons departed this life, after hee had raigned 30. yeares. This Kenwalk was ſuch a Prince, as in the beginning, he was to be compared with the woorſt kind of rulers, but in the middeſt and later ende of his raigne, hee was to bee compared with ỳ beſt. His godly zeale borne towards the aduancing of the Chriſtian religion wel appeared in the building of the Church at Wincheſter, where the Biſhops Sea of al that prouince was thē placed.

His wife Serburga ruled the Kyngdome of Weſt Saxons after him, a woman of ſtoutnes ynough to haue atchieued actes of worthy remēbrance, but being preuented by deathe ere ſhe had raigned one whole yeare, ſhe could not ſhewe any full proofe of hir noble courage.

I remember that Math. Weſt. maketh other report hereof, declaring that the nobilitie remoued hir from the gouernement. But I rather followe William Malmeſ. in this matter.

TO proceede therefore, after ỳ Serburga was departed this life, or depoſed, if you wil nedes haue it ſo, Eſcuinus or Elcuinus, whoſe Grandfather called Cuthgillo, ỳ brother of K. Kinigils ſucceded in gouernmēt of ỳ Weſt Saxons, reigning about ỳ ſpace of two yeres: and after his deceſſe, one Centuinus or Centwine toke vppon him the rule, and continued therein the ſpace of nine yeares. But Bede ſayth that theſe two ruled at one time, and deuided the kingdom betwixt them. Elcuinus fought againſt Vulkhere Kyng of Mercia, a greate number of men being ſlayne on both parties, though Vulkhere yet had after a manner the vpper hand, as ſome haue written.

In the ſame yere that the Sinode was holden at Herford, that is to ſay in the yeare of our Lord 672. Ecgbert the King of Kent departed this life in July, and lefte the Kingdome to his brother Lothore, which held the ſame eleuen yeares, and ſeuen monethes. Some haue written that King Egbert by the ſuggeſtion of one Thunnir, who had the chiefe rule of the kingdome vnder him, ſuffered the ſayde Thunnir to put vnto death Ethelbert or Ethelbright, whiche were the ſonnes of Ermenredus the brother of King Ercombert, that was father vnto king Egbert, for doubt leſt they being towardly yong Gentlemen, myghte in tyme growe ſo into fauor with the people, that it ſhoulde bee eaſie for them to depriue both Egbert, and his iſſue of the Kyngdome. Alſo, that they were priuily put to death, and priuily buried at the firſte, but the place of their buriall immediately beeyng ſhewed after a miraculous manner, theyr bodyes long after in the dayes of Kyng Egilred the ſonne of Kyng Edgar, were taken vp, and conueyed vnto Ramsey, and there buried. And although Egbert being giltie of the death of those his cousins, did sore repent him, for that he vnderstode they dyed giltlesse, yet hys brother Lothaire was thought to be punished for that offence as after shall be shewed.

Winfrid Bishop of the Mercies, for cause of disobedience in some point, was deprined by the Archbishop Theodore, and one Seruulfe that was the buylder and also the Abbot of the Monasterie of Medhamstede, otherwise called Peterborough, was ordeyned and consecrated in his place. About the same time, Erkenwalde was ordeyned Bishop of the East Saxons, and appointed to hold his See in the Citie of London. This Erkenwalde was reputed to bee a man of great holynesse and vertue. Before he was made Bishoppe, hee buylded two Abbeyes, the one of Monkes at Chertsey in Sowthrie, where hee himselfe was Abbot, and the other of Nunnes at Berking, within the prouince of the East Saxons, where he placed his sister Ethelburga a woman also highly esteemed for hir deuout kinde of life. She was firste brought vp and instructed in the rules of hir profession by one Hildelitha a Nunne of the parties of beyond the Sea, whome Erkenwald procured to come ouer for that purpose. After Erkenwald, one Waldhere was made Bishop of London, in whose dayes Sebby king of the East Saxons, after hee had raigned thirtie yeares, being nowe vexed with a greeuous sickenesse, professed himselfe a Monke: whiche thyng he would haue done long before, if his wife hadde not kept him backe. Hee died shortly after within the Citie of London, and was buried in the Church of Saint Paule. King Sighere why che in the beginning raigned with him, and gouerned a parte of the East Saxons, was departed thys life before, so that in his latter time, the foresayde Sebby had the gouernemente of the whole prouince of the East Saxons, and left the same to his sonnes Sighard and Sewfred. Wil. Malm.

About the yeare of our Lorde. 675. Vulfhere King of Mercia departed this life, after hee hadde raigned as some haue. 19. yeares, but as other affirme, hee raigned but. 17. yeares. Howbeit they which recke nineteene, include the time that passed after the slaughter of Penda, wherein Oswy and Peada held the aforesayde Kingdome. 675

King Ethelred.

Edilred

After Vulfhere, hys brother Edilred or Ethelred succeeded in gouernemẽt of the Kyngdome of Mercia. This Edilred inuaded the Kyngdome of Kente with a mighty army in the yeare of oure Lord. 677. destroying the countrey afore him, not sparing Churches nor Abbeyes, but spoyled the same without respect, as well as other common places. King Lothaire durst not appeare in the fielde to giue hym battell, so that Edilred wente thyrough the countrey, destroyed the Citie of Rochester, with great riches gotten by the spoyle, he returned home.

The Bishoppe of Rochester Putta, after that his Church was spoyled and defaced by the enimies, wente vnto Seruulfe the Bishop of Mercia, and there obteyning of him a small cure, and a portion of ground, remayned in that countrey, not once labouring to restore his Church of Rochester to the former state, but wente aboute in Mercia to teach song, & instruct suche as would learne musicke, wheresoeuer hee was required, or could get entertaynement.

Hereupon the Archbiſhop Theodore conſecrated one William Biſhop of Rochester in place of Putta, and after when the ſayd William conſtreyned by powertie, left that Church, Theodore placed one Gebmound in his ſteede. In the yeare of our Lord. 678. in the moneth of Auguſt, a blaſing Starre appeared, with a long bright beame like to a piller. It was ſeene euery morning for the ſpace of three monethes togither. The ſame Ecgfrid king of Northumberland, baniſhed Biſhop Wilfrid vppon diſpleaſure taken with hym, out of his See, and then were two Biſhops ordeyned in his place, to gouerne the Church of the Northūbers, ỳ one named Boſa at Yorke, & the other called Eata at Hagulſtald or Lindeſferne. Also one Eadhidus was ordeined about the ſame time Biſhop of Lindſey, the which prouince king Egfride hadde of late conquered and taken from Vulfhere the late King of Mercia, whome he ouercame in battel, and droue him out of that coūtrey. The ſaid three Biſhops were conſecrated at Yorke by the Archbiſhop of Canterbury Theodorus, the whiche within three yeares after ordeyned two Biſhops more in that prouince of the Northumbers, that is to witte, Tumbert at Hagulſtald, Eata that was appoynted to remain at Lindeſferne, and Trumwine was ordeyned to haue the cure of ỳ prouince of thoſe Pictes which as then were vnder the Engliſhe dominion. Alſo beeauſe Edilred King of Mercia recouered the countrey of Lindſey, and ioyned it to his dominion, Biſhop Eadhedus comming from thence, was appoynted to gouerne ỳ Church of Ryppō.

After that Biſhop Wilfrid was expulſed out of his dioceſſe and prouince of the Northumbers, he went to Rome, & returning from thence, came into the kingdome of the South Saxons, ỳ whiche conteyning ſeuen thouſande houſholdes or familes, as yet was not conuerted to ỳ Chriſtian faith. Wherefore the ſaid Wilfrid began there to preach the Goſpell with licence of K. Edilwalke, who as before is mencioned, was conuerted and baptiſed in Mercia, by the procurement of King Vulfhere, that then became his Godfather, & gaue him at the ſame time the Iſle of Wight, and the prouince of the people auntiently called Weanuari, which he had wonne frō the Weſt Saxōs. Biſhop Wilfrid then by King Edilwalke hys furtherance and helpe, baptiſed the chiefeſt Lords and Gentlemen of that prouince. But certayne Prieſtes baptiſed the reſidue of the people, ryther then or in time following. It chaunced that for the ſpace of three yeares (as it is ſaid before the comming thither of Biſhop Wilfrid, there had fallen no rayne from the ayre within that prouince of the South Saxons, ſo that ỳ people wer brought into greate miſerie by reaſon of famine, whyche through wante of neceſſary fruites of the earthe, ſore afflicted the whole countrey, in ſomuch, that no ſmall number threwe themſelues headlong into the Sea, deſpayring of life, in ſuche lacke of neceſſary victuals. But as God would, the ſame daye that Wilfrid began to miniſter the Sacrament of Baptiſme, there came downe ſweete and plentifull ſhowres of rayne, ſo watering ỳ earth, that thereby great ſtore of all fruites plentifully toke roote, and yelded full increaſe in growth, to the great comfort and relefe of al ỳ people, which before were in manner ſtaruen and loſt through want of foode. Biſhop Wilfrid alſo taught them in that countrey the manner howe to catche fiſhe with nettes, where before that time, they had no great ſkill in any kind of fiſhing, except it were in catching eeles. Hereby the ſayd Biſhop grew there in greate eſtimation with the people, ſo that his wordes were the better credited amongſt thē, for that through him, they receyued ſo greate benefites, God by ſuch meanes working in the peoples hartes a deſire to come to the vnderſtandyng of his lawes. The King alſo gaue vnto Wilfrid a place called Seolesew, compaſſed about on each ſide (except on the Weſt halfe) with the Sea, conteyning. 87. houſholdes or families, where he built an Abbey, and baptiſed all his tenauntes there, amounting to the number of. 250. bond men and bond women, whome hee made free both in body and ſoule, for he did not only baptiſe them, but alſo enfranchiſed them of all bodily ſeruitude and bondage.

In this meane while, many things happened in other partes of this lande, and firſt in the yeare after the appearing of the blaſing Starre before mentioned, a mightie battell was fought betwixt the ſayd Ecgfrid, and Edilred King of Mercia, neere to the riuer of Trent, where Alſwine ỳ brother of King Ecgfrid was ſlaine, with many other of the Northumbers, ſo that King Ecgfrid was conſtreyned to returne home with loſſe. The Archbiſhop of Canterbury Theodorus perceyuing that great warre and effuſion of bloud was like to followe thereof, trauelled ſo in the matter betwixt them, that they were made friendes, and Ecgfrid had a peece of money in recompence of his loſſes. The foreſayd battell was fought in the yeare of our Lord. 679. and in the yeare following, that is to ſay, in the yere of our Lord. 680. whiche was alſo the tenth yeare of the raigne of Ecgfrid King of Northumberland, the ſixth yere of the raigne of Edelred King of Mercia, the ſeuenteenth of the raigne of Aldbulfe King of the Eaſt angles, and in ỳ ſeuenth yeare of the raigne of Lothere king of Kente, the Archbiſhop of Cāterbury Theodorus held anothet Synod at Hatfield, about the day of the fifteenth Kalendes of Octobre, in the which all the Cleargie there preſent, ſubſcribed to certaine Articles touching the beleefe beleefe of the trinitie of persons, in the vnitie of the Godhead of like substãce, and also of the same vnitie in trinitie, according to the true faith of the Church of God: and moreouer, they acknowledged by the like subscription, the fiue generall cõcels of Nice, and Constantinople the first, of Ephesus, of Caledone, and of Constantinople the second, with the Synode also holden at Rome in the dayes of Martin Bishop of Rome, about the ninth yeare of the Emperour Constantine. At this Sinode holden at Hatfield, was presente one John the Archechanter of Saint Peters Church at Rome, sent into this lande of purpose to bring from hence a certificat vnto Pope Agatho of the agreement of the English Church in matters of faith, with other churches of the Christiã world: but the foresayde Archechantor dyed by the way in Fraunce, as he returned homewards, and was buried at Towers in Towrayne.

The same yeare, that famous woman Hilda Abbesse of Whitby, departed out of this life, or as other say, a fiue yeares after, hauing firste bin deteyned a long time with greeuous sickenesse. She was the daughter of one Herrericus the Nephew of King Edwin, and conuerted to the faythe of Christ at the preaching of Bishop Pauline, and afterwards instructed by Bishop Aydan, professed hir selfe a Nunne, applying hir whole studie to the reading of the Scriptures, to prayer, and other godly exercises. She builded the Abbey of Whitby, wherein were placed both men and women, with suche an equalitie in all thyngs, that there was no rich person amongst them, nor any that wanted things necessary. She departed out of this life on the fifteenth Kalendes of December, being .66. yeares of age. As some haue written she argued stoutly on Bishop Colmons part, at the disputation holden in the Monasterie of Whitby, in the yeare of grace. 664. whereof yee haue heard before.

About the yeare of our Lorde .682. that is to say, in the seuenth yeare of Centwine or Centuinus King of West Saxons, the same Centwine fought with the Britaynes, and ouercame them in battayle, pursuing them with fire and sword vnto the Sea side.

Cadwallader.

BVt now to returne vnto that which is founde in the Brittish histories, by the tenor whereof it should appeare, that whe their King Cadwallo was dead, his son Cadwallader succeeded him in rule of the Britaynes in the yeare of our Lord 678. which was about the tenth yere of the Emperour Constantinus Pagonatus, and in the thirtenth yeare of the raigne of Childericus kyng of Fraunce.

This Cadwallader being the sonne of Cadwallo, was begot by him of the halfe sister of Penda King of Mercia, for one father begote them both, but of two sundry mothers, for ther had to mother a Lady, discended of the noble bloud of the West Saxons, and was married vnto Cadwallo when the peace was made betwixt him, & hir brother the said Penda. After that Cadwallader had raigned the space of twelue yeres, as Geffrey of Monmoth hathe, or as other write, but .7. yeares, the Britaines were brought into suche miserie through ciuill discorde, and also by suche great & extreame famin as then raigned through all the lande, that Cadwallader was constreyned with the chiefest part of his people to forsake their native country, and by Seand get them ouer into Britaine Armorike, there to seeke relefe of vittayles, for the sustentation of their languishyng bodies. A long processe is made by the Brittishe writers of this departure of Cadwallader, and of the Britaines, out of this lande, and howe Cadwallader was about to haue returned againe, but that he was admonished by a dreame to the contrary, the which because it seemeth but fabulous, we passe ouer. At length he went to Rome, and there was confirmed in the Christian Religion by Pope Sergius, and shortly after fell sicke, and dyed the twelfth Kalends of May, in the yeare of our Lord .689. But herein appeareth the error of the Britishe writers in taking one for another, by reason of resemblance of names, for where Ceadwalla King of the West Saxons about that time moued of a religious deuotion, after he was conuerted to the faith, went vnto Rome, and was there Baptised or else confirmed of the foresayde Pope Sergius, and shortly after departed thys life in that Citie, in the foresayde yeare of .689. or thereabouttes, the Welchmen accompt hym to be their Cadwalladar: whiche to be true is very vnlike by that whiche may be gathered by the writings of diuers approued authors.

Ceadwalla.

THis Ceadwalla King of the West Saxons succeeded after Centwine or Centuinus, whiche Centwine raigned nine yeares, though it shoulde appeare by that whiche is written by Authoures of good credite, that during two

But now to Ceadwall, whom ſome take to be al one with Cadwallader, we finde ẏ he was lyneally diſcended frō Cutha or Cutwine, the brother of Ceauline or Keuling K. of Weſt Saxōs, as ſon to Kenbert or Kenbright that was ſon to Ceadda the ſon of ẏ foreſaid Cutha or Cutwin. Thus he being extract of ẏ noble houſe of ẏ kings of Weſt Saxons, proued in his youth a perſonage of great towardnes, & ſuch a one as no ſmal hope was of him conceyued: he would let no occaſion paſſe where he might exerciſe his force, to ſhew proofe of his high valiancie, ſo that in the ende with his worthy attemptes ſhewed therein, he purchaſed to himſelfe the enuy of thoſe that ruled in his countrey, by reaſon whereof he was baniſhed by a cōſpiracie made againſt him. Wherupon hee toke occaſion as it were in reuenge of ſuche vnthankfulneſſe to withdrawe out of hys countrey, leading with him all ẏ principal youth of the ſame, the whiche eyther pitying his preſent eſtate, or moued with pleaſure taken in hys meaning to inhabite it with his owne people, hee bound himſelfe by vowe, although as yet he was not baptiſed, that if he might cōquere it, he would giue a fourth part thereof vnto the Lorde. And in perfourmāce of that vowe, he offered vnto Biſhop Wilfride who then chanced to be preſent, when he had taken that Ile, ſo muche thereof, as conteyned three hundred houſholdes or families, where the whole conſiſted in. 1200. houſholdes. valiante doings, followed him at his going into exile. The firſt brunt of his furious attemptes after hee was out of his countrey, Edilwalke the king of the South Saxons taſted, the whiche in defence of himſelfe comming to trie battell with Ceadwalla, was ſlayne with the moſt part of all his army. Ceadwalla then perceiuing the valiāt courages of his Souldiers, filled with good hope of this happy atchieued victory, returned with good and proſperous ſpeede into his owne countrey, and that ere he was loked for, and earneſtly purſuing his aduerſaries, droue them out of the Kingdom, and taking vpon him to rule the ſame as king, reigned two yeares during the whych he atchieued diuers notable enterpriſes. And firſte, whereas Berthun and Authune Dukes of Suſſex & ſubiectes vnto ẏ late K. Edilwalke, had both expulſed him out of ẏ countrey, after he had ſlain the ſaid Edilwalke, and alſo taken vpon them the rule of that Kingdome, he hauing now atteyned to the gouernement of the Weſt Saxons, inuaded ẏ countrey of Suſſex againe, and ſlewe Berthune in battell, bringing that cōtrey into more bondage than before. Thus was ẏ Ile of Wight brought to ẏ faith of Chriſt laſt of al other ẏ parties of this our Britain, after that ẏ ſame faith had failed here by the comming of the Saxons. Moreouer, K. Ceadwalla inuaded the kingdom of Kent, wher he loſt his brother Mollo, as after ſhall appeare, but yet hee reuenged hys death with great ſlaughter made of ẏ inhabitāts in ẏ countrey. Finally, this worthy Prince Ceadwalla turning himſelf from ẏ deſire of warre & bloudſhed, became right courteis, gentle, & liberal towardes all men, ſo that ye could not haue wiſhed more vertuous manners to reſt in one as yet not Chriſtned. to be admitted into the fellowship of the Christians, (of whose Religion he had taken good tast) he went to Rome, where of Pope Sergius hee was baptised, and named Peter, and shortly after surprysed with sickenesse died, and was buried there within the Churche of Saint Peter in the yeare of our Lorde. 689.

In the meane while, that is to witte, in the yeare of our Lorde. 684. Ecgfrid king of Northumberland sent an armie vnder the guiding of a Captaine named Bertus into Irelande, the which wasted that Countrey, sparing neyther Church nor Monasterie, sore endomaging the people of that Countrey, whiche had euer beene friendes vnto the English Nation, and deserued nothing lesse than so to be inuaded and spoyled at their handes.

The Irish men defended themselues to theyr power, beseeching god with manye a salte teare, that he woulde reuenge theyr cause, in punishyng of suche extreeme iniuries. And though cursers may not inherite the Kingdome of heauen, yet they ceassed not to curse, hoping the sooner those which with good cause were thus accursed, should worthily be punished for their offences by God, and so (peraduenture) it fell out. For in the yeare following the sayde king Egfrid had led an armye into Pictlande, againste Brudeus king of the Pictes, and being trayned into straytes within hilles and craggie mountaines, he was slain with the most part of all his armie, in the yeare of hys age. xl. and of his raigne. xb. vpon the. xiij. kalends of June.

There were diuerse of Ecgfrides friends, and namely Cutbert whome hee had aduaunced the same yeare vnto the Bishops sea of Lindesfarne) that admired him in no wise, eyther to haue taken this warre in hande againste the Pictes, or the other against them of Irelande, but he would not be counsayled, the punishment appoynted for his sinnes being such, that hee might not giue eare to his faythfull friendes, that aduised him to the best. From that time forth, the hope and power of the English people began to decay. For not onely the Pictes recouered that part of theyr Countrey which the English men had holde before in theyr possessiō, but also the Scots that inhabited within this Ile, and likewise some part of the Britaynes tooke vppon them libertie which they kept and maintayned a long time after, as Bede confesseth. Ecgfride left no children behinde him. He had to wife one Ethelreda, or Edildrida, that was daughter vnto Anna king of the Eastangles which liued with hir husbande the foresayd Ecgfride. xij. yeares in perfite virginitie (as it is supposed) contrarie to the purpose of hir husbande. if hee might haue perswaded hir to the contrarie, but she founde such meanes, that finally he was contented that she should keepe hir first vow of chastity, which she had made.

She was both widow and virgin when hee maryed hir, being first coupled in wedlocke with one Eunbert a noble men and a ruler in the south partes of the Countrey, where the people called Girwy inhabited, whiche is the same where the fennes lye in the confines of Lincolnshire, Norfolke, Huntingtonshire, and Cambridgshire, but he liued with hir but a small while. Ethelreda. Girwii.

After she had obteyned licence to departe from the Court, she got hir first into Coldingham Abbay, and there was professed a Nunne. And after she went to Ely, and there restored the Monasterie, and was made Abbes of the place, in the which after shee had gouerned. bij. yeares, shee departed this life, and was there buried.

This same was she which commonly is called Saint Audrey of Ely, had in great reuerence for the opinion conceyued of hir great vertue and puritie of life.

After that king Ecgfrid was slain (as before is mencioned his brother Alfrid was made king of Northumberland. This Alfride was the bastarde sonne of king Oswy, and in his brothers dayes, eyther willingly, or by violent meanes constrayned, he liued as a banished man in Irelande, where applying himselfe to studie hee became an excellent Philosopher, and therefore being iudged to be better able to haue the rule of a kingdome, he was receyued by the Northumbers, and made king, gouerning his subiects by the space of. xx. yeares & more, with great wisedome and policie, but not with such large bounds as his auncestors had done: for the Pictes as before is mencioned) had cut off one peece on the North part of the auncient limits of that kingdome.

About the. xvij. yeare of his raigne, that is to wit, in the yeare of our Lorde. 698. one of hys Captaynes named Earle Berthed, or Bertus, was slaine in battaile by the Picts, whose confines he had as then inuaded. 698 Beda in Epit. Mat. West.

The curse of the Irishe men whose countrey in the dayes of king Ecgfrid he had cruelly wasted (as before is mentioned) was thought at this time to take place.

The ſayde John was remoued to the Church of Yorke, the ſame being then voyde by the death of the Archbyſhoppe Boſa. At length the foreſayd John aweried with the cares of publyke affayres reſigned his Sea, and got him vnto Beuerley, where hee lyued a ſolitarie lyfe for the ſpace of foure yeares, and then dyed, about the yeare of our Lorde. 721. King Oſrike as then reigning in Northumberlande. Hee continued Byſhoppe for the ſpace of. xviij. yeares, and buylded a Churche, and founded a Colledge of Prieſts at Beuerley aforeſayde, in which church he lyeth buried.

The ſame yeare, or in the yeare after that king Ecgfride was ſlaine. Lother king of Kent departed this life, the. viij. It was thought that hee was diſquieted with continuall warres and troubles, and finally brought to his end before the natural courſe of his time, for a puniſhment of his wicked conſent giuen, to the putting to death of his couſins Ethelbert, and Ethilbrit, as appeared in that, when they were reported to be Martyrs, bycauſe it was knowne they dyed innocently, hee mocked them, and made but a ieaſt at it, although his brother in acknowledging his fault, repented him therof, and gaue as it were in recompence to theyr mother, a part of the Ile of Thanet to the buylding of a Monaſterie.

Edrick

The foreſaid Edrick after that Lother was dead, got the dominion of Kent, and ruled as king thereof, but not without ciuill war, inſomuch that before he had raigned the full tearme of two yeres, he was ſlaine in the ſame warre.

Then Ceadwalla king of the Weſt Saxons being thereof aduertiſed, ſuppoſing the time now to bee come that would ſerue his purpoſe, as one ſtill coueting to worke the Kentiſh men all the diſpleaſure he coulde, entred with an armie into their Countrey, and beganne to waſt and ſpoyle the ſame on eche ſide, till finally the Kentiſhmen aſſembling themſelues togither, gaue battaile to their enimies and put them to flight.

Mollo brother to Ceadwalla was dryuen from hys compenie, and conſtrayned to take an houſe for his refuge: but his enimies that purſued hym ſette fyre thereon, and burned both the houſe, and Mollo within it to Aſhes. Yet dyd not Ceadwalla herewith depart oute of the Countrey, but to wreake his wrathe, and to reuenge the griefe which he toke for the death of his brother, hee waſted and deſtroyed a greate parte of Kent ere hee returned home, and left (as it were) an occaſion to his ſucceſſor alſo to purſue the quarell (as after ſhall appeare.)

Mollo k to king C walla be death.

VVil. Malm.

The Kentishmen being destitute of a king, after that diuerse had coueted the place, and sought to attaine therto, as well by force as otherwise, to the great disquieting of that prouince for ỳ space of fiue yeares togither, at length in the. vij. yeare after the death of Edrick, Withred an other of the sonnes of king Egbert, hauing with diligente trauelle ouercome enuie at home, and with money redeemed peace abrode, was with great hope conceyued of his worthinesse made king of Kent, the. xj. of November. 205. after the death of Hengest, and raigned. xxxiij. yeares, not deceyuing his subiectes of their good conceyued opinion of him: for ouercomming all his aduersaries which were readie to leuie tyuill warre agaynst him, he also purchased peace of Inas king of the West Saxons, whiche ment to haue made him warre, till with money he was made his friend.

A little before that Withred was confirmed in the kingdome of Kent, there raigned two kings in that countrey, Suebhard, or Nidred, or rather the same Withred, if the printed copie of Bedas booke intituled Ecclesiastica historia gētis Anglorum, haue not that name corrupted: for where he sheweth that the Archbishop Theodorus being of the age of. 88. yeares, departed this life in the yeare of our Lorde. 690. in the next chapter he declareth, that in the yeare. 692. the first day of July one Brightwalde was chosen to succeede in the Archbishops sea of Canterburie, Wilfredus, and Suebhardus as then raigning in Kent: but whether Wilfredus gouerned as then with Suebhardus, or that some other named Nitred, it forceth not, for certain it is by the agreement of writers, that till Wilfred obteyned the whole rule, there was great strife and contention moued about the gouernment, and diuerse there were that sought and fought for it.

But this ought to be noted, ỳ the forenamed Brightwalde was the eight Archbishop in number, and first of the English nation that sat in the sea of Canterburie: for the other seuen that were predecessors to him, were straungers borne, and sent hither from Rome.

Inas king of VVest Saxons.

In this meane whyle after that Ceadwalla, late king of the West Saxons was gon to Rome, where he departed this lyfe (as before is shewed) his cosin Inas, or Ine, was made king of the West Saxons, beginning his raigne in the yeare of our Lorde. 689. in the thirde yeare of the Emperour Iustinianus the thirde, in the. xj. yeare of the raigne of Theodorius king of Fraunce, and about the seconde yeare of the raigne of Eugenius king of Scots.

Bycause that now the rule of the Brytaines commonly called Welchmen, ceassed in thys Realme, as by confession of their owne writers it appeareth, and that in the ende the whole Monarchie of the same Realme came to ỳ hands of ỳ kings of West Saxons, we haue thought meete to referre things general vnto ỳ raignes of ỳ same kings, as before wee did in the Brytaine Kings, reseruing the particuler doings to the kings of the other Prouinces or kingdomes, as the same haue fallen out, and shall come to hande. The Brytaynes ceasse to raign in this lande.

This Inas, which some mistaking then. for an u, do wrongfully name Iue or Iewe, proued a right excellent Prince, hee was discended of the auncient lynage of the kings of the West Saxons, as sonne to one Kenred, that was sonne to Ceolwald, the sonne of Cutha, or Cutwyne, that was sonne to Kenrick, the sonne of Certicus, the first king of West Saxons. But he was admitted to the kingdome more for the valiant prowes knowne to rest in his worthie person, than for the successiue offspring of which he was discended. Fabian. Henric. Hūt.

The first voyage that he made, was agaynst the Kentishmen, on whom he purposed to reuenge the death of his cosin Mollo, the griefe whereof, as yet he kept in fresh memorie. But when the Kentish men perceiued, that to resist him by force, they were nothing able, they attempted by money to buy theyr peace, and so obteined their purpose, vpon payment made to him of. xxx. M. markes of siluer. Mat. VVest. VVil. Malm.

After this, about the. xxj. yeare of his raigne, king Inas and his cosin Nun, fought with Gerent king of the Brytaynes. Anno. 708. as is noted by Mat. VVest.

In the beginning of the battaile one Higelbald a noble man of the West Saxons part was slaine, but in the ende Gerent with his Brytains was chased. H. Hunt.

In the. xxvj. yeare of his raigne, the same Inas fought a mightie battaile against Ceolred King of Mercia, at Wodenesburie, with doubtfull victorie, for it could not well be iudged whether part sustayned greater losse. Mat. VVest. hath. 718.

In the. xxxvj yeare of his raigne, king Inas inuaded the South Saxons with a mightie armie, and slue in battaile Ealdbright, or Alpinius king of the South Saxons, & ioyned that kingdome vnto the kingdome of the West Saxons: so that from thence forth the kingdome of those South Saxons ceassed, after they had raigned in that kingdome by the space of fiue kings successiuely, that is to wit, Ella, Cissa, Ethelwalke, Berutius, and this last Aluinius, or Ealdbright. Mat. VVest. hath. 722. The end of the kingdome of the South Saxons.

Finally

Finally, when Inas had raigned. xxvbij. yeares, and. x. or. xj. odde Monethes, hee renounced the rule of his kingdome, togither with all worldly pompe, and went vnto Rome as a poore pylgryme, and there ended his life: But before this, during the time of his raigne, hee shewed himselfe verie deuout and zealous towardes the aduauncement of the Christian Religion. He made and ordeyned also good and wholesome lawes for the amendment of maners in the people, whiche are yet extant and to bee redde, written in the Saxon tongue, and translated into the Latine in tymes past, and nowe lately agayne by maister William Lambert, and imprinted by John Day, in the yeare. 1568. togither wyth the lawes and Statutes of other Kings before the Conquest, as to the learned it may appeare.

Inas went to Rome and there dyed.

Moreouer, King Ine builded the Monasterie of Glastenburie, where Joseph of Arimathea, in times past builded an Oratorie or Chappell (as before is recited) when he with other christians came into this lande in the dayes of Aruiragus, and taught the Gospell here to the Brytayns, conuerting many of them to the fayth. Polidor.

Moreouer king Ine or Inas buylded the Church of Welles, dedicating it vnto saint Andrew, where afterwardes a Bishops Sea was placed, which at length was translated vnto Salisburie. He had to wife one Ethelburga, a woman of noble lynage, who had beene earnest in hande with him a long time to perswade him to forsake the worlde: but shee could by no meanes bring hir purpose to passe, till vppon a time the king and she had lodged at a Manor place in the Countrey, where all prouision had beene made for the receyuing of them and theyr trayne in most sumptuous manner that might be, as well in riche furniture of householde, as also in costly viandes, and all other things needefull, or that might serue for pleasure, and when they were departed, the Queene the forelayde Ethelburga, caused the keeper of that house to remoue all the bedding, hangings, and other such things as had beene brought thither and ordeyned for the beautifull setting forth of the house, and in place therof to bring ordure, strawe, and suche lyke filth, as well into the Chambers and Hall, as into all the houses of office, and that done to lay a Sowe wyth Pigges in the place where before the kings bed had stoode.

Hereupon when she had knowledge that euerye thing was ordered according to hir appoyntment, she perswaded the King to returne thyther agayne, feyning occasions great and necessarie.

After he was returned to that house, whiche before seemed to the eye a Palace of moste pleasure, and nowe fynding it in suche a filthie state as might lothe the stomacke of any man to beholde the same, shee toke occasion therof to perswade him to the consideration of the vaine pleasures of this worlde, whiche in a moment turned to naught, togyther with the corruption of the flesh, beeing a filthie lumpe of Clay, after it should once be dyssolued by death: and in fine where before shee had spente muche labour to moue hym to renounce the Worlde, though all in vayne, yet nowe the beholding of that chaunge in his pleasant Palayce wherein so late hee had taken so greate delight, wrought suche an alteration in hys mynde, that hir wordes lastlye toke effecte: so that hee resigned the Kingdome to his cousin Ethelard and went himselfe to Rome (as aboue is mentioned,) and his wife became a Nunne in the Abbey of Barking, where she was made Abbesse, and finally there ended hir lyfe.

This Inas was the fyrst that caused the money called Peter pens, to bee payde vnto the Bishop of Rome, which was for euery houshold within his dominion a pennie.

In this meane time Edilred or Ethelred, hauing gouerned the Kingdome of Mercia by the terme of .xxix. yeares, became a Monke in the Abbey of Bardeny, and after was made Abbot of that house. He had to wyfe one Osthryda the sister of Ecgfride King of Northumberlande, by whome hee had a sonne named Ceolred. But he appointed Kenred the sonne of his Brother Vulfhere to succeed him in the kingdome.

The sayde Osthrida was cruelly slaine by the treason of hir husbandes subiectes, about the yeare of our Lorde. 697.

The foresayde Kenred was a Prince of greate vertue, deuoute towardes God, a furtherer of the common wealth of his Countrey, and passed hys lyfe in greate synceritye of maners.

In the fifth yeare of his raigne, he renounced the worlde, and went to Rome, togither with Offa king of East Saxons, where he was made a Monke: and finally dyed there, in the yeare of our Lord. 711.

By the ayde and furtherance of this Kenred, a Monke of Saint Benets order (cleped Egwin) buylded the Abbay of Euesham. Afterwardes the same Egwine was made Bishoppe of Worcester.

Nauclerus.

Egwin Bishop of Worcester.

We finde it recorded by writers, that this Egwine had warning giuen to him by visions, (as hee constantly affyrmed before Pope Constantine,) to set vp an Image of our Ladie in his Churche. Herevppon the Pope approuing the testifications of this Bishoppe, by hys Bulles, wrytte to Brychtwalde the Archebyshoppe of Canterburie, to assemble a Synode, and by authoritie thereof to establishe the vse of Images, charging the kings of this lande to bee present at the same Synode, vpon paine of excommunication.

This Sinode was holden about the yeare of our Lorde. 712. in the dayes of Inas King of West Saxons, and of Ceolred king of Mercia, successor to the foresayde Kenred.

After Kenred succeeded Ceolredus, the sonne of his vncle Edilred, and died in the. viij. yeare of his raigne, and was buried at Lichfielde.

Then succeeded Ethelbaldus that was discended of Eopa the brother of king Penda, as the fourth from hym by lineall succession. Thys man gouerned a long time without any notable trouble: some warres he had, and sped diuerslye.

In the. xviij. yeare of his raigne he besieged Sommerton, and wanne it. Hee also inuaded Northumberlande, and gotte there great ryches by spoyle and pyllage, whiche hee brought from thence without any battaile offered to him.

The Welchmen he ouercame in battaile, being then at quiet, and ioyned as cõfederates with Cuthred K. of West Saxõs. But in the. xxxviij. yeare of his raigne, hee was ouercome in battaile at Beresorde by the same Cuthred, with whome he was fallen at variance, and within foure yeres after, that is to witte, in the. xlj. yeare of hys raigne, hee was slaine in battaile at Secandone, or Sekenton, by his owne subiectes, whiche arreared warres agaynste hym, by the procurement and leading of one Bernred, which after hee had slayne his naturall Prince, toke vppon him the Kingdome: but he prospered not long, being slaine by Offa that succeeded him in rule of the kingdome of Mercia, as after shall be shewed. The bodie of Ethelbald was buried at Ripton.

The hystorie of Magd.

Bonifacius the Archbishop of Menze or Magguntze, hauing assembled a Councell wyth other Bysshoppes and Doctours, deuised a letter and sent it vnto this Ethilbert, commending him for his good deuotion and charitie in almes gyuing to the releefe of the powre, and also for his vpright dealing in administration of Iustice, to the punishment of robbers and such lyke misdoers: but in that he abstayned from maryage and wallowed in filthie lecherie with diuerse women, and namely with Nunnes, they sore blamed him and withall declared in what infamie the whole Englishe Nation in those dayes remayned by common report in other Countreys for theyr lycencious lyuing in sinfull fornication, and namely the moste parte of the Noble men of Mercia by hys euill example did forsake theyr wyues, and defloured other women whiche they kept in adulterie as Nunnes and other.

Moreouer hee sheweth howe that suche euill women, as well Nunnes as other, vsed to make awaye in secrete wise theyr children whiche they bare oute of wedlocke, and so fylled the graues wyth deade bodyes, and hell wyth damned soules.

The same Bonifacius in an other Epystle whiche hee wrote vnto Cutbert the Archbyshop of Canterburie, counsayleth him not to permitte the Englishe Nunnes to wander abrode so often on Pylgrymage, bycause there were fewe Cities eyther in Fraunce or Lombardye, wherein might not bee founde English women, that lyued wantonlye in fornication and whordome.

In this meane tyme Sigharde and Seufred, Kings of the East Saxons, being departed thys lyfe, one Offa that was sonne to Sigerius, succeeded in gouernment of that Kingdome, a man of greate towardnesse, and of right comely countenaunce: but after hee had ruled a certayne tyme, hee beeing moued of a religious deuotion, wente vnto Rome in companie of Kenred King of Mercia, and of one Ecgwine Bysshoppe of Worcester, and beeing there shauen into the order of Monkes, so continued tyll hee dyed.

After him one Selred the sonne of Sigbert the good, ruled the East Saxons the tearme of xxxviij. yeares.

After that Aldulfe the King of East Angles was departed thys life, whiche chaunced aboute the yeare of oure Lorde. 688. his brother Eltwolde, or Ethwolde succeeded him, and raigned about. xij. yeares. After whose decease one Brorne was made king of Eastangles, and raigned about. xxvj. yeares.

About the seuenth yeare of his raigne, that is to witte, in the yeare of oure Lorde. 711. one of his Captaynes named Earle Berthfride fought with the Pictes betwixte two places called Heue and Cere, and obteyning the victorie, slue an huge number of the enimies.

Henric. Hu. Pictes ouerthrowne by the Northumbers.

At length King Osred by the traiterous meanes of hys cousins that arreared warre agaynste him, was slaine in battaile, and so ended his raigne. leauing to those that procured his death the lyke fortune in tyme to come. For Kenred raigning two yeares, and Osricke tenne yeares, were famous onely in this, that beeing worthilye punished for shedding the blond of theyr naturall Prince and soueraigne Lorde, they finished their lyues with dishonourable deathes, as they had well deserued.

King Osred slaine in battaile.

Osricke before his death whiche chaunced in the yeare of oure Lorde. 729. appoynted Ceolwolfe the brother of his predecessour Kenred, to succeede him in the kingdome, whiche hee did, raigning as king of the Northumbers by the space of. viij. yeares currant, and then renouncing his kingdome, became a Monke in the Ile of Lindesferne.

In this meane while, Bysshoppe Wilfride being dead one Acca that was his Chaplain was made Bishop of Hexham.

Beda. Acca Bishop of Hexham.

The forsayde Wilfride had beene Bishop by the space of. xlv. yeares: but hee lyued a long tyme in exyle. For first beeyng Archebyshoppe of Yorke, and exercising his iurisdiction ouer all the North partes, hee was after banished by king Egbert, and agayne restored to the Sea of Hexham, in the seconde yeare of king Alfride, and within fiue yeares after eftsones banyshed by the same Alfride, and the seconde tyme restored by his successour king Osred, in the fourth yeare of whole raigne, beeing the yeare after the Incarnation of oure Sauiour 709. hee departed this lyfe, and was buryed at Rippon.

Moreouer after John the Archebyshoppe of Yorke had resigned, one Wilfride surnamed the seconde, was made Archebishoppe of that Sea: whiche Wilfride was Chaplayne to the sayde John, and gouerned that Sea by the space of fiftene yeares, and then died.

Aboute the yeare of oure Lorde. 710. the Abbot Adrian whiche came into this lande wyth Theodore the Archebyshoppe of Canterburie (as before yee haue heard) departed thys lyfe, a-

Alſo Inas the king of Weſt Saxons, about the .xx. yeare of his raigne, deuided the Prouince of the Weſt Saxons into two Byſhoppes Seas, where as before they had but one. Daniel was ordeyned to gouerne the one of thoſe Seas, being placed at Wincheſter, hauing vnder him Suſſex, Southerie and Hamſhire: and Aldhelme was appoynted to Shireburne, hauing vnder him, Barkeſhire, Wyltſhire Sommerſetſhire, Dorſetſhyre, Deuonſhire, and Cornwall.

This Aldhelme was a learned man, and was firſt made Abbot of Malmeſburie, in the yeare of our Lorde. 675. by Eleutherius then Biſhop of the Weſt Saxons. By his diligence that Abbay was greatly aduaunced, being afore that tyme founded by one Medulfe a Scottiſh man, but of ſo ſmall reuenues afore Aldhelmes tyme, that the Monkes were vneth able to lyue therein.

Alſo the ſame Aldhelme was a greate furtherer vnto king Inas in the buylding of Glaſtenburie.

Ethelard.

EThelarde, the coulyn of king Inas, to whome the ſame Inas reſigned hys kingdome, beganne to gouerne ỹ Weſt Saxõs in the yeare of oure Lorde. 724. or rather, 27. which was in the. xj. yeare of the Emperour Leo Iſaurus, in the ſeconde yeare of Theodorus king of Fraunce, and aboute the. viij. or. ix. yeare of Mordacke king of Scottes.

In the firſt yeare of Ethelardes raigne, hee was diſquieted with ciuill warre, which one Oſwalde a Noble manne, diſcended of the royall bloud of the Weſt Saxon Kings, procured agaynſt him: but in the ende, when he perceyued that the kings power was to ſtrong for him, hee fledde oute of the Countrey, leauing it thereby in reſt.

In the yeare. 729. in the Moneth of Januarie there appeared two Comets or blaſing Starres, right terrible to beholde, the one riſing in the morning before the riſing of the Sunne, & the other after the ſetting thereof: ſo that the one came before the breake of the day, and the other before the cloſing of the night, ſtretching forth theyr fierie brandes towardes the North, and they appeared thus euerie morning and euening the ſpace of a fourtnight togither, menacing as it were ſome great deſtruction or common miſhap to follow.

The Saraſins ſhortly after entred Fraunce, and were ouerthrowne.

Finally, when king Ethelard had raigned the tearme of fourtene yeares currant, hee departed this life.

AFter that Wichtred king of Kent had gouerned the Kentiſhmẽ by the ſpace of xxxiij. yeares, with great cõmendation for the good orders which hee cauſed to be obſerued amongeſt them, as well concerning matters eccleſiaſticall as temporall, hee departed this life, leauing behind him three ſonnes whiche ſucceſſiuely raigned as heyres to hym one after another, (that is to ſay) Edbert. xxiij. yeares, Ethelbert. xj. yeares currant, and Alrike. xxxiiij. yeares, the whiche three Princes following the ſteppes of theyr father in the obſeruaunce of politique orders and commendable lawes, vſed for the more parte theyr fathers good lucke and fortune, except that in Ethelbertes tyme the Citie of Canterburie was burned by caſuall fyre, and Alrike loſt a battaile agaynſt them of Mercia, whereby the glorie of theyr tymes was ſomewhat blemyſhed: for ſo it came to paſſe that whatſoeuer chaunced euill, was kept ſtill in memorie, and the good happes that came forward, were ſone forgotten and put out of remembrance. vvil. Malm.

Harriſon nameth Ethelbert firſt, giuing him. 27. yeares, & Edbert ſecondly allowing him ten complete. Beda li. 5. ca. 24

In the yeare of our Lorde. 731. Bertwalde Archbyſhoppe of Canterburie departed this lyfe the fifth Ides of Januarie, after he had gouerned that Sea by the ſpace of .xxxvij. yeares. vj. Monethes, and fourteene dayes: in whoſe place the ſame yeare one Tacuine was ordeyned Archebyſhoppe, that before was a Prieſt in the Monaſterie of Bruydon wythin the Prouince of Mercia. Hee was conſecrated in the Citie of Canterburie, by the reuerende Fathers, Daniell Byſhoppe of Wyncheſter, Ingwalde Byſhoppe of London, Aldwine Byſhop of Licheſielde, and Aldwulfe Biſhop of Rocheſter, the. x. day of June, being Sunday. 731

Bishops what prouinces they gouerned.

And thus in that ſeaſon, the Prouince of Canterburie was gouerned touching the Eccleſiaſticall ſtate, by the Archbyſhoppe Tacwine, and Byſhoppe Aldwulfe. The Prouince of the Eaſt Saxons by Biſhop Ingwald: the prouince of East Ingles, by Bishop Eadbertus, and Hadulacus, the one keeping his Sea at Elsham, and the other at Dunwich.

The Province of the West Saxons was gouerned by the forelayd Daniel, and by Forthere, which succeeded next after Aldhelme in the Sea of Shereburne.

Mat. West. This Forthere in the yeare of our Lorde. 738. left his Bishoprike, and went to Rome in companie of the Queene of the West Saxons. Many as well Kings as Bishops, noble and vnnoble, Priestes and laymen, togither with women, vsed to make such iourneyes thither in those dayes.

The Province of Mercia was ruled by the forelayde Aldwine Byshop of Lichfielde, and one Bishop Walstod holding hys Sea at Herforde gouerned those people that inhabited beyond the riuer of Seuerne toward the West.

The Province of the Wiccies, that is to meane of Worcester, one Wilfride gouerned.

The South Saxons, and the Ile of Wight, were vnder the Bishop of Winchester.

In the Province of the Northumbers were foure Bishops, that is to say, Wilfride, Archbyshop of Yorke, Edilwalde Bishop of Lindisferne, Acca Bishop of Hexham, and Pechelmus Byshoppe of Whiterne, otherwise called Candida Casa, hee was the fyrst that gouerned that Church after the same was made a Bishops Sea. And thus stood the state of the Englishe Churche for Ecclesiasticall gouernours in that season.

Ethelbald K. of Mercia, of what puissance he was.

And as touching temporall gouernment, king Ceolwulf had the soueraigne Dominion ouer all the Northumbers: but all the Prouinces on the south side of Humber with theyr kings and rulers, were subiect vnto Edilbalde or Ethelbald king of Mercia.

The nation of the Picts were in league with the English men, and gladly became partaker of the Catholike peace and veritie of the vniuersall Church.

Those Scots which inhabited Brytaine, contenting themselues with theyr owne bounds, went not about to practise any deceytfull traynes nor fraudulent deuises agaynst the English men.

The Brytaynes, otherwise called Welchmen, though for the more part of a peculiar hatred they did impugne the English Nation, and the obseruaunce of the feast of Easter appointed by the whole Catholike Churche, yet both deuine and humaine force vtterly resisting them, they were not able in neyther behalfe to atteyne to theyr wished intentions, as they whiche though they were partly free, yet in some poynt remayned still as thrall and mancipate to the subiection of the English men: whiche Englishe men (saythe Bede) now in acceptable peace and quietnesse of time, manye amongest them of Northumberlande, laying armour and weapon aside, applie themselues to the reading of holy Scriptures, more desyrous to be professed in Religious houses, than to exercise feates of warre: but what wyll come thereof (sayth he) the age that followeth shall see and beholde. With these wordes doth Bede ende his Hystorie, continued tyll the yeare of our Lorde. 731. whiche was from the comming of the English men into thys lande, aboute. 285. yeares according to his accounte.

In the yeare following, that is to wit. 732. in place of Wilfride the seconde, Egbert was ordeyned Bishop of Yorke. 732

Will. Ma. This Egbert was brother vnto an other Egbert, the which as then was King of Northumberlande, by whose helpe, hee greatly aduaunced the Sea of Yorke, and recouered the Pall: so that where all the other Bishoppes that holde the same Sea before him sithe Paulines dayes, wanted the Pall, and so were accounted simply but particuler Bishoppes: nowe was hee entituled by the name of Archbishop. He also gotte togyther a great number of good bookes, which he bestowed in a librarie at Yorke.

In the yeare. 733. on the. xviij. Kalendes of September, the Sunne suffered a great Eclipse aboute three of the Clocke in the after Noone, in so muche that the Earth seemed to bee couered wyth a blacke and horrible Pentise. 733

In the yeare. 735. that reuerende and profounde learned manne Beda departed this lyfe, Beda dep. this life. beeing. lxxij. yeares of age vpon Ascention day, which was the. vij. Kalendes of June, and. xxvj. of May, as Mat. West hath diligently obserued. Harison addeth hereto, that it is to bee read in an olde Epystle of Cutbert Monke of the same house, vnto Cuthwyne, that the sayd Beda lying in hys death bed, translated the Gospell of Saint John into Englishe, and commaunded his brethren to bee diligent in the reading and contemplation of the bookes and not to exercise themselues wyth fables and friuolous matters. 735

Finally he was buryed in the Abbey of Girwie, distaunt fiue myles from Wyremouth, an Abbay also in the North parts, not farre from Newcastell (as is before remembred.) Hee was brought vp in those two Abbays, and was scholer to John of Beuerlay.

Howe throughly hee was seene in all kyndes of good literature, the bookes which he wrote doe manifestly beare witnesse. His iudgement also was so much esteemed ouer all, that Sergius the Bishoppe of Rome wrote vnto Ceolfrid the Abbot of Wyremouth, requyring hym to sende

Beda

Beda vnto the Courte of Rome for the decy-ding of certaine queſtions moued there, whiche without his opinion might ſeeme to reſt doubt-full. But whether hee went thither or not wee can not affyrme: but as it is thought by menne worthie of credite, hee neuer went oute of this
in the Abbeyes of Gerule, and Wyremouth, fyrſt vnder Benet the fyrſt Abbot and founder of the ſame Abbayes, and after vnder the ſayde Ceol-fride, in whoſe tyme he receyued orders of prieſthoode at the handes of Byſhoppe Johan, ſurnamed of Beuerlay, ſo that it may be marueylled that a man borne in the vttermoſte corner of the Worlde, ſhoulde prouc ſo excellente in all knowledge and learning, that his fame ſhoulde ſo ſpreade ouer the whole earth, and went neuer out of his native Countrey to ſeeke it. But who that marketh in reading olde Hyſtories the ſtate of Abbayes and Monaſteryes in thoſe dayes, ſhall well perceyue that they were ordered after the manner of our ſchooles or Colledges, hauing in them diuerſe learned men, that attended one-ly to teache and bring vp youth in knowledge of good learning, or elſe to go abrode and preach the word of God in the townes & villages adioining.

The ſame yeare died the Archbiſhop Tacuine, and in the yeare following, that is to witte. 735.
Nothelmus was ordeyned Archbiſhop of Canterburie in his place, and Egbert the Archbyſhop of Yorke the ſame yere got his Pall from Rome, and ſo was confirmed Archbiſhop, and ordeyned two Biſhops, Frydbert, and Frydwalde. But ſome refer it to the yeare. 744.

Cuthred.

After the deceaſſe of Ethelard king of weſt Saxons, his coſin Cuthred was made King & gouernour of thoſe people, raigning the
terme of. xvj.
yeares. He beganne his raigne in the yeare of our Lord. 740. in the. xviij. yeare of the Emperour Leo Iſaurus, in the. xiiij. yeare of the raigne of the ſeconde Theodorus Cala king of Fraunce, and aboute the. vj. yeare of Ethſine King of Scottes.

This Cutred had muche to doe agaynſte Ed-dilbald king of Mercia, the which one while with ſtyrring his owne ſubiects the Weſt Saxons to rebellion, an other while with open warre, and ſometyme by ſecrete craft and ſubtile practiſes, ſought to diſquiet him.

In the fourth yeare yet of his raigne, a peace was concluded betwixt them, and then ioyning theyr powers togyther, they went agaynſte the Welchmen; and gaue them a great ouerthrow, as before is partly touched.

In the. ix. yeare of this Cuthreds raigne, hys ſonne Kenric was ſlaine in a ſeditious tumult amongſt his men of warre, a Gentleman yong in yeares, but of a ſtoute courage, and verie forwarde, whereby (as was thought) he came the ſooner to his ende. Kenric the kings ſonne ſlaine. 749 Mat. VVeſt.

In the. xj. yeare of his raigne, Cuthred had warres agaynſt one of his Earles called Adelme, who raiſing a commotion againſt him, aduentured to giue battaile, though he had the ſmaller nū-ber of men, and yet was at poynt to haue gone away with victorie, if by a wounde at that inſtant receyued, his periurie had not beene puniſhed, and the kings iuſt cauſe aduanced to triumphe ouer his aduerſarie, whome yet by waye of reconciliation he pardoned. In the. xiij. yeare of his raigne, King Cuthred being not well able longer to ſuſtayne the prowde exactions and harde doings of Edelbalde King of Mercia, rayſed hys power, and encountered with the ſame Edelbalde at Hereforde, hauing with hym the foreſayde Earle Adelme, in whoſe valiaunte prowes he put great hope to attaine victorie: neither was he deceyued: for by the ſtoute conduct and noble courage of the ſayde Adelme, the loftie pryde of King Edelbalde was abated, ſo that he was there put to flight, and all his armye diſ-
and mainteyned euen to the vttermoſt poynt. 751 752 Mat. VVeſt. King Edilbald put to flight.

In the. xviiij. yeare of his raigne, this Cuthred fought eftſones with the Welchmen, and obteyned the vpper hande, without any great loſſe of his people: for the enimies were eaſily put to flight and chaſed, to their own deſtruction.

In the yeare after, king Cutred fell ſicke, and in the. xvj. yeare of his raigne hee departed thys lyfe, after ſo many great victories got againſt his enimies.

Sigibert.

After hym
ſucceeded one Sigibert, a cruell prince & one vnmercifull at home, yet a cowarde
abrode.
This Sigbert or Sigibert began his raigne
in the yeare of our Lorde. 755. very neare ended.
He intreated his ſubiects verie euill, ſetting lawe

and reaſon at naught, he could not abide to heare his faultes tolde him, and therefore he cruelly put to death an Earle named Cumbra, which was of his counſaile and faythfully admoniſhed him to reforme his euill doings: whereupon the reſt of his Nobles aſſembled themſelues togither wyth a great multitude of people, and expelled him out of his eſtate in the beginning of the ſeconde, or (as Harison hath) the firſt yeare of hys raigne. Then Sigibert, as hee was fearefull of nature, fearing to bee apprehended, gotte him into the Woodde called as then Andredeſwalde, and there hydde himſelfe, but by chaunce a Swinehearde that belonged to the late Earle Cumbra at Priuetelſtoud founde him oute, and perceyuing what he was, ſlue him in reuenge of his maiſters death.

Lo here you may ſee how the righteous iuſtice of God rewardeth wicked doings in thys worlde with worthie recompence, as wel as in the worlde to come, appoynting forth euill Princes ſometymes to reigne to the puniſhment of the people, according as they haue deſerued permytting ſome of them to haue gouernment a long tyme, that both the frowarde Nation maye ſuffer long for theyr ſinnes, and that ſuch wicked Princes maye in an other Worlde taſte the more bytter tormentes. Againe, other hee taketh ſhortly out of the way, that the people maye bee deliuered from oppreſſion, & alſo that the naughtie ruler for his miſdemenor may ſpeedily receyue due puniſhment.

Ethelred.

After Beorne King of Eaſtangles one Ethelred ſucceeded in gouernment of ỹ kingdõ, a man noted to bee of good & vertuous qualities, in ỹ he brought vp his ſonne Ethelbert (which ſucceeded him) ſo in the feare of the Lorde, that he proued a righte godly prince. This Ethelred raigned (as Harison and alſo other writers haue) the terme of .lij. yeares.

After that Ceolbulf king of Northumberland was become a Monk, in the Abbey of Lindiſſern, his vncles ſonne Egbert by order taken by the ſayd Ceobulfe) ſucceeded him in the kingdome, & gouerned the ſame right worthily for the terme of xxiiij. yeares, and then became a Monke, by the example both of his predeceſſor the foreſayd Ceobulf, and alſo of diuerſe other kings in thoſe days, ſo that he was the eight king who in this lãd had chaunged a kings Crowne for a Monks Cowle, (as Simon Duncl. writeth.)

718 Egbert king of Northumberlande. Har. hath. 21. 758

Chaunging of crownes for Monks cowles

This Edbert (in the .xviij. yere of his raigne,) and Vnguſt king of Pictes came to the Citie of Alcluid with theyr armyes, and there receyued the Brytaynes into theyr ſubiection, the firſt day of Auguſt: but the tenth day of the ſame moneth, the armie which he led from Duan vnto Newbourgh, was for the more part loſt and deſtroyed. 756

The ſame yeare on the .viij. kalendes of December, the Mone being as then in hir full appeared to be of a bloudie coulour, but at length ſhee came to hir accuſtomed colour, after a marueylous meanes, for a ſtarre whiche followed hir, paſſed through hir, and went before hir, the like diſtance as it kept in following hir before ſhe loſt hir vſuall light.

Offa. After that Offa had ſlayne Bernred the vſurper of the Kingdome of Mercia (as before is mentioned,) the ſame Offa toke vppon hym the gouernment of that Kingdome. 758. a man of ſuch ſtowtneſſe of ſtomacke, that he thought he ſhould be able to bring to paſſe all things whatſoeuer he conceyued in his mind. He raigned. xxxix. yeares. 758 Mat. Weſt.

His doings were great and marueylous, and ſuche as ſome tymes his vertues ſurpaſſed hys vices, and ſometyme againe his vices ſeemed to ouermatch his vertues. Will.

The Kentiſhmen he ouercame in a great battayle at Otteforde, and the Northumbers alſo were by hym vanquiſhed, and in battaile put to flight. With Kenwulfe King of Weſt Saxons hee fought in open battaile, and obteyned a noble victorie, wyth ſmall loſſe of hys people, although the ſame Kenwulfe was a right valyaunt Prince, and a good Captaine. Againe, perceyuing that to proceede wyth craft ſhoulde ſooner aduaunce his purpoſe, than to vſe open force againſt Egilbert King of Eaſt Angles, vnder fayre promiſes to giue vnto him hys daughter in maryage, hee allured him to come into Mercia, and receyuing him into hys Palayce, cauſed his heade to be ſtryken off, and after by wrongfull meanes inuaded his kingdome, and got it into his poſſeſſion: yet hee cauſed the bones of the firſt Martyr of this lande Saint Albone (by a myraculous meanes brought to light,) to bee taken vp, and put in a riche ſhrine, adourned with golde and ſtone, buylding a goodly Churche of excellent workemanſhippe, and founding a Monaſterie in that place in honour of the ſame Saint, which he indowed with great poſſeſſions. Hee remoued the Archbiſhops Sea from Canterburie vnto Lichfield, thereby to aduaunce his Kingdome of Mercia, as well in dignitie and preheminẽce of Spirituall power as Temporall. The vi of king Mat. 77 Falſehe felonſhi The A ſhops moued Canterb Lichfi

He

He made great ſuyte to bring that his purpoſe to paſſe in the Court of Rome, and at length by great giftes and rewardes he obteyned it of the handes of Pope Adrian the firſt, as then gouerning the Romaine Sea.

And ſo Eadulfus as then Biſhop of Lichfielde was adourned with the Pall, and taken for Archbiſhop, hauing all thoſe Biſhops within the limittes of King Offa his Dominion, Suffragaines vnto him, as Denebertus Biſhop of Worceſter, Werebertus Biſhop of Cheſter, Eadulfus Biſhop of Dorcheſter, Wlmardus Biſhop of Herefoorde, Halard Biſhop of Elham, and Cedferth Biſhop of Donwich. There remayned onely to the Archbiſhop of Canterburie, the Biſhops of London, Wyncheſter, Rocheſter, and Shireburne.

And this ſeparation continued all the life time of the Archbiſhoppe Lambert, although he trauayled earneſtly to maintayne his prerogatiue, inſomuch for that hee ſtyll defended his cauſe, and woulde not conſent to his will, Offa depriued him of all his poſſeſſions and reuenues that he helde or enioyed wythin any part of his dominions. Neyther was Offa ſatiſfied herewith, but he alſo toke into his handes the poſſeſſions of manye other Churches, and namely, hee fleeced the houſe of Malmeſburie of parte of hir reuenues. Becauſe of theſe and other his harde doings, doubting the malice of hys enimes, hee procured the friendſhip of forraine Princes. Vnto Brightricke king of the Weſt Saxons hee gaue hys daughter Ethelburga in mariage. And ſending diuerſe Ambaſſadors ouer vnto Charles the great, that was both Emperour and king of Fraunce, at length he purchaſed his friendſhippe, although before there had depended a peeſe of diſpleaſure betwixt them, inſomuch that the entercourſe for trade of Merchandize was ſtayed for a tyme.

One of the Ambaſſadors that was ſent vnto the ſaid Charles (as is reported) was that famous clearke Albine, or Alcwine, by whoſe perſwaſion the ſame Charles erected two Vniuerſities, as in place conuenient it may more largely appeare.

Finally king Offa (as it were for a meane to appeaſe Gods wrath, whiche hee doubted to bee iuſtly conceyued towardes him for his ſinnes and wickednelle) graunted the tenth part of all hys goodes vnto Church men, and to poore people. He alſo endowed the Church of Herefoorde with great reuenues, and as ſome write, he builded the Abbay of Bathe, placing Monkes in the ſame, of the order of Saint Benet, as before hee had done at Saint Albons.

Moreouer hee went vnto Rome, about the yeare of our Lorde. 775. and there following the example of Inas King of the Weſt Saxons, he made his realme ſubiect by way of tribute vnto the Churche of Rome, appoynting that euerye houſe within the limits of his dominions ſhoulde yearely pay vnto the Apoſtolike Sea one pennie, which payment was after named Rome Scot, and Peter pens. Peter pence, or Rome Scot.

After hys returne from Rome, perceyuing himſelfe to drawe into yeares, hee cauſed his Sonne Egfride to bee ordeyned King in hys lyfe tyme: and ſhortly after departing oute of this Worlde, lefte the Kingdome vnto hym, after hee had gouerned it by the ſpace of. xxxix. yeares. Wil. Malm. 797. Offa departed this life.

Amongſt other the doings of this Offa which ſurely were great and marueylous, this may not paſſe with ſilence, that he cauſed a mightie greate ditch to be caſt betwixte the Marches of hys Countrey, and the Welche confines, to deuide thereby the bounds of their dominions. Offditch.

This Ditche was called Offeditch euer after, and ſtretched from the South ſide by Bryſtowe, vnder the Mountaynes of Wales, running Northwarde ouer the Ryuers of Seuerne and Dee, vnto the verie mouth of Dee, where that Ryuer falleth into the Sea. Hee likewyſe buylded a Church in Warwikeſhire, whereof the towne there taketh name, and is called Offchurch euen to this day.

Egfred taking vpon him the rule, beganne to follow the approued good doings of his father, and firſt reſtored vnto the Churches theyr auncient priuiledges, which his father ſome time had taken from them. Great hope was conceyued of hys further good proceedings, but death cut off the ſame, taking him out of this lyfe, after he had raigned the ſpace of foure Monethes, not for his owne offences (as was thought) but rather for that hys Father hadde cauſed ſo muche bloud to bee ſpylte for the confyrming of hym in the Kingdome, which ſo ſmall a time he nowe enioyed. Egfride king of Mercia.

After that Eadbert or Egbert king of Northumberlande was become a Monke, his ſonne Oſoulphus ſucceeded him: but after he had raigned onely one yeare, he was traiterouſly murthered by his owne ſeruants at Wikilwongton, on the xi. Kalends of Auguſt. Eadbert king of Northumberlande. 758. Simon Dun. H. Hunt.

Then ſucceeded one Wolfe, otherwiſe called Edilwold or Edilwald, but not immediately, for he began not his raigne till the Nones of Auguſt in the yeare following, which was after the byrth of our Sauior. 759. Edilwold king of Northomberland. Simon Dun. Henric. Hunt.

This man proued right valiaunt in gouernment of his ſubiects. He ſlue in battaile an Earle of his Countrey named Oſwin, the which arrearing warre againſt him, fought with him in a pight fielde at Eadwines Clue, and receyued the worthie rewarde of rebellion.

This chaunced in the third yeare of his raigne.

Shortly after, that is to witte in the yeare of our Lorde. 764. there fel such a marueylous great snowe, and therewith so extreeme a frost, as the like had not beene heard of, continuing from the begynning of the Winter, almost tyll the midst of the Spring, with the rygour whereof, trees and fruites wythered away, and lost theyr liuely shape and growth: and not onely feathered foules, but also beastes on the lande, and fishes in the Sea dyed in great numbers. The same yeare died Ceolwulf somtyme king of Northumberlande, vnto whome Beda dyd dedicate his booke of Hystories of the English Nation. After that hee was become a Monke in the Monasterie of Lyndisferne, the Monkes of that house had licence to drincke Wine, or Ale, where as before they myght not drinke any other thing than milke, or water, by the ancient rule prescribed the of Bishop Aydan first founder of the place.

Monkes licenced to drinke wine.

The same yeare sundrye Cities, Townes, and Monasteryes were defaced and sore wasted with fyre chaunced on the sodayne, as Stretehu, Giwento, Anwicke, London, Yorke, Doncaster, and many other.

After that Wolle had raigned. vj. yeares, he resigned his kingdome. But other write that hee raigned. xj. yeares, and was in the ende slaine by treason of his successor Alfred.

Wil. Malm.

This Alfred raigned ten yeares ouer the Northumbers, and was then expulsed out of his kingdome by his owne subiects.

Alfred began his raigne in the yeare. 765. as Simō Dun. hath.

Then was Ethelbert, named also Edelrede, the sonne of the forsayde Wolle, made king of Northumberlande, and in the fifth yeare of hys raigne, he was dryuen oute of his kingdome by two Dukes of his Countrey, named Edelbalde, and Herebert, the whiche moouing warre against him, had slaine first Aldulfe the sonne of Bosa the Generall of his armie at Kingesclyffe, and after Kinewulfe, and Egga, other two of his Dukes, at Helatherne in a sore foughten fielde, so that Ethelbert dispayring of all recouerie, was constrayned to get him oute of the Countrey. And thus was the Kingdome of Northumberlande brought into a myserable state, by the ambitious working of the Princes and Nobles of the same.

Henric. Hūt. Mat. West.

Ethelbert.

After that Ethelbert King of East Angles was dead, his sonne Ethelbert succeeded hym, a Prince of great towardnesse, and so vertuously brought vp by his fathers circumspect care and diligence, that hee vtterly abhorred vice, and delighted onely in vertue and commendable exercises, for the better attayning to knowledge and vnderstanding of good sciences. There remayne manye sundrye sayings and doynges of hym, manyfestly bearing wytnesse that there coulde not be a man more honourable, thankefull, curteous or gentle.

H. Hunt. Iohn Capgraue. Mat. West. and others.

Ethelbert king of East angles.

Amongst other he had this saying oftentimes in his mouth, That the greater that men were, the more humble they ought to beare themselues: for the Lorde putteth prowde and mightie men from theyr seates, and exalteth the humble and meeke. Moreouer he did not shew himselfe onely wise in wordes, but desired also to excell in stayednesse of maners, and continencie of life: Whereby hee wanne to hym the heartes of hys people, who perceyuing that hee was nothing delighted in the companie of women, and therefore mynded not maryage, they of a singular loue and fauour towards him, required that he shuld in any wise yet take a wife, that he might haue issue to succeed him. At length the matter beeing referred to hys Counsayle, hee was perswaded to followe theyr aduices. And so Alfred the daughter of Offa King of Mercia was flaunced to hym: so that he himselfe appoynted (for meane to procure more fauor at hys father in lawes hands) to go to fetch the bride frō hir fathers house.

Manye straunge things that happened to hym in taking vppon hym this iourney, putte hym in greate doubte of that whiche shoulde followe. Hee was no sooner mounted on hys Horse, but that (as seemed to hym) the earth shoke vnder him: Againe, as he was in his iourney, aboute the mydde tyme of the daye, suche a darke myste compassed hym on eche side, that he coulde not see nor discerne for a certaine time any thing aboute him at all: Lastly, as hee laye one night a sleepe, hee thought hee sawe in a dreame the roofe of his owne Palayce fall downe to the ground. But althoughe wyth these things hee was brought into greate feare, yet hee kept on his iourney, as hee that mistrusted no deceyte, measuring other mens maners by his owne.

King Offa right honourably receyued hym: but his wyfe named Quendred, a wyse woman, but therewyth wicked, conceyued a malicious deuise in hir heart, and streyght wayes goeth aboute to perswade hir husbande to putte it in execution, which was to murther king Ethelbert, and after to take into hys handes hys Kingdome.

Offa at the firste was offended wyth hys wyfe for thys motion, but in the ende through the importunate request of the woman, hee consented to hir minde.

The order of the murther was committed vnto one Wynnebert, that had serued both the sayde Ethelbert and hys father before tyme, the whiche feyning as thoughe hee had beene sent from Offa to will Ethelbert to come vnto him him in the night ſeaſon, ſlue him that once miſtruſted not any ſuch treaſon.

Offa hauing thus diſpatched Ethelbert, inuaded his kingdome, and conquered it. But when the Byde Alfreda underſtode the death of hir liked Make and Bridegrome, ſhe abhorring the fact, did curſe father and mother, & as it were inſpired with the ſpirit of prophecie, ſhe pronounced that worthie puniſhment woulde ſhortly fall on hir wicked mother, for hir heynous crime committed in perſwading ſo deteſtable a deede: and according to hir wordes it came to paſſe, for hir mother dyed miſerably within three Monethes after.

The Mayde Alfreda refuſing the worlde, profeſſed hirſelfe a Nunne at Crowlande, the which place beganne to ware famous aboute the yeare of our Lorde. 695. by the meanes of one Gutlake a man eſteemed of great vertue and holyneſſe, which choſe to himſelfe an habitation there, and departing this lyfe about the yeare of oure Lorde. 714. was buried in that place, where afterwardes an Abbay of Monkes was builded of Saint Benets order.

The bodie of king Ethelbert at length was buried at Hereford, though firſt it was committed to buriall in a vile place, neare to the banke of a riuer called Lugge.

The kingdome of Eaſt Angles from thencefoorth was brought ſo into decay, that it remayned ſubiect one while vnto them of Mercia, an other while vnto the weſt Saxons and ſomewhile vnto them of Kent, till that Edmonde ſurnamed the Martyr obteyned the gouernment thereof, (as after ſhall appeare.)

After that Selred king of Eaſt Saxons had gouerned the realme of. xxviij. yeares, hee was ſlaine, but in what maner, writers haue not expreſſed.

After him ſucceeded one Swithred, or Swithred, the. xj. and laſt in number that particularly gouerned thoſe people. He was finally expulſed by Egbert king of Weſt Saxons, the ſame yeare that the ſayde Egbert ouercame the Kentiſh men (as after ſhall be ſhewed) and ſo the kings of that kingdom of the Eaſt Saxons ceaſſed and toke ende.

About this time, there was a Mayde in Oxforde named Friſwide, daughter to a certaine Duke or Noble man called Didanus, wyth whom one Algarus a Prince in thoſe parties fell in loue, and woulde haue rauiſhed hir, but God the reuenger of ſinnes was at hande as hir ſtorie ſayth. For when Algar followed the mayd that fled before him, ſhe getting into the towne, the gate was ſhutte againſt him, and his ſight alſo was ſodainly taken from him. But the Mayde by hir prayers pacifyed Gods wrath towardes him, ſo that his ſight was to him againe reſtored. But whether this bee a fable or a true tale, hereof grewe the report that the kings of thys Realme long tymes after were afrayde to enter into the Citie of Oxforde. So eaſily is the minde of man turned to ſuperſtition, as ſayth Polidore. Friſwide a virgine.

Kinewulfe.

After that the Weſt Saxons had depriued theyr vnprofitable King Sigibert, they aduanced one Kinewulfe or Cinebulfus, ý which began his raigne aboute the yeare of our Lorde. 756. which was in the. xvj. yeare of the Emperour Conſtantinus, ſurnamed Copronimos, in the. vj. yeare of the raigne of Pipine king of France, and about the. xxij. yeare of Ethfine king of Scottes. Kinewulfe. Hen. Hunt. 756 Simon Dun. hath. 755.

This Kinewulfe proued a right worthie and valiant Prince, and was deſcended of the right line of Cerdicius. Hee obteyned great victories The Brytayns vanquiſhed. agaynſt the Brytaynes or Welchmen, but at Benſington or Benton, he loſt a battaile againſt Offa King of Mercia, in the. xxiij. yeare of hys raigne: and from that time forwarde taſting many diſpleaſures, at length through his owne folly hee came vnto a ſhamefull ende: for where as he had raigned a long time neyther ſtoutly nor preſumptuouſly, yet nowe as it were aduaunced with the glorie of things paſſed, hee eyther thought that nothing coulde go againſt him, or elſe doubted the ſuretie of their ſtate whom he ſhould leaue behind him, and therefore he confined one Kineard the brother of Sigibert, whoſe fame hee perceyued to encreaſe more than hee woulde haue wiſhed.

This Kinearde dissembling the matter, as hee that coulde giue place to tyme, gotte him out of the Countrey, and after by a secrete conspiracie assembled togyther a knotte of vngracious companie, and returning priuily into the Countrey againe, watched his tyme, till he espied that the King wyth a small number of his seruauntes was come vnto the house of a Noble woman whome hee kept as Paramour at Merton, wherevpon the sayd Kineard vpon the sodain beset the house round about.

The King perceyuing himselfe thus besieged of his enimies, at the first caused the dores to be shutte, supposing eyther by curteous wordes to appease his enimies, or wyth his Princely authoritie to put them in feare. But when he sawe that by neyther meane hee coulde doe good, in a great chaufe he brake forth of the house vpon Kineard, and went verie neare to haue killed him: but beeing compassed aboute with multitude of enimies, whylest hee stoode at defence, thinkyng it a dishonour for hym to flie, hee was beaten downe and slaine, togyther with those fewe of his seruauntes which hee had there with hym, who chose rather to die in seeking reuenge of their maisters death, than by cowardice to yeeld themselues into the murtherers handes. There escaped none excepte one Welchman or Brytayne, an Hostage, who was neuertheless sore wounded.

Kenelwulf slain by cõspirators.

The bruyte of suche an heynous acte was streyght wayes blowen ouer all, and brought with speede to the eares of the Noble men and Peeres of the Realme, whiche were not farre off the place where this slaughter had beene committed. Amongest other, one Osrike, for his age and wisedome accounted of most authoritie, exhorted the residue that in no wyse they shoulde suffer the death of their soueraigne Lorde to passe vnpunished vnto theyr perpetuall shame and reproufe. Wherevpon in all haste they ranne to the place where they knew to finde Kineard, who at the fyrst beganne to pleade hys cause, to make large promises, to pretende cosynage, and so forth: but when he perceyued all that hee coulde say or doe might not preuaile, hee encouraged his companie to shewe themselues valyaunt, and to resyst theyr enimyes to the vttermoste of theyr powers.

Herevpon followed a doubtfull fight, the one part stryuing to saue theyr lyues, and the other to attaine honour, and punish the slaughter of theyr soueraigne Lorde. At length the victorie rested on the side where the right was, so that the wicked murtherer after hee had fought a while, at length was slaine, togyther wyth fourescore and eight of his Mates. The Kings bodie was buried at Winchester, and the murtherers at Repingdon. Suche was the ende of King Kinewulfe, after hee had raigned the tearme of. xxxj. yeares.

Sim. Dunel. H. Hunt.

In the yeare of our Lorde. 786. or as Harison hath. 787. Pope Adrian sent two Legates into Englande, Gregorie (or as some Copies haue George) Bishop of Ostia, and Theophilactus bishop of Tuderto, with letters commendatory vnto Offa king of Mercia, and vnto Alfwolde king of Northumberlande, and likewise to Ieanbright or Lambert Archbishop of Canterburie, and to Eaubald Archbishop of Yorke.

Eccle. hy Magd. 785. H.

Legates from the Pope.

These Legates were gladly receyued, not only by the forsayde Kings & Archbishops, but also of all other the high estates, aswel spiritual and temporal of the lande, and namely of Kinewulfe king of the West Saxons, which repayred vnto king Offa to take counsaile with him for reformation of suche articles as were conteyned in the Popes letters.

Twenti cles wh Legates to prop

There were. xx. seuerall articles whiche they had to propone on the Popes behalfe, as touching the receyuing of the faith or articles established by the Nicene Coũcel, & obeying of the other generall Councels with instructions concerning baptisme and keeping of Synodes yearely, for the examination of Priestes and Ministers, and reforming of naughtie liuers.

Moreouer touching discretion to be vsed in the admitting of gouernors in Monasteries, and Curates or priests to the ministerie in Churches: and further for the behauior of priests in wearing their apparell, namely that they should not presume to come to the aulter bare legged, least their dishonestie might be discouered. And that in no wise the Chalice or Paten were made of the horne of an Oxe, because the same is bloudie of nature: nor the host of a crust, but of pure bread.

Also whereas Bishops vsed to sitte in Counsels to iudge in secular causes, they were nowe forbidden so to doe.

Many other things were for meane of reformation articled both for spirituall causes, and also concerning ciuill ordinaunces, as disenabling children to be heyres to the parentes, whiche by them were not begotte in lawfull matrimonie, but on cõcubines, whether they were Nunnes or Nunne cubine secular women.

Also of paymẽt of tithes, performing of vowes, auoyding of vndecent apparell, and abolishing of all maner of Ethnish vsages and customes that sounded contrarie to the order of Christianitie, Curtay horses. as curtayling Horses, and eating of Horses flesh.

These things with many other expressed in. xx. principal articles (as we haue sayd) were first concluded to be receyued by the Church of the Northumbers, in a Councell holden there, & subscribed by Alfwold king of the Northũbers, by Delberke

Bishop

Bishop of Herham by Eaubalde Archbishop of Yorke, Hygwalde Bishop of Lyndisferne, Edelbert Bishop of Whiterne, Aldulfe Bysshoppe of Myeth. Ethelwyne also an other Bysshop by his deputies, with a number of other of the Clergie, and Lordes also of the temporaltie, as Duke Alrike, Duke Segwulfe, Abbot Aldbericke, and Abbot Erhard.

After this confirmation had of the Northumbers, there was also a counsell holden in Mercia, at Cealtide in the which these persons subscribed, Jambert or Lambert Archbishop of Canterburie, Offa King of Mercia, Hughbright Bishop of Lichfield, Edculfe Bishoppe of Faron, with Hewone Bishop of Ligor, and nine other Bishops beside Abbots, and three Dukes, as Brorda, Farwalde, and Bercoald, with Earle Othbalde.

But nowe to returne backe to speake of other doings, as in other parties of this lande they fell out.

Aboute the yeare of our Lorde. 764. the Sea of Canterburie beeing voyde, one Jambert or Lambert was elected Archbishop there, and in the yeare. 766. the Archbishop of Yorke Egbert departed this lyfe, in whose place one Adelbert succeeded.

About the. xvb. yeare of Kynwulfe king of West Saxons, the Northumbers having to their captaynes two noble men, Osbalde and Ethelherard, burned one of their Judges named Beam, by cause hee was more cruell in iudgement (as they toke the matter) than reason requyred.

The same tyme, one Alswalde or Alfwolde, raigned ouer the Northumbers, beeing admitted King, after that Ethelbert was expulsed, and when the same Alfwolde had raigned tenne, (or as other haue. xj.) yeares, he was trayterously, and without all guilt made away, and murthered by his owne people. The chiefe conspiratour was named Siga, and his bodie was buried at Heram.

The same Alfwolde was a iust Prince, and worthilye gouerned the Northumbers to hys highe prayse and commendation. He was murthered (as before yee haue heard) the xiij. of September, in the yeare of our Lorde 788 788

In the yeare. 792. Charles king of Fraunce sent into Brytaine a booke which had beene sent hither him from Constantinople, conteyning certaine articles agreed vpon in a Synode where in were present aboute the number of three hundred Bishops) quite contrarie and dissagreeing from the true fayth, namely in thys, that Images ought to be worshipped, which the Church of god vtterly abhorreth. Against this booke Alcuinus that famous Clearke wrote a treatise confirmed with places taken out of holy Scripture, whiche treatise with the booke in name of all the Bishops and Princes of Brytayne he presented vnto the king of Fraunce. Mat. VVe. Simon Dun. 792

In the yeare. 800. on Christmasse euen chanced a maruelous tempest of winde, which ouerthrew whole Cities and townes in diuers places, and trees in greate number. besides other harmes which it did, as by death of Cattell. &c. In the yeare following a great part of the Citie of London was consumed by fire. Simon Dun. 800

Brightrichus.

Brightricus.

After Kenewulfe, one Bitrichus, or Brightrik was ordeyned King of West Saxons, and began his raign in the yeare of oure lord. 787. which was aboute the viij. yeare of the gouernment of the Empresse Eirene with hir sonne Constantinus, and about the second yeare of the raigne of Achaius king of Scottes. Hen.Hunt. Mat. VVest. hath. 787. Simon Dun. hath. 786.

This Brightrike was procreate of the line of Cerdicius the first king of West Saxons, and xvj. in number from him. He was a man of nature quiet and temperate, more desirous of peace than of warre, and therefore he stoode in doubt of ỹ noble valiancie of one Egbert, which after succeeded him in the kingdome. The linage of Cerdicius was in that season so coloured and mingled, that euerie one as he grew to greatest power, strone to be king and supreme gouernor. But specially Egbertus was knowne to be one that coueted the place, as hee that was of the blood royall, and a man of greate power and lustie courage.

King Brightrike therefore to liue in more suretie, banished him the lande, and appoynted Egbert banished.

him to goe into Fraunce.

Egbert vnderstanding for certaine that this his departure into a forraine Countrey shoulde turne to his aduauncement in time to come, obeyed the kings pleasure.

A straunge wonder.

About the thirde yeare of Brightrykes raigne, there fell vpon mens garmentes as they walked abrode, Crosses of bloudie colour, and bloud fell from heauen as drops of raigne.

Mat. VVest. VVil. Malm. Hen. Hunt. Danes.

Some tooke this wonder for a signification of the persecution that followed by the Danes: for shortly after in the yeare ensuing, there arryued three Danish shippes vpon the English coastes, against whome the Lieutenant of the parties adioyning made forth to apprehend those that were come a lande, howbeeit aduenturing himselfe ouer rashly amongest them, he was slaine: but afterwardes when the Danes perceyued that the people of the Countreyes aboute beganne to assemble, and were comming against them, they fled to theyr shippes, and left their pray and spoile behinde them for that time.

These were the fyrst Danes that arryued here in this lande, beeing onely sente (as was perceyued after) to viewe the Countrey, and coastes of the same, to vnderstande howe with a greater power they myght bee able to inuade it, as shortly after they did, and warred so wyth the Englishe men, that they got a greate parte of the lande, and helde it in theyr owne possession.

In the tenth yeare of King Brightrykes raigne, there were seene in the ayre fyue Dragons flying, whiche betokened (as was thought) two grieuous plagues that followed. Fyrst a greate dearth and famine: and secondly the cruell warre of Danes, which shortly followed, as yee shall heare.

Famine and warre signified

Finally, after that Brightrike had raigned the space of xvj. yeares, he departed this life, and was buried at Warham.

Ran. Cestren. li. 5. cap. 25. Brightrike departed this life

Some wryte that hee was poysoned by hys wife Ethelburga, whom he maryed in the fourth yeare of his raigne. Shee was daughter vnto Offa King of Mercia (as before yee haue heard.) Shee is noted by wryters to haue beene a verye euill woman, proude, and high mynded as Lucifer, and therewyth disdaynfull. Shee bare hir the more stately by reason of hir fathers greate fame and magnificence: whome shee hated shee woulde accuse to hir husbande, and so put them in daunger of theyr lyues. And if she might not so wreake hir rancour, shee woulde not sticke to poyson them.

Ethelburga hir conditions and wicked natere.

And so it happened one daye, as shee ment to haue poysoned a yong Gentleman, agaynste whome shee hadde a quarell, the King chaunced to taste of that Cuppe, and dyed therof (as before ye haue heard.)

Hir purpose indeede was not to haue poysoned the King, but onely the yong Gentleman, the which drinking after the King died also, the poyson was so strong and vehement.

A decree of the kings of the West Saxons agaynst their wiues.

For hir heynous cryme it is sayde that the Kings of West Saxons woulde not suffer their wyues to be called Queenes, nor permitte them to sit with them in open places (where their Maiestie shoulde bee shewed) of manye yeares after.

Ethelburga fearing punishment, fledde into Fraunce with greate ryches and treasure, and was wel cherished in the Court of King Charles at the first, but after she was thrust into an Abbey, and demeaned hirself so lewdly there, in keeping companie with one of hir owne Countrey men, that shee was banished the house, and after died in great miserie.

The ende of Ethelburga. Simon Dun.

Egbert king of Mercia departing this lyfe, after he had raigned foure Monethes, ordeyned his cousin Kenulfe to succeede in his place, which Kenulfe was come of the lyne of Penda king of Mercia, as rightly descended from hys brother Kenwalke. VVil. Mal. Kenulf.

This Kenulfe for his noble courage, wisedome, and vprycht dealing, was worthie to be cõpared with the best Princes that haue raigned. His vertues passed hys fame: nothing hee dyd that enuye coulde with iuste cause reproue. At home hee shewed hymselfe godlye and religious, in warre hee became victorious, hee restored the Archbishoppes Sea agayne to Canterburie, wherein hys humblenesse was to be praysed, that made no accounte of any worldly honour in hys Prouince, so that the order of the auncient Canons might be obserued. Hee had warres left him as it were by succession from his Predecessour Offa agaynste them of Kent, and thereupon entering that Countrey wyth a mightie armie, wasted and spoyled the same, and encountering in battayle wyth King Edbert, or Ethelbert, otherwise called also Pyrme, ouerthrewe his armie, and toke him prysoner in the fielde, but afterwardes he released, him to his great prayse and commendation. For where as hee buylded a Churche at Winchcombe vpon the day of the dedication thereof, hee ledde the Kentishe King as then hys prysoner vp to the highe Aulter, and there sette him at libertye, declaring thereby a greate proufe of hys good nature.

The Archbishops seate restored to Canterburie.

The king of Kent taken prisoner.

There was present at that sight, Cuthred whõ he had made king of Kent in place of Ethelbert, or Edbert, with xij. Bishoppes and ten Dukes. The noyse that was made of the people in reioysing at the kings bounteous liberalitie was merueylous. For not only he thus restored ỳ Kentish

king

King to libertie, but alſo he beſtowed greate rewards vpon all the Prelates and noble men that were come to the feaſt, euery Prieſt had a peece of golde, and euery monke a ſhilling. Alſo hee gaue away great giftes amongſt the people, and founded in that place an Abbey, endowing the ſame with great poſſeſſions. Finally, after he had raigned. 24. yeares, he departed this life, and appoynted his buriall to be in ẏ ſaine Abbey of Winchcome, leauing behind him a ſon named Kenelme, who ſucceeded his father in the Kingdome, but was ſone murthered by yͤs vnnaturall ſiſter Quenbred the ſeuenteenth of July, as hereafter ſhall be ſhewed.

AFter that Alwald King of Northumberland was made away, his brother Oſred the ſonne of Alred toke vppon him the rule of that Kyngdome anno. 788. and within one yere was expulſed, and lefte the Kingdome to Ethelbert or Edelred as then reuoked out of exile, in whiche hee had remayned for the ſpace of. 12. yeres, and nowe beeing reſtored, he continued in gouernemente of the Northumbers foure yeares, or as ſome ſay. 7. yeres. In the ſecond yere whereof Duke Eardulfe was taken and led to Ripon, & there without the gate of the monaſterie wounded, as was thought to death by the ſaid K. but the Monks taking his body, and laying it in a tent without the Church, after midnight he was found alue in ẏ Churche. Moreouer, about the ſame time, ẏ ſonnes of king Alfwald wer by force drawen out of the Citie of Yorke, but firſte by a wile they were trayned out of the head Church where they had taken Sanctuary, & ſo at length miſerably ſlain by K. Ethelbert in Wonwaldremere, the one of them highte Alfus, and the other Alfwine. In the yeare of oure Lord. 792. Oſred vpon truſt of the othes and promiſes of diuers noble men, ſecretly returned into Northumberland, but his own ſouldiers forſoke him, and ſo was he taken and by king Ethelberts commaundement put to death at Cunburg on ẏ fourteenth day of September. The ſame yere K. Ethelbert married ẏ Lady Alfled the daughter of Offa King of Mercia, forſaking his former wife which he had, hauing no iuſt cauſe of diuorſe giuen on hir part, whereby his people toke ſuch diſpleaſure againſte him, that finally after he hadde raigned now this ſecond time four yeres, or (as other haue) ſeuen yeres, he could not auoyde the deſtenie of his predeceſſors, but was miſerably killed by his owne ſubiects at Cobre, the eightenth day of Aprill. After whome, one Oſwald a noble man, was ordeyned K. and within a. 27. or. 28. dayes after, was expulſed, & cõſtreined to flee firſt into the Ile of Lindeſferne, & frõ thence vnto the K. of Pictes. Then Ardulfe ẏ was a Duke, & ſon to one Arnulfe, was reuoked out of exile, & made K. & conſecrated at Yorke by ẏ Archb. Cumbalde, & three other Biſhops, the. 25. of June, in the yere 796. About a two yeres after, to witte, in the yere 798. one Duke Wade, and other conſpirators whiche had bin alſo partakers in ẏ murthering of K. Ethelbert, reyſed war againſte K. Ardulf, and fought a battell with him at Walley, but K. Ardulf got ẏ vpper hand, & chaſed Wade & other his eminies out of the field. In the yeare. 799. Duke Aldred that had murthered Ethelbert or Athelred K. of Northumberlande, was ſlaine by another Duke called Chorthmond, in reuẽge of the death of his maiſter ẏ ſaide Ethelbert. Shortly after, about ẏ ſame time ẏ Brightrike K. of Weſt Saxons departed this life, there was a ſore battell foughten in Northumberlãd at Wellehare, in ẏ which Alrick ẏ ſon of Herbert, and many other him were ſlain: but to reherſe all the battels with their ſucceſſes and iſſues, it ſhoulde be to tedious & irkſome to ẏ readers, for the Engliſh people being naturally hard and high minded, continually ſcourged each other with inteſtine warres. About ſixe or ſeuẽ yeres after this battel, K. Ardulf was expulſed out of ẏ eſtate. And thus may ye conſider in what plight things ſtode in Northumberlãd, by the often ſeditious tumultes and chaungings of gouernors, ſo that there be which haue writte, how after the death of King Ethelbert otherwise called Edelred, diuers Bishops and other of the chiefest nobles of the countrey disdeyning suche trayterous princequellings, ciuill sedition, and iniurious dealings, as it were put in dayly practise amongst the Northumbers, departed out of their native boundures into voluntary exile, and that frō thenceforth there was not any of the nobilitie, that durst take vpon him the kingly gouernement amongst them, fearing the prerogatiue destiny thereof, as if it had bin Seianes horse, whose rider came euer to some euil end. But yet by that whiche is heeretofore shewed out of Simon Dunelmensis, it is euident, that there raigned Kings ouer the Northumbers, but in what authority and power to command, it may be doubted: Howbeit this is certaine, that the sundry murderings and banishmentes of their kings and Dukes giue vs greatly to gesse, that there was but lory obedience vsed in the countrey, wherby for no small space of time that kingdome remayned without an head gouernor, being set open to the pray and iniurie of them that were bordurers vnto it, and likewise vnto straungers: for the Danes whiche in those dayes were great rouers, had landed before in the North partes, & spoyled the Abbey of Lindesferne otherwise called holy Iland, & perceiuing ỳ fruitefulnesse of the countrey, & easinesse for their people to inuade it (because that through their priuate quarelling, there was little publike resistance to be loked for) at their comming home, entised their countreymen to make viages into England, and so landing in Northumberlande, did much hurt, and obteined a great part of ỳ countrey in maner without resistance, bycause there was no Ruler there able to reyse any power of men by publike authoritie to encounter with the common enimies, by reason whereof, ỳ countrey was brought into great miserie, what through war of Danes, & the ciuil dissention amongst the nobles and people themselues, no man being of authority (I say) able to reforme such misorders. Yet we finde, that the nobles and Captaines of the countrey, assembling togither at one time againste the Danes ỳ were landed about Tinemouth, constreined them by sharp fight to flee back to their Shippes, & toke certain of thē in the field, whose heads they stroke off there vpon the shore. The other that gote to their Shippes, suffered greate losse of men, & likewise of their vessels by tempest.

This chanced in the yere of our Lorde 793. as Simon Dunel. hath.

The Danes inuade Northumberland.

The Danes vanquished.

This was anno 794. as Simon Dunel. hath.

After that Alrike (the last of K. Witchtredes sonnes which raigned in Kent successiuely after their father) was dead, the noble offspring of the kings there lore decayed, and begā to fade away, so ỳ euery one which eyther by flattering had gote riches togither, or by seditious partaking was had in estimation, sought to haue the gouernmēt and to vsurp ỳ title of King, abusing by vnwor-thy meanes the honor and dignitie of so high an office. Amongst other, one Edbert or Edelberte surnamed also Pyrenne, gouerned the Kentishmen for the space of two yeres, & was in the ende vanquished by them of Mercia, and taken prisoner as before is said, so that for a time he liued in captiuitie, & although afterwardes he was set at libertie, yet was he not receyued againe to the Kyngdome, so that it is vncertaine what end he made. Cuthred that was appointed by Kinebulfe ỳ K. of Mercia, to raigne in place of the saide Edberte or Edelbert, continued in the gouernement eyght yeres as king, rather by name than by acte, inheriting his predecessors euill happe and calamitie, through factions and ciuill discord. Edbright.

After that Jambrith or Lambert the Archbishop of Canterburie, was departed this life, one Edelred was ordeined in his place, vnto whome the primacie was restored, which in his predecessors time was taken away by Offa K. of Mercia, as before is recited. Also after ỳ deathe of Eubalde Archbishop of Yorke, another of the same name called Eubald the second, was admitted to succeede in that see. Lambert.

After that Brightrike ỳ K. of West Saxons was departed this life, messengers were sent with all speede into Fraunce, to giue knowledge thereof vnto Egberte, which as before is shewed, was constreined by the saide Brightrike to departe the countrey. At the first, he withdrew vnto Offa K. of Mercia, with whom hee remained for a tyme, til at length, (through suite made by Brightrike, he perceiued hee might not longer continue there withoute danger to be deliuered into his enimies hands, and so Offa winking at the matter) he departed out of his countrey, and gote him ouer into Fraunce, but being now aduertised of Brightrikes death, and required by earnest letters sente from his friends to come and receiue the gouernment of the kingdome, he returned with al conuenient speede into his countrey, and was receyued immediately for King, by the generall consent of the West Saxons, as well in respect of ỳ good hope which they had conceiued of his worthy qualities and aptnesse to haue gouernement, as of his royall lignage, being lineally discended from Inegild the brother of K. Inas, as sonne to Alkemounde, that was the sonne of one Eafla, which Eafla was sonne to Ope the sonne of the forsayd Inegild.

Egberte receyued King of West Saxons. His lignage.

Egbert.

THis Egbert began his raigne in the yeare of our Lord. 800. whiche was the fourth yeare almost ended, after that the Emperour Elrine began the seconde time to rule the Empire, and in the. 24. yere of the raigne of Charles the great K. of France, whiche also was in the same yere after he was made Emperour of the West, and about the second yere of Conwall King of Scottes.

802. as Simon Dunel. but M. W. hath noted for. 801. as William Harrison proueth it out of Mal.

Whilest

Whileſt this Egbert remayned in exile, he turned his aduerſaries into occaſion of valiancie, as it had bin a grindelſtone to grind away & remoue the ruſt of ſluggiſh ſlouthfulnes, in ſo much, that haunting ẏ wars in France, in ſeruice of Charles the Great, he atteined to great knowledge & experience, both in matters apperteyning to the wars, & likewiſe to ẏ well ordering of a common welth in time of peace. The firſt warres that he toke in hand, after he had atteyned to ẏ kingdom, was againſt the Corniſhmẽ, a remeant of the old Britaines, whome he ſhortly ouercame and ſubdued. Thẽ he thought good to tame ẏ vnquiet Welchmen, ẏ which ſtil were ready to moue Rebellion againſt the Engliſhmen, as they that being vanquiſhed, woulde not yet ſeeme to bee ſubdued, wherefore about the. 14. yere of his raigne, he inuaded the countrey of Wales, and went throughout the ſame frõ Eaſt to Weſt, not finding any perſon ẏ durſt reſiſt him. Thus K. Egbert hauing ouercome his enimies of Wales and Cornewall, began to growe in authoritie aboue all the other rulers within this lande, in ſo much, that euery of thẽ began to feare their owne eſtate, but namely Bernebulf K. of Mercia ſore ſtomaked the matter, as he that was wiſe, & of a iolly loftie courage, and yet doubted to haue to do with Egbert, who was knowen alſo to be a man both ſkilfull & valiant. At length yet cõſidering with himſelfe, that if his chance ſhould be to ſpeede well, ſo much the more ſhuld his praiſe be increaſed. He determined to attempt the fortune of war, & therupõ intimated the ſame vnto Egbert, ẏ whiche ſuppoſing it ſhoulde be a diſhonor to him to giue place, boldly prepared to meete Bernulfe in the field. Hereupon they encountred togither at Ellendone, and fought a ſore battell, in ẏ which an huge number of men were ſlaine, what on the one part, & on ẏ other, but in the ende the victory remained with Egbert, although he had not ẏ like hoſt for number vnto Bernulfe, but he was a politike prince, & of great experience, hauing choſen his Souldiers of nimble, leane, and deliuer mẽ, wher Bernulfes Souldiers through long eaſe, were cowardly perſons, & ouercharged with fleſh. This battell was fought in the yere of our Lord. 826. King Egbert hauing got this victory, was aduanced into ſuch hope, that he perſwaded himſelf to be able without greate adoe to ouercome the reſidue of his neighbours, whoſe eſtates he ſaw playnely ſore weakened & fallen in great decay. Herupon before all other, he determined to aſſaile Edelbulf K. of Kẽt, whome he knew to be a man in no eſtimation amongſt his ſubiects. A competent army therefore being leuied, he apointed his ſon Ethelbulf & Alſtane Biſhop of Shireborne, with erle Walhard to haue the conduit thereof, & ſente them with the ſame into Kent, where they wrought ſuche maiſteries, that they chaſed both the K. & al other that would not ſubmit thẽſelues, out of the countrey, cõſtreining them to paſſe ouer the Thames. And herewith the Weſt Saxons following the victory brought vnder ſubiection of king Egbert the countreys of Kẽt, Eſſex, Southrey, and Suſſex. The Eaſt Angles alſo about the ſame time receiued K. Egbert for their ſoueraigne Lord, & comforted by his ſetting on againſte Bernulfe king of Mercia, inuaded ẏ confines of his Kingdome, in reuenge of diſpleaſures whiche he had done to thẽ lately before, by inuading their countrey. & as it came to paſſe, encountring with the ſaid Bernulf which came againſt them to defend his countrey, they ſlew him in the field. And thus their myndes on both parts being kindled into further wrath, ẏ Eaſt Angles eftſones in ẏ yere following, fought with thẽ of Mercia, & ouercame them againe, and ſlew their K. Ludicenus that ſucceeded Bernulfe in that kingdome, with. 5. of his Erles. Thus the ſtate of the kingdome of Mercia being weakened, Egbert conceiued an aſſured hope of good ſucceſſe in the. 27. yere of his raigne, made an open inuaſiõ into ẏ countrey, & chaſing Whitlafe K. of Mercia (ẏ ſucceeded Ludicenus) out of his eſtate, conquered ẏ whole kingdom of the Mercies. But yet in the in the yere next following, or in the third yere after (as saith Harrison,) he restored it againe vnto Wightlake, with condition, that he should enioy the same as tributary to him, and acknowledge him for his supreme gouernour. The same yeare that Bernulf K. of Mercia was slain by ẏ East Angles, there was a sore battell foughten at Gauelforde, betwixte them of Deuonshire, and the Britaynes, in the whiche many thousands dyed on both parts. King Egbert hauing conquered al the English people, inhabiting on the South side of Humber, led forth his army againste them of Northumberland: but the Northumbers beeyng not only vexed with ciuil sedition, but also with ẏ often inuasion of Danes, perceiued not how they should be able to resist the power of K. Egbert: & therfore vpon good aduisement taken in the matter, they resolued to submit themselues, & therevpõ sent Ambassadors to him to offer their submissiõ, cõmitting themselues wholly vnto his protectiõ.

Sim. Dunel.

These were the Cornishmen as is to be supposed.

King Egbert inuadeth Northũb. The Northbers submit them to K. Egbert.

King Egbert gladly receiued them, & promised to defend them from all forraine enimies. And thus the kingdome of Northumberland was brought vnder subiectiõ to the kings of the West Saxõs, after the state had bin sore weakened with contẽtion and ciuill discord that had continued amõgst the nobles of the countrey, for the space of many yeres, beside the inuasion made by outwarde enimies, to ẏ greeuous domage of the people. After ẏ K. Egbert had finished his businesse in Northũberlãd, he turned his power towards the countrey of Northwales, & subdued ẏ same with the Citie of Chester, which till those dayes, the Britaynes or Welchmen had kept in their possession. Whẽ K. Egbert had obteined these victories, and made such conquests as before is mentioned, of the people here in this lande, he caused a counsell to be assembled at Winchester, and there by aduice of the high estates, hee was Crowned K. as soueraigne gouernour, and supreme Lord of the whole land. It is also recorded, that hee caused commission to be directed forth into all partes of ẏ Realme, to giue commandement, that frõ thence forwarde al the people inhabiting within this land, should bee called Englishmẽ, & not Saxõs, & likewise ẏ lãd should be called England by one generall name, though it should appeare (as before is mentioned) that it was so called shortly after the firste time ẏ the Angles & Saxons gote possessiõ therof. Now was K. Egberte setled in good quiet, and his dominions reduced out of ẏ troubles of warre, when suddaynely newes came, that the Danes with a nauie of. xxxb. ships, were arriued on ẏ Englishe coastes, & began to make sore war in the land. K. Egbert being thereof aduertised, with all conuenient speede gote togither an army, & went forth to giue battell to the enimies. Herevpon encountring with them, there was a sore foughten fielde betwixt them, and continued with great slaughter on both sides, till the night came on, and then by chance of warre the Englishmen which before were at pointe to haue gone away with victory, were vanquished and put to flight, yet K. Egbert by couert of the night escaped his enimies handes, but two of his chiefe Captaines Dudda and Osmond, with two Bishops, to witte, Herferde of Winchester, and Wigferd of Shireborne, were slayne in that battel, which was foughtẽ at Carrum, about the. 834. of Christ, and. 34. yeare of K. Egberts raigne. In ẏ yere following, the Danes with their nauie came into West Wales, and there the Welchmen ioyning with them, rose againste K. Egbert, but he with prosperous fortune vanquished and slew, both ẏ Danes & Welchmẽ, & that in great nũber, at a place called Hengistẽtõ. The next yere after also, which was. 836. he ouerthrew another army of Danes which came againe him, as an author writeth. Finally, whẽ K. Egbert

The name of this Ile when it was chãged.

Egbert had raigned the tearme of.36.yeres, &.7. monethes with greate glory for the inlarging of his kingdome with ſo wide bounder, which when he receiued, was of ſo ſmall a compaſſe, he departed this life, leauing to his iſſue matter of worthy praiſe to maintayne that with good order which he with painefull diligence had ioyned together. His body was buried at Wincheſter, and he left behind him two ſonnes Ethelboulfe, otherwiſe named Athaulfe and Adelſtan. The firſte he appointed to ſucceede him in the kingdom of Weſt Saxons, and Athelſtan hee ordeined to haue the gouernement of Kent, Suſſex, and Eſſex.

After that Cuthred K. of Kent had raigned.8. yeres, as before is mentioned, he was conſtreyned to giue place vnto one Baldred, that toke vppon him the gouernment, and raigned the ſpace of.18. yeres, without any greate authoritie, for his ſubiects regarded him but ſoſily, ſo that in the ende, when his countrey was inuaded by the Weſt Saxons, he was eaſily conſtreyned to departe into exile. And thus was the kingdome of Kent annexed to the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons, after the ſame kingdome had continued in gouernmente of kings created of the ſame nation for the ſpace of.382.yeres, that is to ſay, from the yeare of our Lord.464. vnto the yere.827.

Suithred or Suthred K. of Eſſex was banquiſhed and expulſed out of his kingdom by Egbert K. of Weſt Saxons (as before ye may reade) in the ſame yere that the kentiſhmen were ſubdued by the ſaid Egbert, or elſe very ſhortly after.

This Kingdome continued.281. yeres, from the yere.614. vnto the yere.795. as by the table of the Heptarchie ſet forth by Alexander Neuill it appeareth.

After the deceſſe of Kenbulfe K. of Mercia, his ſonne Kenelme a child of the age of.7. yeares was admitted K. about the yere of our Lord.821. Hee had two ſiſters, Quendred, and Burgenild, of the which the one (that is to ſay) Quendred, of a malitious minde, moued through ambition, enuyed hir brothers aduauncemente, and ſought to make him away, ſo that in the ende, ſhe corrupted ẏ gouernor of his perſon one Aſhberte, with greate rewardes and high promiſes, perſwading him to diſpatch hir innocent brother out of life, that ſhee might raigne in his place. Aſhbert one day vnder a colour to haue the yong king forthe on hunting, led him into a thicke wood, and there cut off the head frō his body, an Impe by reaſon of his tender yeres & innocent age, vnto the worlde voyde of gilt, & yet thus trayterouſly murthered without cauſe or crime: he was afterward reputed for a Martir. There hath gone a tale that his death ſhould be ſignified at Rome, and the place where the murther was committed, by a ſtraunge manner: for (as they ſay) a white Doue came and alight vpon the Aulter of Saint Peter, bearyng a ſcroll in hir bil, which ſhe let fall on the ſame Aulter, in which ſcroll among other things this was conteyned, in Clene Kou Bath, Kenelme Kinbarne lieth vnder thorne, heaued bereaued: that is, at Clene in a Cow paſture, Kenelme the Kyngs Child lieth beheaded vnder a thorne. This tale I reherſe not for any credite I thinke it worthy of, but only for ẏ it ſeemeth the place where the yong Prince innocently loſt his life.

After that Kenelme was thus made away, his Vncle Ceolwolfe the Brother of King Kenulfe was created King of Mercia, and in the ſeconde yeare of his raigne, was expulſed by Bernwolfe. Ceolwolf K. of Mercia. 825

Bernwolfe in the thirde yeare (or ſeconde as Harriſon hath) of his raigne, was banquiſhed and put to flight in battell by Egbert King of Weſt Saxons, and ſhortly after ſlaine of the Eaſt angles as before ye haue heard.

Then one Ludicenus or Ludicanus was created King of Mercia, and within two yeres after came to the like ende that hapned to his predeceſſor before him, as he went about to reuenge hys death, ſo that the Kingdome of Britayne began now to reele from their owne eſtate, and leane to an alteration, which grew in the end to the erectiō of a perfit Monarchie, and finall ſubuerſion of their particular eſtates and regiments.

After Ludicenus, ſucceeded Wightlafe, who firſt being banquiſhed by Egbert, King of Weſt Saxons, was afterwardes reſtored to the Kingdome by the ſame Egbert, and raigned thirtene yeres, whereof twelue at the leaſt were vnder tribute which he payed to the ſaid Egbert and to his ſonne, as to his Soueraignes and ſupreme gouernours. Mat. VVeſt. 728

The Kingdome of Northumberlande was brought in ſubiection to the Kings of Weſt Saxons, as before is mentioned, in the yeare of oure Lord.828. and in ẏ yeare of the raigne of K. Egbert.28. but yet here it toke not ende as after ſhall appeare. 828

EThelwoulfus otherwiſe called by ſome writers Athaulfus, began his raigne ouer ẏ Weſt Saxons in the yeare.837. which was in the.24. yere of the Emperour Ludouicus Pius that was alſo K. of France, in the.10. yeare of Theophilus ẏ Emperour of the Eaſt, & about the thirde yere of Kenneth the ſeconde of that name K. of Scottes. This Ethelwoulf minding in his youth to haue bin a Prieſt, entred into the orders of Subdeacō, and as ſome write, he was Biſhop of Winchēſter: but howſoeuer the matter ſtode, or whether he was or not, ſure it is, that ſhortly after he was aſſoyled of his vowes by authoritie of Pope Leo, and then maried a proper Gentlewoman named Oſburga, which was his butlers daughter. Hee was of nature curteous, and rather deſirous to liue in. Ethelwolfus. Hen. Hunt. Math. VVeſt.

liue in quiet rest, than to be troubled with the gouernement of many countreys, so that cõtenting himselfe with the kingdome of West Saxons, he permitted his brother Athelstan to enioy the residue of the countreys, which his father had subdued, as Kent, and Esser, with other. He ayded the K. of Mercia Burthred against the Welchmen, and greatly aduanced his estimation, by gyuyng vnto him his daughter in marriage. But now the fourth destruction which chanced to this lande by forraine enimies, was at hande, for the people of Denmarke, Norway, and other of those North-east regions, which in that season were greate rouers by Sea, had tasted the wealth of this land by such spoiles and prayes as they hadde taken in the same, so that perceiuing they coulde not purchase more profit any where else, they set their myndes to inuade the same on each side, as they had partly begun in the days of the late kings Brightrike and Egbert. The persecutiõ vsed by these Danes seemed more greeuous, than any of the other persecutions, either before or sithence that time: for ẏ Romanes hauing quickly subdued the land, gouerned it nobly without seeking the subuersion thereof. The Scottes and Pictes only inuaded ẏ North partes. And the Saxons seeking the conquest of the land, when they had once gote it, they kept it, and did what they could, to better and aduance it to a flourishing estate. And likewise the Normans hauing made a conquest, graunted both life, libertie, and auntient lawes to the former inhabitants: But the Danes long time and often assayling the land on euery side, now inuading it in this place, and now in that, did not at ẏ first so much coueto conquere it, as to spoyle it, nor to beare rule in it, as to waste & destroy it: who if they were at anye time ouercome, the victorers were nothing the more in quiet: for a new naue, and a greter army was ready to make some new inuasiõ neither did they enter all at one place, nor at once, but one company on the East side, & an other in the West, or in the North and Southe coastes, in suche sorte, that the Englishmenne knew not whether they shoulde firste goe to make resistance against them.

The Danes fought the destruction of this lande.

This mischiefe beganne chiefly in the days of this K. Ethelwoulf, but it continued aboute the space of two hundred yeares, as by the sequele of this Booke it shall appeare. King. Ethelwoulf was not so muche giuen to ease, but that vpõ occasion for defence of his countrey and subiectes, he was ready to take order for the beating backe of the enimies, as occasion serued, and specially, hee chose such to be of his coũsel, as were mẽ of great experience & wisdome. Amongst other, there were two notable Prelates, Swithune Bishoppe of Winchester, & Adelstan Bishop of Shireborne, whiche were readie euer to giue him good aduice.

How long the persecution of the Danes lasted.

VVil. Malm.

Two notable Bishops in Ethelwoltes dayes.

Swithune was not so muche experte in worldly matters as Adelstan was, & therefore chiefly coũselled the K. in things apperteining to his soules health: But Adelstan toke in hand to order matters apperteining to the state of the cõmon welth, as prouiding of money, and furnishing forthe of men to withstand the Danes, so that by him many things were both boldly begun, & happily atchieued, as by writers hath bin recorded. He gouerned the see of Shireborne, ẏ space of .50. yeres, by the good counsell and faithfull aduice of those two Prelates. K. Ethelwoulf gouerned his subiects right politikely, & by himselfe and his Captaines oftẽtimes put the Danes to flight, though as chance of warre falleth out, he also receyued at their hands great losses, & sundry sore detriments. In ẏ first yere of his raigne, the Danes arriued at Hampton, with .33. ships, against whom he sente Erle Wulhard with part of his army, the whiche giuing battell to the enimies, made great slaughter of them, and obteyned a noble victory. He sent also Erle Adelhelme with the Dorsetshire men, against an other number of Danes, whiche were landed at Portesmouth, but after long fighte, the sayde Adelhelme was slaine, and the Danes obteyned the victory. In the yeare following, Earle Herbert fought against ẏ Danes at Merseware, and was there slaine, and his men chased. The same yere, a great army of Danes passing by the East parts of the land, as through Lindsey, East Angle, and Kent, they slew & murthered an huge number of people. The next yere after this, they entred further into the lande, and about Canterbury, Rochester, and Londõ, did much mischiefe. In the fifth yere of his raigne, K. Ethelwoulfe wt a parte of his army encountred with the Danes at Carrum, the whiche were arriued in those parties with .30. Ships, hauing their full fraughte of men, so that for so small a number of vessels, there was a great power of men of warre, in so muche, that they obteined the victory at that time, and put the K. to the worse. About the tenth yeare of K. Ethelwoulfes raigne, one of his Captaynes called Ernwoulfe, & Bishop Athelstan, with the Sommersetshire men, and an other Captayne called Osred, with the Dorsetshire men, foughte against the Danes, at a place called Pedredesmuth, and vanquished them with great triumph. In the sixtenth yere of his raigne, K. Ethelwoulf and his sonne Edelbald hauing assembled al their powers togither, gaue battell at Ocley, to an huge ost of Danes, the which with four hundred and fiftie Ships had arriued at Thaimes mouth, and destroyed the famous Cities of London, and Canterbury, & also had chased in battell Brightwoulf K. of Mercia, and being nowe entred into Southzey, were encountred by K. Ethelwoulfe at Ocley aforesaid, and after sore fight and incre-

Ethelwolfe obteined a glorious victory in ſo mightie a battell, as the greater had not bin lightly hard of to chance within the Engliſh dominions. The ſame yeere alſo Athelſtan K. of Kent and Duke Ealhere fought by Sea with the Danes, & tooke nine of their Shyps, and chaſed the reſidue. Moreouer, one Earle Croyle hauing with hym the power of Deuonſhire, foughte with the Danes, at Winleſhore, and gote the victory. This yere was very luckie to the Engliſh nation, but yet the armie of the Danes lodged al the Winter ſeaſon in the Ile of Tanet. And this was the firſt tyme ẏ they remayned heere all the Winter, vſing afore time but to come and make an inuaſion in one place or other, and immediately to returne home with the pray.

In the. 18. yere of King Ethelwoulfes reigne, he aided Burthred King of Mercia, agaynſte the Welchmen (as before is mentioned), and gaue to him his daughter in marriage, the ſolemnization whereof was kept at Chipnham. The ſame yere King Ethelwoulfe ſent his ſonne Alured as then but fiue yeres of age vnto Rome, where hee was ſacred K. by Pope Leo the fourth, & was receiued of him as if he had bin his owne ſonne. Duke Ealhere or Eachere with the Kentiſhmen, and one Huda or rather Wada, with the men of Southrey, fought againſt the army of Danes at Tenet, where greate ſlaughter was made on bothe ſides, the Engliſhmen preuailing in the begynning, but in the ende both their foreſaid Dukes or leaders dyed in that battel, beſide many other that were ſlaine and drowned. In the nineteenth yere of his raigne, K. Ethelwoulfe ordeined, that the tenthes or tithes of all landes due to bee payed to the Church, ſhould be free from all tribute duties, or ſeruices regall. And afterwards, with great deuotion he went to Rome, where he was receyued with great honor, and taried there one whole yere: hee toke with him his ſon Alured, who had bene there before as yee haue heard. He repared the Saxons ſchoole, whiche Offa K. of Mercia had ſometime founded in that Citie, and lately hadde bin ſore decayed by fire. He confirmed the graunt of Peter Pence, to the intent that no Engliſhmē from thenceforth ſhould doe penance in boundes as he ſawe ſome there to do before his face. It is alſo written, that he ſhonlde acquit all the Churches of his Realme of paying tribute to his cofers (as before ye haue heard) and moreouer couenaunted to ſend vnto Rome euery yere three hundred Markes, that is to wit, one hundred Markes to S. Peters Churche, an other hundred Markes to S. Paules light, and the third hundred markes to the Pope. In his returne through Fraunce, he married the Lady Judith, daughter to Charles ẏ Bald, then K. of France, and bringing hir with him into his coūtrey, placed hir by him in a chaire of eſtate, with which doing he offēded ſo ẏ minds of his ſubiects, becauſe it was againſt the order takē before time, for the offence of Ethelburga, that his ſonne Ethelbalde and Adelſtan Biſhoppe of Shireborne, with Enwoulf Earle of Sommerſet, conſpired to depoſe him from his kingly authoritie, but by mediation of friendes, the matter was taken vp, and ſo ordred, that the kingdome was deuided betwixte the father and the ſon, with ſuch parcialitie, that the ſonne had the better parte lying Weſtward, and the father was conſtreyned to contente himſelfe with the Eaſt parte and the worſt. Of this trouble of Ethelwoulf, Harriſon writeth ſomewhat otherwiſe, and after this manner word for word. 857. Ethelwoulf K. of ẏ weſt Saxons beeing returned from Rome and ẏ parties beyond the Seas, is prohibited the entraunce into his Realme, by Alſtane B. of Shireborne, & Ethelbald his eldeſt ſonne, pretending outwardly his coronation of Alfride, ẏ marriage of Judith the French kings daughter, and open eating with hir at the Table, to be the only cauſe of this theyr manifeſt Rebellio. Hitherto Harriſon: wherby he ſeemeth to inferre, that this reuolting of Alſtane and his ſon, ſhould proceede of the ambitious deſire of Ethelbald to raigne, and likely ynough, or elſe this vnequall partition ſhould neuer haue bin made. But howſoeuer ẏ matter ſtode, K. Ethelwoulf liued not long after his returne frō Rome, but departed this life after he hadde gouerned the kingdome of the Weſt Saxons the ſpace of. 20. yeres and odde monethes. His body was buryed at Wincheſter. He left behind him. 4. ſonnes, Ethelbald, Ethelbert, or Ethelbright, Ethelred and Alfred or Alured, which were begotten of his firſt wife Oſburga. A little before his death hee made his Teſtament & laſt will, appointing his ſon Ethelbald to ſucceede him in the whole regiment of his kingdomes of Weſtſex and Suſſex, which he held by inheritance: but the kingdomes of Kente & Eſſex he aſſigned to his ſon Ethelbright. Ethelwolfe gaue land to build two Abbeyes, and also deliuered vnto hir his sister Edith to bee professed a Nunne. Modwen hereupon built two Monasteries, one at Poulesworth, ioyning to the boundes of Arderne, wherin she placed the foresaid Edith, with Osyth and Athea: the other, whether it was a Monasterie or cell, she founded in Strencshall or Trentsall, where she hir selfe remained solitary a certain time in praier, and other vertuous exercises. And as it is reported, she went thrice to Rome, & finally dyed, being. 130. yeres of age. Hir body was firste buried in an iland compassed about with the Riuer of Trent called Andresey, taking that name of a Church or Chappell of S. Many Monasteries she built, both in Englande, (as partly aboue is mentioned) and also in Scotland, as at Striueline, Edenbrough, and in Ireland, at Cellesline, and else where.

Ethelbald and Ethelbright.

Ethelbald & Ethelbright.

EThelbalde & Ethelbright deuiding theyr fathers kyngdome betwixte them, began to raigne, Ethelbalde ouer the West Saxons, and the South Saxons, & Ethelbrighte ouer them of Kent and Essex, in the yere of our Lorde 857. which was in the second yere of the Emperour Lewes the secõd, and the. 17. of Charles surnamed Calbus or the bald K. of Fraunce, and about the first yere of Donald ỹ fifth of that name K. of the Scottes. The said Ethelbald greatly to his reprochе toke to wife his mother in lawe M. Judith, or rather as some write his own mother, whome his father had kept to concubine. He liued not past fiue yeres in gouernement of the kyngdome, but was taken out of this life, to the greate sorow of his subiects, whome he ruled right worthily, and so as they had him in great loue and estimatiõ. Then his brother Ethelbright toke vpon him the rule of the whole, gouerning as well ouer the West Saxons and them of Sussex, as ouer the Kentishmen and them of Essex.

The vnlawfull marriage of Ethelbalde. Will. Malm.

In his dayes the Danes came a land, and destroyed the Citie of Winchester: but Duke Osrike with them of Hamshire, and Duke Adelwolf with the Barkshire men gaue the enimies battel, and vanquishing them, slew of them a great nũber. In the fifth yeare of Ethelbrightes raigne, a nauie of the Danes ariued at the Isle of Tenet, vnto whome when the Kentishmen had promised a summe of money to haue a truce graunted for a time, the Danes one night before the tearme of that truce was expired, brake forth and wasted all the East part of Kent: whereupon the Kentishmen assembling togither, made towards those trucebreakers, and caused them to depart out of ỹ countrey. The same yere, after that Ethelbrighte had ruled wel & peaceably the West Saxons fiue yeres, and the Kentishmẽ ten yeres, he ended this life, and was buried at Shireborne, as his brother Ethelbald was before him.

Ethelred.

After Ethelbrighte succeeded hys brother Ethelred, and began his raigne ouer the West Saxons, and the more part of ỹ Englishe people, in the yere of our Lord. 867. and in ỹ twelfth yere of ỹ Emperoure Lewes, in the. 17. yeare of the raigne of Charles Calbus K. of France, and about the. 6. yeare of Constantine the seconde K. of Scottes.

This Ethelred was in tyme of peace a most curteous prince, and one ỹ by all kinde of meanes sought to winne ỹ harts of his people: but abroade in the warres he was sharp and sterne, as he that vnderstood what appertained to good order, so that he would suffer no offence to escape vnpunished. By whiche meanes he was famous both in peace and warre: but hee neither liued any long time in the gouernment, nor yet was suffered to passe the short while that he raigned in rest or quietnesse: for wher as he raigned not past fiue yeres, he was continually during that tearme vexed with the inuasion of the Danes, and specially towards the latter end, in so much, that as hath bin reported of writers, hee fought with them nine times in one yere: and although with diuers and variable fortune, yet for the more part he went away with ỹ victory. Beside that, he oftentimes lay in a wayte for their forragers, and such as strayed abrode to robbe and spoile the countrey, whom he met with all, and ouerthrew. There were slayne in his time nine Earles of those Danes, and one King, beside other of the meaner sort without number. But here is to be vnderstoode, that in this meane tyme whilest Ethelred was busied in warre to resist the inuasions of the Danes in the South and West partes of this lande the kings and rulers of Mercia and Northumberland, taking occasion therof, began to withdraw their couenanted subiection from the Westsaxons, and toke vpon them, as it were the absolute gouernement and rule of their countreys without respect to ayde one another, but rather were contented to sustein the iniuries within their dominions than to preuent the iniurie with dutifull assisting those to whome by allegiance they were bounde to serue and obeye. By reason wherof, the Danes without resistance grew into greater power amongst them whylest the inhabitantes were still put in feare eche daye more than other, and euery late gotten victorie by the enimies by the increase of prisoners, ministred occasion of some other conquest to followe. Euen about the beginning of kyng Ethelredes reigne, there arriued vppon the English coastes an huge armie of the Danes, vnder the conducte of two renowned capitaines Hungar and Hubba, men of meruailous strengthe and valiancie, but bothe of them passing cruell of nature. They laye all the Winter season in Eastangle, compounding with them of the countreye for truce vpon certaine conditions, sparing for a tyme to shewe theyr force for quietnesse sake.

In the seconde yeare of king Ethelred the said capitains came with their armie into Yorkeshyre, finding the countrey vnprouided of necessarie defence because of the ciuil discord that reigned amongst the Northumbers, the whiche had lately expulsed king Osbrighte, that had the gouernement of those parties, and placed one Ella in his rowme: but nowe they were constrayned to reuoke him home agayne, and sought to accorde him and Ella. But it was long ere that myght be brought to passe, notwithstanding yet at lengthe they were made frendes by reason of this inuasion attempted by forain enemies, and then repsing their powers they came to Yorke, where the Danes, hauing wasted the countreye euen to the ryuer of Tyne, were lodged.

The English hoste entryng the citie, beganne to fyghte wyth the Danes, by reason whereof a sore battayle ensued betwixte them: but in the ende the two kynges Osbrighte and Ella were slayn, and a great number of the Northumbers what within the Citie, and what without, losse theyr lyues at that tyme, the residue were constrayned to take truce with the Danes.

Thys battayle was fought the .xxj. daye of Marche, on the Fryday before Palmesundaye, in the yeare .657.

Some haue written otherwyse of thys battayle, reportyng that the Northumbers reuokyng home king Osbright (whome before they hadde banyshed) encounter wyth the Danes in the fielde, without the walles of Yorke, but they were easyly beaten backe, and chased into the Citie, the whyche by the Danes pursuyng the victorie, was sette on fyre and bzerte, togyther with the king and people that were fledde into it for succour. Yorke brent by Danes.

Howe soeuer it came aboute, certayne it is, that the Danes gotte the victorie, and now hauyng subdued the Northumbers, appoynted one Egberte to reygne ouer them as kyng, vnder their protection, whiche Egberte reigned in that sorte sixe yeeres ouer those whyche inhabited beyonde the riuer of Tyne.

The same yeare Adelstane, the Bishoppe of Shirborne departed this lyfe, hauyng gouerned that sea the terme of fiftie yeares.

This Adelstane was a man of hyghe wysedome, and one that had borne no small rule in the kingdome of the Westsaxons, as hereby it may be coniectured, that when kyng Ethelwolf returned from Rome, hee would not suffer him to bee admitted king, because he hadde done in certayne poynts contrarie to the ordinance and lawes of the same kingdome, wherupon by this bishops meanes Ethelbald the sonne of the same king Ethelwolfe was established Kyng, and so continued till by agreement the kingdome was deuided betwixte them, as before is mencioned. The cõmendation of Adelstan bishop of Shirborne.

He greatly enriched the sea of Shirborne, and yet thoughe hee was feruently sette on conetousnesse, hee was neuertheleſſe verye free and liberall. Bishop Adelstan conetous. H. Huns.

In the yeare followyng, that is to witte, in the thyrde yeare of Ethelredes reygne, the same Ethelred, wyth hys brother Alured, went to ayde Burthred Kyng of Mercia, agaynste the two forsayde Danish Capitaynes Hungar and Ubba, the whiche were entered into Mercia, and had wonne the towne of Notingham, and lodged within the same towne for the winter season. Wherevppon the forsayde Ethelred and Burthred with their powers came to Notingham, and besieged the Danes within it. Burthred king of Mercia.

The Danes perceiuing themselues in daunger, made suite for a truce and abstinence of warre, whiche they obteyned, and then departed backe to Yorke, where they soiourned the moste parte of all that yeare. Danes besieged in Notingham.

In the fourthe yeare of kyng Ethelred, the Danes comming into Eastangle, cruelly slewe that blessed man king Edmunde, as after shall be shewed, 4 Nouemb. feria. 2.

In the sixte yeare of kyng Ethelreds reigne a newe armye of greate force and power came into the countrey of the Westsaxons vnder two leaders or kyngs of Danes, Basreeg and Halden. Basreeg and Halden.

The Danes vvan the victorie at Reading.

After this alſo king Ethelred and his bzother Alvzed fought again with thoſe Danes at Aſchdon, where the armies on both ſides were diuided into .ij. parts, ſo ẏ the two Daniſh kings led the one part of their armie, & certain of their Earles led the other parte. Likewiſe on the Engliſhe ſide king Ethelred was placed with one parte of the hoſt againſt ẏ Daniſh kings, & Alvzed with the other parte was appointed to encounter with the Erles. that at length, the Engliſhmen were at poynte to haue turned their backes: but herewith came king Ethelred and manfully renued the battaile, ſtayed his people from renning away, and ſo encouraged them, and diſcozaged the enimies, that by the powèr of God, (who as was thought in the mozning he hadde ſerued) the Danes finally were chaſed and put to flight, loſing one of their kings (that is to ſay) Baſreeg oz Oſrec, and.v. Erles, Sidzoc the elder, and Sidzoc the yonger, Olbem, Freyn, and Harold. This battayl was ſoze foughten and continued tyll night, with the ſlaughter of many thouſandes of Danes.

The Danes diſcomfited.

About xiiij. days after, king Ethelred and his bzother Alvzed fought eftſoones with the Daniſh armie at Baſing, where the Danes hadde the victozie.

Also two monethes after this, they lykewiſe fought with the Danes at Merton. And there the Danes after they had bene put to the woꝛſe, and purſued in chaſe a long tyme, yet at lengthe they alſo got the victozie, in which battayle Edmund biſhop of Shirborne was ſlayn, and many other that were men of woꝛthye fame and good accompte.

A battayle at Merton.

He vvas biſhop of Shirborne as Math. VVeſt. hath noted.

In ſommer following, a mighty hoſte of the Danes came to Reding, and there ſoiozned foꝛ a tyme.

These thinges agree not (I remember wel) with that whiche Polidoze Vergile hathe wzitten of theſe warres whiche king Ethelred hadde with the Danes: foꝛ he maketh mencion of one Ivarus a king of the Danes, who landed (as he wziteth) at the mouthe of Humber, and lyke a ſtoute enimie inuadeth the countrey adioyning, Againſt whom Ethelzed with his bzother Alvzed came with an armie, and encountring the Danes, fought with thẽ by the ſpace of a whole day togither, and was in daunger to haue bin put to the woꝛſe, but that the nighte ſeuered them aſunder.

Ivarus.

In the mozning they ioyned againe: but the death of Ivarus, who chaunced to be ſlayne in the begynnyng of the battayle, diſcouraged the Danes, ſo that they were eaſily put to flighte, of whome (befoze they coulde get out of danger) a great number were ſlayne.

Danes flight.

But after that they had recouered themſelues togither, and found out a cõuenient place where to pitche theyr campe, they choſe to theyr Capitaynes Agnerus, and Hubo, two bzetherne, whiche indeuoured them ſelues by all meanes poſſible to repayze theyr armie: ſo that within fifteene dayes after, the Danes eftſoones fought wyth the Engliſhmenne, and gaue them ſuche an ouerthzowe, that little wanted of makyng an ende of all encounters to bee attempted after by the Engliſhemen.

Agnerus Hubo.

But yet within a fewe dayes after this, as the Danes attended theyr market to ſpoyle the countrey and raunge ſomewhat licenciouſly abzoade, they fell wythin the daunger of ſuche ambuſhes as were layd foꝛ them by king Ethelzed, that no ſmalle ſlaughter was made of them, but yet not without ſome loſſe of the Engliſhmenne. Emongſt other, Ethelred himſelfe receyued a wounde, whereof he ſhoꝛtely after dyed.

Thus

Thus hath Polyd. touching the warres which king Ethelred had with the Danes, who yet confeſſeth as the truth is, that ſuche Authors as he herein folowed, varie muche from that which the Daniſh writers do recorde of theſe matters, and namely touching the doings of Ivarus, as in the Daniſhe hiſtorye you maye ſee more at large.

But now to oure purpoſe touching the death of king Ethelred, whether by reaſon of hurt receyued in fight againſt the Danes (as Polydore ſayth) or otherwiſe, certain it is, that Ethelred anone after Eaſter departed this lyfe, in the ſixte yeare of his reigne, and was buried at Wynborn abbey.

In the days of this Ethelred, the foreſaid Daniſhe capitaines, Hungar, otherwiſe called Agnerus, and Hubba returning from the Northe parties into the countrey of Eaſtangles, came vnto Thetford, wherof Edmunde, who reigned as king in that ſeaſon ouer the Eaſtangles, being aduertiſed, he rayſed an armie of men, and wente forthe to giue battayle vnto this armie of the Danes. But he with his people was chaſed out of the fielde, and fled to the caſtell of Framyngham, where being enuironed with a ſiege by his enimies, hee yelded him ſelfe vnto them. And bicauſe he would not renounce the chriſtian faith they bound him to a tree, & ſhot arrowes at him til he dyed: & afterwards cut off his head from his bodie, and threw the ſame into a thicke groue of buſhes. But afterwards his frēds toke the bodie with the head, and buried the ſame at Egleſdon: where afterwarde alſo a faire monaſterie was buylded by one biſhop Aſwyn, and chaungyng the name of the place, it was after called Sainte Edmundeſbury. Thus was king Edmund put to death by the cruel Danes for his conſtant cōfeſſing the name of Chriſte in the xbj. yeare of his reigne, and ſo ceaſed the kingdome of Eaſtangles. For after that the Danes hadde thus ſlaine that bleſſed man, they conquered the hole countrey, and waſted it ſo that through their tyrānie it remayned without any gouernor by the ſpace of nine yeares, and then they appoynted a king to rule ouer it, whoſe name was Guthrun, one of their owne nation, who gouerned bothe the Eaſtangles and the Eaſtſaxons.

Ye haue heard how the Danes ſlew Oſryke & Ella kings of Northumberland. After which victorie by them obteyned, they did muche hurte in the north parties of this lande, and amongeſt other cruell deedes, they deſtroyed the Citie of Aclwyd, which was a famous Citie in the tyme of the olde Saxons, as by Beda and other wryters it dothe manifeſtly appeare.

Here is to be remembred, that ſome wryters reherſe the cauſe to be this:

Olbright or Oſricke king of Northumberlande rauiſhed the wyfe of one Bearne that was a noble man of the countrey about Yorke, who tooke ſuche great deſpite thereat, that hee fledde out of the lande, and went into Denmarke, and there complained vnto the king of Denmarke that was his couſin, of the iniurie done to hym by king Olbright. Wherupon the king of Denmark glad to haue ſo iuſt a quarell againſt them of Northumberlande, furniſhed forthe an armie, and ſente the ſame by Sea, (vnder the leadyng of hys two brethren Hungar and Hubba) into Northumberland, where they ſlew firſt the ſayd kyng Olbrighte, and after king Ella, at a place beſides Yorke, whiche vnto thys daye is called Elles croſſe, takyng that name of the ſayde Elle, beeing there ſlayne in defence of hys countrey againſt the Danes. Whyche Ella (as we fynde regiſtred by wryters) was elected king by ſuche of the Northumbers, as in fauour of Berne had refuſed to be ſubiect vnto Olbright.

Alvred or Alfred.

Alvred or Alfred.

After the deceaſe of King Ethelred, his brother Albred or Alfrede ſucceeded him, and beganne hys reigne ouer the Weaſt Saxons, and other the more parte of the people of Englande, in the yeare of our Lorde eyght hundred ſeuentie and two, whiche was in the nintenth yeere of the Emperour Lewys the ſeconde, and two and thirtieth yeare of the reigne of Charles, ſurnamed Calnus or the balde kyng of Fraunce, and about the eleuenth yeare of Conſtantine the ſeconde king of Scotland.

Although that this Albred was ſacred king in his fathers lyfe tyme by Pope Leo (as before you haue heard,) yet was he not admitted king at home, till after the deceaſe of his three elder brethren: for he being the youngeſt, was kepte backe from the gouernement, though he were for his wiſedome and policie moſt highly eſteemed and had in all honour.

In the beginning of his reigne he was wrapped in many great troubles and miſeries, ſpecially by the perſecution of the Danes, whiche made ſore and greeuous warres in ſundry parts of this lande, deſtroying the ſame in moſte

The morowe after his comming to Abingdon he brought his armie ready to fight into the field, neyther the enimies wolde ſtacke on their parte, to receyue the battayle, and ſo the two armies ioyned & fought right ſore on both ſydes: ſo that it ſeemed the Engliſhmen had not to do with thoſe Danes, whiche had bin diuers tymes before diſcomfited and put to flight, but rather with ſome newe people freſh and luſtie: neyther the one part nor the other was mynded to giue it ouer; in ſo muche that the horſemen alyghting on foote, and puttyng their horſes from them, entred the bat-tayle emongſt the footmen, and thus they continued with equall aduantage till night came on, whiche parted the affray, being one of the ſoreſt foughten fieldes that had bin hearde off in thoſe days. To whether partie a man might iuſtly attribute the victorie, it was vtterlye vncertayne, with ſo lyke loſſe and gayn the matter was tried and ended betwixt them.

With the ſemblable chaunce of daunger and glorie .bij. times that yeare did the Engliſhe and Danes encounter in battail, as writers haue recorded. And at lengthe when their powers on bothe partes were ſore diminiſhed, they agreed vppon a peace, with theſe conditions, That the Danes ſhoulde not attempte any further warre againſt the Engliſhmenne, nor bring into this lande any newe ſupplye of ſouldioures oute of Denmarke.

The ſame yeare the Danes ſoiourned in the winter ſeaſon at London, according as they had done often tymes before.

Aboute the ſame tyme or ſhortely after, there came into Englande one Rollo, a noble man of Denmark or Norway, with a great armie, and (notwithſtanding the peace concluded betweene the Engliſhmen and the Danes,) he beganne to waſt and deſtroy the countrey.

King Alured hearing theſe newes, wyth all ſpeede, thoughte beſte in the beginning to ſtoppe ſuche a common miſchiefe, and immediately aſſembling his people, went againſt the enimies, and gaue them battaile, in the which there died a great number of men on both ſides, but the greater loſſe fel to Rollo his armie. Yet Matthewe Weſtm. ſayeth, that the Engliſhemen were put to flight.

After this, it chaunced, that Rollo beeing warned in a dreame, left Englande, and ſayled ouer into France, wher he foũd fortune ſo fauorable to him, that hee obteined in that region for him and his people a countrey, the whiche was afterwardes named Normandie, of thoſe Norrherne people, whiche then began to inhabite the ſame, as in the hiſtories of Fraunce you may ſee more at large.

xxx. yeares after this he was baptiſed.

The Danes which had concluded peace with king Alured (as before you haue herd) ſhortly after, vpon the firſt occaſion, brake the ſame, & by the often inuaſions whiche they made into the countrey of Weſtſaxons, brought the matter to that passe, that there remayned to king Alured, but onely the three countreis of Hamshire, Wilshire, and Somersetshire, in so much that he was constrained for a time to kepe himself close within the fennes and marrishe grounded of Somersetshire, with such small companies as he had about him, constreyned to get their liuing wyth fishing, hunting, and other suche shiftes. He remayned for the most part within an Isle called Edelynsey, that is to meane, the Ilande of noble menne, enuironed aboute with fennes and marrisses.

Athelney.

Whyles he was thus shut vp within this Iland, he was by dreame aduertised of better hap shortly to follow: For as it hath bene said, Saint Cuthbert appeared to him as he lay in sleepe, and comforted him, declaring vnto him, that within a whyle Fortune shoulde so turne that he shoulde recouer againe his kingdome to the confusion of his enimies: and to assure him, that this should proue true, he told him that his men which were gone abroade to catche fishe, should bring home great plentie, although the season was agaynste them, by reason that the waters were frosen, and that a colde rime fell that morning, to the hinderance of their purpose. His mother also at that tyme being in sleepe, saw the like vision. And as they had dreamed, so it came to passe: for being awakened of their sleepe, in came his men with so great foyson of fishe, that the same might haue suffised a great armie of men, for the victualling of them at that season.

A vision if it be true.

Shortly after, kyng Alured toke vpon hym the habite of a Minstrell, and going forth of his closure, repaired to the campe of the Danyshe king, only accompanied with one trusty seruant, and tarrying there certaine dayes togither, was suffered to goe into euery parte, and play on hys instrument, as well afore the king as others, so that there was no secrete, but that hee vnderstoode it.

After that he had seene and learned the demeanour of his enimies, he returned againe to hys people at Edlingsey, and there declared to hys nobles what he had seene and heard, what negligence was amongst the enimies, and howe easy a matter it shoulde bee for him to endomage them.

Hereupon they conceyuing a meruaylous good hope, and enboldened wyth his wordes, a power was assembled togither, and spyes sente forth to learne and bring word where the Danes lodged: which being done, & certificat made accordyngly, Kyng Alured commyng vppon them on the sodayn, slew of them a great number, hauyng them at great aduauntage.

H. Hunt. 878 — 877.

Also about the same tyme the brother of king Halden came with thirtie and three ships out of Wales into the countreye of Westsaxons, on the coaste of Deuonshire, where the Deuonshire men gaue him battaile, and slewe him with 840. persons of his retinue. Other write, that Halden himself was present at this conflict, with Inguare, otherwise called Hungar, and that they were both slayne there, with twelue hundred of their companye (before a certayne castell called Kynwith) receyuing as they hadde deserued for their cruel dealing lately by them practised in the parties of Southwales, where they had wasted all afore them with fyre and swoorde, not sparing Abbeys more than other common buyldings.

King Alured being with that good lucke the more comforted, builded a fortresse in the Ile of Edlingsey, afterwardes called Athelney, & breaking out oftentymes vpon the enimyes, distressed them at sundrie tymes wyth the ayde of the Somersetshiremen, which were at hande.

Athelney.

Aboute the seuenth weeke after Easter, in the seuenth yeare of hys reigne, kyng Alured went to Egleringhton, on the East parte of Selwood, where there came to him the people of Somersetshire, Wylshyre, and Hamshyre, reioycing greatly to see him abroade.

From thence he wente to Edanton, and there fought against the armie of the Danes, and chased them vnto their strength, where he remained afore them the space of foureteene dayes: and then the armie of the Danes deliuered hym hostages and couenaunts to departe out of his dominions, and that their king should be baptised, which was accomplished: for Gurthrun whom some name Gurmound, a prince or king amongest these Danes, came to Alured, and was baptised, king Alured receyuyng hym at the Font-stone, named hym Adelstane, and gaue to hym the countrey of Eastangle, whyche hee gouerned, (or rather spoyled,) by the space of twelue yeares.

Dyuers other of the Danishe nobilitie to the nnmber of thirtie, (as Simon Dunelmensis hathe) came the same tyme in companye of theyr kyng Guthrun, and were lykewyse baptysed, on whome kyng Alured also bestowed many riche giftes.

The same tyme (as is to bee thought) was the league concluded betwyxte kyng Alured, and the sayde Guthrun or Eythrun, in the whyche the boundes of kyng Alureds kyngdome are sette forth thus:

Fyrste therefore sette the boundes or marches of oure dominion stretche vnto the ryuer of Thames, and from thence to the water of Lee, euen vnto the head of the same water, and so forth streight vnto Bedforde: and finally going alongst by the riuer of Ouse, sette them vnto at Watlingstreete.

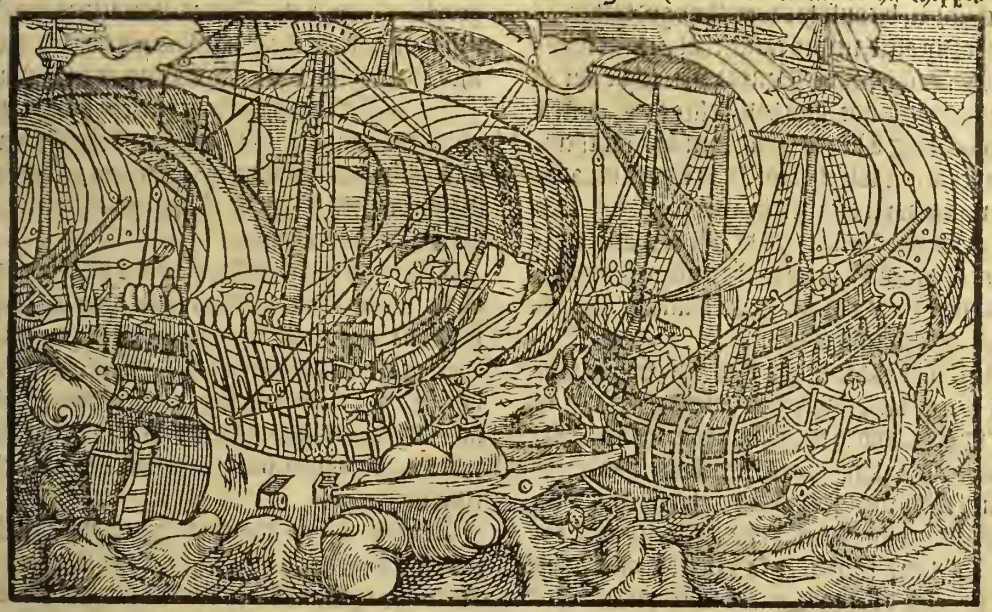
This league beeing made with the aduiſe of the ſage perſonages as well Engliſhe as thoſe that inhabited within Eſt England, is ſet forth in maiſter Lamberts booke of the olde Engliſhe lawes, in the ende of thoſe lawes or ordinaunces whyche were eſtabliſhed by the ſame kyng Alured, as in the ſame booke ye maye ſee more at large. But nowe to proceed.

Here is to bee noted, that oure writers name diuerſe of the Danyſh Capitaines kyngs, of the whyche no mention is made in the Danyſhe Chronicles, to reygne in thoſe parties.



But true it is, that in thoſe dayes, not onely the Danyſhe people, but alſo other of thoſe Northeaſt countreyes or Regyons, as Swedeners, Norweygians, the Wonden, and ſuch other, whyche the Engliſhe people called by one generall name Danes, and the Frenchmen, Normans, vſed to roaue on the Seas, and to inuade forrayne Regions, as England, France, Flaunders, and others, as in conueniente places ye maye fynde, as well in oure Hyſtories as alſo in the writers of the Frenche Hyſtories, and lykewyſe in the Chronicles of thoſe North Regyons.

The Wryters beryly of the Danyſhe Chronicles, make mention of one Gurmo, whome they name Anglicus, becauſe hee was borne here in Englande, whyche ſucceeded his father Frotto in gouernemente of the kyngdome of Denmarke, whyche Frotto receyued baptiſme in Englande, as in their hiſtorie you may reade more at large. Gurmo.

In the eyght yere of kyng Alured his reigne, the armye of the Danes wyntered at Cirencester, and the ſame yeare an other armie of ſtraungers called Vvincigi, lay at Fulham, and in the yeare following, departed forth of Englande, and wente into Fraunce, and the armye of king Godrun or Gurmo departed from Cirencester, and came into Eaſt angle, and there deuidyng the countrey amongeſt them, beganne to inhabite the ſame. H. Hunt. 878. 879. Si. Dunelm. Mat. Weſt.

In the. xiiij. yeare of king Alured his reigne, parte of the Danyſhe armie whyche was gone ouer into Fraunce, returned into England and beſieged Rocheſter. But when Alured approched to the reſcue, the enimies fledde to theyr ſhippes, and paſſed ouer the ſea agayne. Rocheſter beſieged. 885.

King Alured ſente a nauie of his ſhippes well

furniſhed with menne of warre into Eaſtangle, the whyche at the mouthe of the Riuer called Sture, encountring with. xvj. ſhippes of Danes, ſet vpon them, and ouercame them in fight: But as they returned with theyr pryſes, they encountred with an other myghtie armye of the enimies, and fighting wyth them, were ouercome and vanquiſhed.

In the yeare folowing, king Alured beſieged the Citie of London, the Danes that wer within it, fledde from thence, and the Engliſhemen that were inhabitantes thereof, gladly receiued him, reioycing, that there was ſuche a Prince bredde of their nation that was of power able to reduce them into libertie.

This Citie being at that ſeaſon the chiefe of all Mercia, he deliuered vnto the keeping of duke Eldred, whiche had maried his daughter Ethelfleda, and held a great portion of Mercia, which Colwolphus before tyme poſſeſſed by graunt of the Danes, after they had ſubdued kyng Burthred, as before is mencioned. W. Malmſ. Ethelfleda. Colvvolphus.

About the. xij. yeare of king Alured, a greate armie of thoſe Danes, or Normanes, whyche hadde ben in France, returned into England, and arriued in the hauen or riuer of Lymene in the eaſt part of Kente, neere to the greate woode called Andredeſley, whyche dydde contyne in Lymer, novve, Rother. A caſtel buylte at Apledore. 893.

Alſo in the meane tyme came Haſtyng wyth lxxx. ſhips into the Thames, and buylded a Caſtell at Middleton, but hee was conſtrained by ſiege, whiche king Alured planted about him to receiue an othe that he ſhould not in any wyſe anoy the dominion of king Alured, who vpon his promyſe to departe, gaue great rewards as well to him as to his wyfe and children. One of his ſonnes alſo king Alured helde at the Fontſtone, and to the other, Duke Elored was godfather. (For as it were to winne credite, and to auoyde preſent daunger,) Haſting ſent vnto king Alured theſe hys two ſonnes, ſygnifying that if it ſtode with his pleaſure, he coulde be content that they ſhoulde be baptiſed. But neuertheleſſe this Haſting was euer moſte vntrue of worde and deede, he buylded a caſtell at Beamfield. And as he was going forth to ſpoyle and waſt the kings countreys, Alured toke that Caſtell wyth hys wyfe, children, ſhippes, and goodes, which he had got togither of ſuche ſpoyles as he had purchaſed abroade: but he reſtored vnto Haſting his wyfe and children, becauſe hee was their godfather.

Shortly after, newes came, that a great number of other ſhippes of Danes were come out of Northumberlande, and had beſieged Exceſter: Whyleſt king Alured went then againſt them, the other armie whiche laye at Apledore inuaded Eſſex, and buylt a caſtell in that countrey, and after went into the borders of Wales, and builded an other caſtell neere to the riuer of Seuerne: but being driuen oute of that countrey, they returned agayne into Eſſex.

Thoſe that had beſieged Exceſter, vpō knowledge had of king Alureds comming, fledde to their ſhippes, and ſo remayning on the ſea, roaued abroade, ſeeking prayes. Beſides thys, other Armies there were ſent forth, whiche comming out of Northumberlande, toke the citie of Cheſter, but there they were ſo beſette aboute with their enimies, that they were conſtrayned to eate their horſes.

Cheſter taken by Danes.

Great famine.

At length in the. xxiiij. yeare of king Alured they lefte that citie, and fetched a compaſſe about Northwales, and ſo meaning to ſayle rounde aboute the coaſt to come into Northumberland, they arriued in Eſſex, and in the winter folowing drew their ſhippes by the Thames into the water of Luye. That armie of Danes whiche had beſieged Exceſter, toke prayes aboute Chicheſter, and was mette with, ſo that they loſt many of their men, and alſo diuers of their ſhips.

The vvater of Luye, novve Lee.

In the yeare folowing, the other armie which had brought the ſhippes into the riuer of Luye, began to buylde a caſtell neere to the ſame riuer, twentie myles diſtaunt from London: but the Londoners came thither, and giuing battayl to the Danes, ſlewe. iiij. of the chiefe Captaynes. But by Simon Dunel. and Mathew Weſt, it ſhoulde ſeeme, that the Londoners were at thys time put to flighte, and that foure of the kinges Thanes or barons were ſlaine. Howbeit Henry of Huntington hath written as before I haue recited: And further ſayth, that when the Danes fled for their refuge to the Caſtell, king Alured cauſed the water of Luye to be deuided into three Chanels, ſo that the Danes ſhoulde not bring backe their ſhippes oute of the place where they lay at ancker. When the Danes perceyued this, they lefte their ſhippes behynde them, and wente into the borders of Wales, where at Earthbridge vpon Seuerne, they buylte an other caſtell, and lay there all the wynter following, hauing lefte their wiues and childrē in the countrey of Eaſtangles. King Alured purſued them, but the Lōdoners toke the enimies ſhips, and brought ſome of them to the Citie, and the reſt they brent.

Thus for the ſpace of three yeeres after the arriuing of the mayne armie of Danes in the hauen of Luye, they ſore endomaged the Engliſhe people, although the Danes themſelues ſuſtayned more loſſe at the Engliſhmens handes than they did to them with all pilfering and ſpoyling.

In the fourth yeare after their comming, the armie was deuided, ſo that parte of them wente into Northumberlande, part of them remayned in the countrey of the Eaſtangles, and an other part went into Fraunce.

The Danes armie deuided into parts

Alſo certain of their ſhips came vpon the coaſt of the Weſtſaxons, oftentymes ſettyng theyr men on lande to robbe and ſpoyle the countrey.

But king Alured toke order in the beſt wiſe he might for defence of his countrey and people, and cauſed certaine mightie veſſels to be buylded which he appointed forth to encounter with the enimies ſhippes.

And thus lyke a worthie Prince and politike gouernour, he preuented eche way forth to reſiſt his enimies, and to ſauegarde his ſubiects. Finally after he had reigned. 29. yeeres, and an halfe, he departed this lyfe the. 28 day of October. His bodie was buried at Wincheſter: He left behynde him iſſue by his wife Ethelwitha, the daughter of Earle Ethelred of Mercia, two ſonnes Edwarde, ſurnamed the elder, which ſucceeded him, and Adelwolde. Alſo three daughters, Elfleda, or Ethelfleda, Ethelgeda or Elgiua and Ethelwitha. Elfleda was maried (as ye haue heard) vnto Duke Edelred, who left a notable example behinde hir of deſpiſing fleſhely pleaſure, for bearing hir huſbande one chylde, and fore handeled before ſhe coulde be delyuered, ſhe euer after forbare to company with hir huſbande, ſaying that it was great folliſhneſſe to vſe ſuch pleſure which therwith ſhould bring ſo great griefe.

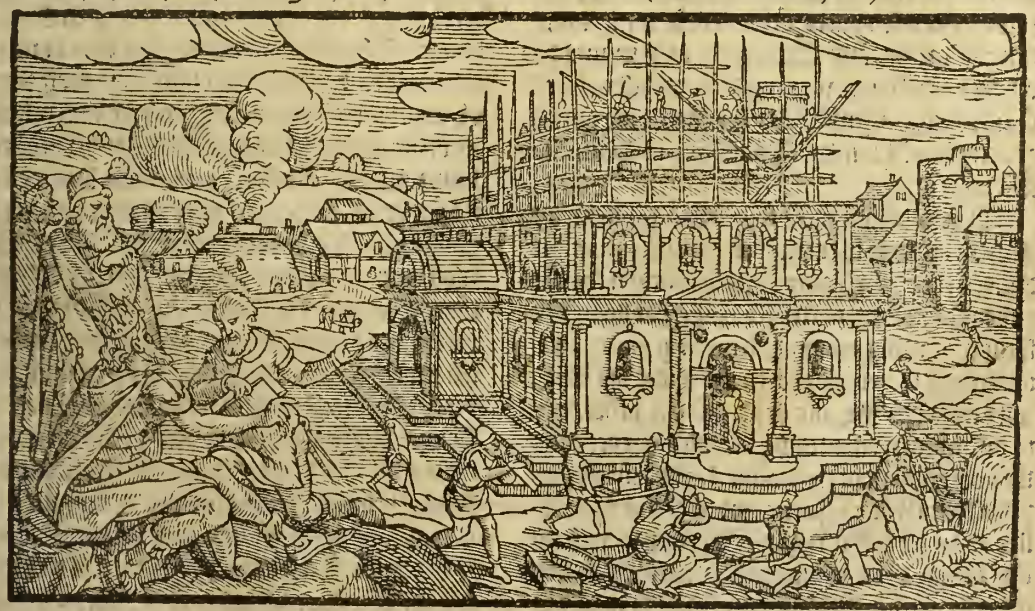
To ſpeake ſufficiently of the worthie prayſe due to ſo noble a prince as Alured was, might require eloquence, learning and a large volume. He was of perſon comely and beautifull, & better beloued of his father and mother than his other brethren. And although he was as before is touched, greatly diſquieted with the inuaſion of forreyn enimies, yet did he both manfully from time to tyme indeuour himſelfe to repulſe them, and alſo attempted to ſee his ſubiectes gouerned in good and vpright iuſtice.

And albeit that good lawes amongeſt the clinking noyſe of armour, are oftentymes put to ſilence, yet he perceiuing how his people were greued with theeues and robbers whiche in tyme of warre grew and increaſed, deuiſed good ſtatutes and holſome ordinances for punyſhing of ſuche offenders.

Amongeſt other thinges he ordeyned, that the countreys ſhould be deuided into hundreds and tythings, that is to wit, quarters conteyning a certayne number of townehips, adioyning togither, ſo that euery Engliſhman liuing vnder preſcripte of lawes, ſhould haue both his hundred and tithing, that if any man were accuſed of any offence, he ſhoulde fynde ſuretie for his good demeanour: and if he coulde not fynde ſuche as woulde anſwere for him, then ſhoulde hee taſte extremitie of the lawes.



And if any manne that was guiltie fled before hee founde ſuretie or after: all the inhabitants of the hundred or tithing where he dwelte ſhoulde be put to their fyne. By this deuiſe hee brought his countrey into good tranquillitie, ſo that he cauſed bracelets of golde to be hanged vp aloſte on hilles, where any common ways laye to ſee if any durſt be ſo hardy to take them away by ſtealth. He was a liberall Prince namely in relieuing of the poore. To churches he confirmed ſuche priuiledges as his father had graunted before him, and he alſo ſent rewardes by waye of deuotion vnto Rome, and to the bodie of Saint Thomas in India. Sighelmus the biſhop of Shirborne bare the ſame, & brought from thence riche ſtones, and ſwete oyles of ineſtimable valure. From Rome alſo he brought a piece of the holy croſſe, whiche Pope Martinus did ſend for a preſent vnto king Alured.

Moreouer king Alured founded three godlie Monaſteries, one at Edlingley, where he liued ſometyme when the Danes had bereaued hym almoſt of all his kyngdome, whiche was after called Athelney, diſtant from Taunton in Somerſetſhire about fiue myles: the ſeconde he builded at Wincheſter, called the newe minſter, and the thirde at Shaftſbury, whiche was an houſe of Nunnes, where he made his daughter Ethelgera, or Elgiua Abbeſſe. But the foundation of the vniuerſitie of Oxford paſſed all the reſidue of his buyldings, whiche he began by the good exhortation and aduiſe of Neotus an Abbotte in thoſe days highly eſteemed for his vertue and lerning with Alured.

Foundation of monaſteries.

This worke he toke in hande about the .23. yeare of his reigne, whiche was in the yeare of our Lorde. 895. So that the Vniuerſitie of

Cambridge was founded before thys other at Oxforde about. 265. yeeres, as Polydore gathereth. For Sigebert king of the Eaſt angles began to erecte that Vniuerſitie at Cambridge, about the yeare of our Lorde, 630.

King Alured was learned himſelfe, and giuen muche to ſtudie, in ſo muche that beſide dyuers good lawes whiche he tranſlated into the engliſh toung, gathered togither and publiſhed, he alſo tranſlated diuers other bookes out of Latin into englisshe), as Orosius, Pastorale Gregorij, Beda de gestis Anglorū, Boetius de consolatione Philosophiæ, and the booke of Psalms, but this he finisshed not, being preuented by death.

The vertuous zele of Alured to bring his people to an honest trade of lyfe.

So this worthie Prince minding wel toward the common wealth of his people, in that season when learning was little esteemed amongest the Weast nations, dyd studie by all meanes possible, to instructe his subiectes in the trade of leadyng an honest lyfe, and to encourage them generally to imbrace learnyng. He would not suffer any to beare office in the Courte, except hee were learned: and yet hee hymselfe was twelue yeares of age before hee coulde reade a worde on the booke, and was then trayned by his mothers perswasion to applye hymselfe to study, promising to gyue hym a goodly fayre booke whyche she had in hir handes, if he wold shortly lerne to reade it. Hereupon going to his booke in sporte, he so earnestly sette his mynd thereto, that within a small tyme hee profited marueilously, and became suche a fauourer of learned men, that he delyghted most in their companie, to haue conference wyth them, and allured dyuers to come vnto hym out of other countreyes, as Asserius Menenensis bishop of Shirborne, and Werefridus the byshop of Worcester, who by his commaundemente translated the Bookes of Gregories Dialogues into Englisshe. Also John Scot whyche whyles hee was in Fraunce, translated the booke of Dionysius Areopagita, entituled Hierarchia, out of Greecke into Latin, and after was Scholemaister in the Abbey of Malmesburye, and there murthered by his Schollers with penkniues, hee had dyuers other aboute him, bothe Englisshmenne and straungers, as Pleymonde whyche afterwarde was made Archebishoppe of Canterbury, Grimbalde, whome he appointed gouernour of the newe Monasterie at Winchester, with other.

He is perswaded by his mother, to applye himself to lerning.

But to conclude with this noble Prince king Alured, hee was so carefull in his office, that hee deuided the .xxiiij. houres which contayn the day and night in three partes, so that eight houres he spent in writing, reding and making his prayers, other eight hee employed in relieuing his bodye with meate, drinke, and slepe, and the other .viij. he bestowed in dispatching of businesse cōcerning the gouernment of the realme. He had in his chapell a candell of .24. partes, whereof euery one lasted an houre: So that the Sexton to whome that charge was committed, by burning of that candell warned the king euer how the time passed away. A little before his death, hee ordeined his last wil and testament, bequeathing halfe the portion of all his goodes iustly gotten, vnto such Monasteries as he had founded. All his rents and reuenues he deuided into two equall partes, and the first part he deuided into three, bestowing the first vpon his seruants of housholde, the seconde to suche labourers and workmen as he kept in his workes of sundrie newe buyldings, the thyrde part he gaue to straungers. The second whole part of his reuenues was so diuided, that the first portion thereof was established amongest the poore people of his countrey, the seconde to Monasteries, the thirde to the findyng of poore schollers, and the .iiij. part to Churches beyonde the sea: he was diligent in the enquirie how the Iudges of his land behaued themselues in their iudgemēts, and was a sharpe correcter of them which transgressed in that behalfe. To be briefe, he liued so as he was had in greate fauoure of his neighbors, highly honored amongst straungers. He maryed his daughter Ethelswida or rather Elstride vnto Baldwyn Erle of Flaunders, of whome hee begat two sons Arnulfe and Adulfe, of the which the first succeded in the Erledome of Flaunders, and the yonger was made erle of Boloigne.

Elstrid, whose epitaph you find in Iacob Meyer, if you looke for him vvyne his bande.

The bodie of king Alured was firste buried in the Bishops churche: but afterwarde because the Canons raysed a fond tale that the same shoulde walke a nightes, his sonne king Edward remoued it into the newe monasterie whiche he in his lyfe tyme had founded.

The ende of the kingdome of Mercia.

IN the dayes of the forsayd king Alured, the kyngdome of Mercia toke ende. For after that ỹ Danes had expulsed king Burthred, whē he had reigned .22. yeares, he went to Rome, and there died, his wife also Ethelswida, the daughter of king Athulf that was sonne to king Egbert folowed him, and dyed in Pauia in Lumbardie. The Danes hauyng got the countrey into their possession, made one Ceolfe king thereof, whome they bound with an othe and deliuerie of pledges, that he should not longer kepe the state with their pleasure, and further shoulde bee readie at all tymes to ayde them wyth suche power as he should be able to make. Thys Ceolf was the seruant of king Burthred. Within foure yeres after the Danes returned, & toke one part of that kingdome into their owne handes, & left the residue vnto Ceolfe. But within fewe yeres after, king Alured obteined that parte of Mercia which Ceolf ruled, as he did all the residue of this land, except those parcels which the Danes held, as Northumberland, the countreis of the Eastangles, some parte of Mercia, & other. The yere in the whiche king Alured thus obteyned the dominion of that part of Mercia whiche Ceolf had in gouernāce, was after the birth of our Sauior .886. so that the forsaid kingdom cōtinued the space of .202. yeres vnder .22. kings frō Crida to this last Ceolf. But ther be ỹ accopt the continuance of this kingdome, only from the begin-beginning of Penda, vnto the last yere of Burthred, by which reckning it stood not past 270. yeres vnder .8. or rather .17. kings, accompting the last Cewolf for none, who began his reigne vnder subiection of the Danes, aboute the yeare of our Lord. 874. wher Penda bega his reigne. 604.

The Eastangles & the Northumbers in these days wer vnder subiection of the Danes, as partly may be perceued by that which before is rehersed. After Guthra ỹ gouerned ỹ eastangles by the term of .xij. yeres, one Edbirick or Erick had the rule in those parties, a Dane also, & reigned .xiiij. yeres, & was at length bereued of his gouernment by king Edward the sonne of K. Alured, as after shal appere. But now although that the Northumbers were brought greatly vnder foote by the Danes, yet could they not forget their old accustomed maner to stirre tumultes and rebellion against their gouernors, insomuch that in the yere 872. they expulsed not onely Egbert, whome the Danes had appointed king ouer one parte of the countrey (as before you haue heard) but also their archbishop Wilfhere. In the yere following, the same Ecgbert departed this life, after whom, one Rigsig or Riesige succeeded as king, & the Archbishop Wolfhere was restored home. In ỹ same yeare the armie of Danes which had wintered at London, came from thẽce into Northumberlãd, and wintred in Lindsey, at a place called Torksey, and went the next yeere into Mercia. And in the yere. 975. a part of them returned into Northumberland, as before ye haue herd. In the yere following, Riesig the king of Northumberlande departed this lyfe: After whom an other Egbert succeeded. And in the yeare. 983. the armie of the Danes meanyng to inhabite in Northumberlands, and to settle themselues there, chose Euthryd the sonne of one Hardicnute to their king, whome they had sometyme solde to a certayne widowe at Witingham. But nowe by the aduise of an Abbot called Aldride, they redeemed his libertie and ordeined him king to rule bothe Danes and Englishmen in that countrey.

It was sayd, that the same Aldrede being Abbot of holy Ilande, was warned in a vision by Sainte Cuthbert, to giue counsell bothe to the Danes and Englishmen, to make the same Guthrid king. This chaunced about the .xiij. yere of the reigne of Alured king of West Saxons.

Then after that Guthrid was established king he caused the bishops sea to be remoued from holy Ilande vnto Chester in the strete, and for an augmentation of the reuenues and iurisdiction belonging therto, he assigned and gaue vnto Sainte Cuthbert all that countrey which lyeth betwixt the riuers of Teyse and Tyne.

Moreouer this priuiledge was there graunted vnto S. Cuthbert shrine, That whosoeuer fledde into the same for succour & safegarde, should not be touched or troubled in any wise for the space of 37. dayes. And this freedom was confirmed not only by king Guthrid, but also by king Alured. Finally king Guthrid departed this lyfe in the yeare of our Lord God. 894. after hee had ruled the Northumbers with muche cruelti (as some say) by the terme of .11. yeres, or somwhat more: He is named by some writers Gurmond, and also Gurmo, and thought to bee the same whome king Alured caused to be baptised. Where other affirme, that Guthred who ruled the Eastangles, was he that Alured receiued at ỹ fontstone; William Malmsbury taketh them to be but one man, whiche is not lyke to be true.

894. Polydor. VV. Malmſ. VV. Malmſ.

After this Guthred or Gurmo his sonne Sithrike succeeded, and after hym other of that line, till king Athelstane depriued them of the dominion, and toke it into his owne hands. Sithrike.

Edwarde the elder.

After the decease of king Alured, his son Edwarde, surnamed the elder began his reygne ouer the more parte of Englande in the yeare of our Lord 901. which was in the .7. yere of the emperour Lewis in the eight yeare of the reigne of Charles, surnamed Simplex, king of France, and about the .8. yeare of Donald king of Scotland. He was sacred after the maner of other kyngs his auncestors by Athelrede the Archebishop of Canterburie. This Edward was not so learned as his father, but in princely power more high & honorable, for he ioyned the kingdome of Eastangles and Mercia with other vnto his dominion, as after shall be shewed, and vanquished the Danes, Scots, & Welchmen, to his great glory and high cõmendation. In the beginning of his reign he was disquieted by his brother Adelwold, which toke the town of Winborn besides Bath, and maried a Nunne there, which he had deflowred, and attempted many things against his brother. Wherupõ the king came to Bath, & though Adelwold shewed a countenance as if he would haue abyde the chaunce of warre within Wynborne, yet he stale awaye in the night, & fled into Northũberland, wher of the Danes he was ioyfully receiued. The king toke his wife being lefte behind, & restored hir to ỹ house from whence she was taken. Some haue written, that this Adelwolde or Ethelwolde, was not brother vnto king king Edwarde, but his vncles ſonne.

After this king Edwarde prouiding for the ſuretie of his ſubiectes againſt the forrays which the Danes vſed to make, fortifyed diuers cities and townes, and ſtuffed them with great garriſons of ſouldiors, to defend the inhabitants, and to repulſe the enimies. And ſurely the engliſhmen were ſo inured with warres in thoſe dayes, that the people being aduertiſed of the inuaſion of the enimies in any part of their countrey, would aſſemble oftentymes without knowledge of king or capitayne, and ſetting vpon the enimies, went commonly away with victorie, by reaſon that they ouermatched them bothe in number & practiſe. So were the enimies deſpiſed of the engliſhe ſouldiours, and laughed to ſcorn of the king for their foliſhe attempts. Yet in the third yeare of king Edwards reigne, Ethelwolde his brother came with a Nauie of the Danes into the parties of the eaſtangles, and euen at the firſt the Eſſex men yelded themſelues vnto him. In the yere folowing he inuaded the countrey of Mercia with a mightie armie, waſting and ſpoyling the ſame vnto Crykelade, and there paſſing ouer the Thames, rode forth til he came to Baſingſtoke, (or as ſome bookes haue Buttenden,) harying the countrey on eche ſyde, and ſo returned back into Eaſt angles with great ioy & triumph.

King Edwarde awakened heerewith, aſſembled his people, & folowed the enimies, waſting all the countreye betwixt the riuer of Duſe and S. Edmunds ditch. And when he ſhuld returne, he gaue cõmandement, that no man ſhould ſtay behinde him, but come backe togither for doubte to be forclayd by the enimies. The Kentiſhmen notwithſtanding this ordinance & cõmandemẽt, remained behind, although the king ſent. 7. meſſengers for them. The Danes awayting their aduantage, came togither, and fiercely foughte with the Kentiſhmen, which a long tyme valiantly defended themſelues. But in the ende the Danes obteyned the victorie, although they loſte more people there than the Kentiſhmen did: and amongeſt other, there were ſlaine the forſaid Athelwold, & diuers of the chief captains amongſt the Danes. Likewiſe of the engliſh ſide, ther died ij. dukes, Siwolf & Singlem, or Sigbelm, with ſundry other mẽ of name, both tẽporal & alſo ſpiritual lords & Abbots. In the .v. yere of his reign K. Edward cõcluded a truce with the Danes of Eaſtangle & Northumberlãd at Itingford. But in the yere folowing, he ſent an army againſt thẽ of Northumberlãd, which ſlew many of ẏ Danes, and took great bootes both of people & cattel, remaining in the countrey the ſpace of .v. weekes.

The Kentiſhmen diſobey the kings cõmaundement, are ſurpriſed by the enimies. Athelwold king Edwards brother.

Foure dayes hath S. Dunel.

The yere next enſuing, the Danes with a great armie entred into Mercia, to rob & ſpoile ẏ countrey, againſt whom king Edward ſent a mightie hoſt, aſſembled togither of the Weſt ſaxons and them of Mercia, the which ſet vpon the Danes, as they were returning homeward, & ſlew of thẽ an huge multitude, together with their chief capitaines and leaders, as king Halden, and kyng Eolwils, erle Uther, erle Scurfa, & diuers other.

In the yeare 912. (or as Simon Dunel. hath 908.) the Duke of Mercia Edrid or Etheldred, departed this life, and then king Edward ſeyſed into his handes the Cities of London and Oxford, and all that part of Mercia which he helde. But afterwards he ſuffered his ſiſter Elfleda to enioy the moſt part therof, except the ſayde cities of London and Oxford, whiche he ſtill retayned in his owne hande. This Elfleda was wyfe to the ſayd duke Edrid or Etheldred, as before you haue heard: Of whoſe worthy actes more ſhall be ſayde hereafter.

H. Hunt.

In the nynthe yeare of his reigne kyng Edwarde buylt a caſtell at Hartford, and likewiſe he he buylded a towne in Eſſex at Wightham, and lay himſelf in the meane time at Maldon, otherwiſe Mealdun, bringing a great part of ẏ countrey vnder his ſubiection, which before was ſubiect to ẏ Danes. In the yere following, the armie of the Danes departed frō Northāpton & Cheſter in breach of the former truce, & ſlew a greate number of men at Hocchnerettō in Oxfordſhire. And ſhortly after their return home, an other cōpanie of them wēt forth and came to Leighton, where the people of the countrey being aſſembled togither, fought with them, and put them to flight, taking frō them all the ſpoyle whiche they had got, and alſo their horſes.

In the .xj. yere of king Edw. a fleet of Danes compaſſed about the Weſt partes, and came to the mouth of Seuerne, & ſo toke preyes in Wales: They alſo toke priſoner a Welche biſhop named Camelgaret, at Irchenfield, whome they led to their ſhips: but king Edward redemed him out of their hands, paying to them .xl. ℔. for his raunſom. After that the armie of Danes went forth to ſpoyle the countrey about Irchingfield, but the people of Cheſter, Hereforde, and other townes and countreys therabout, aſſembled togither, and giuing battayl to the enimies, put them to flight, and ſlewe one of their noble men called Earle Rchald, and Geoleil the brother of Earle Uter, with a great part of their armie, and draue the reſidue into a Caſtell, whiche they beſieged till the Danes within it gaue hoſtages, and couenanted to depart out of the kings lande.

The king cauſed the coaſts about Seuerne to be watched, that they ſhould not breake into his countrey: But yet they ſtale twice into the borders: neuertheles they wer chaſed & ſlain ſo many as coulde not ſwim, and ſo get to their ſhips.

Then they remayned in the Ile of Stepen, in great miſerie for lacke of victuals, bycauſe they coulde not go abroade to get any. At length they departed into Northwales, & from thēce ſayled into Ireland.

The ſame yeare king Edward came to Buckingham with an armie, and ther taried a whole moneth, building two caſtels, the one vpon the one ſide of the water of Duſe, and the other vpon the other ſide of the ſame riuer. He alſo ſubdued Turketyllus an Erle of the Danes that dwelte in that countrey, with all the reſidue of the noble men and barons of the ſhires of Bedforde and Northampton.

In the .xij. yere of K. Edwards reigne, ẏ Kentiſhmen & Danes fought togither at Holme: but whether partie had the victorie, writers haue not declared. Simon Dunelm. ſpeaketh of a batayle which the citizens of Canterbury fought againſt a number of Daniſh rouers at Holme, wher the Danes were put to flight, but that ſhould be (as he noteth) an. 8. yeres before this ſuppoſed time, as in the yere. 904. whiche was aboute the thirde yere of king Edw. reigne. After this other of the Danes aſſembled themſelues togither, & in Staffordſhire at a place called Tottēhal, fought with the Engliſhmen, & after great ſlaughter made on bothe parties, the Danes were ouercome: and ſo likewiſe were they ſhortly after at Wodfield, or Wodenfield. And thus K. Edw. put the Danes to the worſe in eche place commonly where hee came, and hearing that thoſe in Northumberlād ment to breake the peace: he inuaded the countrey and ſo afflicted the ſame, that the Danes whiche were inhabitants there, gladly continued in reſt and peace. But in this meane tyme, Ericke the king of thoſe Danes which helde the countrey of eaſtangle was about to procure new warre, and to allure other of the Danes to ioyn with him againſt the Engliſhmen, that with cōmon agreement, they might ſette vpon the engliſhe nation, and vtterly ſubdue them.

King Edw. hauing intelligence hereof, purpoſed to preuent him, & therevpon entryng with an armie into his countrey, cruelly waſted & ſpoyled the ſame. K. Erick hauing alreadie his people in armour through diſpleſure conceiued hereof, and deſire to be reuenged, haſted forthe to encounter his enimies: And ſo they met in the field & fiercely aſſayled eche other. But as the battaile was raſhly begon on king Ericks ſide, ſo was the end verie harmeful to him: for with ſmall a doe after great loſſe on his ſide, was he vanquiſhed and put to flight.

Ericke put to flight.

And after his comming home, bycauſe of his great ouerthrowe and foule diſcomfiture, he began to gouerne his people with more rigour and ſharp dealing thā before time he had vſed. Wherby he prouoked the malice of the Eaſtangles ſo highly againſt him, ẏ they fell vpon him & murthered him: yet did they not gain ſo much hereby as they looked to haue done: for ſhortly after, they being brought lowe, and not able to defende their countrey, were compelled to ſubmit themſelues vnto king Edw. And ſo was that kingdome ioyned vnto the other dominions of the ſame king Edwarde, who ſhortly after annexed alſo the kingdome of Mercia vnto other of his dominions, immediatly vpon the death of his ſiſter Elfleda, whome he permitted to gouern that countrey during hir lyfe. And not without good reaſon, for by hir wyſe & politike order vſed in all hir doings, he was greately furthered and aſſiſted. But namely in reparing and buylding of Townes and Caſtelles, ſhee ſhewed hir noble magnificence, in ſo muche that during the time of hir gouernaunce whiche continued an eyght yeares, it is recorded by writers, that ſhe did buylde and repaire theſe Townes, whoſe names

Moreouer, by hir helpe the citie of Chester whiche by Danes had bin greately defaced, was newly repaired, fortified with walles and turrets and greatly enlarged. So that the castell whiche stoode without the walles before that tyme was now brought within compasse of the new wall.

Moreouer she boldely assaulted hir enimyes whiche wente aboute to trouble the state of the countrey as the Welchemen, and Danes. She sent an armie into Wales, and toke the towne of Brecknocke with the Queene of the Welchmen at Brecennamere. Also she wan from the Danes the towne of Darby, and the countrey adioyning.

In this enterprise she put hir owne person in great aduenture: for a great multitude of Danes, þ were withdrawen into Derby, valiātly defended the gates and entries, insomuche that they slew foure of hir chiefmen of warre, which were named Wardens of hir person, euen fast by hir at the very entrie of the gates. But this notwithstanding, with valiāt fight hir people entred, and so the towne was wonne: she gotte diuers other places out of their handes, and constrained them of Yorkeshire to agree with hir, so that some of them promised to become hir subiectes: Some promised to ayde hir, and some sware to be at hir cōmaundement. Finally this martiall Lady and manly Elfleda, the supporter of hir coūtreymen and terrour of the enimies, departed this life at Thamworth aboute the. xij. of June, in the xviij. or rather. xix. yeare of hir brother king Edwards reigne, as by Math. West. it should appeare. But Simon Dunelm. writeth, that she deceassed in the yeare of Christ. 915. which should be about the. xiiij. yeare of king Edwards reign. Hir bodie was conueyed to Glouceſter, and there buried within the monasterie of S. Peter, which hir husband and she in their life tyme had buylded, and translated thither the bones of Sainct Oswyll from Bardona. The same monasterie was after destroyed by Danes. But Aldredus the archbishop of Yorke, who was also bishop of Worcester, repared an other in the same Citie, that was after the chiefe Abbey there.

After the decease of Elfleda, king Edwarde toke the dominion of Mercia as before we haue sayde) into his owne handes, and so disinherited his neece Alfwen, or Elfwen, the daughter of Elfleda, takyng hir awaye wyth him into the countrey of Westsarons. By thys meanes he so amplifyed the boundes of his kingdome, that he had the most parte of all this Ilande of Brytayne at his commaundement: for the kynges of the Welchmen (namely the kyng of Strecled, and of the Scots, acknowledging hym to be their chiefe soueraigne Lorde, and the Danes in Northumberland were kept so short, that they durst attempt nothing againste him in his latter dayes: so that he had tyme to applye the buildyng and reparing of Cities, townes, and castels wherin he so muche delighted. He buylded a newe towne at Notingham on the southside of Trent, and made a bridge ouer that riuer betwixt the olde towne and the newe. He also repared Manchester beyonde the riuer of Mercie in Lancashire, accounted as then in the southe ende of Northumberlande. He buylt a Towne of auncient writers called Thirwall, nere to the same riuer of Mercie, and placed therin a garrison of souldiers: diuers other townes and castels he buylt. as two at Buckingham on eyther side the water of Ouse (as before is shewed and also one at the mouth of the riuer of Auon. Hee likewise buylt or new repared the townes of Tocester and Wigmore, with diuers other, as one at Eladenuth, about the last yeare of his reigne. Some also he destroyed whiche seemed to serue the enimies turne for harborough, as at Temmelforde, a Castell, whyche the Danes had buylded and fortifyed.

At lengthe after that this noble Prince king Edward had reigned somewhat aboue the terme of. xxiij. yeares, hee was taken out of this lyfe at Farington: His bodie was conueyed frō thence vnto Winchester, and there buried in the newe Abbey. He hadde. iij. wyues, or (as some haue written) but two, affirming that Edgiua was not his wife, but his concubine, of whom he begat his eldest sonne Adelstane, who succeded hint in the kingdome. This Edgiua (as hathe bene reported) dreamed on a tyme, that there rose a Mone out of hir belly, whiche with the brighte shine thereof gaue light ouer all Englande: and telling hir dreame to an ancient Gentlewoman, the same Gentlewoman coniecturyng by the dreame that whiche folowed, toke care of hir, and caused hir to bee brought vp in good manners and lyke a Gentlewoman, though she were borne but of base parentage.

His ſeconde or rather his firſt wyfe if he were not maried to Eguina mother to Adelſtane, highte Elfleda, or Elfrida, and was daughter to one erle Ethelme: by hir he had iſſue two ſonnes Ethelward and Edwyn, which immediatly departed this life after their father: & vj. daughters Elfleda, Edgiua, Ethelhilda, Ethilda, Egditha, & Elfgiua. Elfleda becam a Nunne: and Ethelhilda alſo liued in perpetuall virginitie, but yet in lay habite. Egditha was maried to the king of Fraunce Charles, ſurnamed Simplex. And Ethilda by help of hir brother Adelſtan was beſtowed vpon Hugh ſonne to Robert earle of Paris, for hir ſingular beautie moſte highly eſteemed: for nature in hir had ſhewed as it were hir whole cunning, in perfecting hir with all gifts and properties of a comely perſonage. Edgiua and Edgitha were ſent by their brother Adelſtan into Germanie, vnto the Emperour Henry, who beſtowed one of them vpon his ſonne Otho, that was after Emperor, the firſte of that name, and the other vnto a duke, inhabiting about ỳ Alpes: By his laſt wife named Edgiua, he had alſo two ſonnes, Edmunde and Eldred, the whiche both reigned after their brother Adelſtane ſucceſſiuely. Alſo he had by hir two daughters, Edburge that was made a Nunne, and Edgiue, a lady of excellent beautie, whom hir brother Adelſtan gaue in mariage vnto Lewys king of Aquitayn.

Whyles this lande was in continuall trouble of warres againſte the Danes, as before is touched, ſmall regarde was hadde to the ſtate of the Church, inſomuch that the whole country of the Weſtſaxons by the ſpace of .7. yeres together (in the days of this K. Edward) remained withoute any Biſhop, to take order in matters appertayning to the church. Wherupon the Pope had accurſed the engliſh people, bicauſe they ſuffred the Biſhops ſeas to be vacant ſo long a time.

King Edward to auoyd the curſſe, aſſembled a prouincial Coũcel. 905. in the which the Archbiſhop of Canterbury Pleymond was preſident. Wherein it was ordeyned, ỳ where the prouince of Weſtſaxõs in tymes paſt had but. ij. biſhops, now it ſhoulde be deuided into .v. dioceſſes, euery of them to haue a peculiar Biſhoppe. When all things were ordered and concluded in this Synode (as was thought requiſite,) the Archbiſhop was ſent to Rome with rich preſents, to appeaſe the Popes diſpleaſure. When the Pope had herd what order the king had taken, he was contented therewith. And ſo the Archebiſhop returned into his countrey, and in one day at Canterbury ordeined. vij. biſhoppes, as fiue to the Prouince of Weſtſaxons, that is to wit, Frideſtane to the ſea of Wincheſter, Adelſtan to S. German in Cornewal, Werſtan to Shirborn, Adelme to Welles, and Edulfe to Kirton. Alſo to the prouince of Suſſex, hee ordeyned one Berrigus, and to Dorcheſter for the prouince of Mertia, one Cenulfe. Here muſt ye note, that where William Malmeſ. Polichro. and other do affirme, ỳ Pope Formoſus did accurſe K. Edward & the engliſhe nation for ſuffring the biſhops ſeas to be vacant, it cannot ſtand with the agreement of the tyme, vnleſſe that the curſe pronounced by Formoſus for this matter long afore was not regarded, till Edward toke reſpect therto. For the ſame Formoſus began to gouerne the Romane ſea abonte the yeare of our Lord. 892. and liued in the papacie not paſt. vj. yeres, ſo that he was deade before king Edward came to the crowne. But how ſo euer this matter may fall out, this ye haue to conſider: Although that Pleymound was ſent vnto Rome to aduertiſe the Pope what the king had decreed and done, in the ordeyning of Biſhops to their ſeueral ſeas as before ye haue heard, yet (as Maiſter Fore hath noted) the gouernaunce and direction of the Church depended chiefly vpon the kings of this lande in thoſe days, as it manifeſtly appeareth, as wel by the decrees of K. Alured, as of this king Edward, whoſe authoritie in the election of Biſhops (as before ye haue herd) ſeemed then alone to be ſufficient.

Englande, the yeare of our Lorde. 924. whiche was in the. vj. yeare of the Emperor Henry the first, in the. xj. yeare of the reigne of Charles, surnamed simplex, king of France. 3. moneths after the burning of Paule, & about the. 22. or. 23. yeare of Constantine the third king of Scotlande.

This Adelstan was crowned and sacred king at Kingston upon Thames of Adelme the Archbishop of Canterbury, which succeeded Pleymond. He was the. xxiiij. king in number from Cerdicius or Cerdik the first king of the Westsaxons.

Alfred striueth in vayn to kepe Athelstan from the gouernmēt.

There were in the beginning some ẏ set them selues against him, as one Alfred a noble mā whi che practised by treason, to haue kept him frō the gouernmēt: but he was apprehended ere he could bring his purpose to passe, & sente to Rome there to trie himself giltie or not guiltie. And as he toke his othe for his purgation before ẏ aultar of saint Peter, he sodenly fel down to the earth, so that his seruants toke him up & bare him vnto the englishe schoole or hospitall, where the thirde night after he died.

VVil. Malm.

See more hereof in the booke of Actes and Monumentes set foorth by M. Foxe vol. 1. leafe. 105.

Pope John the. x. sent vnto king Adelstane to know if he wold that his bodie should be layde in christian burial or not. The king at the contemplation of Alfreds frends & kinsfolks, signified to the Pope that he was contented that his bodye should be enterred amongst other christians. His lands being forfaited were giuen by ẏ king vnto God & S. Peter. The cause ẏ moued Alfred and other his cōplices against the king, was (as some haue alledged) his bastardie. But whether that allegation wer true, or but a slander, this is certain that except that stain of his honor, there was nothing in this Adelstan worthy of blame: So that he darkned all the glorious fame of his predecessors both in vertuous conditions & victorious triumphs. Such difference is there to haue that in himselfe wherein to excell, rather than to stande vpon the worthinesse of his auncestors, sith that can not rightly be called his.

After that K. Adelstane was established in the estate, he endeuored himself to answer the expectation of his people, which hoped for great welth to ensue by his noble & prudent gouernāce: Fyrst therfore meaning to prouide for the suretie of his countrey, he cōcluded a peace with Sithricus K. of the Northūbers, vnto whō as ye haue heard, he gaue one of his sisters named Editha in mariage. Sithrike liued not past one yere after he had so maried hir. And thē Adelstan brought the prouince of the Northūbers vnto his subiection, expelling one Aldulph out of the same ẏ rebelled against him. Ther be ẏ write, that Godfrey & Iulake the sonnes of Sithrike succeding their father in the gouernment of Northūberland, by practising to moue war against king Adelstane, occasioned him to inuade their cōtrey, and to chase them out of the same, so that Iulak fled into Ireland & Godfrey into Scotlād: but other write, ẏ Godfrey was the father of Reignold, which wan Yorke, after that Sithrike had slaine his brother Nigellus, as before is mencioned. The Scottish chronicles vary in report of these matters from ẏ english writers: whose chronicles affirm, ẏ in the life time of K. Edwarde his daughter Beatrice, was giuen in mariage to Sithrike, the gouernor of the Danes in Northumberland, with condition, that if any issue male were procreate of that mariage, the same shuld inherite the dominions of K. Edward after his decease. Kyng Edward had a brother (as they say) named Edwyn, a ioyly Gentleman, and of great estimation amongst the Englishmen. He by Sithrikes procurement was sent into Flaunders in a ship that leaked, & so was drowned, to the greate reioycing of all the Danes, least if he had suruiued his brother, hee woulde haue made some businesse for the crowne.

H. Hunt.

H. Boetius.

The Scottish writers vary from our English authors. Beatrice daughter to K. Edward. as the Scottish writers affirme.

Edwyn not brother to K. Edward. but sonne to him.

About the same time Adelstā a base son of K. Edw. fled ẏ realme for doubt to be made away by some like trayterous practise of the Danes. Shortly after K. Edward vnderstanding ẏ Sithrik went about some mischef toward him, persuaded his daughter to poyson hir husbande the sayd Sithrike. Then Iulaffe or Iualaffus, and Godfrey the sonnes of Sithrike, finding out by diligent examination, ẏ Beatrice was of counsell in poysoning hir husband, they caused hir to be apprehended and put to death on this wyse:

Athelstā the realme.

She was sette naked vpon a Smythes colde Anuylde or stythie, and therwith harde rosted egges being taken forth of the hot ymbers were putte vnder hir arme pittes, and hir armes faste bounde to hir bodie with a corde, and so in that state she remayned till hir life passed from hir.

Beatrice death by

K. Edward in reuenge of his daughters death moued war against the two brethren, Iulak and Godfrey, & in battail finally vāquished them, but was slain in the same battail himself. Thus haue the Scotish chronicles recorded of these matters as an induction to the warres which followed betwixt the Scots and Danes as confederates against K. Adelstan: but for the truth therof we leaue to the readers own iudgement. For in oure englishe writers we finde no suche matter, but that a daughter of King Edward named Eadgitha or Editha, after hir fathers decease was by hir brother King Athelstane, about the firste yeare of his reigne giuen in mariage (as before ye haue heard vnto the forsayde Sithrike king of Northumberland, that was descended of the Danishe blood, who for the loue of the young Ladie, renounced his Heathenishe religion, and became a christian, but shortly after, forsakyng bothe hys wyfe, and the christian fay the hee ſet vppe againe the worſhipping of Idols, and within a while after, as an Apoſtata, miſerably ended his life. Whereupon, the yong Lady, hir virginitie being preſerued, and hir body vndefyled (as they write) paſſed the reſidue of hir dayes at Polleſworth in Warwikeſhire, ſpendyng hir time as the ſame writers affirme, in faſting, watching, praying, and doing of almes deedes, and ſo at length departed out of this world.

Thus our writers differ from the Scottiſh hiſtory, both in name & maner of end as concerning that daughter of K. Edwarde, that was coupled in marriage with Sithrike. But now to returne where we left: After that Kyng Adelſtane hadde ſubdued them of Northumberland, hee was aduertiſed, that not onely Conſtantine Kyng of Scottes, but alſo Hudbale or Howell Kyng of Wales, weute about a priuie conſpiracy agaynſt him. Heereupon with all conuenient ſpeede aſſembling his power, he wente againſt them, and with like good fortune ſubdued them bothe, and alſo Viner or Wulferth K. of North wales, ſo that they were conſtreyned to ſubmit themſelues vnto him, who ſhortly after moued with pitie in conſidering their ſuddayne fall, reſtored them all three to their former eſtates, but ſo as they ſhould acknowledge themſelues to gouerne vnder hym, pronouncing with all this notable ſaying, that more honorable it was to make a King, than to be a King. Ye muſt vnderſtand, that as it appeareth by the Scottiſh Chronicles, the Scottiſhmē in time of the warres that the Danes made to ẏ Engliſh nation, gote a parte of Cumberland and other the North countreys into their poſſeſſion, and ſo by reaſon of their neere adioyning to the confines of the Engliſhe Kings, there chaunced occaſions of warre betwixte them, as well in the days of Kyng Edward, as of this Adelſtane hys ſonne, although indeede the Danes held the more part of the North countreys, till that this Adelſtane conquered the ſame out of their hands, and ioyned it vnto other of his dominions, conſtreyning as well the Danes (of whom the more part of the inhabitāts then conſiſted) as alſo the Engliſhmen, to obey him as their King and gouernour.

Godfrey as is ſaide, being fled to the Scots, did ſo much there by earneſt ſute made to Kyng Conſtantine, that hee gote a power of men, and entring with the ſame into Northumberlande, beſieged the Citie of Dureſme, ſoliciting the Citizens to receyue him, whiche they woulde gladly haue done, if they had not perceyued how he was not of power able to reſiſt the puiſſance of Kyng Adelſtane: and therefore doubting to be puniſhed for their offences if they reuolted, they kept the enimies out.

King Adelſtane beeyng ſore moued againſte the King of Scottes, that thus ayded his enimies, rayſed an army, and wente Northwarde, purpoſing to reuenge that iniurie. At his comming into Yorkſhire, hee turned out of the way, Ran. Higd. to viſit the place where Saint Johu of Beuerley was buryed, and ther offered his knife, promiſing that if he returned with victory, he would redeme the ſame with a worthy price: and ſo proceeded forth on his iourney, & entring Scotland, waſted Sim. Dun. the countrey by land vnto Dunfoader, and Werternore, and his Nauie by Sea deſtroyed the coaſtes alongſt the ſhore, euen to Catneſſe, and ſo he brought the King of Scottes and other hys enimies vnto ſubiection at his pleaſure, conſtreyning the ſame King of Scottes to deliuer vnto him his ſonne in hoſtage. It is ſayde, that beyng in his iourney neere vnto the Towne of Dunbarre, he prayed vnto God, that at the inſtance of Saint Johu of Beuerley, it would pleaſe him to graunt, ẏ he might ſhew ſome open token, whereby it ſhould appeare to all them that then lyued, & ſhould hereafter ſucceede, that the Scottes ought to be ſubiect vnto ẏ kings of Englād. And therewith the King with his ſworde ſmote vpō a great ſtone ſtanding neere to the Caſtel of Dunbarre, & with the ſtroke, there appeared a clift in the ſame ſtone to the length of an elne, whiche remayned to be ſhewed as a witneſſe of ẏ thing many yeres after. At his comming backe to Beuerley, hee redeemed his knife with a large price, as before hee had promiſed. After this, was Edwin the Kings brother accuſed of ſome conſpiracie by him begun againſt the K. wherupō he was baniſhed the land, and ſent out in an old rotten veſſell without rower or Marriner, onely accompanied with one Eſquire, ſo that beeing launched forth from the ſhore, through very diſpaire Edwin lept into the Sea, and drowned himſelfe, but the Eſquire that was with him recouered his body, and broughte it to land at Withland beſides Canterbury. But Iames Maier in the annales of Flanders ſayth, that hee was drowned by fortune of the Seas, beeyng in a ſmall veſſell, and caſt vp into a creeke on the coaſt of Picardie, was founde by Adolph Earle of Bullcigne that was his couſin germayne, and honorably buryed by the ſame Adolph in the Churche of Bertine: for the whyche deede of pietie and dutie of mindfull conſanguinitie, the Kyng of Englande both hartily thanked Earle Adolph, and beſtowed greate giftes vppon the Church where his brother was thus buryed. For verily King Adelſtane after his diſpleaſure was aſſuaged, and hearing of this miſerable ende of his brother, ſore repented hymſelfe of his rigour ſo extended towardes him, in ſo muche that he coulde neuer abide the man that had giuen the information againſt him, which was his cupbearer, ſo that one time as the ſaide cupbearer ſerued him at the Table, and came towardes him with a cuppe of wine, one of his feete chaunced to ſlide, but hee recouered himſelfe with the help of the other foote, ſaying, one brother yet hathe holpe and ſuccoured the other: whiche wordes coſt him hys life: for the King remembring that by his accuſation he had loſt his brother that might haue bin an ayd to him, cauſeth his ſaid cupbearer ſtraight wayes to be put to death.

VVil. Malm. In this meane while, Aulafe the ſonne of Sithericke, late King of Northumberland (who is alſo named by Writers to be King of the Iriſhmen, and of many Ilands) aſſembled a great power of Danes, Iriſhmē, Scottes, and other people of the out Iles, and embarqued them in. 615. Shippes, and Crayers, with the whiche he arriued in the mouthe of Humber, and there comming on lande, beganne to inuade the countrey. 937 Thys Aulafe had married the daughter of Conſtantine Kyng of Scottes, by whoſe procurement notwithſtanding his late ſubmiſſion, Aulafe toke in hand this iourney. King Adelſtane aduertiſed of his enimies arriuall, gathered his people, and with all conuenient ſpeede haſted towards them, and approching neere vnto them, pight downe his fielde at a place called by ſome Brimeſbury, by other Brimeſford, and alſo Brunanburght, and by the Scottiſh Writers Browningfielde. When knowledge hereof was had in the enimies camp, Aulafe enterpriſed a marueilous exployte, for taking with him an harpe, hee came into the Engliſhe campe, offering himſelfe, diſguiſed as a minſtrell, to ſhewe ſome parte of his cunning in muſicke vpon his inſtrument: and ſo being ſuffered to paſſe from Tente to Tente, and admitted alſo to play afore the Kyng, ſurueyghed ỳ whole ſtate and order of the army. This done, he returned, meaning by a cammiſado to ſet vpō ỳ kings Tente. But one that had ſerued as a Souldiour ſometime vnder Aulafe, chaunced by markyng his demeanor, to knowe him, and after he was gone, vttered to the King what he knewe. The Kyng ſemed to be diſpleaſed, in that he had not told him ſo much before Aulafes departure: but in excuſing himſelfe, the Souldiour ſayde, yee muſt remember if it like your grace, that the ſame fayth which I haue giuen vnto you, I ſometime ought vnto Aulafe, therefore if I ſhoulde haue betrayed hym now, you might wel ſtand in doubt leaſt I ſhuld hereafter do the like to you: but if you wil follow myne aduice, remoue your Tente, leaſt happily he aſſayle you vnwares. The Kyng did ſo, and as it chaunced in the nyght following, commeth Aulafe to aſſayle the Engliſh Camp, and by fortune comming to the place where the Kings Tent before ſtode, he found a Biſhoppe lodged, which with his company was come the ſame day to the army, and hadde pight vp his Tent in that place from whence the King was remoued: and ſo was the ſame Biſhoppe, and moſt parte of his men there ſlaine. Which ſlaughter executed, Aulafe paſſed forward, and came to the Kings Tẽt, who in this mean time, by reaſon of the Alarme raiſed, was gote vp, and taking to him his ſword in that ſuddayne fright, by chance it fell out of the ſcabbard, ſo that he could not finde it, but calling to God and S. Adelme, as ſaith Polichron. his ſword was reſtored to the ſcabbard againe. The King comforted with that miracle, boldly preaſſed forth vpon his enimies, and ſo valiauntly reſiſted them, that in the ende he put them to flight, and chaſed them all that morning and day following, ſo that hee ſlewe of them an huge number. Some haue written, that Conſtantine Kyng of Scottes was ſlayne at this ouerthrowe, and fiue other ſmall Kyngs or Rulers, with. 12. Dukes, and welneere all the army of thoſe ſtraunge nations whiche Aulafe had gathered togither. But the Scottiſh Chronicles affirme, that Conſtantine was not there himſelf, but ſent his ſon Malcolme, which yet eſcaped ſore hurt and wounded from this battell, as in the ſame Chronicles yee may ſee more at large.

When Kyng Adelſtane had thus banquiſhed his enimies in the North parties of England, he went againſt them of Northwales, whoſe Rulers and Princes he cauſed to come before him at Hereford, and there handled them in ſuche ſorte, that they couenaunted with him to pay yeerely in name of a Tribute twentie pounde of golde, three hundred pounde of ſiluer, and fiue and twentie hundred head of Neate, with Hawkes and Houndes to a certayne number. After this, hee ſubdued alſo the Corniſhmen: and whereas till thoſe dayes they inhabited the Citie of Exeter, mingled amongſt the Engliſhmen, ſo that the one nation was as ſtrong within that Citie, as the other, he ridde them quite out of the ſame, and repaired the walles, and fortified them with ditches and turrets as the maner then was, and ſo remoued the Corniſhmen further into the Weſt partes of the countrey, that hee made Tamer water to be the confines betweene the Engliſhmen and them. 940 Finally, this noble Prince King Adelſtane departed out of this world, the ſixe and twẽty day of Octobre, after he hadde raigned the tearme of ſixteene yeres. His body was buried at Malmeſbury. He was of ſtature ſuch, as exceeded not the common ſort of mẽ, and ſtowped ſomewhat, yellow heared, for his valiancie ioyned with curteſey beloued of al men, yet ſharp againſt Rebels, & of inuincible conſtancie: his greate deuotion toward ỳ Church appeared in ỳ building, adorning and endowing of Monaſteries and Abbeyes. He builte one at Wilton within the dioceſſe of Saleſbury, Simon D. The deceſ K. Athelſ. The deſcription of K. Athelſtane.

Salisbury, and an other at Michelney in Somersetshire. But besides these foundations, there were few famous Monasteries within this land, but that hee adorned the same eyther with some new peece of buylding, Jewels, bookes, or portion of lands. He had in exceeding fauour Wolstane Archbishop of Yorke that lived in his dayes, for whose sake he greatly enriched that Bishopricke. His fame spred ouer all the parties of Europa, so that sundry Princes thought themselues happy if they might haue his friendship, eyther by affinitie or otherwise: by meanes whereof, he bestowed his sisters so highly in marriage as before ye haue heard. Hee receyued many noble and riche presents from diuers Princes, as from Hugh K. of Fraunce Horles, and sundry riche Jewels, with certaine reliques: as Constantines sworde, in the hilte whereof was set one of the nayles wherewith Christ was fastned to ỳ Crosse. The Speare of Charles the great, which was thought to be the same with whiche the side of our Sauiour was pearced. The banner of Saint Maurice, with a part of the holy Crosse, and likewise a part of the thorned Crowne: yet Mandeuille sawe the one halfe of this Crowne in Fraunce, and the other at Constantinople, almost. 400. yeares after this time, as he writeth.

Of these Jewels, K. Adelstane gaue parte to the Abbey of S. Swithune at Winchester, and part to the Abbey of Malmesbury. Moreouer, the King of Norway sent vnto him a goodly ship of fine workmanshippe, with sterne gilt and purple sayles, furnished rounde about the decke within-furth, with a rowe of gilte pauises.

In the dayes of this Adelstane, raigned that worthy Guy Earle of Warwike, who as sonie writers haue recorded, fought with a mighty Giaunt of the Danes in a singular combate, and vanquished him.

Edmonde.

AFter that Adelstane was departed this lyfe, without leauing issue behind to succeede hym in the kingdome, his brother Edmond, sonne of Edward the elder, borne of his last wife Edgiue, toke vpon him the gouernment of this land, and beganne his raigne in the yere of our Lord. 940. which was in the fifth yere of the Emperour Otho the first, in the .x. of Lewis, surnamed transmarinus, K. of France, and about the .38. yeare of Costantine ỳ third K. of Scotland. The Danes of Northumberlād rebelled against this Edmod, and ordeyned Aulafe to bee their K. whome they had called out of Ireland. Some write, that thys Aulafe which now in the beginning of king Edmonds raigne, came into Northumberland, was King of Norwey, and hauing a greate power of men with him, hee marched forthe towardes the South parties of this lande, in purpose to subdue the whole: but K. Edmonde rayled a mighty army, and encoūtred with his enimies at Leecster. But ere the matter came to the vttermost triall of Mars his iudgement, through the earnest sute of the Archbishop of Canterbury and Yorke Odo & Wolstan, a peace was concluded, so as Edmond should enioy all that part of the land whiche lieth from Watling streete South ward, and Aulafe shoulde enioy the other parte as it lieth from the same streete Nortl ward. Then Aulafe toke to wife the Lady Aldithа, daughter to Earle Ormus, by whose coūsell and assistance he had thus obteyned the vpper hande. But this Aulafe in the yere folowing, after he had destroyed the Church of Saint Balter, and brenned Tynningham, hee departed this life. Then the other Aulafe that was sonne to Kyng Sithricke, toke vppon hym to gouerne the Northumbers.

After this, in the yere. 942. King Edmond assembling an army, first subdued those Danes which had gote into their possessiō the Cities and Townes of Lincolne, Leecster, Derby, Stafford and Notingham, constreyning them to receyue the Christian fayth, and reduced all the countreis euen vnto Humber vnder his subiection. Thys done, Aulafe and Reignold the sonne of Gurmo, the which as you haue heard, subdued Yorke, for meane ỳ sooner to obteyn peace, offered to become Christians, and to submit themselues vnto him: wherevpon he receyued them to his peace. There be that write, that this Aulafe is not that Aulafe whiche was sonne to King Sithricke, but rather that the other was hee with whome Kyng Edmond made partition of the Realme: but they agree, that this seconde Aulafe was a Dane also, and being conuerted to the faith as well through constraint of the Kyngs puissance, as through the Preaching of the Gospell, was Baptised, Kyng Edmonde beeyng Godfather both to him, and to the forsayde Reignolde: to Aulafe at the fontstone, and to Reignolde at his confirmation at the Bishoppes handes. But their wicked natures coulde not rest in quiet, so that they brake bothe promise to GOD, and to theyr prince, and were therefore in the yeare nexte followyng dryuen bothe out of the countrey, and punished by perpetuall exile. And so K. Edmond adioyned Northumberlande without admitting any other immediate gouernor vnto his owne estate. Moreouer, he walled & spoiled whole Cumberland, bycause he could not reduce ỳ people of that countrey vnto due obeysance, and cõformable subiection. The two sonnes of Dunmaile K. of that prouince, hee apprehended, and caused their eyes to be put out. And herewith vpon consideration eyther of suche ayde as he had receiued of ỳ Scottes at that time, or some other friendly respect, he assigned the saide countrey of Cumberlande vnto Malcolme K. of Scottes, to hold the same by fealtie of him and his successors. The Scottishe Chronicles peruerting the tyme and order of the actes and doings of the Englishe kings whiche raigned about this season, affirme, that by couenauntes of peace concluded betwixte Malcolme King of Scotlande, and Adelstane King of England, it was agreed, that Cumberlande shoulde remayne to the Scottes, as in their Chronicles you may finde at full expressed. And again, that Indulfe who succeeded Malcolme in the Kingdome of Scotland, ayded K. Edmonde against Iulake whome ỳ same Chronicles name Iualassus, but the time which they attribute vnto the raignes of their Kings, will not allow the same to stand. For by accompt of their writers, King Malcolme began not his raigne till after the decesse of King Adelstane, who departed thys life in the yere. 940. And Malcolme succeed Cõstantine the third in the yere. 944. which was about the third yeare of Kyng Edmonds raigne, and after Malcolme that raigned. xv. yeares succeeded Indulfe in the yeare. 959. The like discordance preceedeth and followeth in their writers, as to the diligent Reader in conferring their Chronicles wt ours, it manifestly appeareth. We therefore (to satisfie the desirous to vnderstande & see the diuersitie of writers,) haue for the more part in their Chronicles left the same as we haue found it.

Leolin Kyng of South-Wales ayded K. Edmonde in this enterprise.

But now to the other doings of K. Edmond: it is recorded, that hee ordeyned diuerse good and wholesome lawes very profitable and necessary for the common wealth, which lawes with dyuerse other of like antiq[illegible] forgot and blotted out by rust of time, the consumer of thynges worthy of lõg remembrance, as sayth Polidore: but sithence his time they haue but recouered for the more part, and by master William Lambert turned into Latyne, were imprinted by John Day in the yeare. 1568. as before I haue sayde.

The lawes of K. Edmonde.

Fiue yeres and seuen monethes hath Si. Dun.

Finally, this Prince K. Edmond, after he had raigned fiue yeres and a halfe, he came to his end by great misfortune, for as some say, it chanced, that espying where one of his seruauntes was in daunger to bee slayne amongst his enimies that were about him with drawen swords, as he stepped in to haue holpen his seruante, he was slayne at a place called Pulcher Church, or as other haue Michelbourgh. Other say, that keeping a great feast at the aforesayde place on the day of Saint Augustine the English Apostle (which is the. 26. of May, and as that yeare came about, it fell on the tewsday) as hee was set at the table, he espyed where a common robber was placed neere vnto him, whome sometime he had banished the land, and now being returned without licence, he presumed to come into the kings presence, wherwith the King was so moued with high disdaine, that he suddaynely rose from the table, and flew vpon the Theefe, and catching him by the heare of the head, threwe him vnder his feete, wherewith the theefe hauing fast holde on the King, broughte him downe vppon him also, and with his knyfe stroke him into the belly in suche wise, that the Kings bowels fell out of his chest, and there presently dyed: the theefe was hewen in peeces, by the Kings seruauntes, but yet he slewe and hurt diuers before they coulde dispatch him. Thys chance was lamentable, namely to the Englishe people, whiche by the ouertimely deathe of theyr King, in whome appeared many euident tokens of great excellencie, lost the hope whiche they had conceiued of great wealth to encreate by his prudent and most princely gouernemente. His body was buried at Glastenbury where Dunstan was then Abbot. There be that write, that the death of King Edmonde was signified aforehande to Dunstane, who about the same time attendyng vppon the same Kyng, as hee remoued from one place to an other, chanced to accompany himselfe with a noble man, one Duke Elstane, and as they rode togither, beholde suddaynely Dunstane sawe in the way before hym where the Kings Musitions rode, the Deuill running and leaping amongst the same Musitions after a reioycing manner, whome after hee had beholde a good while, he said to the Duke, is it possible that you may see that whiche I do see, and the Duke answered he sawe nothing otherwise than hee ought to see. Then saide Dunstane, blesse youre eyes with the signe of the crosse, and trie whether you can see that I see. And when hee hadde done as Dunstane appoynted hym, hee sawe also the Fende in likenesse of a little short euill fauoured Ethyopian daunsing and leaping, whereby they gathered that some euill happe was towardes some of the company. But when they had crossed and blessed them, the foule Spirit vanished out of their sight. And after they had talked of this vision, and made an end of their talke touching the same, ỳ Duke required of Dunstane to interpret a dreame which he had of late in sleepe, and that was this: he thought that he ſawe in viſion the King with all his Nobles ſit in hys dining chamber at meate, and as they were therewith making merry togither, the K. chanced to fall into a dead ſleepe, and all the Noble men, and thoſe of his counſell that were aboute him were chaunged into Rowbuckes and Goates. Dunſtan quickly declared, that this dreame ſignified the Kings deathe, and the chaunging of the Nobles into dumb and inſenſible beaſtes, betokened, that the Princes and gouernours of the Realm ſhould decline from the way of truth, and wander as fooliſh beaſtes, without a guide to rule them. Alſo the nighte after this talke when the King was ſet to ſupper, Dunſtan ſawe the ſame ſpyte or ſome other walke vp and downe amongſt them that wayted on the table, & within three days after the K. was ſlayne, as before ye haue heard.

Hee was Crowned and anointed the 16. day of Auguſt by Odo the Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury at Kingſton vpon Thames. In the firſt yeare of his raigne, the Northumbers rebelled againſt him, wherevppon hee rayſed an army, inuaded their countrey, and ſubdued them by force. This done, he wente forwarde into Scotlande: but the Scots without ſhewing any reſiſtance, ſubmitted thẽſelues vnto him, and ſo both Scottes and Northũbers receyued an oth to bee true vnto him, whiche they obſerued but a ſmall while, for he was no ſoner returned into ỹ South partes, but that Aulaf which had bin chaſed out of the countrey by K. Edmond as before ye haue heard, returned into Northumberlande with a great nauie of Ships, and was ioyfully receyued of the inhabitants, and reſtored againe to ỹ kingdome, which he held by the ſpace of four yeres, and then by the accuſtomed diſloyaltie of the Northumbers, hee was by them expulſed, and then they ſet vp one Hyrke, or Heritius the ſonne of one Harrolde to raigne ouer them, who helde not ỹ eſtate any long time. He brente the Abbey of Rippon, whiche was kept againſt him. As he was returning homeward, an hoſt of enimies brake out of Yorke, and ſetting vpon the rereward of the kings army at a place called Eaſterforde, made great ſlaughter in the ſame. Wherefore the King in his rage, mente to haue begun a new ſpoyle and deſtruction, but the Northumbers humbled themſelues ſo vnto him, that putting away their foreſaide K. King Edrede put the Archbiſhop of Yorke in cloſe priſon, bycauſe of often complaynte exhibited againſt him, as he which had commaunded many Townelmen of Theadford to bee put to death, in reuenge of the Abbot Aldelme, by the vniuſtly ſlayne and murthered. After this, when Edredus had appeaſed all ciuill tumultes & diſſentions within his land, he applyed himſelfe to the aduancing of Religion, wholly following the mind of Dunſtane, by whoſe exhortation he ſuffered patiently many tormentes of the body, and exerciſed himſelfe in prayer and other deuoute ſtudies. Finally, after he had raigned nine yeares and a halfe, he departed this life to the great greeuance of menne, and reioycing of Angels, as it is writtẽ, and was buried at Wincheſter in the Cathedral Church there. Here is to be noted, that the foreſaide Edrede when hee came firſte to the Crowne, vpon a ſingular and moſt eſpeciall fauour whiche hee bare towards Dunſtan the Abbot of Glaſtenbury, he committed to him the cheefeſt part of all the threaſure, as charters of landes with other monuments, and ſuch antient princely iewels as belonged to the former Kings, with other ſuch as he gote of his owne, willing hym to lay the ſame in ſafekeeping within his Monaſterie of Glaſtẽbury. Afterward when King Edred perceyued himſelfe to be in daunger of deathe by force of that ſickneſſe which in deede made an end of his life, he ſent into all parties to ſuch as had any of his treaſure in keeping, to bring the ſame vnto him with all ſpeede, that hee might diſpoſe thereof before his departure out of this life, as hee ſhould ſee cauſe. Dunſtane toke ſuche thynges as he had vnder his handes, and haſted forwarde to deliuer the ſame vnto the King, and to viſit hym in that tyme of hys ſickneſſe according to hys duetie: but as he was vpõ ẏ way, a voice ſpake to him frõ Heauen, ſaying behold K. Edred is now departed in peace. At the hearing of this voyce, the Horſe whereon Dunſtane rode fell downe & died, being not able to abide the preſence of the Angell that thus ſpake to Dunſtane. And when he came to the Court, he vnderſtoode that the King dyed the ſame houre in whiche it was tolde him by the Angell, as before ye haue heard.

Edwin.

After the deceſſe of Edredus, his Nephewe Edwin the eldeſt ſonne of Kyng Edmõd was made King of England, and began his raigne ouer the ſame in the yeare of our L. 955. and in the. 20. yeare of the Emperour Otho the firſte, in the. 28. and laſt yeare of the raigne of Lewis King of France, and about the twelfth yere of Malcolme the firſt of that name King of Scotland. He was ſacred at Kingſton vppon Thames by Odo the Archbiſhop of Canterbury. The ſame day of his Coronation, as the Lordes were ſet in counſell about weighty matters touching the gouernemente of the Realme, hee roſe from the place, gate him into a chamber with one of his neere kinſwomen, and there had to do with hir without reſpect or any regard had to his royall eſtate and princely dignitie. Dunſtane lately beforenamed Abbot of Glaſtenbury, did not onely without feare of diſpleaſure reprowue the king for ſuch ſhamefull abuſing of his body, but alſo cauſed the Archbiſhop of Canterbury to conſtreyne him to forgoe ẏ company of that women whom vnlawfully hee kept as his wife. There be that write, that there were two women both mother and daughter, whome K. Edwin kept as concubines: for the mother beeing of noble parentage, ſought to ſatiſfie the Kings luſt, in hope that eyther hee woulde take hir, or hir daughter to wife. And therefore perceyuing that Dunſtane was ſore againſt ſuche wanton paſtime as the King vſed in their company, ſo wrought, that Dũſtan was thrꝰgh hir earneſt trauel baniſhed the land. And this is alſo reported, that when he ſhould departe the Realme, the Deuill was heard in the Weſt end of the Church, taking vp a great laughter after his roring manner, as though he ſhould ſhew himſelfe glad and ioyfull of Dunſtanes goyng into exile. But Dunſtane perceyuing his behauiour, ſpake to him, and ſayd: well thou aduerſarie, do not ſo greatly reioyce at the matter, for thou doeſt not now ſo much reioyce at my departure, but by Gods grace thou ſhalt be as ſorowfull for my returne. Thus was Dunſtane baniſhed by K. Edwine, ſo that he was compelled to paſſe ouer into Flaunders, where hee remayned for a tyme within a Monaſterie at Gaunt, finding muche friendſhippe at the handes of the gouernoure of that countrey. wreake his wrath, the King spoyled many Religious houses of their goodes, and drone out the Monkes, placing secular Priests in their rowmes, as namely at Malmesbury, where yet the house was not empayred, but rather enriched in landes and ornamentes by the kings liberalitie and the industrious meanes of the same Priestes whyche toke vp the bones of Saint Elderine, and put the same in a shrine. At length, the inhabitantes of ỹ middle parte of England, euen from Humber to Thames rebelled againste him, and electe hys brother Edgar to haue the gouernemente ouer them, wherewith King Edwine toke such griefe for that he saw no meane at hand how to remedy the matter, that shortly after when he had raigned somewhat more than four yeres, he departed this life. His body was buried at Winchester in the new Abbey there.

Edgar.

EDgar the seconde son of Edmonde late Kyng of Englande, after the decease of hys elder brother ỹ foresayd Edwin, beganne hys raigne ouer this Realme of England in the yere of our Lord God. 959. in the. 22. yeare of the Emperour Otho the first, in the fourth yere of the raigne of Lotharius K. of France. 510. almost ended after the cõming of the Saxons. 124. after the arriuall of the Danes, and in the last yeare of Malcolme K. of Scotlãd. He was Crowned and sacred at Bath, or as some say, at Kingstõ vpõ Thames, by Dodo the Archbishop of Canterbury, being as then not past. 16. yeres of age, when hee was thus admitted K. Hee was no lesse endowed with commendable giftes of mind, than with strength and force of body. He was a great fauorer of Monks, and especially hee had Dunstane in high estimation. Aboue all things in this world he regarded peace, and studyed dayly howe to preserue the same, to the commoditie and aduancement of his subiectes. And when he had established thynges in good quiet, and set an order in matters as seemed to him best for the peaceable gouernement of hys subiectes, he prepared a great nauie of Shippes, and deuiding them in three partes, hee appoynted euery part to a quarter of the Realm, to waste about the coast, that no forayne enimie shoulde approch the lãd, but that they might bee encountred and put backe before they could take land. And euery yeare after Easter, he vsed to giue order, that his Shipps shoulde assemble togither in theyr due places. And then would he with the East nauie, saile to the West parties of his Realme, & sending those Shipps backe, he would with the West nauie sayle into the North partes, and with the North nauie came backe againe into the East. This custome he vsed, that hee might scoure the Seas of all Pirates and Theeues. In the Winter season and spring time, he would ride through the prouinces of his Realme, searching out howe the Iudges and greate Lordes demeaned themselues in the administration of Iustice, sharply punishing those that were found faulty of extortion, or had done otherwise in any poynte than dutie required. In all things he vsed suche politike discretion, that neither was he put in daunger by treason of his subiectes, nor molested by forayne enimies. He caused diuers Kings to binde themselues by oth, to bee true and faithfull vnto him, as Kinadius or rather Indulf king of Scotland, Malcolme K. of Cumberland, Malcutius an Archpirate as we may call him a Maister Rouer, and also all the Kings of the Welchmen, as Duffuall, Gyffrith, Huuall, Jacob, and Iuthill, all which came to his court, and by their solemne othes receyued, sweare to bee at his commandement: and further for more manifest testimonie thereof, he hauing them with him at Chester, caused them to enter into a Barge vpon the water of Dee, and placing himselfe in the fore part of the Barge at the helme, caused those eight high Princes to rowe the Barge vp and downe ỹ water, shewing therby his princely prerogatiue and royall magnificence, in that he might vse the seruice of so many kings that were his subiectes. And therevpon he said (as hath bin reported) that then might his successors accompte themselues kings of England, when they enioyed suche prerogatiue of high & supreme honor. The fame of this noble Prince was spredde ouer al, as well on this side the Sea, as beyõd, in so much that great resort of straungers chanced in his dayes, whyche came euer into this land to seruc him, & to see the state of his Court, as Saxons & other, yea & also Danes, whyche became very familiar with hym. He fauored in deede the Danes (as hath bin sayd) more than stood with ỹ cõmoditie of his subiectes, for vneth was anye streete in Englande, but Danes had their dwelling in ỹ same amongst ỹ Englishmẽ, wherby came great harme: for wher as the Danes by nature were great drinkers, the Englishmen by cõtinuall conuersation with thẽ learned the same vice. Dunſtane was made Biſhoppe of Worceter, & had alſo the adminiſtration of the See of Lõdon committed vnto him. He was in ſuch fauor with ỹ K. that hee ruled moſt things at his pleaſure. Ethelwold which beeyng firſte a Monke of Glaſtenbury, and after Abbot of Abington, was likewiſe made Biſhop of Wincheſter, and might doe very much with the K. Alſo Oſwalde which had bin a Monke in the Abbey of Flory in Fraunce, & after was made Biſhop of Worceter, and from thence remoued to the See of Yorke, was highly in fauour with this King, ſo that by theſe three Prelates he was moſt counſelled. Iuſtice in hys dayes was ſtraightly obſerued, for although hee were courteous and gentle towards his friendes, yet was he ſharp and hard to offenders, ſo that no perſon of what eſtate or degree ſo euer he was, eſcaped worthy puniſhment if he did tranſgreſſe the lawes and ordinances of the Realme. Ther was no priuy theefe nor common robber that durſt lay hands of other mens goods but that he might looke to make amendes with loſſe of his lyfe if hee were knowen to be giltie. For howe myghte men that did offend, thinke to eſcape his hands, whych deuiſeth wayes howe to ridde the countrey of all wilde rauening beaſtes, that liued vppon ſucking the bloud of others? For as it is ſaid, he appointed Iudwcall or Ludweal K. of Wales, to preſente him with three hundred Woulfes yerely in name of a tribute, but after three yeares ſpace, there was not a Wolfe to be found, and ſo that tribute ceaſſed in the fourth yere after it began to be payed.

In this meane time, Alfred the wife of Kyng Edgare, as ſome ſaye, or rather as other write, his concubine, dyed, of whome he had begote a ſon named Edward. The death of this woman occaſioned the K. to committe an heynous offence. For albeit the ſame time, the fame wẽt. that Porgerius Duke of Cornewal, or rather Deuonſhire had a daughter named Alfred, a Damoſell of excellent beautie, whome Edgar minding to haue in marriage, appointed one of his noble men called Earle Ethelwolde, to goe with al ſpeede into Cornewall or Deuonſhire, to ſee if the yong Ladyes beautie aunſwered the report that wente of hir, then hee to breake the matter to hir father in his behalfe. Ethelwold being a yong iolly Gentleman, tooke his iourney into Cornwall, & comming to ỹ Duke, was well receiued, & had a ſight of his daughter, ỽ whoſe beautie he was ſtraight rauiſhed ſo farre in loue, that not regarding the kings pleaſure which had ſent him thither, he begã to purchaſe the good will of both father & daughter for himſelfe, and did ſo much, that he obteyned the ſame indeede. Hereupon returning to the K. hee enformed him that the Damoſell was not of ſuch beautie and comely perſonage as mighte bee thought worthy to matche in marriage with hys Maieſtie. And ſhortly after perceyuing the kyngs mind by his wrongfull miſreport to be turned, & nothing bent that way, he began to ſue to hym ỹ hee mighte with his fauour marry the ſame Damoſell: which the K. graunted, as one that cared not for hir, becauſe of the credite whiche he gaue to Ethelwolds wordes. And ſo by this meanes Ethelwold obteined Alfrid in marriage, which was to his owne deſtruction, as the caſe fell out. For whẽ the fame of hir paſſing beautie did ſpred ouer all ỹ Realme now that ſhe was married & came more abroade in ſight of the people, the K. chanced to heare therof, and deſirous to ſee hir, deuiſed vnder colour of hunting to come vnto the houſe of Ethelwolde, and ſo did: Where he had no ſoner ſet his eye vpon hir, but he was ſo farre wrapped in ỹ chaine of burning concupiſcence, that to obteine his purpoſe, he ſhortly after contriued Ethelwolds death, & married his wife. Some ſay, that the woman kindled the brand of purpoſe: for where it was knowen, that the K. would ſee hir. Ethelwold willed hir in no wiſe to trimme vp hir ſelfe, but rather to diſfigure hir in foule garmẽts, & ſome euill fauored attire, that hir natiue beautie ſhould not appeare, but ſhee perceiuing howe the matter went, of ſpight ſet forthe hir ſelfe to ỹ vttermoſt, ſo that ỹ K. vpon the firſt ſight of hir became ſo farre enamored of hir beautie, that taking hir huſbande forthe with him on hunting into a foreſt or wood called then Werlewood, and after Horewood, not ſhewing that hee meante hym any hurt, till at length hee had gote him within ỹ thicke of the wode, where hee ſuddaynely ſtroke him through with his darte, and as his baſtarde ſon came to ỹ place, the K. aſked hym how he liked ỹ maner of hunting, whereunto he anſwered, very wel if it like your grace, for ỹ that liketh you ought not to diſpleaſe me: ỽ which anſwer ỹ K. was ſo pacified, ỹ he indeuored by pretendyng his fauor towards the ſonne to alleuiate the tyrannicall murder of the father. the Counteſſe Alfred, & of hir begat two ſons, Edmond which died yōg, & Ethelored or Egelthred.

Beſides this cruell acte wrought by king Edgar for the ſatiſfying of his fleſhly luſt, hee alſo played another part greatly to the ſtayne of hys honour, moued alſo by wanton loue, wyth a yong Damſel named Wilfrid, for after ỳ ſhe had (to auoyde the daunger of him) eyther profeſſed hir ſelfe a Nunne, or elſe for a colour (as the moſt part of wryters agree) got hir ſelfe into a Nunrie, and clad hir in Nunnes weede, he toke hir forth of hir Cloyſter, and lay by hir ſundrie tymes, and begat on hir a daughter named Edith, who comming to conuenient age, was made a Nunne.

A thirde example of his incontinencie, is written by Authours, and that is this. It chaunced on a time that he lodged one night at Andauer, and hauing a minde to a Lordes daughter there, he commaunded that ſhe ſhould be brought to his bed, but the mother of the Gentlewoman woulde not that hir daughter ſhoulde be defloured: and therefore in the darke of the night, brought one of hir mayd ſeruants, and layde hir in the kings bed, ſhe being both fayre, proper and pleaſant. In the morning when the day beganne to appeare, ſhee made haſte to ariſe: and being aſked of the king why ſhe ſo haſted, that I may goe to my dayes worke (if it pleaſe your grace) quoth ſhe. Herewith ſhe being ſtayed by the king, as it were againſt hir will, ſhee fell downe on hir knees, and requyred of him that ſhe might be made free, in guerdon of hir nights worke. For (ſayth ſhe) it is not for your honour, that the woman whiche hath taſted the pleaſure of the kings bodie ſhould any more ſuffer ſeruitude vnder the rule and appoyntment of a ſharpe and rough miſtres.

The King then being moued in his ſpirites, laughed at the matter, though not from the heart, (as he that toke great indignation at the doings of the Ducheſſe) and pitied the caſe of the poore wenche. But yet in fine (turning the matter to a bourd) he pardoned all the parties, and aduaunced the wenche to high honour, farre aboue thoſe that had rule of hir afore: ſo that ſhee ruled them (willed they nilled they) for he vſed hir as his paramour, till time ỳ he maryed the foreſaid Alfrede.

For theſe youthfull partes, and namely for the rauiſhing of Wilfrida (which though ſhe were no Nunne) yet the offence ſeemed right haynous, for that he ſhoulde once touche any woman ſhadowed vnder that habite, hee greatly diſpleaſed Dunſtan, ſo that by him hee was put to hys vij. yeares penance, and kept from the crowne till the. xij. yeare of his raigne or more. For ſome write that hee was not crowned nor annoynted king, till the. xxx. yeare of his age, which ſhoulde be about the. xiij. or. xiiij. yeare of his raigne, by that account, ſithe hee entred into the rule of the kingdome about the. xvj. yeare of his age.

In deede one Authour witneſſeth, that he was ſacred at Bathe on a Whitſunday, the. xiij. yeare of his raigne, and that by Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterburie, and Oſwolde Archbiſhop of Yorke. But ſome which ſuppoſe that he was ſacred king immediately vpon the death of Edzidus, affyrme that he was crowned and annoynted by the Archbiſhop Odo, Dunſtan as then remayning in exile, from whence he was immediately reuoked by Edgar, and firſt made Biſhop of Worceter (as hath beene ſayde) and after the deceaſſe of Odo was aduaunced to be Archbiſhop of Canterburie. But by ſome writers it appeareth, that Dunſtan was reuoked out of exile immediately vpon the partition of the Realme betwixte Edwyn and Edgar, which chaunced in the yeare. 957. by the rebellion of the people of Mercia, and others (as before ye haue heard.) And that in the yeare following the Archbiſhop Odo died, After whome ſucceeded Alfin biſhop of Wincheſter, the whiche alſo died the ſame yeare that K. Edwin deceaſed, as he went to fetch his Pal from Rome, and then Brightelme Biſhop of Dorcheſter was elected Archbiſhop. But becauſe he was not ſufficient to diſcharge ſo great an office, by king Edgars commaundement hee was conſtrayned to giue place to Dunſtan.

Toward the latter end of king Edgars dayes, the Welchmen moued ſome rebellion againſte him. Wherevpon he aſſembled an armie, and entring the Countrey of Glamorgan, did muche hurt in the ſame, chaſtiſing the inhabitants right ſharpely for theyr rebellious attempts.

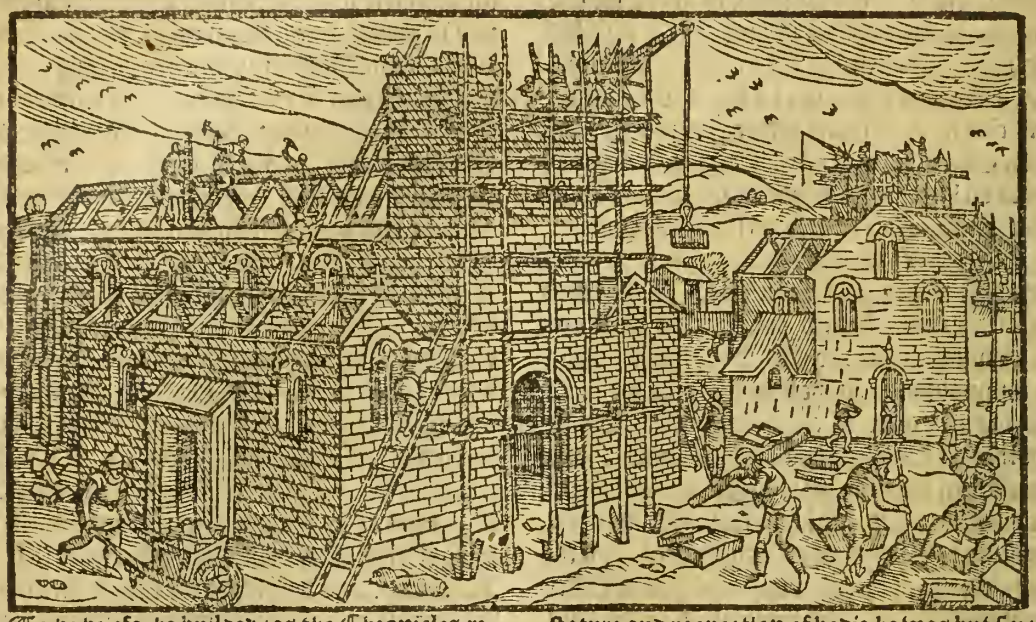
Amongſt other ſpoyles taken in thoſe parties at that time by the men of warre, the Bell of S. Ellutus was taken away, and hanged aboute a horſes necke, and (as hath beene reported) in the after noone, it chaunced that king Edgar layde him downe to reſt, wherevpon in ſleepe there appeared one vnto him, and ſmote him on the breaſt with a Speare. By reaſon of which viſion hee cauſed all things that had beene taken away, to be reſtored againe. But within. ix. dayes after the king dyed.



Whether any ſuch thing chaunced, or that he had any ſuch viſion, it forceth not. But truth it is that in the. xxxvij. yeare of his age, after hee had raigned. xvj. yeares and two Monethes he departed this life, the. viij. daye of July, and was buried at Glaſtenburie.

VVil. Malm. H. Hunt. King Edgar departed this life.

This Edgar is highly renowmed of writers for ſuch princely qualities as appeared in him, but chiefly for that hee was ſo beneficiall to the Church, namely to Monkes, the aduauncement of whom he greatly ſought, both in buylding Abbayes newe from the grounde, in reparing thoſe that were decayed: alſo by enriching them wyth great reuenues, and in conuerting Collegiate Churches into Monasteries, remouing secular Priests, and bringing in Monks in their places. There passed no one yeare of his raigne, wherein he founded not one Abbay or other. The Abbay of Glastenburie which his father had begon he finished. The Abbay of Abingdon also he accomplished and set in good order. The Abbayes of Peterborough and Thorney hee established. The Nunrie of Wilton he founded & richly endowed, where his daughter Editha was professed, and at length became Abbatesse there.

To be briefe, he builded (as the Chronicles recorde) to the number of. xl. Abbayes and Monasteries, in some of which he placed Monks, and in some Nunnes. By his example in those his dayes, other noble men, as well Prelates as of the Laitie, did begin the foundation of sundrie Abbays and Monasteries: as Adelwolde Bishop of Wincheſter buylded the Abbay of Ely, and as some say Peterbourgh, & Thorney, though they were established by the king (as before is mentioned.) Also Earle Aylewin at the exhortation of the same Bishop Adelwold, builded the Abbay of Ramsey, though some attribute the doing thereof vnto Odwold the Archbishop of Yorke, and some to king Edward the elder. But to conclude, the religious orders of Monkes & Nunnes in these dayes flozished, & the state of secular Priests was smally regarded, insomuch that they were constrayned to auoyd out of diuerse Colledges, and leaue the same vnto Monks, as at Worceter and Wincheſter, where in the new Monasterie, bycause the priests liued not in such sort as was thē thought requisite, the prebends were taken from them and giuen to vicars. But when the vicars were thought to vse themselues no better, but rather worse thā the other before thē, they were likewise put out, & Monkes placed in their roomes by authoritie of Pope Iohn the. xiij. And this reformation, or rather deformatiō was vsed by K. Edgar in many other places of the realm. He was (as appeareth by writers) namely in his beginning, cruel against his own people, and wanton in lusting after yong women (as you haue heard before.) Of stature and proportion of bodie he was but smal & low, but yet had nature enclosed within so little a personage such strength, that he durst encounter & combat with him that was thought most strong, only doubting this, least he which should haue to do with him should stand in feare of him. And as it chanced at a great feast, where ofentymes men vse their tongues more liberally than needeth,) the king of Scottes Kinadius cast out certaine wordes in this maner: It may (sayeth he) seeme a maruel that so many Countreys and prouinces should bee subiect to suche a little silly bodie as Edgar is. These wordes being borne away by a iesster or Minstrell, and afterwardes vttered to Edgar with greate reproche, hee dissembled the matter for a tyme, although hee kept the remembraunce thereof inclosed within his breast: and vpon occasion, at length he faigned to goe on hunting, taking the king of Scots forth with him: and hauing caused one of his seruaunts to conuey two swordes into a place within the forrest by him appointed in secrete wise, of purpose he withdrew from the residue of his companie, & there accompanied onely with the Scottish king, came to the place where the swordes were layde: And there taking the one of them, deliuered the other to the Scottish king, willing him now to assay his strength, that they might shew by proufe whether of them ought to be subiect to the other: & start not away but trie it with me (saith he) for it is a shame for a king to be ful of brags at bankets and not to be ready to fight when triall should be made abrode. The Scottish king herewith being astonied aſtonied and marueilouſly abaſhed, fell downe at his feete, and with much humilitie confeſſed hys fault, & deſired pardō for the ſame, which vpō ſuch his humble ſubmiſſion K. Edgar eaſily granted.

This noble prince had two wiues, Egelfrida, or Elfrida, ſurnamed the white, the daughter of a mightie duke named Ordmer, by whome he had iſſue a ſonne named Edward that ſucceeded him. His ſeconde wife hight Alfreda the daughter of Ogar duke of Deuon. or Cornewall (as ſome haue) by whom he had iſſue Edmōd that died before his father, and Egelthred which afterwardes was king. Alſo he had iſſue a daughter named Editha, begotten baſe of his concubine Wilfrid (as before ye haue heard.) The ſtate of the realme in king Edgars dayes was in good poynt: for both the earth gaue hir encreaſe very plēteouſly: the Elaments ſhewed themſelues very fauourable, according to the courſe of times: peace was maintayned and no inuaſion by forraine enimies attempted. For Edgar had not onely all the whole Ile of Britain in ſubiection, but alſo was ruler & ſouerain Lorde ouer all the kings of the out Iles that lie within the ſeas about all the coaſts of the ſame Britain euen vnto the realme of Norway. He brought alſo a great part of Irelande vnder his ſubiection, with the citie of Dublin, as by autentike recordes it doth and may appeare.

After the deceaſe of king Edgar, ther was ſome ſtrife and cōtēcion amōgſt the Lordes and peeres of ỹ realm about the ſucceſſiō of the crown: for Alfrida ỹ mother of Egelredus, or Ethelredus, and diuerſe other of hir opinion, would gladly haue aduanced the ſame Egelredus to the rule: but the Archbiſhop Dunſtan taking in his handes the baner of the Crucifix, preſented his elder brother Edward vnto the Lords as they were aſſembled togither, and there denoūced him king, notwithſtāding that both Queene Alfred and hir friends, namely Alpher the Duke of Mercia were fore agaynſt him, eſpecially for ỹ he was begot in vnlawful bed of Elfleda ỹ Nun, for which offēce he did. iij. yeres penāce, & not for lying with Wilfride (as maiſter Foxe thinketh.) But Dunſtan iudging (as is to be thought) that Edward was more fitte for their behoufe to continue the world in ỹ former courſe as Edgar had left it, than his brother Egelred (whoſe mother & ſuch as toke part with hir vnder hir ſonnes authoritie were likely enough to turne all vpſide downe) vſed the matter ſo that with helpe of the Archbiſhop of Yorke Oſwalde, and other Biſhoppes, Abbottes, and certaine of the Nobilitie, as the Earle Eſſex and ſuch like, he preuayled in his purpoſe, ſo that (as before is ſayde) the ſayde Edwarde being the ſeconde of that name whiche gouerned thys lande before the conqueſt, was admitted king, and beganne his raigne ouer Englande in the yeare of oure Lorde. 975. in the thirde yeare of the Emperour Otho the ſecond, in the. xx. yeare of the raigne of Lothar king of Fraunce, and about the fourth yeare of Cumelerne king of Scotlande. Alſo Duke Alpher or Elpher of Mercia, and other Noble men deſtroyed the Abbayes which King Edgar and Biſhoppe Adelwold had builded within the limittes of Mercia. The Prieſtes or Canons whiche had beene expulſed in Edgars tyme out of their Prebendes and Benefices, beganne to complaine of theyr wrongs that were done to them, in that they had beene put oute of poſſeſſion from theyr lyuings, alledging it to bee a great offence and miſerable caſe that a ſtraunger ſhould come and remoue an olde inhabitant, for ſuch maner of doing coulde not pleaſe God, nor yet bee allowed of anye good man, whiche ought of reaſon to doubt leaſt the ſame ſhould hap to him whiche hee might ſee to haue beene another mans vndoing.

Foz there were e= uen then dyuerſe that thought this to be rather an Dzacle of Phebus, than of God, that is to vn= derſtande, not publiſhed by Gods power, but by the fraude and craftie deceyte of men.

The matter therefoze was not ſo quieted, but that vpon newe trouble an other Councell was had at a manour houſe belonging to the K. called VVil. Malm. Calne, where they that were appoynted to haue the hearing of the matter, ſatte in an vpper loft. The king by reaſon of his yong yeares was ſpa= red, ſo that he came not there.

Here as they were buſied in arguing the mat= ter, eyther part laying foz himſelfe what coulde be ſayde. Dunſton was ſoze reuiled, and had ſun= dzie repzoches layde againſt him: but ſodainly euē in the verie heate of theyz communication, the ioyſtes of the loft fayled, and downe came all the companie, ſo that many were ſlaine and hurt, but Dunſtan alone ſtanding vpon one of the ioyſtes that fell not, he eſcaped ſafe and ſounde. And ſo this myzacle with the other made an ende of the controuerſie betweene the Pzieſtes and Monkes, all the Engliſh people following the minde of the Archbiſhop Dunſtan, who by meanes thereof had his will.

Dunſtan by working myracles had his will, when ar= gumentes fayled.

In this meane while, king Edwarde ruling himſelf by good counſaile of ſuch as were thought diſcrete and ſage perſons, gaue great hope to the wozlde that he woulde walke in his fathers ver= tuous ſteppes, as alreadie he well beganne, and bearing alway a reuerence to his mother in lawe, and a bzotherly loue to hir ſonne Egelred, vſed himſelfe as became him towardes them both. red then ſoiourned, when all his companie were ſpzedde abzode in following the game, ſo that hee was left alone, hee toke the way ſtreyght vnto his mother in lawes houſe, to viſite hir and hys bzother.

The Queene hearing that he was come, was right glad thereof, foz that ſhee had occaſion offered to wozke that which ſhe had of long time befoze ymagined, that was, to ſlea the king hir ſonne in lawe, that hir owne ſonne might enioy the garlande. She therefoze requyzed him to a= light, which he in no wiſe woulde yeeld vnto, but ſayde that he had ſtolne from his companie, and was onely come to ſee hir and his bzother, and to dzinke with them, and therefoze woulde returne to the Fozreſt againe to ſee ſome moze ſpoꝛt. The Queene percеyuing that hee woulde not alight, cauſed dzinke to be fetched, and as he had the cup at his mouth, by hir appoynment one of hir ſer= uaunntes ſtroke him into the bodie with a knife, whereupon feeling himſelfe wounded, hee ſette ſpurres to the hoꝛſe thinking to gallop away, and ſo to get to his companie. But being hurt to the death, he fell from his hoꝛſe, ſo as one of his feete was faſtened in the ſtyzrop, by reaſon whereof his hoꝛſe dzew him foꝛth thzough woods and launds, and the bloud whiche guſhed out of the wounde ſhewed tokē of his death to ſuch as followed him, and the way to the place where the hoꝛſe had left him:

him. That place hight Coyphes gate, or Coynes gate. His bodie being founde was buried without any solemne funeralles at Warham. For they that enuyed that hee shoulde enioy the Crowne, enuied also the buriall of his bodie within the Church: but the memorie of his fame coulde not so secretely bee buried vp with the bodie, as they imagined. For sundrie miracles shewed at the place where his bodie was enterred, made the same famous (as diuerse haue reported) for there was sight restored to the blind, health to the sicke, and hearing to the deafe, which are easilyer to be tolde than beleeued.

Queene Alfride also woulde haue ridden to the place where he lay, mooued with repentaunce (as hath beene sayde) but the horse whereupon she rode woulde not come neare the graue, for anye thing that could be done to him. Neither by changing the sayde horse coulde the matter be holpen. For euen the same thing happened to the other horses. Hereupon the woman perceyued hir great offence towardes God for murthering the innocent, and did so repent hir afterward for the same, besides the chastising of hir body in fasting, and other kinde of penance, shee employed all hir substance and patrimonie on the poore, and in buylding and reparing of Churches and Monasteries.

Two houses of Nunnes shee founded (as is sayde) the one at Warwell, the other at Ambresburie, and finally professed hirselfe a Nunne in one of them, that is to say, at Warwell, whiche house shee buylded (as some affyrme) in remembrance of hir first husbande that was slaine there by K. Edgar for hir sake (as before is mentioned.)

The bodie of this Edwarde the seconde, and surnamed the Martyr, after that it had remayned three yeares at Warham where it was first buryed, was remoued vnto Shaftesburie, and with great reuerence buried there by the forenamed Alfer, or Elfere Duke of Mercia, who also did sore repent himselfe in that hee had beene agaynst the aduauncement of the sayde king Edward (as yee haue heard.) But yet did not he escape worthie punishment: for within one yeare after, he was eaten to death with Lice (if the Historie be true.)

King Edward came to his death after he had raigned three yeres (or as other write) three yeres and. viij. Monethes.

Whatsoeuer hath beene reported by writers of the murther committed in the person of this king Edwarde, sure it is that if he were base begotten (as by writers of no meane credit it should appeare he was in deede) great occasion vndoubtedly was giuen vnto Queene Alfred to seeke reuenge for the wrongful keeping backe of hir sonne Egelred frō his rightful succession to the crowne: but whether that Edwarde was legitimate or not, she might yet haue deuised some other lawful meane to haue come by hir purpose, & not so to haue procured the murther of the yong Prince in such vnlawfull maner. For hir doing therein can neither be worthily allowed, nor throughly excused, although those that occasioned the mischiefe by aduauncing hir stepsonne to an other mans right, deserued most blame in this matter.

Egelredus.

Egelred.

EGelredus, or Ethelredus, the sonne of king Edgar, and of his late wife Queene Alfrede, was ordeyned King in place of his brother Edwarde, after that the same Edwarde was dispatched out of the way, and begunne his raigne ouer this realme of Englande in the yeare of our lorde 979. which was in the seuenth yeare of the Emperour Otho the second, in the. xviij. of Lothaire king of Fraunce, and about the seconde or thirde yeare of Kenneth the thirde of that name King of Scotlande. 979 Simon Dun.

This Egelred, or Ethelred, was the. xxx. in number from Cerdicius the first King of the West Saxons: through his negligente gouernment the state of the common wealth fell into such decay (as writers doe report) that vnder him it may bee sayde, howe the kingdome was come to the vttermost poynt or period of olde and feeble age. For whereas whilest the Realme was deuided at the first by the Saxons into sundrie dominions, it grew at length (as it were increasing from youthfull yeares) to one absolute Monarchie, which passed vnder the late remembred Princes, Egbert, Adelstane, Edgar, and others, so that in their dayes it might be said, how it was growne to mans state, but now vnder this Egelred, through famine, pestilence, and warres, the state thereof was so shaken, turned vpside downe, and weakened on eche parte, that rightly might the season be likened vnto the olde broken yeares of mans life, which through feeblenesse is not able to helpe it selfe.

Dunstan the Archbishop of Canterbury was thought to haue foreseene this thing, and therfore refused to anoynt Egelred king, whiche by the murther of his brother shoulde atteyne to the gouernment: but at length he was compelled to it, and so he sacred him at Kingston vpon Thames, as the maner then was, on the. xxiiij. day of Aprill, assysted by Oswalde Archbishop of Yorke, and ten other Bishops.

But

Wil. Mal. But as hath beene reported, Dunſtan then ſayde that the Engliſh people ſhoulde ſuffer condigne puniſhment generally with loſſe of auncient liberties which before that tyme they had enioyed. Dunſtan alſo long before propheried of the ſlouthfulneſſe that ſhould remaine in this Ethelred. For at what time he miniſtred the ſacrament of Baptiſme vnto him, ſhortly after he came into this world, he defyled the Font with the ordure of his wombe (as hath beene ſayde) whereupon Dunſtan beeing troubled in hys mynde: By the Lorde (ſayth he) and his bleſſed mother, this child ſhall proue to be a ſlouthfull perſon. It hath bene written alſo, that when he was but tenne yeares of age, and heard that his brother Edwarde was ſlaine, he ſo offended his mother with weeping, bycauſe ſhe coulde not ſtill him, that hauing no rodde at hande, ſhee toke Tapers or Sizes that ſtode before hir, and bet him ſo ſore with them, that ſhe had almoſt killed him, whereby he coulde neuer after abyde to haue any ſuch Candles lighted before him.

Polidor. This Egelred (as writers ſay) was nothing giuen to warlike enterpriſes, but was ſlouthfull, a louer of ydleneſſe, and delyting in ryotous luſtes, which being knowne to all men, cauſed him to be euill ſpoken of amongſt his owne people, and nothing feared amongſt ſtraungers. Hereupon the Danes that exerciſed roauing on the Seas, beganne to conceyue a boldeneſſe of courage to diſquiet and moleſt the Sea coaſtes of the realme, inſomuche that in the ſeconde yeare of this Egelreds raigne, they came with ſeuen Shippes on the Engliſhe coaſtes of Kent, and ſpoyled the Ile of Tennet, the Towne of Southampton, and in the yere following they deſtroyed S. Petrokes Abbay in Cornewall, Northlande in Deuonſhire, and dyuerſe other places by the Sea ſyde, ſpecially in Deuonſhire and Cornewall. Alſo a great part of Cheſſhire was deſtroyed by Pirates of Norway.

Wil. Malm. Mat. Weſt. In the ninth yeare of his raigne, vpon occaſion of ſtrife betweene him and the Biſhoppe of Rocheſter, he made warre agaynſt the ſame Byſhop, waſted his Lordſhips, and beſieged the citie of Rocheſter, till Dunſtan procured the Biſhops peace with paymẽt of an hundred pound in golde: and bycauſe the king woulde not agree with the Biſhop without money at the onely requeſt of Dunſtan, the ſaid Dunſtan did ſend him worde, that ſithence he made more account of golde than of God, more of money than of S. Andrew Patrone of the Church of Rocheſter, and more of couetouſneſſe than of him being the Archbiſhop, the miſchiefes which the Lord had threatned woulde ſhortly fal and come to paſſe, but the ſame ſhould not chance whileſt he was aliue, who died in the yere following, the. xvi. of May, on a Saturday.

Vita Dunſtani Of this Dunſtan many things are recorded by writers, that he ſhould be of ſuch holineſſe and vertue, that God wrought many myracles by him, both whiles he liued here on earth, and alſo after his deceaſe. He was borne in weſt Saxon, his father was named Heorſtan, & his mother Ciniſride, they in his youth ſet him to ſchole, where he ſo profited, that he excelled al his equals in age. Afterwarde he fell ſicke of an Ague, which vexed him ſo ſore that it draue him into a frenſie: & therfore his parents appoynted him to the cure and charge of a certain womã, where his diſeaſe grew ſo on him, that he fell in a trance as though he had bin dead, & after that he ſodenly aroſe, & by chance caught a ſtaffe in his hande, and ran vp & downe through hilles and dales, and layde about him as though he had bene afrayde of mad dogges. The next night (as it is ſayde) he gat him to the top of the church by the help of certain ladders that ſtood there for workmen to mend the roof, and there ran vp and downe very daungerouſly, but in the ende came ſafely down, and layd him to ſleep betweene two men that watched the Church that night, & when he wakened, marueiled howe he came there. Finally recouering his diſeaſe, his parents made him a prieſt, and placed him in the Abbay of Glaſtenburie, where he gaue himſelfe to the reading of Scriptures and knowledge of vertue: But as well his kinſmen as certaine other did raiſe a report of him, that he gaue not himſelfe ſo much to the reading of ſcriptures, as to charming, coniuring and ſorcery, which he vtterly denied: howbeit learned he was in deed, and could do many prety things both in handie worke & other deuices: he had good ſkill in muſicke and delited much therin.

John Co. Oſborne. Ran. Hi.

At length he grew in ſuch fauour, that he was aduaunced into the ſeruice of king Adelſtane. And on a time as he came to a Gentlewomans houſe with his harpe, and hung the ſame on the wall, while he ſhaped a prieſtes ſcoale, the harpe ſodenly began to play a Pſalm, which draue the whole houſhold in ſuch feare, that they ran out and ſaid, hee was too cunning, and knewe more than was expedient: whereupon he was accuſed of Nicromancie, and ſo baniſhed out of the Court.

And after this he began to haue a liking to women, and when Elſheagus then Biſhop of Winchester and his couſin, perſwaded him to become a

But being sone after strike with such a swelling disease in his bellie, that all his bodie was brought into such state, as though he had bene infected with a foule leprosie, hee bethought himselfe, and vpon his recouerie sent to the bishop, who immediatly shore him a Monke, in which life he liued in so great opinion of holynes, as he in time became Abbot of Glastenbury: where on a time as hee was in his prayers before the aulter of S. George, he fell asleepe: and imagining in his dreame, that an vgly rough Beare came towards him with open mouth, and set his forefeete vpon his shoulders ready to deuour him, he sodenly waking for feare, caught his walking staffe which he comonly went with, & layd about him, that all the Church rang thereof to the great wonder of such as stood by. The common tale of his plucking the diuell by the nose with a paire of pynsers, for tempting him with women, while he was making a Chalice: the great loue that the ladie Elfleda, nigh kinswoman to K. Adelstan bare to him to his dying day, with a great meiny of other such like matters, I leaue as friuolous, and wholy impertinent to our purpose: onely this I reade, that through declaring of his dreames and visions, he obteyned in the time of K. Edgar, first the Bishoprike of Worcester, after of London, & last of al the Archbishoprike of Canterburie. And now I will returne to the doings of Egelred, and to speake of such things as chaunced in his time.

Wil. Malm. Mat. West.

Shortly after the decease of Dunstan, Danes inuaded this Realme on eche side, wasting and spoyling the Countrey in moste miserable wise. They arryued in so manye places at once, that the Englishe men coulde not well deuise whyther to goe to encounter first with them. Some of them spoyled a place or towne called Wicheport, and from thence passing further into the Countrey, were mette with by the Englishe men, who giuing them battayle, slew theyr Captaine Goda: but yet they gotte the victorie, and beat the Danes oute of the fielde, and so that parte of the Danishe armie was brought to confusion.

The Danes inuade this land.

Alias Wecederport.

Hen. Hunt. Sim. Dunel.

Danes vanquished.

Simon Dunel. sayth that the English men in deede wanne the fielde here, but not without great losse. For beside Goda, (who by report of the same Authour was Earle of Deuonshire) there dyed an other valyaunt man of warre named Strenwolde.

In the yeare. 991. Brightnod Earle of Essex, at Maldon gaue battaile to an armie of Danes, (which vnder their leaders Justin & Guthmund, had spoyled Ipswich) and was there ouercome & slaine with the most part of his people, and so the Danes obteyned in that place the victorie.

The same yeare, and in the. xiij. yeare of king Egelreds raigne, when the land was on eche side sore afflicted, wasted and haried by the Danes, which couered the same as they had beene Grashoppers: by the aduise of the Archbishop of Canterburie Sirlcius, (which was the second of that Sea after Dunstane,) a composition was taken with the Danes, so that for the summe of ten thousand pound to them to be payde by the king, they should couenant not to trouble his subiectes any further.

Ten thousand pound payed to the Danes.

This money was called Danegylt, or Dane money, and was leuyed of the people. Although other take that to bee Danegylte, whiche was gyuen vnto suche Danes as King Egelred afterwardes reteyned in his seruice to defende the lande from other Danes and enimyes that sought to inuade his Dominions. But by what name so euer thys money (whiche the Danes nowe receyued) was called, true it is that they beganne to play theyr olde partes agayne,

And ſhortly after a greater Nauye of the Danes came, and encountered with the kings like a traytor turned to the Danes ſide.

Mat.VVeſt. Math. Weſtm. maketh other report of this matter, declaring that Alfrike in deede being one of the chiefe captaines of the fleet, aduertiſed them by forewarning of the daunger that was towarde them, and that when they ſhoulde come to ioy-ning, the ſame Alfrike like a traytor fledde to the

as they fledde away, and ſlue a greate number, and alſo toke the Shippe of the Traytour Al-played the lyke trayterous part once before, and yet was reconcyled to the Kings fauour againe.

About the ſame time was Bamburgh deſtroyed by the Danes, whiche arryued after in Humber, and waſted the Countrey of Lyndſey and Yorkeſhyre, on either ſyde that Ryuer. And when the Engliſhe men were aſſembled to giue them battayle: before they ioyned, the Cap-ſo gyuing the occaſion of the ouerthrowe that lighted on theyr people.

But by ſome wryters it ſhoulde appeare, that after the Danes had deſtroyed all the North

Moreouer, whereas they wintered that yeare at Southampton: the king procured Iulafe king of the

of the Norwegians to come vnto Andeuer (whet at that time he lay) vpon pledges receyued of the king for his ſafe returne. Elphegus Biſhoppe of Wincheſter, and Duke Ethelwold were appointed by king Egelred to bring Aulafe vnto him in moſt honourable wiſe.

The ſame time was Aulafe baptiſed, K. Egelred receyuing him at the Font ſtone, and ſo hee promiſed neuer after to make any warre within this lande. And receyuing great gyftes of the King he returned into his Countrey, and kept his promiſe faythfully: But the enilles toke not ſo an ende: for other of the Danes ſprang vp, as they had bene the heades of the Serpent Hydra, ſome of them euer being redie to trouble the quiet ſtate of the Engliſh nation.

Aboute this ſeaſon that is to witte, in the yeare of our Lorde. 995. Biſhop Aldayne whiche was fledde from Cheſter in the (Strete otherwiſe called Cunceſter) with the bodie of Saint Cuthbert for feare of the inuaſion of Danes, vnto Rippon, brought the ſame bodie now vnto Durhã, & there began the foundation of a church: ſo that the Sea of that Biſhoprike was from thence forth there eſtabliſhed, and the Woddes were there cutte downe, whiche before tyme couered and ouergrewe that place, wherevpon it began firſt to be inhabited.

Earle Uthred who gouerned that Countrey greatly furthered the Biſhop in this worke, ſo that all the people inhabiting betweene the Ryuers of Coquid and Theis, came togither to ridde the woddes, and to helpe towarde the buylding of the Church and towne there.

In the. xix. yeare of King Egelreds raigne, the Danes ſayled aboute Cornewall, and comming into the Seuerne ſea, they robbed and toke prayes in the coaſtes of Deuonſhire, and Southwales, and landing at Wechepoꝛt, they burned vp the countrey, and came about vnto Penwithſtreete on the South coaſt, and ſo arriuing in the mouth of Tamer water, came vnto Lydforde, and there waſted all afore them with force of fire. They burned amongeſt other places, the Monaſterie of Saint Oꝛdulfe at Eſſyngſtocke.

After this they came into Dorſetſhire, and paſſed through the countrey with flame and fire, not finding any that offred to reſiſt them.

The ſame yeare alſo they ſoiourned for a time in the Iſle of Wight, and lyued vpon ſpoyles and prayes whiche they toke in Hampſhire, and Suſſex: At length they came into the Thames, and ſo by the Ryuer of Medeway, arryued at Rocheſter. The Kentiſhmen aſſembled togither and fought with the Danes, but they were ouercome, and ſo left the fielde to the Danes.

After this, the ſame Danes ſayled into Normandie, and king Egelred went into Cumberland where the Danes inhabited in great numbers, whom he ouercame with ſore warre, and waſted almoſt al Cumberland, taking great ſpoiles in the ſame.

About the ſame time or ſhortly after, the Danes with their nauie, returning out of Normandie, came vnto Exmouth, and there aſſaulted the Caſtell, but they were repulſed by thẽ that kept it. 1001 Exmouth.

After this they ſpred abrode ouer all the countrey exerciſing theyr accuſtomed trade of deſtroying all before them with fire and ſworde. The mẽ of Sõmerſetſhire fought with thẽ at Pentho, but the Danes gate the vpper hand. Pentho.

Thus the ſtate of the realme in thoſe dayes was verie miſerable: for there wanted worthie Chieftains to rule the people, and to chaſtice them when they did amiſſe. There was no truſt in the noble men, for euerye one impugned others doing, and yet woulde not deuiſe whiche way to deale with better likelyhode. When they aſſembled in Counſaile, and ſhould haue occupied their heades in deuiſing remedies for the miſchiefe of the common wealth, they turned theyr purpoſe vnto altercation aboute ſuch ſtrykes, contentions and quarelles as eche one had agaynſt other, and ſuffered the general cauſe to lie ſtil in the duſt. And if at any time there was any good concluſion agreed vpon, for the withſtanding of the enimie, & reliefe of the common wealth, anon ſhoulde the enimie be aduertiſed thereof by ſuch as were of aliance or conſanguinitie vnto them. For as Harriſon in his Chronologie gathereth out of Caxton, Polichron. and others, the Engliſh bloud was ſo mixed with that of the Danes & Britains, who were like enimies to the Engliſhmen, that there was almoſt few of the nobilitie & cõmons which had not on the one ſide a parent of ſome of them. Whereby it came to paſſe, that neither the ſecrete purpoſes of the k. could be cõcealed til they might take due effect, neither their aſſemblies proue quiet without quarelling & taking of partes. Many alſo being ſent forth with their powers one way (whileſt the K. went to make reſiſtãce, another) did reuolt vnto his enimies & turn their ſwords againſt him (as you haue heard of Elfrik & his cõplices) & ſhall read of many others, ſo ỹ it was no marueil that Ethelred ſped no better, & yet was he as valiant as any of his predeceſſors, although ỹ Mõks fauour him not in their writings, becauſe he demaũded ayd of thẽ toward his warres, & was nothing fauorable to their lewd hipocriſie (as ỹ ſame Har. noteth:) but what is a king if his ſubiects be not loyall? what is a realme, if the cõmon wealth be diuided: by peace & concord, of ſmal beginnings great & famous kingdoms haue oft times proceeded, wheras by diſcord ỹ greateſt kingdoms haue oftner bin brought to ruine: ſo it proued here: for whileſt priuate quarels are purſued, the generall Diſagreement with counſaylers what fruit it bringeth.

affayres are vtterly neglected: and whileſt eche nation ſeeketh to preferre hir owne alliance, the Iland it ſelf is like to become a deſart. But to proceede with our Monaſticall writers: certes they lay all the fault in the king, ſaying that he was a mã giuẽ to no good exerciſe, he delighted in fleſhly luſtes and riotous banketting, and ſtill ſought wayes how to gather of his ſubiectes what might be got, as wel by vnlawful meanes as otherwiſe. For he would for feyned or for very ſmall & light cauſes diſinherite his ſubiectes, and cauſe them to redeeme their owne poſſeſſions for great ſummes of money. Beſides theſe oppreſſions, diuerſe kinds of ſickneſſe vexed the people alſo, as the bloudie Flixe, and hote burning Agues which then raged throughout the lande, ſo that many died thereof. By ſuch maner of meanes therfore, what through the miſgouernance of the king, the treaſon & diſloyaltie of the nobilitie, the lacke of good order and due correction amongſt the people, and by ſuch other ſcourges & miſhaps as afflicted the Engliſh nation in that ſeaſon, the lãd was brought into great ruine, ſo that, where by ſtrength the enimy coulde not be kept off, there was now no helpe but to appeaſe thẽ with mony. By reaſon wherof frõ time of the firſt agreement with the Danes for tenne thouſande pound tribute, it was inhanced to. xvj. thouſande pounde (as ye haue heard.) And after that to twentie thouſande pounde, then to. xxiiij. thouſande pound, and ſo to. xxx. thouſand pound, and laſtlye to fortie thouſande pounde, till at lengthy the Realme was emptied in maner of all that money and coyne that could in it be founde. In this meane time died Elgiua or Ethelgiua ỹ Queene. Then ſhortly after it was deuiſed that ỹ king ſhould be a ſuter vnto Ri. And ſo in the yere of our lord. 1002. which was about. the. xxiiij yere. of K. Egelreds raigne, the ſame Egelred receiued the forſaid Emma, & maried hir wt great ſolemnitie. right neceſſary, honorable & profitable for ỹ realm of Englande, by cauſe of the great puiſſance of the Norman princes in thoſe days: but as things afterward came to paſſe, it turned to the ſubuerſiõ of ỹ whole Engliſh ſtate: for by ſuch affinitie & dealing as hapned hereby betwixt the Normãs and Engliſhmẽ, occaſion in ỹ end was miniſtred to ỹ ſame Normans to pretend a tytle to the crowne of Englãd, in proſecuting of which title, they obteyned and made the whole conqueſt of the land, as after ſhall appeare. Egelred being greatly aduaunced, as he thought, by reaſon of this maryage deuiſed vpon preſumption thereof, to cauſe all the Danes within the lande to bee murthered in one day. Herevpon he ſent priuie Commiſſioners vnto all cities, boroughes and townes within his dominions, commaunding the rulers and officers in the ſame, to diſpatche and dea all ſuch Danes as remayned within theyr liberties, at a certaine day prefixed, being Saint Brices daye, in the yeare. 1012. and in the. 34. yeare of king Egelreds raigne.

ded and recorded. Where it is shewed that the Danes compelled the husbandmen to till the ground, and to doe all maner of labour and toyle to bee done about husbandrie: and the Danes liued of the fruite and gaynes that came therof, and kept the husbãdmens wiues, their daughters, mayders and seruaunts, vsing and abusing them at theyr pleasures. And when the husbandmen came home, then coulde they yueth haue such sustenaunce of meates and drinkes as fell for seruantes to haue: so that the Danes had all at theyr commaundements, eating and drinking of the best, where the sillie man that was the owner, could hardly come to his fill of the worst.

And besides this, the common people were so oppressed by the Danes, that for feare and dread they called them in euerie such house where anye of them sojourned, Lorde Dane. And if an Englishe man and a Dane chaunced to meete at any Bridge or streyght passage, the Englishe man must staye till the Lorde Dane were passed. But in proces of time, after the Danes were voyded the lande, this worde Lorde Dane was in derision and dispite of the Danes turned by English men into a name of reprochе, as Lordane, which till these our dayes is not forgotten. For when the people in manye partes of thys Realme will note and signifie anye greate yole lubber that will not labour nor take paine for his liuing, they will call him Lordane. But whether the Danes vsed the English men in such vile maner, and kept them in such seruile thraldome or not, truth it is that vppon knowledge giuen into Denmarke of the cruell murther of the Danes here in Englande, the people of that Countrey were greatly kindled in malice, and set in such a furious rage agaynst the Englishmen, that with all speede they made forth a Nauie full fraught with menne of warre, the whiche in the yeare following came swarming about the coastes of Englande, and landing in the West Countrey, toke the Citie of Exeter, and gat there a riche spoyle.

One Hugh a Norman borne, whom Queene Emma had placed in those parties as gouernour or Sherife there, conspired with the Danes, so that all the Countrey was ouerrunne and wasted.

The king hearing that the Danes were thus landed, and spoyled the west partes of the realme, hee sente vnto Edricus to assemble a power to withstande the enimies. Hereupon the people of Hampshire and Wilshire rose and got togither: But when the armyes shoulde ioyne, Earle Edricus surnamed de Streona, faigned himselfe sick, and so betrayed his people, of whome hee had the conduct, for they perceyuing the want in theyr leader, were discouraged, and so fled.

The Danes followed them vnto Wilton, whiche towne they rifled and ouercame. From thence they went to Salesburie, & so taking theyr pleasure there, returned to their ships, bycause (as some write) they were aduertised that the K. was comming towards them with an huge armie.

In the yeare next ensuing, that is to wit. 1004 which was aboute the .xxuij. yeare of King Egelreds raigne, Sweyne, or Swanus, king of Denmarke, wyth a mightie Nauie of shippes came on the coast of Norffolke, and there landing with his people, made towarde Norwiche, and comming thither toke that Citie, and spoyled it. Then went he vnto Thetford, and when hee had taken and rifled that Towne, hee burned it, notwythstanding a truce taken by Vikillus, or Wilketell gouernour of those partes wyth the same King Sweyne after the taking of Norwich.

In the yeare of our Lorde. 1006. king Swein returned againe into Englande with a mightie huge Nauie arryuing at Sandwiche, and ſpoyled all the Countrey neare vnto the Sea ſide. King Egelred rayſed all his power agaynſt him, and all the Haruell time lay abroade in the fielde to reſiſt the Danes, which according to theyr wonted maner ſpared not to exerciſe their vnmercifull cruelties, in waſting and ſpoyling the land with fire and ſworde, pilfering & taking of preys in euery part where they came. Neyther coulde King Egelred remedie the matter, becauſe the enimies ſtyll conueyed themſelues with their ſhippes into ſome contrarie quarter, from the place where they knew him to be, ſo that his trauaile was in vaine.

About the beginning of Winter they remayned in the Ile of Wight, and in the tyme of Chriſtmaſſe they landed in Hampſhire and paſſed through that Countrey into Barkeſhire, and came to Reding. And from thence to Wallingforde, and ſo to Coleſey, and then approching neare to Eſſington, came to Achikelmeſlawe, and in euery place whereſoeuer they came, they made cleane worke. For that which they coulde not carry with them, they conſumed with fire, burning vp theyr Innes and ſleaing their hoſtes. In returning back, the people of the weſt Countrey gaue them battail, but preuayled not, ſo that they did but enriche theyr enimies with the ſpoyle of their bodies.

This Edricus although hee had maryed the kings daughter Edgita, was yet noted to be one of thoſe which diſcloſed the ſecretes of the realme, and the determinations of the Counſaile vnto the enimies. But he was ſuche a craftie diſſembler, ſo greatly prouided of ſleight to diſſemble and cloke his falſehoode, that the king beeing to muche abuſed by him, had him in ſingular fauour, where as hee vppon a malicious purpoſe ſtudyed daply howe to bring the Realme into vtter ruine and deſtruction, aduertiſing the enimies from tyme to tyme howe the ſtate of thinges ſtoode, whereby they came to knowledge where they ſhoulde giue place, and when they mighte ſafely come forwarde, Moreouer, beeing ſent vnto them oftentymes as a Commiſſioner to treate of peace, hee perſwaded them to warre. Prouiſion for ſhippes and armour.

In the .xxx. yeare of King Egelreds raigne, whiche fell in the yeare of oure Lorde. 1008. hee toke order that of euery three hundred and tenne hydes of lande within this realme, there ſhoulde one ſhippe be buylded, and of euery. viij. hydes a complete armor furniſhed.

In the yeare following, the Kinges whole fleete was brought togither at Sandwiche, and ſuche ſouldiers came thither, as were appoynted to goe to Sea in the ſame fleete. There had not beene ſeene the lyke number of ſhippes ſo trimly rigged and furniſhed in all poyntes, in anye Kinges dayes before. But no greate profitable peece of ſeruice was wrought by them: For the King hadde aboute that tyme baniſhed a noble yong manne of Suſſex called Wilnote, who getting togither twentie ſayles, laye vppon the coaſtes, taking priſes where he might gette them. Mat. VVeſt.

Brithericke the brother of Earle Edricke, deſirous to wynne honour, toke forth foure ſcore of the ſayde Shippes, and promiſed to bring in the enimie deade or aliue. But as hee was ſayling forwarde on the Seas, a ſore tempeſt with an outragious winde roſe with ſuche violence, that his ſhippes were caſt vppon the ſhore. And Wilnote comming vpon them, ſet them on fyre, and ſo burned them euery one. The reſidue of the ſhips, when newes came to them of this miſhap, returned backe to London. And then was the armie diſperſed, and ſo all the coſt and trauaile of the Engliſh men proued in vaine.

After this, in the Haruell time a newe armie of Danes, vnder the conduct of three Captaynes, Turkell, Henuing, and Tulake, landed at Sandwiche, and from thence paſſed forth to Canterburie, and had taken the citie, but that the Citizens gaue them a thouſande pounde to depart from thence, and to leaue the Countrey in peace. Then went the Danes to the Ile of Wight, and afterwardes landed and ſpoyled the Countrey of Suſſex and Hamſhire.

King Egelred aſſembled the whole power of all his ſubiectes, and comming to giue them battaile, had made an ende of their cruell harrying the Countrey with the ſlaughter of them all, if Earle Edrike with forged tales (deuiſed onely to put him in feare) had not diſwaded him from giuing battaile. The Danes by that meanes returning in ſafetie, immediately after the feaſt of S. Martyn, returned into Kent, and lodged with theyr nauie in the Winter folowing in the Thames, and oftentymes aſſaulting the Citie of Lõdon, were ſtill beaten backe to their loſſe.

After the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe they paſſed through the Countrey and Woddes of Chilterne vnto Oxforde, whiche Towne they burned, and then returning backe they fell to waſting of the Countrey on both ſides the Thames. But hearing that an armie was aſſembled at London to gyue them battaile, that parte of theyr Hoſte whiche kepte on the North ſyde of the Ryuer, paſſed the ſame Ryuer at Stanes, and ſo ioyning wyth theyr fellowes marched forth through Southerie, and comming backe to theyr Shippes in Kent, fell in hande to repayre and amende theyr ſhippes that were in any wiſe decayed.

Then after Eaſter, the Danes ſayling about the coaſt, arryued at Gippeſwiche in Suffolke, on the day of the Aſcention of our Lorde: and inuading the Countrey, gaue battayle at a place called Wigmere, or Rigmere, vnto Vikell, or Vlfketell leader of the Engliſh hoſt in thoſe parties, the fifth of May.

The men of Norffolke and Suffolke ſtedde at the fyrſt onſet gyuen. But the Cambridgeſhire men ſticked to it valiantly, wynning thereby perpetuall fame and commendation. There was no mindefulneſſe amongeſt them of running awaye, ſo that a great number of the Nobilitie and other were beaten downe and ſlaine, tyll at the length one Turketell Mireneheued, that had a Dane to hys father, fyrſt beganne to take his flight, and deſerued thereby an euerlaſting reproch.

The Danes obteyning the vpper hande, for the ſpace of three monethes togyther, went vppe and downe the Countreys, and waſted thoſe parties of the Realme, that is to ſay, Norffolke, and Suffolke, with the borders of Lincolnſhire, Huntingtonſhire, and Cambridgeſhire where the fennes are, gayning exceeding ryches by the ſpoile of the great and wealthie Abbayes and Churches which had their ſituation within the compaſſe of the ſame Fennes.

They alſo deſtroyed Thetford, and burnt Cambridge, and from thence paſſed through the pleaſant mountain countrey of Belleſham, cruelly murthering the people without reſpect to age, degree or ſexe. Thetforde, Cambridge. Hen. Hunt.

After this they entred into Eſſex, and ſo came backe to theyr ſhips, whiche were then arriued in the Thames. But they reſted not any long time in quiet, as people that mynded nothing but the deſtruction of this Realme. So that ſhortly after they had somewhat refreſhed them, forwarde they ſet again into the Country, paſſing through Buckinghamſhire, and ſo into Bedfordſhire. And about S. Andrewes tide they turned toward Northampton, and comming thither, ſet fyre on that towne. The Danes arriue in the Thames. 1011. Northampton burnt by Danes.

And then returning through the weſt country, with fire and ſword waſted and deſtroyed a great part thereof, and namely Wilſhire, with other parties. And finally aboute the feaſt of Chriſtmaſſe they came againe to their ſhippes.

Thus had the Danes waſted and deſtroyed the moſt part of .xvj. or .xvij. ſhires within this realme as Norff. Suff. Cambridgeſhire, Eſſex, Middleſex, Hartfortſhire, Oxfordſhire, Buckinghãſhire, and Bedfordſhire, with a part of Huntingdonſh. and alſo a great portion of Northamptonſhire. How many ſhires the Danes waſted.

This was done in the Countreys that lie on the northſide the Riuer of Thames. And on the ſouthſide of the ſame Ryuer, they ſpoyled and waſted Kent, Southerie, Suſſex, Barkſh. Hãpſhire, and (as is before ſayd) a great part af Wilſhire. The king and the peeres of the realme not knowing otherwiſe how to redreſſe the matter, ſent Ambaſſadors vnto the Danes, offring them great ſummes of money to leaue off ſuche cruell waſting and ſpoyling of the lande. The king ſendeth to the Danes. Simon Dun.

The Danes were contented to retayne the money, but yet coulde not abſtayne from their cruell doyngs, neither was their greedie thyrſt of bloud and ſpoyle ſatiſfied with the waſting and deſtroying of ſo many Countieys and places as they had paſſed through. Whereupon in the yeare of our Lorde. 1011. about the feaſt of Saint Mathew in September, they layde ſiege to the Citie of Canterburie, which by the Citizens was valiantly defended by the ſpace of .xx. dayes. The Archbiſhop Alphegus murthered.

This cruell murther was cõmitted at Grenewich foure miles diſtant from London, the .xix. of Aprill, where he lay a certaine time vnburied, but at length through miracles ſhewed (as they ſay) for myracles are all wrought now by deade men, and not by the liuing: the Danes permitted that his bodie might be caried to London, & there was it buried in the Church of S. conclusion of this agreement, that is to witte, in the yeare. 1012. at what tyme Gunthildis the ſiſter of King Swaine was ſlaine, with hir huſbande and ſonne, by the commaundement of the falſe traytour Edzike. But bycauſe all other Authours agree that the ſame murther of Danes was executed aboute tenne yeares before thys ſuppoſed tyme: wee haue made rehearſall thereof in that place. Howbeeit for the death of Gunthilde, it maye bee, that ſhee became Hoſtage eyther in the yeare. 1007. at what tyme King Egelred payed thirtie thouſande pounde vnto king Swayne to haue peace (as before you haue heard) or elſe myght ſhee bee deliuered in hoſtage, in the yeare. 1011. when the laſt agreement was made with the Danes (as aboue is mentioned.) But when or at what time ſoeuer ſhe became hoſtage, this we finde of hir, that ſhe came hither into England with hir huſband Palingus, a mightie Earle, and receyued baptiſme here. Whereupon ſhe earneſtly trauailed in treatie of a peace betwixt hir brother & king Egelred, whiche being brought to paſſe chiefely by hir ſuyte, ſhee was contented to become an Hoſtage for perfourmance thereof (as before is recyted.) And after by the commaundement of Earle Edzicke ſhee was put to death, pronouncing that the ſhedding of hir bloude would cauſe all England one day ſore to rue.

She was a right beautifull Ladie, and toke hir death without all feare, not once chaunging countenaunce, though ſhe ſaw hir huſbande and hir onely ſonne (a yong Gentleman of much towardneſſe) firſt murthered before hir face.

Turkillus in the meane tyme had aduertiſed king Swayne in what ſtate things ſtoode here within the Realme: howe King Egelred was negligent, only attending to the luſtes and pleaſures of the fleſhe: howe the Noble menne were vnfaythfull, and the Commons weake and feeble through waute of good and truſtye leaders.

Some wryte yet that Turkyll, as well as other of the Danes whiche remayned here in Englande was in league with King Egelred, inſomuche that he was with him in London to helpe to defend the Citie againſt Swayne when hee came to aſſault it, (as after ſhall appeare.) Whiche if it bee true, a doubt may riſe whether Swaine receyued any aduertiſement from Turkill to moue him the rather to inuade the realme: but ſuche aduertiſements might come from him before that he was accorded with Egelred.

Swayne therefore as a valiaunt Prince deſirous both to reuenge his ſiſters death, and win honour, prepared an huge armie, and a greate number of Shippes, with the whiche hee made towardes Englande, and firſte comming to Sandwiche, tarryed there a ſmall while, and taking cuſtomes the Sea, compaſſed aboute the coaſtes of the Eaſt Angles, and arryuing in the mouth of Humber, ſayled vp the water, and entring into the Ryuer of Trent, he landed at Gaynesbourgh, purpoſing to inuade the Northumbers: But they as ſoon brought into great feare, for that they had beene ſubiect to the Danes in tymes paſt, and thinking therefore not to reuolte to enimyes, but rather to theyr olde acquaintaunce, if they ſhoulde ſubmitte themſelues to the Danes, ſtreyght wayes offered to become ſubiect vnto Swayne, togither with theyr Duke named Wightred.

With this proſperous ſucceſſe, Swayne being greatly encouraged, prepared to go vnto London where king Egelred as then remayned, hauing with him Turkillus the Dane, which was retayned in wages with other of the Danes (as by report of ſome Authours it may appeare) and were nowe readie to defende the Citie againſte theyr Countrey men in ſuppoſt of King Egelred togyther with the Citizens. Swayne bycauſe hee would not ſtepp ſo farre out of the way as to goe to the nexte bridge, loſt a greate number of his menne as hee paſſed through the Thames.

At his comming to London, he begonne to aſſaulte the Citie right fiercely, in hope eyther to put his enimie in ſuch feare that he ſhould diſpaire of all reliefe and comfort, or at the leaſt to trye what hee was able to doe. The Londoners on the other part, although they were brought in ſome feare by this ſodaine attempt of the enimyes, yet conſidering with themſelues, that the hazarde of all the whole ſtate of the Realme was annexed to theyrs, ſithe theyr Citie was the chiefe and Metropolitane of all the Kingdome, they valyantly ſtoode in defence of themſelues, and of their king that was preſent there with them, beating backe the enimies, chaſing them from the walles, and otherwiſe doing their beſt to keepe them of. At length although the Danes did moſt valiantly aſſault the Citie, the Engliſh men yet to defend their prince from all iniurie of enimies, did not ſhrinke, but boldly ſallied forth at ye gates in heapes togither, & encountred with theyr aduerſaries, and began to fight with the right fiercely.

And ſo with the reſidue of his armie ceaſſed not to iourney day and night tyll hee came to Bathe, where Ethelmere an Earle of greate power in thoſe Weſt parties of the Realme, ſubmitted himſelfe wyth all hys people vnto him, who ſhortly after neuertheleſſe (as ſome write) was compelled through want of vitayles to releaſe the tribute lately couenanted to bee payed vnto him for a certaine ſumme of money, which when hee had receyued, he returned into Denmarke, meaning ſhortly to returne againe with a greater power.

I ſhoulde for euer bee put to ſilence, if there wanted in vs the vertue of a fatherly minde, in giuing good aduice and counſaile for the well ordering the adminiſtration of things in the common wealth, or if there lacked courage or might in our ſouldiers and men of warre to defende our Country. Truly to die in defence of the Country where we are borne, I confeſſe it a worthie thing, and I for my part am readie to take vpon me to enter into the middeſt of the enimies in defence of my kingdome. But here I ſee our countrey and the whole Engliſh nation to be at a poynt to fall into vtter ruine. We are ouercome of the Danes, not with weapō or force of armes, but with treaſon wrought by our owne people: wee did at the firſt prepare a nauie againſte the enimies, the which that falſe traytor Elfrik betrayd into their handes. Againe oftentymes haue we giuen battaile with euill ſucceſſe, and onely through the fault of our owne people, that haue beene falſe and diſloyal, wherby we haue bene conſtrayned to agree with the enimies vpon diſhonorable conditions, euen as neceſſitie required, which to ouercome reſteth only in God. Such kind of agreemēt hath bin made in deed to our deſtruction, ſith the enimies haue not ſticked to breake it (they being ſuch a wicked kinde of people as neither regarde God nor man) contrarie to right & reaſon, and beſide all our hope & expectation. And ſo is the matter come nowe to this paſſe, ẏ we haue not cauſe only to feare the loſſe of our gouernment, but leaſt the name of the whole Engliſh natiō be deſtroyed for euer. Therfore ſithence the enimies are at hād, and as it were ouer our heades, ye to whō my cōmandemēt hath euer bin had in good regard, prouide, take counſell, & ſee to ſuccor the ſtate of your cūtry now redy to decay & to fal into irrecouerable ruine.

ruine. Herebpon they fel in cõsultation euery one, alledging and bringing forth his opinion as seemed to him best, but it appeared they hadde the Wolfe by the eare, for they wist not which way to turne them: If they shoulde give battayle it was to be doubted, least through treason amongst themselues, the armie shoulde be betrayed into the enimies hands, the which would not fayle to execute all kinde of crueltie in the slaughter of the whole nation. And if they did not stand valiantly to shewe themselues ready to defende their countrey, there was no shifte but to yeeld themselues, whiche though it were a thing reprochfull and dishonorable, yet shoulde it be lesse euill as they toke the matter, for thereby myght many bee preserued from deathe, and in time to come, be able to recouer the libertie of their countrey againe when occasion shoulde thereto be offered.

This poynt was allowed of them all, and so in the ende they rested vpon that resolution.

King Egelred therefore determined to committe himselfe into the hands of his brother in lawe Richarde Duke of Normandy, whose sister (as ye haue heard) he hadde married. But bycause he woulde not do this vnaduisedly, firste he sent ouer his Wife Queene Emme, with his sonnes which he hadde begotten of hir, Alfred and Edwarde, that by their entertaynemente hee might vnderstande how hee shoulde be welcome. Duke Richarde receyued his sister and his Nephewes right ioyfully, and promised to ayde his brother King Egelred in defence of his Kyngdome. But in this meane while had Sweyne conquered the more part of al England, and brought (by little and little) that whiche remayned, vnder his subiection. The people through feare submitting themselues on each hand, King Egelred in this meane time, (for the Londoners had submitted themselues to Sweyne) was first withdrawē vnto Greenewiche, and there remayned for a time with the nauie of the Danes, which was vnder the gouernemente of Earle Turkill, and from thence sayled vnto the Isle of Wight, and there remayned a great part of the Winter, and finally after Christmas, sayled himselfe into Normandy, and was of his brother in law ioyfully receyued, and greatly comforted in that his time of necessitie. Sweyne hauing now gote the whole rule of the lande, was reputed for King, and so commanded that his army shoulde be prouided of wages and victuals to bee taken vp and leuied through the Realme. In like manner Turkill cõmanded that to his army which lodged at Greenewhich, shoulde wages and victuals be deliuered sufficiente for the finding and sustentation therof. Sweyne vsed the victory very cruelly against the Englishmen, oppressing them on each hand, to the intent that they being broughte lowe, he might gouerne in more surelie. The yere in which he obteined the rule thus of this Realm, and that King Egelred was constreyned to flee into Normandy, was in the fiue and thirtith yere of the same Egelredes his raigne, and after the birth of our Lord. 1014. Sweyne being once established in the gouernemente, did not onely vse much crueltie, in oppressing the laitie, but also he stretched forthe his hande to the Churche and to the Ministers in the same, fleecing them and spoyling both Churches and Ministers, without any remorse of conscience, in so muche, that hauing a quarrell against the inhabitantes within the precinct of S. Edmonds land in Suffolke, he did not onely harry the countrey, but also ryfled and spoyled the Abbey of Bury, where the body of Saint Edmond rested.

Wherupon shortly after as hee was at Grimelborough or Thetforde (as some haue) and there in his iollitie talked with his Nobles of his good successe in conquering of this lande, he was suddaynly striken with a knife, as it is reported, miraculously, for no man wist how or by whome: and within three dayes after, to wit, on the thirde of February, hee ended his life with greeuous payne and torment in yelling and roring, by reason of his extreme anguish beyonde all measure. There hathe sprong a pleasant tale amongst the posteritie of that age, how he should be wounded with the same knife whiche King Edmonde in his life time vsed to weare. Thus haue some of our Writers reported, but the Danishe Chronicles recorde a farre more happy ende whiche should chaunce vnto this Sweyne, than is before mentioned, out of our Writers: for the sayde Chronicles reporte, that after he had subdued England, he toke order with King Egelred, whome they name amisse Adelstane, that he shoulde not ordeine any other successor, but only the same Sweyne. Then after this, he returned into Denmarke, where liuing himselfe like a right godly

Prince, at length he there ended his life, being a very old man. But when, or how soeuer he dyed, immediately after his decesse, the Danes elected his son Cnute or Knought to succeede in his dominions. But the Englishmen of nothing more desirous than to shake the yoke of the Danishe thraldome besides their neckes and shoulders, straight wayes vpon knowledge had of Sweynes deathe, with all speede aduertised King Egelred thereof, and that they were ready to receiue and assist him if he would make hast to come ouer to deliuer his countrey out of ẏ hands of strãgers. These newes were right ioyful vnto Egelred, who burning in desire to be reuenged on thẽ that had expulsed him out of his Kingdom, made no long tarriance to put that enterprise forward. But yet doubting ẏ inconstancie of the people, sent his elder son (named Edward) to trie the minds of them, & to vnderstand whether they were cõstant or wauering in ẏ they had promised. The yong Gentleman hasting ouer into Englande, & with diligẽt enquirie perceyuing how they were bent, returned with like speede as he came into Normandie againe, declaring to his father, that all things were in safetie if hee would make hast. K. Egelred then conceiued an assured hope to recouer his Kingdome, ayded wt his brother in lawes power, & trusting vpon ẏ assistance of the Englishmẽ, returned into England in ẏ time of Lẽt. His returne was ioyfull & most acceptable to the English people, as to those that abhorred the rule of ẏ Danes, which was most sharp and bitter to them, although Cnute did what he could by bountifulnesse and curteous dealings to haue retayned

And to ẏ intẽt to procure Gods fauour in the well ordering of things for ẏ administration in ẏ common wealth, he sought te first to appease his wrath, & also to make emends to S. Edmond for his fathers offence committed (as was thought) against him: in so much, ẏ after he had obteyned the Kingdome, he caused a great ditche to be cast round about the land of S. Edmond, & graunted many liberties to the inhabitants, and acquit them of certain taskes and payments, vnto ẏ which other of their neighbors were contributaries. He also builded a Church on ẏ place wher S. Edmond was buried, & ordeined an house of Monkes there, or rather remoued the Canons or secular Priests that were there afore, and put Monkes in their rowmes. He offred vpp also hys Crowne vnto the same S. Edmonde, & redemed it again with a great summe of money, which maner of doing grewe into an vse vnto other kings ẏ folowed him. He adorned ẏ Church there with many riche iewels, and endowed the Monasterie with greate possessions. But these things were not done now at the first, but after that he was stablished in the Kingdome. For in the mean time, after that K. Egelred was returned out of Normandie, Cnute as then sojourning at Farnelbrough, remayned there till the feast of Easter, and made agreemente with them of Lindsey, so that they finding him horses, they should altogither goe forth to spoyle their neighbours. King Egelred aduertised thereof, sped him thither with a mighty host, and with greate cruelty brenned vp the Countrey, and slewe the more part of the inhabitantes, bicause they hadde

Cnute as ẏ was not of power able to resist Egelred, and therefore taking his Ships whiche lay in Humber, fled from thence, & sailed about ẏ coast, til he came to Sandwich, and there sore grieued in his mind to remẽber what mischiefe was fallen & chanced to hys frends & subiects of Lindsey, only for his cause, he cõmanded ẏ such pledges as had bin deliuered to his father by certaine noble men of this Realme, for assurance of theyr fidelities, should haue their noses slit, & their eares stourd, or as some write, their handes and theyr noses cut off.

When

When this cruell acte according to his commaundement was done, he taking the Sea, sayled into Denmarke, but yet he toke not al the Danes with him whiche his father broughte hither, for Earle Turkill perceyuing the welthinesse of ẏ lande, compounded with the Englishmen, and chose rather to remayne in a region replenished with all riches, than to returne home into hys owne countrey that wanted suche commodities as were here to be had. And yet as some thought, hee did not forsake his soueraigne Lorde Cnute for any euill meaning towards him, but rather to ayde him when time serued, to recouer the possession of Englād againe, as it afterwards wel appeared: for notwithstanding that he was now rereyned by King Egelred with fortie shippes, and the floure of all the Danes that were menne of war, so as Cnute returned but with .60. Ships into his countrey, yet shortly after, Earle Turkill with nine of those Ships sailed into Denmarke, submitted himselfe vnto Cnute, counselled him to returne into Englande, and promised him the assistaunce of the residue of those Danish Shippes whiche yet remayned in England, beeing to the number of thirtie, with all the Souldiers and mariners that to them belonged. To conclude, hee did so much by his earnest perswasions, that Cnute (through ayde of his brother Harrold Kyng of Denmarke) gote togither a nauie of two hundred Shippes, so royally decked, furnished, and appoynted, both for braue shewe and necessary furniture of all manner of weapon, armour and munition, as it is strange to consider that whiche is written by them that liued in those dayes, and toke in hand to register the doings of that time. But nowe to returne to our purpose, to shewe what chaunced in Englande after the departure of Cnute. The same yeare vnto these accustomed mischieues an vnwonted misaduenture happened, for the Sea rose with suche high spring tydes, that ouerflowing the countreys nexte adioyning, diuers billages with the inhabitantes were drowned vp and destroyed. Also to encrease the peoples miserie, K. Egelred commaunded, that .xxx. thousande. ℔. shuld be leuied to pay the tribute due to ẏ Danes which lay at Greenewiche.

This yere also, King Egelred held a counsell at Oxforde, at the whiche, a great number of noble men were present, both Danes and Englishmen, and there did the King cause Sigeferd and Morcade two noble personages of the Danes to bee murthered within his owne chamber, by the traytorous practise of Edericke de Streona, whiche accused them of some conspiracie, but the quarrell was onely as men supposed, for that the King had a desire to their goodes and possessions. Their seruauntes toke in hand to haue reuenged the death of their maisters, but were beaten backe, wherevppon, they fledde into the Steeple of S. Friswydes Churche, and kepte the same, till fyre was set vpon the place, and so they were brenned to death. The wife of Sigeferd was taken, and sente to Malmesbury, beeing a woman of hygh fame and greate worthinesse, wherevppon the Kyngs eldest sonne named Edmond, toke occasion vppon pretence of other businesse to goe thyther, and there to see hir, with whome hee fell so farre in loue, that he toke and married hir. That done, hee required to haue hir husbandes landes and possessions, whiche were an Earles lyuing, and lay in Northumberland, and when the K. refused to graunt his request, he goeth thither, and sealed the same possessions and landes into hys hands, without hauing any commission so to do, finding the farmours and tenauntes there ready to receiue him for their Lord. While these things were a doing, Cnute hauing made his prouision of Ships and men, with all necessary furniture (as before yee haue heard) for his returne into England, set forward with full purpose, eyther to recouer the Realme out of Egelredes handes, or to die in the quarrell. Hereupon he landed at Sandwich, and firste Earle Turkill obteyned leence to goe against the Englishmen that were assembled to resist the Danes, and finding them at a place called Scorastan, he gaue them the ouerthrow, gote a great bootie, and returned therewith to the Ships. After this, Eric gouernor of Norway, made a roade likewise into another parte of the countrey, and with a rich spoyle, and many Prisoners, returned vnto the nauie.

After

After this iourney atchieued thus by Eric, Cnute commaunded that they ſhoulde not waſt the countrey any more, but gaue ouer to prepare all thynges ready to beſiege London. But before hee attempted that enterpriſe, as other write, hee marched forth into Kent, or rather ſailing round about that countrey, toke his iourney Weſtward, and came to Fromundham, and after departing from thence, waſted Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, and Wiltſhire. Kyng Egelred in this meane time lay ſicke at Coſſam. His ſonne Edmond had gote togither a mighty hoſt, howbeit, ere hee came to ioyne battayle with his enimies, he was aduertiſed, that Earle Edricke wer about to betray him, and therefore he withdrewe with the army into a place of ſurety. And Edricke to make his traiterous purpoſe manifeſt to the whole worid, fled to the enimies with fortie of the Kings Shippes, fraughte with Daniſhe Souldiers. Herevpon, al the Weſt countrey ſubmitted it ſelfe vnto Cnute, who receyued pledges of the chiefe Lords and Nobles, and then set forward to ſubdue them of Mercia. The people of that countrey woulde not yeelde, but determined to defend the quarrell and title of King Egelred ſo long as they mighte haue any Captayne that would ſtand with them, and help to order them.

In the meane time was King Egelred recouered of his ſickneſſe, and ſent ſommonance forth to rayſe all his power, appoynting euery man to reſort vnto him, that he mighte encounter the enimies and giue them battaile. But yet when his people were aſſembled, hee was warned to take heede to himſelfe, and in any wiſe to beware how he gaue battayle, for his owne ſubiects were purpoſed to betrary him. Herevpon, the armie brake vp, and King Egelrede withdrew to London, there to abide his enimies within walles, with whome in the fielde hee doubteth to trie the battayle. His ſonne Edmond gote him to Utred, an Earle of great power, inhabiting beyond Humber, and perſwading him to ioyne his forces with his, forthe they wente to waſt thoſe countreyes that were become ſubiect to Cnute, as Staffordſhire, Leceſterſhire, and Shropſhire, not ſparing to exerciſe great cruelty vpon the inhabitants, as a puniſhmēt for their reuolting, that other might take enſample thereof. But Cnute perceyuyng whereabout they went, politikely deuiſed to fruſtrate their purpoſe, and with doyng of like hurte in all places where he came, paſſed through Buckinghamſhire, Bedforſhire, Huntingtonſhire, and ſo through the Fennes, came to Stamford, and then entred into Lincolnſhire, and from thence into Notinghamſhire, and ſo into Yorkſhire, not ſparing to do what miſchiefe myght be deuiſed in all places where he came. Uthred aduertiſed hereof, was conſtreyned to departe home to ſaue his owne countrey from preſente deſtruction, and therefore comming backe into Northumberlande, and perceyuing himſelfe not able to reſiſt the puiſſaunt force of his enimies, was conſtreyned to deliuer pledges, and ſubmit hymſelfe vnto Cnute: but yet was hee not hereby warranted from danger, for ſhortly after he was taken, and put to death, and then were his lands giuen vnto one Iricke or Iricius, whome afterward Cnute did baniſhe out of the Realme, bycauſe that he did attempt to chalenge like authoritie to him in all poynts, as Cnute himſelfe had.

with his father. Then didde Cnute take his Shippes, and came about to the coaſt of Kente, preparing to beſiege the Citie of London: but in the meane time, King Egelred ſore wexne with long ſickneſſe, departed this life the. 23. of Apryll, being S. Georges daye, or as other haue, on S. Gregories day, being the twelfth of Marche, but I take this to be an error growen, by miſtakyng the feaſt day of S. Gregory for S. George. Hee raigned the tearme of. 37. yeres, or little leſſe. His body was buryed in the Churche of S. Paule, in the North Ile beſides the Choyre, as by a memoriall there in the wall it may appeare. He had two Wiues as before is mentioned, by Elgiua his firſt Wife, he had iſſue three ſonnes, Edmõd Edwine and Adelſtane, beſides one daughter named Edgiua. By his ſecõd wife Emma, daughter to Richarde the firſte of that name, Duke of Normandy, and ſiſter to Richard the ſecond, he had two ſonnes, Alfride and Edward. This Egelfred as you haue heard, had euill ſucceſſe in his warres againſt the Danes, and beſides the calamitie that fell thereof to his people, many other miſeries oppreſſed this lande in his dayes, not ſo much through his lacke of courage and ſlothfull negligẽce, as by reaſõ of his preſumptuous pryde, wherby he alienated the hartes of his people from him. His affections he could not rule, but was led by them without order of reaſon, for hee did not only diſinherite diuerſe of his owne Engliſh ſubiects without apparant cauſe of offence by plaine forged cauillatiõs, and alſo cauſed all the Danes to be murthered through his Realme in one day, by ſome lighte ſuſpition of their euill meanings, but alſo gaue himſelfe to lecherous luſt, in abuſing his body with naughty ſtrumpets, forſaking the bedde of his owne lawfull wife, to his greate infamie and ſhame of that high degree of Maieſtie, whiche by his Kingly office hee bare and ſuſteyned. To conclude: he was from his tender youth, more apt to idle reſt, than to the exerciſe of warres, more giuen to pleaſures of the body, than to any vertues of the minde, although that toward his latter ende, beeing growen into age, and taught by long experiẽce of worldly affaires, and proofe of paſſed miſeries, hee ſoughte (though in vayne) to haue recouered the decayed ſtate of his common wealth and countrey.

Edmõd Ironſide

After that Kyng Egelred was dead, his eldeſt ſonne Edmond ſurnamed Ironſide was proclaymed K. by the Lõdoners and others, hauing the aſſiſtance of ſome Lordes of the Realme, although the more parte, and ſpecially thoſe of the ſpiritualty fauoured Cnute, becauſe they had afortetime ſworn fealtie to his father. Some write, that Cnute had planted his ſiege both by water & land very ſtrongly about the Citie of London before Egelred departed this life, and immediately vppon his deceſſe, was receyued into the Citie, but the army that was within the Citie, not conſenting vnto the ſurrender made by the Citizens, departed the night before the day on the whych Cnute by appoyntment ſhould enter, and in company of Edmonde Ironſide (whome they had choſen to be their King and gouernour) they prepared to increaſe their numbers with newe ſupplies, meaning eftſoones to trie the fortune of battell againſte the Daniſh power. Cnute perceyuing the moſt parte of all the Realme to bee thus againſt him, and hauing no great confidẽce in the loyaltie of the Londoners, toke order to leauie money for the payment of his menne of warre and Mariners that belonged to his nauie, left the Citie, and embarquing himſelfe, ſayled to the Ile of Sheppey, and there remayned all the Winter. In whiche meane while, Edmonde Ironſide came to London, where he was ioyfully receyued of the Citizens, and continuing there till the ſpring of the yere, made himſelfe ſtrong againſt the enimies.

The author of the Booke entituled Encomiũ Emmæ ſaith, that it was reported that Edmond offered the combate vnto Cnute at this his going frõ the citie, but Cnute refuſed it.

This Edmond for his noble courage, ſtrẽgth of body, and notable patience to endure and ſuffer all ſuche hardneſſe and paynes as is requiſite in a man of warre, was ſurnamed Ironſide, and began his raigne in the yere of our Lord. 1016. in the ſixteenth yeare of the Emperour Henry the ſecond ſurnamed Claudius, in the twentith yere of the raigne of Robert King of Fraunce, and about the ſixth yeare of Malcolme the ſeconde K. of the Scottes. After that Kyng Edmund hadde receyued the Crowne in the Citie of Londō by ẏ hands of the Archb. of Yorke, he aſſembled togyther ſuch a power as he cold make, & with ẏ ſame marched forthe towardes the Weſt partes, and made the countrey ſubiect to him. In the meane time was Cnute proclayned and ordeyned K. at Southampton by the Biſhops and Abbots, and diuers Lordes alſo of the Temporaltie there togyther aſſembled, vnto whome he ſware to bee their good and faithfull ſouereigne, and that hee would ſee Juſtice truely and vprightly miniſtred. Then after hee had ended his buſineſſe at Southampton, hee drewe with his people towards London, and comming thither, beſieged the Citie both by water and lande, cauſing a great trenche to be caſt about it, ſo that no man might eyther get in or come forth. Many greate aſſaultes he cauſed to bee gyuen vnto the Citie, but the Londoners and others within ſo valiantly defended the walles and gates, that the enimies gote ſmall aduauntage, and at length were conſtreyned to depart with loſſe. Cnute then perceiuing that he might not haue his purpoſe there, withdrewe Weſtward, and beſides Gillingham in Dorſetſhire, encountred with K. Edmund in the Rogation weeke, and after ſore and ſharp battayle, was put to the worſe, and conſtreyned to forſake the fielde by the high prowes and manhode of the ſayde Edmund. King Cnute ẏ ſame nighte, after the armies were ſeuered, departed towards Wincheſter, ſo to get himſelfe out of danger. Shortly after, King Edmund hearing that an other army of the Danes had beſieged Saliſbury, he marched thither to ſuccour them within, and immediatly Cnute followed him, ſo that at a place in Worceterſhire called Scorſtan, on ẏ foure and twentith of June, they encountred togyther, and fought a right cruell battayle, which at length the nighte parted with equall fortune. And likewiſe on the next day they buckled togyther agayne, and fought with like ſucceſſe as they hadde done the day before, for towardes euening they gaue ouer well wearied, and not knowyng to Writers haue reported, that this ſeconde daye when Duke Edricke perceyued the Engliſhmen to be at poynte to haue gote the vpper hande, hee withdrewe aſide, and hauing by chaunce ſlayne a common Souldioure called Osmear, which in viſage muche reſembled King Edmunde, hee cut off his head, helde it vp, and ſhaking his ſworde bloudy with the ſlaughter, cried to the Engliſhmen, flee ye wretches, flee and get away, for your Kyng is dead, behold here his head which I hold in my hands. Herewith had the Engliſhmenne fled immediately, if King Edmunde aduiſed of this ſtratageme, had not quickly gote him to an high ground wher his men might ſee him aliue & luſtie. Herewith alſo ẏ traytor Edricke eſcaped hardly ẏ daunger of death, ẏ Engliſhmen ſhot ſo egrely at him. At length as is ſaid, the night parting them in ſunder, they withdrewe the one army from the other, as it had bin by conſent.

The third day they remayned in armour, but yet abſteyning from battayle, ſate ſtill, in taking meate and drinke to releeue their wearied bodies, and after gathered in heapes the dead carcaſes that had beene ſlayne in the former fighte, the nūber of which on eyther partie reconed, roſe to the poynt of twentie thouſand and aboue.

by the naute of the Danes. King Edmond in the morning when the lighte had diſcouered the departure of his enimies, followed thē by the traĉt, and comming to London with ſmall adoe, remoued the ſiege, and entred the Citie like a conquerour. Shortly after he foughte with ỹ Danes at Brentford, and gaue them a great ouerthrow. In this meane while, Queene Emme the widdow of King Egelred, doubting the fortune of the warre, ſente hir two ſonnes Alfred and Edwarde ouer into Normandy vnto hir brother Duke Richard, or rather fled thither hirſelfe with them (as ſome write.) Moreouer, Earle Edricke perceyuing the great manhode of K. Edmund, began to feare, leaſt in the ende he ſhoulde ſubdue and vanquiſhe the Danes, wherefore hee foughte meanes to conclude a peace, and take ſuche order with him as might ſtand with both their contentations, which ere long he brought about. And this was done as you ſhall heare by the conſente of Cnute (as ſome write) to the intente that Edricke being had in truſt with King Edmunde, mighte the more eaſily deuiſe wayes how to betray him. Cnute diſappoynted of his purpoſe at London, fetching a greate booty and pray out of the coūtreys next adioyning, repaired to his ſhips, to ſee what order was amongſt them, the whych a little before were withdrawen into the Riuer that paſſeth by Rocheſter called Medway. Heere Cnute remayned certayne dayes, both to aſſemble a greater power, and alſo to hearken & learne what his enimies meant to do, the which he eaſily vnderſtode. For K. Edmund who hated nothing worſe thā to linger his buſineſſe, aſſembled his people, and marching forwarde towarde hys enimies, approched neere vnto them, and pighte downe his tents not farre frō his enimies camp, exhorting his people to remember their paſſed victories, and to doe their good willes, at length by one battayle, ſo to ouerthrowe them, that they mighte make an ende of the warre, and diſpatche them cleerely out of the Realme. He ſo much encouraged his Souldiers with theſe and the lyke wordes, that they diſdeyning thus to haue the enimies dayly to prouoke them, and to put them to trouble, with egre mindes and fierce courages offered battayle to the Danes, whiche Cnute had prepared to receyue whenſoeuer the Engliſhmē approched: and heerewith bringing his men into aray, he came forth to meete his enimies. Then was the battaile begunne with great earneſtneſſe on both ſides, and continued foure houres, till at length the Danes begaune ſomewhat to ſhrinke, which when Cnute perceyued, hee commaunded his Horſemen to come forward into the forepart of his hoſt. But whileſt one parte of the Danes giue backe with feare, and the other come ſlowly forwarde, the array of the whole army is broken, and then without reſpect of ſhame they fledde amayne, ſo that there dyed that daye of Cnutes ſide foure thouſand and fiue hundred men, and of Kyng Edmunds ſide, not paſt ſixe hundred, and thoſe were footemen. This battell was foughte as ſhoulde appeare by dyuers writers, at Okeford or Otesforde. It was thought, that if king Edmund had purſued the victory and followed in chaſe of his enimies in ſuche wiſe as hee lykely might haue done, hee had made that day an ende of the warres: but he was counſelled by Edricke as ſome write, in no condition to folow them, but to ſtay and gyue tyme to hys people to refreſhe theyr weery bodyes. And ſo Cnute with his army paſſed ouer the Thames into Eſſex, and there aſſembled all his power togither, and began to ſpoyle and waſt the countrey on eathe hande. King Edmund aduertiſed thereof, haſted forthe to ſuccoure his people, and at Aſhdone in Eſſex three miles from Saffron Walde gaue battayle to Cnute, where after ſore and cruell fight continued with greate ſlaughter on both ſides a long time, Duke Edricke fledde to the comforte of the Danes, and to the diſcomfort of the Engliſhmē: ſo that Kyng Edmunde was conſtreyned in the ende to depart out of the fielde, hauing firſte done all that could be wiſhed in a worthy Chieftayne, both by wordes to encourage his men, and by deedes to ſhewe them good example, ſo that at one time the Danes were at poynte to haue gyuen backe, but that Cnute aduiſed thereof, ruſhed into the left wing where moſt daunger was, and ſo relieued his people there, that finally the Engliſhmen, both awearied with long fight, and alſo diſcouraged with the running away of ſome of theyr company, were conſtreyned to giue ouer, and by flighte to ſeeke their ſafegarde, ſo that K. Edmund myght not by any meanes bring them agayne into order. Hereuppon all the wayes and paſſages beeyng forelayde and ſtopped by the enimies, the Engliſhmenne wanting bothe carriage to make longer reſiſtaunce, and perceyning no hope to reſt in fleeing, were beaten downe and ſlayne in heapes, ſo that fewe eſcaped from that dreadfull and bloudy battayle.

There dyed on Kyng Edmundes ſyde, Duke Edmund, Duke Alfricke, and Duke Godwin, with Earle Alfketell, or Urchell of Eaſt Angle, and Duke Ayleward, that was ſonne to Ardelwine, late Duke of Eaſt Angle, and to bee briefe, all the floure of the Engliſhe nobilitie.

There was alſo ſlayne at this battayle many renoumed perſons of the ſpiritualty, as ỹ Biſhoppe of Lincolne, and the Abbot of Ramſey, with other. Kyng Edmund eſcaping away, gote him into Glocesterſhire, and there began to rayſe a new army.

King Edmund withdraweth into Glocesterſhire.

In

In the place where this field was fought, are yet ſeuen or eyght hilles, wherein the carcaſſes of them that were ſlayne at the ſame field, were buried, and one beeing digged downe of late, there were foũd two bodies in a coffin of ſtone, of whiche the one lay with his head towards the others foote, and many chaynes of iron, like to the water chaynes of the bittes of Horſes were found in the ſame hill. But nowe to the matter, in the meane while that Edmonde was buſie to leauie a newe army in Glowceſt. and other parties of Mercia, Cnute hauing got ſo great a victory, receiued into his obeiſance, not only ẏ Citie of Londõ, but alſo many other Cities and townes of great name, & ſhortly after haſted forward to purſue his enimie K. Edmũd, who was ready with a mighty hoſte to trie the vttermoſt chaunce of battayle if they ſhoulde eftſoones ioyne.

Polidor. Mat. VVeſt. Herevpon, both the armies being ready to giue the onſet, the one in ſyghte of the other at a place called Dearehurſt, nere to the Riuer of Seuerne, by the drifte of Duke Edrick, who then at lẽgth, beganne to ſhewe ſome token of good meanyng, the two Kings came to a communication, and in the end concluded an agreement, as ſome haue written, without any more adoe.

Simon Dun. Other write, that when both the armies were at poynte to haue ioyned, one of the Captaynes, but whether he were a Dane or an Engliſhmã, it is not certaynely tolde, ſtood vp in ſuch a place, as he mighte be hearde of both the Princes, and boldly vttered hys wordes in forme followyng.

Math. Weſt. ſayth this was Eadricke.

The ſaying of a Captayne. We haue moſt worthy Chiefetaynes fought long ynoughe one againſte another, there hathe bene but to muche bloud ſhed betweene both the Nations, and the valiancie of the Soudiours on both ſides is ſufficiently ynough tried, & eyther of your manhods lykewiſe, & yet cã you beare neyther good nor euill fortune, if the one of you win the battayle, he purſueth him ẏ is ouercome, and if hee chaunce to be vanquiſhed, hee reſteth not till he haue recouered newe ſtrengthe to fight eftſoones with him that is victor. What ſhoulde you meane by this youre inuincible courage? At what marke ſhooteth youre greedy deſire to beare rule, and youre exceſſiue thirſt to atteyne honor? if you fyghte for a Kyngdome, deuide it betweene you two, which ſometume was ſufficient for ſeuen Kyngs, but if you couet to winne fame and glorious renowme, and for the ſame are driuen to trie the hazarde, whether yee ſhall commaund or obey, deuiſe the way whereby ye maye without ſo greate ſlaughter, and without ſuche pitifull bloudſhed of both youre giltleſſe peoples, trie whether of you is moſt worthy to be preferred.

Thus made hee an ende, and the two Princes allowed well of his laſt motion, and ſo order was taken, that they ſhould fighte togither in a ſingular combate within a little Flande encloſed with the Riuer of Seuerne called Olney, with condition, that whether of them chaunced to be Victor, ſhould be King, and the other to reſigne hys title for euer into his hands.

The two Princes entring into the place, appointed in faire armoure, beginne the battaile in ſight of both their armies, raunged in goodly order on eyther ſide the Riuer, with doubtfull mindes, and nothing ioyfull, as they that wauered betwixt hope and feare. The two Champions manfully aſſaile eyther other, without ſparing. Firſt, they went to it on horſebacke, and Mat. W after on foote. Cnute was a man of a meane ſtature, but yet ſtrong and hardy, ſo that receyuing a great blowe by the hande of his aduerſary, whiche cauſed him ſomewhat to ſtagger, hee yet recouered himſelfe agayne, and boldly ſtepte forwarde to bee reuenged, but perceyuing hee coulde

not find aduantage, and that he was rather too weake, and ſhrewdly ouermatched, he ſpake to Edmunde, with a lowde voyce on this wyſe: What neceſſitie (ſayth he) ought thus to moue vs, moſt valiant prince, that for the atteyning of a kingdome, we ſhould thus put our lyues in danger, better were it that laying armoure and malice aſide, wee ſhoulde condeſcende to ſome reaſonable agreement: lette vs become ſworne brethren, and parte the kyngdome betwixt vs: And let vs deal ſo frendly, that thou mayeſt vſe my things as thyne owne, and I thyne as though they were myne.

King Edmunde with thoſe wordes of his aduerſarie was ſo pacified, that immediately he caſte awaye his ſworde, and comming to Cnute, ioyneth hands with him. Both the armies by their enſample did the lyke, which looked for the ſame fortune to fall to their countreys, whiche ſhoulde happen to their Princes by the ſucceſſe of that one battayle.

After this there was an agreement deuiſed betwixt them, ſo that a partition of the realm was made, and that part that lieth foreaneinſt Fraunce, was aſſigned to Edmunde, and the other fell to Cnute.

Ther be that write, how the offer was made by king Edmunde for the auoyding of more bloudſhed, that the two Princes ſhould try the matter thus togither in a ſingular combate. But Cnute refuſed the combate, becauſe (as he alledged) the matche was not equall. For although he was able to matche Edmund in boldneſſe of ſtomacke, yet was he far to weake to deale with a man of ſuche ſtrength as Edmunde was knowne to bee.

But ſith they did pretend title to the realme by due and good directe meanes, he thoughte it moſte conuenient, that the kingdom ſhould be deuided betwixt them. This motion was allowed of bothe the Armies, ſo that Kyng Edmunde was of force conſtrayned to bee contented therewith. Thus our common writers haue recorded of this agreement, but if I ſhould not be thought preſumptuous, in taking vppon mee to reproue, or rather but to myſtruſt that whiche hath bin receyued for a true narration in this matter, I would rather giue credite vnto that whiche the authoure of the booke intituled by ſome Encomium Emmæ, dothe repoꝛte in this behalfe. Whiche is, that thoꝛough perſwaſion of Edꝛike de Streona, Kyng Edmunde immediatlye after the battayle fought at Aſhdonne, ſente Imbaſſadoꝛs vnto Cnute, to offer vnto hym peace, wyth halfe the Realme of Englande, that is to witte, the noꝛthe partes, wyth condition that King Edmunde myghte quyetly enioye the South parte, and thereuppon to haue pledges delyuered interchaungeably on eyther ſide. Cnute hauing heard the effecte of thys meſſage, ſtayed to make aunſwere tyll he had vnderſtoode what hys counſell woulde aduyſe hym to doe in thys behalfe: and vppon good deliberation taken in the matter, conſidꝛeyng that he had loſte no ſmall number of people in the foꝛmer battayle, and that being farre out of his countrey, he coulde not well haue anye newe ſupplye, where the Engliſhemen although they hadde lykewyſe loſte very manye of their menne of warre, yet beeyng in theyꝛ owne countrey, it ſhoulde bee an eaſye matter for them to reſtoꝛe theyꝛ decayed nnmbers, it was thought expedient by the whole conſente of all the Daniſhe Capitayns, that the offer of kyng Edmunde ſhoulde bee accepted. And herevpon Cnute calling the Imbaſſadours afoꝛe hym agayne, declared vnto them, that hee was contented to conclude a peace vppon ſuche conditions as they hadde offered: but yet with thys addition, that their King whatſoeuer he ſhoulde bee, ſhoulde pay Cnutes ſouldiours their wages, with money to bee leuied of that parte of the Kingdome whiche the Engliſh king ſhoulde poſſeſſe. For this (ſayth he) I haue vndertaken to ſee them payde, and otherwyſe I wyll not graunte to any peace. The league and agreement therfoꝛe beyng concluded in this foꝛte, pledges are deliuered and receyued on both partes, and the armies diſcharged. But God (ſayth myne Authour) being myndefull of his olde doctrine, That euery kingdome diuided in it ſelfe can not long ſtande, ſhoꝛtely after tooke Edmunde oute of this lyfe: and by ſuche meanes ſeemed to take pitie of the Engliſhe kingdome, leaſt if bothe the kinges ſhoulde haue continued in life together, they ſhoulde haue liued in daunger. And incontinently herevpon was Cnute choſen and receyued for abſolute King of all the whole Realme of Englande.

Thus hath he written that lyued in thoſe dayes, whoſe credite thereby is muche aduanced. Howbeit the common repoꝛte of writers touchyng the deathe of Edmunde varyeth from this, who doe affirme, that after Cnute and Edmund were made friends, the ſerpent of enuie and falſe conſpiracie, brent ſo in the hearts of ſome traiterous perſons, that within a while after king Edmund was ſlain at Oxforde, as he ſatte on a priuie to doe the neceſſaries of Nature. K. Edmunde traiterouſly ſlaine at Oxforde.

The common repoꝛte hath gone, that Erle Edꝛicke was the procurer of this villainous acte, and that (as ſome write) his ſonne did it. Fabian. Simon Dun.

But the ſame authour that wrote Encomium Emmæ, wryting of the death of Edmunde hath theſe woꝛdes, (immediatly after hee hath firſte declared in what ſoꝛte the two Pꝛinces weꝛe agreed, and had made partition of the realme betwixt them:) But GOD (ſayeth he) beyng myndefull of his olde doctrine, That euery kingdome deuided in it ſelf can not long ſtand, ſhoꝛtly after toke Edmunde out of this lyfe: and by ſuche meanes ſeemed to take pitie vpon the Engliſhe kingdome, leaſt if bothe the kings ſhoulde haue continued in lyfe togither, they ſhould bothe haue liued in great daunger, (and the Realme in trouble.

Wyth this agreeth alſo Simon Dunelmenſis, who ſayeth, that Kyng Edmunde dyed of naturall ſickeneſſe, by courſe of kynde at London, aboute the feaſt of Saincte Andꝛewe nexte enſuyng the late mencioned agreement.

Fabian.

And this ſhoulde ſeeme true: foꝛ wheras theſe Authours whiche repoꝛte, that Earle Edꝛyke was the pꝛocurer of his death, they alſo wꝛite, that when he knewe the acte to be done, hee haſted vnto Cnute, and declared vnto hym what he had bꝛought to paſſe foꝛ his aduauncement to the gouernement of the whole realme.

Wherevppon Cnute abhoꝛryng ſuche a deteſtable facte, ſayde vnto hym: Becauſe thou haſte foꝛ my ſake, made awaye the woꝛthyeſt bodye of the woꝛld, I ſhall rayſe thy head aboue all the Lꝛdes of Englande, and ſo cauſed him to be put to death. Thus haue ſome bookes.

Howbeit this repoꝛte agreeth not with other wꝛiters whiche declare howe Cnute aduaunced Edꝛyke in the beginning of his reigne vnto high honour, and made hym gouernour of Mercia, and vſed his counſell in manye things after the death of king Edmund, as in baniſhing Edwin, the bꝛother of kyng Edmunde, with his ſonnes alſo, Edmunde and Edward.

His body was buryed at Glaſtenbury, neere his vncle king Edgar.

With thys Edmunde, ſurnamed Ironſyde, fell the gloꝛious Maieſtie of the Engliſh kingdome: The whiche afterwarde as it had beene an aged bodye beyng ſoꝛe decayed and weakened by the Danes, that nowe got poſſeſſion of the whole, yet ſomewhat recouered after the ſpace of .xxvj. yeres, vnder kyng Edward, ſurnamed the Confeſſoꝛ: and ſhoꝛtely therevpon as it had bin falne into a reſiluation, came to extreme ruine by the inuaſion and conqueſt of the Noꝛmans: as after by gods good helpe and fauoꝛable aſſiſtance it ſhall appeare.

Canute oꝛ Cnute.

CInute, oꝛ Cnute, whom the engliſh Chꝛonicles doe name Knought, after the deathe of Kyng Edmunde, toke vpon hym the whole rule ouer all the realme of Englande in the yeare of our Lord. 1017. in the .xvij. yeare of the emperoꝛ Henry the ſeconde, ſurnamed Claudus, in

the. xx. yeare of the reigne of Roberte king of France, and aboute the. xij. yeare of the reigne of Malcolme king of Scotlande.

Canute ſhortely after the death of king Edmunde, aſſembled a Councell at London, in the whiche he cauſed all the nobles of the realme to do vnto him homage, in receiuing an othe of loyall obeyſance. Hee deuided the realme into foure parts, aſſigning Northumberlande vnto the rule of Irke or Iricius, Mercia vnto Edzike, & Eaſtangle vnto Turkyl, reſeruing the weſt part to his own gouernance. He baniſhed (as before is ſayd) Edwyn, the brother of king Edmunde, but ſuch as was ſuſpected to bee culpable of Edmundes death, he cauſed to be put to execution, wherof it ſhould appeare, that Edzick was not then in any wyſe detected or once thought to bee giltie. The forſayd Edwyn afterwards returned, and was then reconciled to the Kings fauour (as ſome do write) and was ſhortly after trayterouſly ſlaine by his owne ſeruants. He was called the king of Churles. Other write, that he came ſecretely into the realme after he had bin baniſhed, and keeping him ſelf cloſely out of ſighte, at length ended his lyfe, and was buried at Tauceſtocke.

Moreouer Edwyn and Edwarde the ſonnes of king Edmund were baniſhed the lande, and ſent firſt vnto Sweno king of Norway to haue bin made awaye: but Sweno vppon remorſe of conſcience ſent them into Hungarie, where they founde great fauour at the handes of king Salomon, in ſo muche that Edmunde married the daughter of the ſame Salomon, but had no iſſue by hir. Edward was aduaunced to marry with Agatha, the daughter of the Emperour Henrye, and by hir had iſſue two ſonnes, Edmunde and Edgar, ſurnamed Adelyng, & as many daughters, Margarete and Chriſtine, of the whiche in place conuenient more ſhall be ſayd.

When Kyng Cnute hadde eſtabliſhed thynges, as hee thoughte, ſtoode moſte to his ſuretie, he called to remembrance, that he had no iſſue but two baſtarde ſonnes Harrolde and Sweno, begotten of his concubine Alwyne. Wherfore he ſent ouer vnto Richarde Duke of Normandie, requiring that he might haue Queene Emme, the widow of king Egelred in mariage, & ſo obteyned hir, not a little to the wonder of manye, which thought a great ouerſight both in the woman and in hir brother, that would ſatisfye the requeſte of Cnute herein, conſidering hee hadde bin ſuch a mortall enimie to hir former huſband. But Duke Richarde did not only conſent, that hys ſayd ſiſter ſhould be maryed vnto Cnute, but alſo he hymſelfe toke to wyfe the Lady Heſtritha, ſyſter to the ſayd Cnute.

Heere ye haue to vnderſtande, that this mariage was not made without greate conſideration and large couenants granted on the part of king Cnute: for before he could obtain queene Emme to his wife, it was fully condiſcended and agreed that after Cnutes deceaſſe, the crowne of Englande ſhould remaine vnto the iſſue borne of this mariage betwixte hir and Cnute, whiche couenant although it was not perfourmed immediatly after the deceaſſe of kyng Cnute, yet in the ende it toke place, ſo as the right ſeemed to bee deferred, and not to be taken awaye nor aboliſhed: for immediatly vpon Haroldes death that had vſurped, Hardicnute ſucceeded as right heire to the crown, by force of the agreement made at the tyme of the mariage ſolemniſed betwixt his father and mother, and being once eſtabliſhed in the Kingdome, hee ordeyned his brother Edwarde to ſucceede hym, whereby the Danes were vtterly excluded from all ryghte that they hadde to pretende vnto the Crowne of this land, and the Engliſhe bloud reſtored thereto, chiefly by that gracious concluſion of this mariage betwixt king Cnute and Queene Emme: for the which no ſmall prayſe was thoughte to bee due vnto the ſayd Queene, ſith by hir politike gouernement, in making hir matthe ſo beneficiall to hir ſelfe and hir lyne, the Crowne was thus recouered out of the handes of the Danes, and reſtored againe in time to the right heire, as by an auncient treatiſe whiche ſome haue intitled Encomium Emmæ, and was written in thoſe dayes it doth and may appere. Whiche booke although there bee but fewe Copies therof abroade, gyueth vndoubtedly greate light to the hiſtorie of that tyme.

The couenants made at the mariage betwixt Cnute and Emme.

The Engliſhe bloud reſtored.

The praiſe of Queene Emme for hir wiſedome.

En comium Emmæ.

But nowe to our purpoſe. Cnute the ſame yeare in whiche he was thus maryed, thorought perſwaſion of his wyfe Queene Emme, ſent away the Daniſhe nauie & armie home into Denmark, giuing to them fourſcore and two thouſande pounds of ſiluer, whiche was leuied throughout this lande for their wages. Mat. VVeſt.

In the yeare a thouſande and eighteene, Edzycke de Streona Erle of Mercia, was ouerthrowen in his owne turne: for being called afore the King into his priuie chamber, and there in reaſoning the matter about ſome quarell that was piked to him, hee begaunne very preſumptuouſly to vpbrayde the king of ſuche pleaſures as he had before tyme done vnto him: I did (ſayde he) for the loue which I bare towardes you, forſake my ſouereigne Lorde king Edmunde, and at length for your ſake ſlewe him. VVil. Mal.

At whiche wordes, Cnute beganne to change countenaunce, as one meruaylouſly abaſhed, and ſtreightwayes gaue ſentence againſt Edzike in this wiſe: Thou art worthy (ſaith he) of death, and dye thou ſhalte, whiche art giltie of treaſon both towardes God and me, ſith that thou haſt ſlayne thyne owne ſouereigne Lorde, and my deare alyed brother. Thy bloud therfore be vpon thyne owne head, ſith thy toung hath vttered thy treaſon. And immediatly hee cauſed his throate to be cut, and his bodie to be throwen out at the chamber windowe into the riuer of Thames.

Edrike put to death.

This was the ende of Edryke, ſurnamed de Stratten, or Streona, a man of greate infamie for his craftie diſſimulation, falſhod and treaſon, vſed by him to the ouerthrowe of the Engliſhe eſtate, as partly before is touched.

But ther be that concerning the cauſe of this Edriks death, ſeeme partly to diſagree from that whyche before is recited, declaryng that Cnute ſtanding in ſome doubt to be betrayed thorough the treaſon of Edricke, ſoughte occaſions howe to ryddе him and other (whome hee lykewyſe myſtruſted) out of the waye. And therfore one daye when Edryke craued ſome preferremente at Cnutes handes, and alledged that he had deſerued to be wel thought of, ſith by his flight from the battaile at Aſhendone, the victorie therby inclined vnto Cnutes parte. Cnute hearing hym ſpeake theſe wordes, made this aunſwere: And canſt thou (quoth he) be true to me, that thorough fraudulent meanes diddeſt deceyue thy ſouerain Lorde and maiſter? but I will reward thee according to thy deſertes, ſo as from henceforth thou ſhalte not deceyue any other, and ſo forthwith cõmaunded Erick one of his chief captains to diſpatch him, who incõtinẽtly cut off his head with his axe or halbert. Verily Simon Dunelmenſ. ſayth, kyng Cnute vnderſtanding in what ſorte both king Egelred, and his ſonne king Edmunde Ironſide had bin betrayed by the ſayde Edricke, he ſtoode in great doubt to be lykewyſe deceyued by him, and therfore was glad to haue ſome pretended quarrell, to diſpatche both hym and other, whome he lykewyſe myſtruſted, as it well appeared. For at the ſame tyme there were put to death with Edricke Earle Norman the ſonne of earle Leofwyn, and brother to Earle Leofryke: alſo Adelwarde the ſonne of Earle Agelmare and Brightricke the ſonne of Alfegus gouernour of Deuonſhire (without all guilt or cauſe as ſome wryte.) And in place of Norman his brother Leofryke was made earle of Mercia by the king, and had in great fauour.

This Leofricke is cõmonly alſo by writers named Earle of Cheſter.

After this, likewiſe Cnute baniſhed Iric and Turkyll, two Danes, the one (as before is recited) gouernor of Northumberland, and the other of Norfolke and Suffolk, or Eaſtangle.

Then reſted the whole rule of the realme in the kings hands, wherupon he ſtudied to preſerue the people in peace, and ordeyned lawes according to the whiche, bothe Danes and Engliſhemenne ſhoulde bee gouerned in equall ſtate and degree.

Diuers greate lordes whome hee founde vnfaithfull or rather ſuſpected, he put to death, as before ye haue hearde) beſyde ſuche as he baniſhed out of the Realme. He rayſed a taxe or tribute of the people, amounting to the ſumme of fourſcore & two thouſand pound, beſide. xj. M. pound which the Londoners payde towards the maintenance of the Daniſh Armie onely in Englande, but alſo in Denmarke, and elſewhere.

In the thirde yeare of his reigne hee ſayled with an armie of Engliſhemen and Danes into Denmarke to ſubdue the Vandals there, whiche then ſore annoyed and warred agaynſt his ſubiectes of Denmarke.

King Cnute paſſeth into Denmarke.

Erle Godwyn his ſeruice in Denmarke.

Erle Godwyn which had the ſouerain conduct of the Engliſhmen, the night before the day appoynted for the battayle gote him forthe of the campe with his people, & ſodeynly aſſaylyng the Vandals in their lodgings, eaſily diſtreſſed them ſleaing a great number of them, and chaſing the reſidue. In the morning early when Cnute herd that the Engliſhemen were gone forth of their lodgings, he ſuppoſed that they were eyther fled awaye, or elſe tourned to take part with the enimies. But as he approched to the enimies campe he vnderſtode howe the matter wente, for hee founde nothyng there but bloud, deade bodyes, and the ſpoyle.

For thys good ſeruice, Cnute had the engliſhmen men in more eſtimation euer after, and highely reward ded they ye leader the ſame Earle Godwin.

When Cnute had ordered all things in Denmarke, as was thoughte behouefull, he returned agayne into Englande. And within a few dayes after, hee was aduertiſed that the Swedeners made warre againſt his ſubiectes of Denmarke, vnder the leading of two greate Princes. Vlfe and Eulafe.

Cnute therefore to defende his dominions in thoſe parties, paſſed agayne with an armie into Denmarke, encountred with his enimies, and receyued a greate ouerthrowe, loſing a greate number both of his Danes and Engliſhemen. But gathering togither a newe force of nienne, he ſette agayne vpon his enimies, and ouercame them, conſtrayning the two foreſayd Princes to agree vpon reaſonable conditions of peace.

Mathewe Weſtm. recounteth, that at thys tyme Earle Godwyn, and the Engliſhmenne wrought the enterprile aboue mentioned, of aſſaultyng the enimies campe in the night ſeaſon, after Cnute had fyrſte loſte in the daye before no ſmall number of his people. And that then the foreſayde princes or kyngs, as hee nameth them Vlfus and Eulafus, which latter he calleth Eiglafe, were conſtrayned to agree vpon a peace.

The Daniſh Chronicles alledge, that the occaſion of this warre roſe hereof: This Olauus ayded Cnute (as the ſame writers reporte) againſt kyng Edmunde and the Engliſhemenne. But when the peace ſhould be made betweene Cnute and Edmunde, there was no conſideration had of Olauus: where as throughe hym the Danes chiefly obteyned the victorie.

Herevpon Olauus was ſore offended in hys mynde againſte Cnute, and nowe vpon occaſion ſought to be reuenged. But what ſoeuer the cauſe was of this warre betwixte theſe two Princes, the ende was thus: That Olauus was expulſed out of his kingdom, and conſtrained to flee to Eer thallans, a duke in the parties of Caſtlande.

And afterwarde returning into Norwaye, was ſlayne by ſuche of his ſubiectes, as toke part with Cnute, in manner as in the hiſtorie of Norway, it appereth more at large, with the contrarietie found in the writing of them which haue recorded the hiſtories of thoſe North regions.

But here is to be remembred, that the fame and glorie of the Engliſh nation was greately aduaunced in theſe warres, as well againſte the Swedeners as the Norwegians: ſo that Cnute began to lone and truſt the Engliſhmen muche better than it was thought he woulde euer haue done. Shortly after that Cnute was returned into Englande, that is to wit (as ſome haue) in the. xv. yeare of his reigne, he went to Rome to perform his vow which he had made to viſite the places where the Apoſtles Peter and Paule had their burial. He was honorably receyued of Pope John the xx. that then held the ſea. When he had done his deuotion there, hee returned into Englande. In the yeare following, he made a iourney againſt the Scottes, whiche as then had rebelled. But by the princely power of Cnute, they were ſubdued and brought agayne to obedience: ſo that not onely king Malcolme, but alſo two other kinges Melbeath and Jeohmare, became his ſubiectes. Finally after that this noble prince king Cnute had reigned the tearme of. xx. yeares currant, after the death of Ethelred, hee died at Shaftesbury, as the engliſhe writers affirme, the. xij. daye of Nouember, and was buried at Wincheſter. But the Daniſh chronicles record, that he died in Normandie, and was buryed at Roan (as in the ſame Chronicles ye maye reade more at large.) This Cnute was the mightyeſt prince that euer reigned ouer the Englishe people: for he had the soueraigne rule ouer al Denmark, Englande, Norway, Scotland, & part of Sweden. Amongst other of his royall actes, he caused suche tolles and tallages as were demaunded of waygoers at bridges & streetes in the high waye betwixte Englande and Rome to be diminished to the halfes, and agayne got also a moderation to be had in the payemente of the Archbishoppes fees of his realme, whiche was leuied of them in the Court of Rome when they shoulde receyue their palles, as may appeare by a letter which he himselfe being at Rome, directed to the Bishops and other of the nobles of England. In the whiche it also appeareth, that besides the royal entertaynment, which he had at Rome of pope John, he had conference there with the Emperor Conrade, & with Rafe king of Burgoingne, and with many other great princes and noble men, which were present there at that time. Which at his request in fauor of those Englishmē that shuld trauaile to Rome, graunted (as we haue said) to diminish such duties as were gathered of passingers. He receyued there many great giftes of the Emperor, and was highly honored of him, and likewise of the Pope, & of al other the high princes at that tyme present at Rome: so that when hee came home (as some write) hee shoulde growe greatly into pride, insomuche that being neere to the Thames, or rather (as other write) vppon the sea stronde, neere to Southhampton, and perceyuyng the water to ryse, by reason of the tyde, hee caste off his gowne, and wrappyng it rounde togither, threwe it on the sandes beyne neere the increasing water, and sate him downe vpon it, speaking this or the lyke wordes to the sea. Thou art (sayth he) within the compasse of my dominion, and the grounde whereon I sitte is myne, and thou knowest that no wyght dare disobey my cōmandements, I therfore do now commaund thee not to ryse vpon my grounde, nor to presume to wet any part of thy soueraine Lorde and gouernour. But the sea keeping his course, rose still higher and higher, and ouerflowed not only the kings feete, but also flashed vp vnto his legs & knees. Wherwith the king starte sodenly vp, & withdrew from it, saying withal to his nobles that were about him: Behold you noble men, you cal me king, which can not somuch as stay by my cōmaundement this smal portion of water. But knowe ye for certaine, that there is no king but the father only of our Lord Jesus Chriſte, with whome he reigneth, and at whose becke all things are gouerned, let vs therfore honour him, let vs confesse and professe him to bee the ruler of heauen, earth, and sea, and besides him none other. From thence he went to Winchester and there with his own hands set his crown vpō the head of the image of the Crucifix, which stode there in the church of the Apostles Peter & Paul, and frō thenceforth he wold neuer weare ỳ crown nor any other. Some write, that he spake not the former words to ỳ sea vpon any presumptuousnes of mynd, but only vpon occasion of the vain title, which in his cōmendation one of his gētlemen gaue him by way of flatterie (as he rightly toke it) for he called him the most mightiest king of all kings, which ruled most at large both men sea and land. Therfore to reproue the vayn flatterie of such vain persons, he deuised such maner of mean as before is mencioned: wherby both to reproue such flatterers, & also that men might be admonished to consider the omnipotencie of ỳ almightie God. He had issue by his wife Queene Emme a son, named by the Englishe chronicles Hardiknought, but by ỳ Danish writers Knute, or Knutte: also a daughter named Gonilda, ỳ was after maryed to Henry the son of the emperor Conrade, which also was afterward Emperor, & named Henry the third. By his concubine Alwynne, that was daughter to Alselme, whom some name erle of Hampton: he had two bastard sons, Harold & Sweno. He was much giuen in his latter dayes to vertue, as hee that considered howe perfect felicitie rested only in godlynes and true deuotion to serue the heauenly king and gouernour of all things.

The saying of kyng Cnute.

Zealously ynough, if it had bin according to true knowledge.

He repaired in his time many churches, abbeis, and houses of religion, whyche by occasion of warres had bin sore defaced by him and by his father, but specially he did greate coste vpon the Abbey of saint Edmund, in the town of Bury, as before partely is mēcioned. He buylt also two Abbeys from the foundation, as Saint Benets in Norffolke, seuen myles distant from Norwyche, and an other in Norwaye. He did also buylde a Churche at Assdowne in Essex, where he obteyned the bisshopric of king Edmund, and was present at the hallowing or consecration therof with a greate multitude of the Lordes and nobles of the Realme, bothe Englishe and Danes. He also holpe with his owne handes to remoue the body of the holy Archbishop Elphegus, when the same was translated from London to Canterbury. The royall and moste riche iewels whiche he and his wyfe Queene Emme gaue vnto the Churche of Winchester, might make the beholders to wonder at such their exceeding and bountiful munificence.

Thus did Cnute striue to reforme all suche thynges whiche hee and his auncestors had done amisse, and to wype awaye the spot of euill doing, as surely to the outward sight of the world he did in deed. He had the Archbishoppe of Canterbury Achelnotus in singular reputation, and vsed his Counsell in matters of importaunce.

He

He alſo fauoured highly Leofrike Earle of Cheſter, ſo that the ſame Leofryke bare great rule in ordering of things touching the ſtate of the Cõmon wealth vnder hym as one of his chief counſellours.

Diuers lawes and ſtatutes he made for the gouernment of the cõmon wealth, partly agreeable with the lawes of king Edgar, and other the kinges that were his predeceſſors, and partely tempered according to his owne liking, and as was thought to him moſt expediẽt: among the which there be diuers that concerne cauſes as wel eccleſiaſticall as tempozall. Wherby as M. Fox hath noted, it may be gathered, that the gouernement of ſpirituall matters dyd depend then not vpon ỹ Biſhop of Rome, but rather appertayned vnto the laufull authozitie of the tempozall Pzince, no leſſe than matters and cauſes tempozall. But of theſe lawes and ſtatutes enacted by king Cnute ye maye reade moze as ye finde them ſette forth in the before remembred booke of Maſter William Lambert, whiche for bꝛeuitie we here omitte.

Harolde, the baſe ſonne of Cnute.

After that Cnute was departed this lyfe, there arose great variance amongſt the peeres and great Lozdes of the realme about the ſucceſſion. The Danes and Lõdoners (which throughe continuall familiaritie had with the Danes, were become lyke vnto them) elected Harolde the baſe ſonne of king Cnute, to ſucceede in his fathers rome, hauing Earle Leofrike, and diuers other of the noble menne of the Nozthe partes on theyr ſide.

But other of the Engliſhmẽ, and namely Erle Godwyn Erle of Kent, with the chiefeſt lozdes of the weaſt partes, coueted rather to haue one of K. Egelreds ſons, which were in Nozmandie, oz elſe Hardiknought the ſonne of kyng Cnute by his wife Quene Emme, which remained in Denmarke, aduaunced to the place.

Thys controuerſie helde in ſuche wyſe, that the Realme was deuided (as ſome write) by lotte betwixte the two bꝛethꝛen, Harolde, and Hardicnute.

The nozth parte as Mercia and Nozthumberlande fell to Harrolde, and the ſouth part vnto Hardicnute: but at length the whole remained vnto Harrolde, bycauſe his bꝛother Hardicnute refuſed to come out of Denmarke to take the gouernment vpon him.

But yet the authozitie of Earle Godwyn who had the queene and the treaſure of the realm in his keeping, ſtayed the matter a certayn time, (hee profeſſing hymſelfe as it were Gardian to the yong men, the ſonnes of the Queene, tyll at length he was conſtrayned to gyue ouer hys holde, and conforme hym ſelfe to the ſtronger parte and greater number.) And ſo at Oxforde, where the aſſemble was holden aboute the election, Harolde was proclaymed kyng, and ſacred accozdyng to the manner (as ſome write) But it ſhoulde appeare by other, that the Archbiſhoppe of Canterburye Elnothus, a manne endued with all vertue and wyſedome refuſed to crowne hym: Fox when kyng Harolde beeing elected of the nobles and peeres, requyred the ſayde Archebiſhoppe that he myght be of him ſacred, and receyue at hys handes the Regall Scepter wyth the Crowne, whyche the Archebiſhoppe harde in hys cuſtodie, and to whome it onely did appertayne to inueſte hym therewyth, the Archebiſhop flatly refuſed, and wyth an othe proteſted, that he woulde not ſacre any other for Kynge, ſo long as the Queenes thyldren lined: Fox (ſayth he) Cnute committed them to my truſte and aſſurauncе, and to them will I keepe my fayth and loyall obedience. The ſcepter and crowne I heere laye downe vpon the aulter, and neyther doe I denye nor deliuer them vnto you: but I forbid by the Apoſtolyke authozitie all the Biſhoppes, that none of them preſume to take the ſame away, and delyuer them to you, oz sacre you for kyng. As for your ſelfe, if you dare, you maye vſurpe that whyche I haue committed vnto God and hys table.

But whether afterwardes the Kyng by one meane oz other, cauſed the Archebyſhoppe to crowne hym Kyng, oz that he was ſacred of ſome other, he was admitted for kyng of al the Engliſhe people, beginning hys reygne in the yeare of our Lozde a thouſande thirtie and ſixe, in the fourteenth yeare of the Emperour Conrade the ſeconde, in the ſixte yeare of Henrye the firſte, kyng of Fraunce, and aboute the ſeuen and twentie yere of Malcolme the ſecond, king of Scotlande. 1036.

to haue ben an oppressour of his people, and spotted wyth manye notable vices. It was spoken of dyuers in those dayes, that thys Harrolde was not the sonne of Cnute, but of a shoemaker: and ẏ his supposed mother Elgiua, king Cnutes concubine, to bring the king further in loue with hir, fayned that she was with child: and about the time that she shuld be brought to bed (as she made hir accompt) caused the sayd Shoemakers son to be secretly brought into hir chamber, and then vntruly caused it to be reported, that she was deliuered, and the child so reputed to bee the kings sonne.

Immediatly vpon aduertisement had of Cnutes death, Alfred the sonne of king Egelred, with fifty saile landed at Sandwich, meaning to chalenge the crowne, & to obteyn it by lawful clayme with quietnes if he might, if not, then to vse force by ayde of his frends, and to assay that way forth to winne it, if he might not otherwyse obteyne it. From Sandwiche he came to Canterbury, and shortly after, Earle Godwyn feygnyng to receyue hym as a friend, came to meet hym, and at Gilford in the night season, appointed a number of armed men to fall vpon the Normans as they were a sleepe, and so toke them together with Alfred, & slewe the Normans by the poll, in suche wise that .ix. were slaine, and the .x. reserued. But yet when those that were reserued seemed to him a greater number than he wished to escape, he fell to and againe tithed them as before. Alfred had his eyes put out, and was conueyed to the Ile of Elye, where shortely after he died. How Alfred should clayme the crowne to himselfe, I see not: for verily I can not be perswaded that he was elder brother, although diuers authors haue so written, sith that Ernesticensis and the authour of the booke called Encomium Emmæ, plainly affirme, that Edward was the elder: but it might bee, that Alfred being a man of a stouter stomacke than his brother Edward, made this attempt, eyther for himself, or in the behalfe of his brother Edward, being as then absent, and gone into Hungarie, as some write: but other saye, that as well Edwarde as Alfred came ouer at this tyme with a number of Norman knights, & men of war embarqued in a few shippes onely to speake with their mother, which as then laye at Winchester, whether to take aduise with hir howe to recouer their right here in this lande, or to aduaunce their brother Hardicnute, or for some other purpose, our authors do not declare.

But the Lordes of the realme that bare their good willes vnto Harold, and (although contrarie to right) ment to maynteine him in the estate, seemed to be much offended wyth the comming of these two brethren in suche order: for Earle Godwin perswaded them, ẏ it was great danger to suffer so many straungers to enter the realm, as they had brought with them.

Wherupon Earle Godwyn with the assent of the other Lordes, or rather by commaundemente of Harolde, wente forthe, and at Gildforde met with Alfred that was comming towardes Kyng Harrolde to speake wyth hym, accordingly as he was of Harolde required to doe. But newe being taken, and hys companie miserably murthered (as before ye haue herd) to the number of six hundred Normans, Alfred hymselfe was sente into the Ile of Elye, there to remayn in the Abbey in custodie of the Monkes, hauyng his eyes put out as sone as he entred firste into the same Ile. William Malmsburye sayeth, that Alfred came ouer, and was thus handeled betwixte the tyme of Harolds death, and the comming in of Hardicnute: and other write, that this chaunced in hys brother Hardicnutes dayes, whiche seemeth not to bee true: for Hardicnute was knowne to loue hys brethren by his mothers side too dearely, to haue suffred any suche iniurie to be wrought to eyther of them in hys tyme.

Thus ye see how writers dissent in this matter, but for the better clearing of the truthe touching the tyme, I haue thought good to shewe also what the author of the sayd booke intituled Encomium Emmæ writeth hereof, whiche is as followeth.

When Harolde was once established kyng, he sought meanes howe to rid Queene Emme out of the waye, and that secretely, for that openlye as yet he durste not attempte any thing againste hir. Shee in silence kepte hir selfe quiet, lokyng for the ende of these thyngs.

But Harrolde remembryng himselfe of a malicious purpose, by wicked aduise toke counsell howe hee might gette into his handes and make awaye the sonnes of Queene Emme, so to bee out of daunger of all annoyance that by them myght be procured againste him: and therefore hee causeth a Letter to bee written in name of their mother the sayde Emme, whiche he sente by certayne messengers suborned for the purpose into Normandie, where Edwarde and Alfred as then remayned. The tenour of whiche letter here ensueth.

The ſame in effect in engliſhe is thus.

Emme in name onely Queene, to hir ſonnes Edwarde and Alfred, ſendeth motherly greting: Whyleſt we ſeparately bewayle the death of our ſoueraigne Lorde the kyng (moſte deare ſonnes) and whyleſt you are euery daye more and more depriued from the kingdom of your inheritance, I mervaile what you doe determine, ſithe you knowe by the delaye of youre ceaſſyng to make ſome enterpriſe, the grounded force of the vſurper of your kingdome is daily made the ſtronger: for inceſſantly goeth he frõ towne to towne, from citie to citie, and maketh the Lordes his frends by rewardes, threattes, and prayers, but they had rather haue one of you to reigne ouer them, than to be kepte vnder the rule of this man that nowe gouerneth them. Wherfore my requeſt is, that one of you do come with ſpeed, and ỹ priuately ouer to me, that he maye vnderſtande my wholſome aduiſe, and know in what ſort this matter ought to be handled, which I would haue to goe forward, and ſee that you ſend me worde by this preſent meſſenger what you mean to do herein. Fare ye well, euen the bowels of my heart.

These Letters were deliuered vnto ſuche as were made priuie to the purpoſed treaſon, who beyng fully inſtructed howe to deale, wente ouer into Normandie, & preſentyng the Letters vnto the young Gentlemenne, vſed the matter ſo, that they toke it verily that this meſſage had bene ſente from their mother, and wrote agayn by them that broughte the Letters, that one of them woulde not fayle but to come ouer vnto hir according to that ſhe had requeſted, and withal appointed the day and tyme.

The meſſengers returning to king Harolde, enformed him howe they hadde ſped.

The younger brother Alfrede, with his brothers conſente, toke with hym a certayne number of Gentlemen and men of warre, and firſt came into Flanders, where after he had remayned a whyle with Earle Baldwyne, he increaſed his retinue with a few Bolongners, and paſſed ouer into Englande, but approchyng to the ſhore, he was ſtreyghtwayes deſcried by his enimies, who haſted forth to ſette vpon him: but he perceyuing their purpoſe, commanded ỹ ſhippes to caſte aboute, and to make agayne to the ſea: And after this landing at an other place, he mente to haue gone the nexte waye to his mother.

But Earle Godwyn hearyng of his arriual, met him, receyued hym into his aſſurence, and bynding his credite with a corporal othe became his manne, and therewith leading hym oute of the highe way that leadeth to London, he brought him vnto Gildforde, where hee lodged all the ſtraungers, by a score, a dozeyn, and halfe a a ſcore together in Innes, ſo as but a fewe remayned aboute the yong Gentleman Alured to attende vpon him.

Goodvvyn vvas ſuſpected to do this vnder a colour to betray him as by vvruers it ſeemeth.

There was meate and drynke plentie prepared in euery lodgyng, for the refreſhyng of all the companie. And Godwyn takyng hys leaue for that nyght, departed to his lodgyng, promiſing the nexte morning to come agayne to giue his dutifull attendaunce on Alured.

But beholde, after they had filled themſelues with meates and drinkes, and were gone to bed, in the dead of the nyght came ſuche as king Harold had appointed, and entring into euery Inne, firſt feyſed vppon the armour and weapons that belonged to the ſtraungers: Whiche done, they toke them, and chayned them faſte with fetters and manacles, ſo keeping them ſure till the nexte morning. Which being come, they wer brought forthe with their handes bounde behynde theyr backes, and deliuered to moſt cruell tormentors, who were commaunded to ſpare none, but euery tenth man, as he came to hand by lot, and ſo they ſlew nyne and left the tenth alyue. Of thoſe that were lefte alyue, ſome they kepte to ſerue as bondmen, other for couetouſneſſe of gayne they ſolde, and ſome they put in priſon, of whome yet diuers afterwardes eſcaped.

Not only Goodvvyn but other ſuche as king Harold apointed, toke Alvred vvith his Normans.

This with more hath the forſaid author written of this matter, declaring further, that Alured being conueyed into the yle of Ely, had not only his eyes put out in moſt cruell wyſe, but was alſo preſently there murthered. But hee ſpeaketh not further of the maner howe he was made away, ſaying that he ſaith, he forbeareth to make long recitall of this matter, bycauſe he will not renewe the mothers greefe in hearyng it, ſithe there can be no greater ſorow to the mother than to heare of hir ſonnes death.

I remember that in Caxton we reade, that his cruell tormentours ſhoulde cauſe his belly to be opened, and taking out one ende of his bowelles or guttes, tyed the ſame to a ſtake whiche they had ſet faſt in the ground, and then with needels of yron pricked his bodie, and cauſed him to run rounde about the ſtake, tyll he had wound out all his entrailes, and ſo ended his innocente lyfe, to the great ſhame and obloquie of his cruell aduerſaries. But whether he was thus tormented or not, or rather dyed (as I thinke) of the anguiſhe by putting out his eyes, no doubte but his death was reuenged by Gods hande in thoſe that procured it.

But whether Erle Godwyn was chief cauſer thereof, in betraying him vnder a cloked colour of pretended frendſhippe, I can not ſaye: but that he tok him and ſlew his companie, as ſome haue written, I can not thynke it to bee true, both as well for that whiche ye haue heard recited out of the author that wrote Encomium Emmæ, as alſo for that it ſhould ſeme he myght neuer be ſo directly charged with it, but that he had matter to alledge in his owne excuſe.

But nowe to retourne vnto other doings of king Harolde.

After he had made away his halfe brother Alured, his mother in law Queene Emme he ſpoiled of the moſte parte of hir riches, and therwith baniſhed hir out of the realme: ſo that ſhe ſayled ouer into Flaunders, where ſhe was honorably receyued of Earle Baldwyne, and hauyng of hym honourable prouiſion aſſigned hir, ſhe continued there for the ſpace of three yeeres, tyl that after the death of Harolde, ſhe was ſent for by hir ſonne Hardiknought, that ſucceded Harolde in the kingdome.

Simon Dun. Queene Emme baniſhed.

Moreouer, Harolde made ſmall accompte of his ſubiectes, degenerating from the noble vertues of hys father, folowing hym in few things, (except in cracking of tributes and paymentes.) He cauſed in deede. viij. markes of ſiluer to bee leuyed of euery porte or hauen in Englande, to the retayning of. xvj. ſhippes furniſhed with men of warre, why che continued euer in a readineſſe to defende the coaſtes from pyrates.

To conclude, with this Harrold. His ſpeedy death prouided well for his fame, bycauſe (as it was thought) if his lyfe had bene of long continuance, his infamie had bin the greater.

Euil men, the longer they liue, the more they growe into miſerie.

But after he had reigned foure yeres or (as Harriſon gathereth) iij. yeres x. iij. monethes, he departed out of this worlde at Oxforde, and was buryed at Wincheſter (as ſome ſay:) other ſay he dyed at Henefordе in the moneth of Apryll, and was buryed at Weſtminſter, whiche ſhould appeare to be true by that whiche after is reported of his brother Hardiknoughtes cruell dealyng, and great ſpite ſhewed towarde his dead bodye, as after ſhall be ſpecified. *VVil. Hardiknought, or Hardicnute.

Hardicnute.

After that Harrolde was dead, all the nobles of the realm, both Danes and Engliſhmen agreed to ſende for Hardiknoughte, the ſonne of Canute by his wyfe Queene Emme, and to make him kyng. Here is to be noted, that by the death of king Cnute, the ſtate of thinges was muche altered in thoſe countreys of beyonde the ſea where he had rule and dominion. For the Norwegians cleſted one Magnus, the ſonne of Olaus, to be their king, and the Danes choſe this Hardiknought, whom theyr writers name Kanute the thirde, to their king and gouernor.

Alteration of the ſtate of things.

This Hardiknought or Canute being aduertiſed of the death of his halfe brother Harold, and that the Lordes of England had choſen him to their king, with all conuenient ſpeed, prepared a nauie, and imbarquing a certain number of men of warre, toke the ſea, and had the wynde ſo fauourable to his purpoſe, that he arriued vpon the coaſt of Kent the. vj. day after he ſet out of Denmark, and ſo comming to London, was ioyfully receyued, and proclaymed king, & crowned of Athelnotus the Archb. of Canterbury, in the yere of our Lord. 1041. in the firſt yere of the Emperor Hery ỹ third, in the. ix. of Henry the firſt of that name king of Fraunce, and in the firſt yere of Magſinloch, alias Machabeda king of Scotlande. Incontinently after his eſtabliſhemente in the rule of this realme, he ſent into Flaunders for his mother Queene Emme, who during the tyme of hir baniſhment, had remayned there. For Normandie in that ſeaſon was gouerned by the French king, by reaſon of the minoritie of Duke Willia. ſurnamed the baſtard.

Queene Emme ſent for.

Moreouer, in reuenge of the wrong offered to Queene Emme by hir ſonne in lawe Harrolde, kyng Hardiknoughte dydde cauſe

Alfrike

Alfrike archbishop of Yorke and Erle Godwin, with other noble men to go to Westminster, and there to take vp the bodie of the same Harold and withall appointed, that the head therof should be striken of, and the trounke of the body to be cast into the riuer of Thames. Whiche afterwarde beyng found by Fishers, was taken vp and buried in the Churchyard of Saint Clement Danes without Temple barre at London. He committed the order and gouernement of thyngs to the handes of his mother Queene Emme, and of Godwyn that was Erle of Kent. He leuied a sore tribute of his subiectes here in Englande to paye his souldiers and mariners of his nauie, as first .xxj. M. pound. and. xcix. pound: and afterward vnto .xxxij. shippes, there was a payement made of eleuen thousand and .xlviij. pound. To euery mariner of his nauie he caused a payment of. viij. markes to bee made, and to euerye maister. xij. markes. Aboute the payment of this money, great grudge grew amongst the people, insomuche as two of his seruants, whiche were appointed Collectors in the citie of Worcester, the one named Feader, and the other Turstane, were there slain. In reuenge of which contempt a great part of the countrey with the Citie was brent, and the goodes of the Citizens put to the sacke by such power of Lords, and men of warre as the king sent against them.

Shortly after, Edward, king Hardiknoughts brother, came forth of Normandie to visyte him and his mother Queene Emme, of whome he was moste ioyfully and honorably welcomed and entertayned, and shortly after made returne backe againe. It should appere by some writers, that after his comming ouer out of Normandie he remayned still in the Realme, so that he was not in Normandie when his halfe brother Hardiknoughte dyed, but here in Englande: although other make other reporte, as after shall be shewed.

Also (as before ye haue heard) some writers seeme to mean, that the elder brother Alfrid came ouer at the same tyme.

But surely they are therein deceyued: for it was knowne well inough howe tenderly kyng Hardicnute loued his brethren by the mothers syde, so as there was not any of the Lordes in his dayes, that durste attempte any suche iniurie agaynste them. True it is, that as well Earle Godwyn, as the bishop of Worcester, (that was also put in blame & suspected for the apprehending and making away of Alured (as before ye haue heard,) were charged by Hardicnute, as culpable in that matter, insomuch that the sayd Bishop was expulsed oute of his sea by Hardiknought: And after twelue monthes space was restored by meanes of such summes of money, as he gaue by waye of amendes.

Earle Godwyn was also put to his purgation, by taking an othe that hee was not giltie. Whiche othe was the better allowed, by reason of suche a present as he gaue to the king for the redemyng of his fauour and good will, that is to wit, a shippe with a sterne of gold, conteyning therin. lxxx. souldiours, wearing on eche of their armes two bracelettes of golde of. xvj. ounces weyght, a triple habergion gylte on their bodies, with guilt burgenets on their heads, a swoorde with gilt hiltes girded to their wastes, a battaile Axe after the maner of the Danes, on their lefte shulder: a targat with bosse & mailes gilt in their left hand: a darte in their right hande: And thus to conclude, they were furnished at all peeces with armour and weapon accordyng.

Erle Goodwin excuseth selfe.

The gift which Erle Goodwin gaue to the king.

It hath bin sayd, that Erle Godwyn mynded to marrie his daughter to one of these brethren, and perceyuing that the elder brother Alfred would disdayne to haue hir, thought good to dispatche him, that the other taking hir to wyfe, might be nexte heire to the Crowne, and so at length enioy it, as it afterwardes came to passe. Polidor.

Also about that tyme, when the lineage of the kings of Englande was in maner extincte, the English people were muche carefull (as hathe bene sayde) aboute the succession of those that shoulde enioy the crowne.

Whereupon as one Brightwold, a Monke of Glastenburye, that was afterwarde Bishop of Winchester, (or as some haue written) of Worcester, studyed oftentymes theron: It chaunced that he dreamed one nyght as he slepte in bedde, that he sawe Sainct Peter sacre and annoynt Edwarde the sonne of king Egelred (as then remaining in exile in Normandie) king of Englande. And as he thought, he dyd demaunde of Sainct Peter, who shoulde succeede the sayde Edwarde? Whereunto aunswere was made by the Apostle, Haue thou no care for such matters: for the kingdome of Englande is Gods kingdome, which surely in good earnest may appeare by many great argumentes to be full true vnto suche as shall well consider the state of this realme from time to tyme, howe there hath bin euer gouernours raysed vp to mayntayn the maiestie of the Kingdome, and to reduce the same to the former dignitie, when by any infortunate mishap, it hath bin brought in daunger.

But to return now to Kyng Hardiknought, after that hee had reygned two yeares lacking fiftine dayes, as hee satte at Table at a greate feast holden at Lambheth, he fell downe sodenly with the pot in his hande, and so dyed, not without some suspition of poyson. Sim. Dunel. Math. West. 1042.

was solemnised betweene the lady Githa, the daughter of a noble man called Osgote Clappa, and a Danishe lorde called Canute Pryan. His bodie was buried at Winchester besides his fathers. He was of nature very curteous, gentle, and liberall, specially in keeping good cheere in his house, so that he would haue his table couered foure tymes a day, furnished with great plentie of meats and drinks, wishing that his seruantes and all straungers that came to his palaice, might rather leaue than want. It hath bin commonly told that Englishmen learned of him their excessiue gourmandize and vnmeasurable filling of their panches wyth meates and drinks, wherby they forgate the vertuous vse of sobrietie, so muche necessarye to all estates and degrees, so profitable for all common wealths, and so commendable both in the sight of God, and all good men. In this Hardiknought ceased the rule of the Danes within this lande, with the persecution which they had executed against the English nation, for the space of .250. yeres and more, that is to witte, euer sith the .x. yeare of Brithrike the king of Westsarons, at what time they first began to attempt to inuade the Englishe coastes.

H. Hunt.

Polidore.

IMmediatly vpon ỹ death of Hardiknought and before his corps was committed to buryall, his halfe brother Edwarde, sonne of kyng Egelred begotten of Queene Emme, was chosen to be king of Englande, by the generall consent of all the nobles and comons of the realme. Therevppon were Ambassadours sente with all speede into Normandie, to signifie vnto him his election, and to bring him from thence into Englande, in delyuering pledges for more assurance, that no fraude nor deceipte was ment of the Englishmen. But that vpon his comming thyther, he should receyue the Crowne without all contradiction. Edwarde then ayded by hys cousin William Duke of Normandie, toke the sea, and with a small companye of Normans came into Englande, where hee was receyued with greate ioye as king of the realme, and immediatly after was crowned at Winchester by Edsinus then archbishop of Canterbury, on Easter day in the yeare of our Lorde. 1042. whiche fell also about the fourth yeare of the Emperor Henrye the thirde, surnamed Niger, in the .xij. yeare of Henry the first of that name kyng of Fraunce, and about the third yeare of Makbeth king of Scotland.

H. Hunt. V Vil. Malm. The. 3. ech. 10.

This Edwarde the third of that name before the conquest, was of nature more meeke & simple than apte to the gouernement of the realme, and therfore did Erle Godwyn not only seeke the destruction of his elder brother Alfred, but also holpe in that he might to aduaunce this Edwarde to the crowne, in hope to beare great rule in the realme vnder him, whome hee knewe to be softe, gentle and easy to be persuaded.

But whatsoeuer writers do report hereof, sure it is, that Edwarde was the elder brother, and not Alured, so that if erle Godwyn did shew his furtherance by his pretensed cloake of offring his frendship vnto Alured to betraye him, he did it by king Harolds cõmandement, and yet it may be that he ment to haue vsurped the crowne to himself, if eche poynt had aunswered his expectation in the sequele of things as he hoped they would, and therfore had not passed if bothe the brethren had bin in heauen. But yet when the worlde framed contrary (peraduenture) to his purpose, he didde his best to aduaunce Edward, trusting to beare no small rule vnder him, being knowne to be a man more appliable to be gouerned by other than to trust to his owne wit, and so chiefly by the assistance of Erle Godwyn: whose authoritie (as appeareth) was not small within the Realme of Englande in those dayes, Edwarde came to attayne the Crowne: wherevnto the erle of Chester Leofryke also shewed all the furtherance that in him lay.

Some write (which seemeth also to be confirmed by the Danish chronicles) that king Hardiknought in his lyfe tyme had receyued this Edwarde into his Courte, and reteyned him still in the same in moste honourable wyse.

Ran. Hig. ex Marian. Albert. Cra.

But for that it maye appeare in the abstracte of the Danishe Chronicles, what their writers hadde of this matter recorded, we doe here passe ouer, referring those that be desyrous to knowe the diuersitie of oure writers and theyrs, vnto the same Chronicles, where they may fynd it more at large expressed.

Thys in no wyse is to be lefte vnremembred, that immediatly after the death of Hardiknought it was

It was not only decreed and agreed vppon by the greate Lords and nobles of the Realme, that no Dane from thenceforth shoulde reigne ouer them, but also all menne of warre and souldiours of the Danes whiche lay within anye Citie or Castell in garrison within the realme of Englande, were then expulsed and put out, or rather slayne (as the Danishe writers do rehearse.

Amongst other that were banished, the ladie Gonild neece to king Swayn by his sister, was one, beeing as then a widdowe, and with hir two of hir sonnes, whiche she had then lying, Heming and Turkyll, were also causeed to auoyde.

There be that write, that Alfred the brother of king Edwarde, came not into the realme till after the death of Hardiknought, and that he dydde helpe to expulse the Danes, and that doone, was slaine by Erle Godwin and other of his complices. But how this may stande, considering the circumstãces of the tyme, with suche things as are written by diuers authors hereof, it may well be doubted.

But whether Earle Godwyn was guiltie to the death of Alfred, eyther at this time, or before, certayne it is, that he so cleered him selfe of that crime vnto King Edwarde, the brother of Alfred, that there was none so highly in fauoure with hym as Earle Godwyn was, insomuche that king Edwarde maryed the lady Editha, the daughter of erle Godwyn, begotten of his wyfe Thira, that was syster to King Hardiknought, and not of his seconde wyfe, as some haue written.

But so it was, that King Edwarde neuer had to doe with hir in fleshly wyse. But whether he abstained bicause he hadde haply vowed chastitie, eyther of impotencie of nature, or for a priuie hate that hee bare to hir kinne, men doubted. For it hath bene thoughte, that he esteemed not Earle Godwyn so greatly in his hearte, as he outwardely made shewe to doe, but rather for feare of his puissaunce, dissebled with him, least he shoulde otherwise put hym selfe in danger both of losse of life & kingdom. Howsoeuer it was, he vsed his counsel in ordering of things concerning the state of the cõmon wealth, and namely in the harde handelyng of his mother Queene Emme, agaynste whõ diuers accusatiõs were brought & alledged: as first for ỹ she consented to marrie with king Cnute, the publike enimie of the realme. Againe, that she did nothing ayde or succoure hir sonnes whyle they liued in exile, and that worse was, contriued to haue made them away. For which cause she was dispoyled of al hir goodes: And bicause she was defamed to be naughte of hir bodie with Alwyne or Adwine bishop of Winchester, both she, and the same bishop were cõmitted to prison within the citie of Winchester, (as some write:) but other affirme, that she was straytly kepte in the Abbey of Warwell, tyl by way of purging hir selfe, after a marueilous manner, in passyng barefooted ouer certaine hot shares or ploughyrons, according to the lawe Ordalium, she cleered hir selfe (as the world toke it) and was restored to hir first astate and dignitie. Hir excessiue courtousnesse without regarde had to the poore, caused hir also to be euil reported of. And ageyne, for that she euer shewed hir selfe to be more naturall to the issue whiche she had by hir second husband Cnute, than to hir children which she had by hir firste husbande kyng Egelred (as it were declaryng howe she was affected toward the fathers, by the loue borne to the children) she losse a greate peece of good will at the handes of hir sonnes, Alfred & Edwarde: So that nowe the said Edwarde enioying the realme, was easily enduced to think euill of hir, and thereuppon vsed hir the more vncourteously. But hir greate liberalitie employed on the churche of Winchester, whiche she furnished with marueilous rich iewels and ornamentes, wan hir great commendation in the worlde, and excused hir partly in the sight of many, of the infamie imputed to hir for the immoderate filling of hir coffers by all wayes and meanes shee coulde deuise. And after that she had purged hir self, as before is mẽcioned, hir sonne king Edwarde had hir euer after in great honor and reuerence. And wheras Robert Archbishop of Canterbury, had ben sore against hir, he was sore abashed of the matter that hee fledde into Normandye, where hee was borne.

But it shoulde seeme by that whiche after shall be said, that he fled not the realme for this matter, but for that he counselled the king to banish Erle Godwyn, and also to vse the Englishmen more straitly thã reson was he shuld.

Ye must vnderstande, that kyng Edwarde brought diuers Normãs ouer with him, whiche in tyme of his banishment had shewed him great friendship, wherefore he nowe sought to recompense them. Amongest other, this Robert was one, which before his comming ouer was a Monke in the abbey of Gemeticum in Normandie, & by the king was first aduanced to gouern ỹ sea of London, & after was made archbishop of Cant. & bare great rule vnder ỹ king, so that he coulde not auoyde the enuie of diuers noble men, & specially of erle Godwin as after shal appere. About ỹ third yere of K. Edwards reigne, Osgod Clap was banished

About this time Swain the ſon of erle Godwin was baniſhed the land, & fled into Flanders. This Swayne kepte Edgiua, the Abbeſſe of the Monaſterie of Leoffe, and forſaking his wife meante to haue marryed the foreſayde Abbeſſe. Within a certain tyme after his baniſhement, he returned into Englande, in hope to purchaſe the kings peace by his fathers meanes and other his frendes. But vpon ſome malicious pretence, he ſlewe his couſin Erle Bearne, which was about to labour to the king for his pardone, and ſo then fledde againe into Flaunders, till at length Aldred the Archbiſhop of Yorke obteyned his pardon, and founde meane to reconcile him to the kings fauour.

Aboute the tenthe yeare of king Edwardes reigne, Euſtace Erle of Bolongne, that was father vnto the valiant Godfreye of Bovillon and Baldwyn, both afterwarde kings of Hieruſalem, came ouer into Englande in the moneth of September, to viſite his brother in lawe Kyng Edwarde, whoſe ſiſter named Goda, he had maryed, ſhe then being the wydow of Gualter de Maunte. The Kyng crediting the Earle was highely offended againſte the Citizens, and wyth all ſpeede ſendyng for Earle Godwyn, declared vnto hym in greeuous wyſe, the rebellyous acte of them of Canterbury, whiche were vnder his iuriſdiction.

The erle plaineth king. The Erle who was a man of a bold courage and quicke witte, didde perceyue that the matter was made a greate deale worſe at the fyrſte

in

In the beginnyng, than of lykelyhoode it woulde proue in the end, thought it reaſon therefore that firſte the aunſwere of the Kentiſhemen ſhoulde be hearde before any ſentence were giuen againſt them. And herevpon although the king comanded hym forthwith to goe with an armie into Kent, and to puniſh them of Canterbury in moſt rigorous manner, yet he woulde not be to haſty, but refuſed to execute the Kinges commaundement, both for that hee bare a piece of grudge in his mynde, that the kyng ſhoulde fauour ſtraungers ſo hyghly as he did, And agayne, becauſe hereby he ſhuld ſeme to do pleſure to his coũtreymen, in taking vppon hym to defende their cauſe againſte the rough accuſations of ſuche as had accuſed them. Wherfore he declared to the king that it ſhoulde bee conueniente to haue the ſuppoſed offendours fyrſte called afore hym, and if they were able to excuſe themſelues, then to bee ſuffered to departe without further vexation: and if they were found faultie, then to be put to their fine, bothe as well in ſatiſfying the King, whoſe peace they had broken, as alſo the Erle, whom they had indamaged.

Earle Godwyn departed thus from the king, leauing him in a greate furie: howbeit hee paſſed little thereof, ſuppoſing it would not long continue. But the king called a greate aſſemble of his lordes, together at Gloceſter, that the matter might be more deepely conſidered. Syward Erle of Northumberland and Leofryke Erle of Cheſter, with Rafe Erle of Hereford, the kings nephew by his ſiſter Goda, and al other the noble men of the realme, only Erle Godwyn and his ſonnes, meant not to come there, excepte they myght bring with them a great power of armed men, and ſo remained at Beuerſtane, with ſuch bandes as they had leuyed vnder a colour to reſiſt the Welchemen, whome they bruted abroade to bee readie to inuade the marches aboute Hereforde.

But the Welchemen preuenting that ſlaunder, ſignified to the king that no ſuch matter was ment on their parties, but thát Earle Godwyn and his ſonnes with their complices, went about to moue a commotion againſt him. Herevpon a rumour was rayſed in the Courte that the kings power ſhoulde ſhortely marche forth to aſſayle Earle Godwyn in that place where hee was lodged. Wherevpon the ſame Erle prepared himſelfe, and ſent to his frendes, willing to ſticke to this quarrell, and if the king ſhould go about to forcet them, then to withſtande him, rather than to yelde and ſuffer themſelues to be troden vnder foote by ſtraungers.

Godwyn in this meane tyme had got together a greate power of his countreys of Kente, Southerie, and other of the weaſt parts. Swayn lykewiſe had aſſembled muche people out of his countrys of Barkeſhire, Oxfordſhire, Somerſetſhire, Herefordſhire, and Glouceſterſhyre. And Harolde was alſo come to them wyth a greate multitude whiche hee had leuyed in Eſſex, Norffolke, Suffolke, Cambridgeſhire, and Huntingdonſhire. Ran. Higd. Mat. VVeſt. Sim. Dunel.. Harolde.

On the other parte the Erles that were with the king, Leofryke, Syward, and Raufe, reyſed all the power whiche they might make, and the ſame approching to Gloceſter, the king thoughte him ſelfe in more ſuretie than before, in ſomuche that where as Earle Godwin (who lay with his armie at Langton there not farre off in Glouceſterſhire) had ſente vnto the king requiryng that the Earle of Bolongne with the other Frenchmen and alſo the Normans which helde the Caſtell of Douer, might bee deliuered vnto him, si. Dunelm.

The King although at the firſte hee ſtoode in great doubt what to do, yet hearing now that armye of his friendes was commyng, made anſwere to the meſſengers, which Godwin had ſent, that hee woulde not deliuer a man of thoſe whome Godwin required, and herewith the ſaid meſſengers being departedthe kings army entred into Glouceſter and ſuch readie good willes appeared in them all to fight with the aduerſaries, that if the kyng woulde haue permitted, they woulde forthwith haue gone forth and gyuen battaile to the enimies. And thus the matter was at poynt to haue put the realme in hazarde not only of a field, but of vtter ruine that might therof haue enſued: for what on the one parte and the other, there were aſſembled the chiefeſt Lordes and moſt able perſonages of the lande. But by the wyſedome and good aduiſe of Earle Leofrike and others, the matter was pacified for a tyme, and order taken, that they ſhoulde come to a parliament or communication at London, vppon pledges giuen and receyued as well on the one parte as the other.

The king with a mightie armye of the Northumbers, and them of Mercia, came vnto London, and Earle Godwyn with his ſonnes, and a greate power of the Weaſt Saxons, came into Southwarke, but perceyuing that many of his companie ſtale awaye and ſlipte from hym, he durſte not abyde any longer to enter talke with the Kyng, as it was couenaunted but in the nyghte nexte enſewing, fledde away with all ſpeede poſſible.

Some write, howe an order was preſcribed that Swanus the eldeſt ſonne of Godwyn ſhoulde departe the lande as a banyſhed manne to qualifye the Kynges wrathe, and that Godwyn and one other of his ſonnes, that is to wite, Harrolde, ſhouldecome to an other *VV. But when this laſt article pleaſed nothing erle Godwyn, and that he perceyued howe his force beganne to decline, ſo as hee ſhoulde not be able to matche the kinges power, he fledde the realme, and ſo likewiſe did his ſonnes. Earle Goodwin fled the realme.

The king hauing perfect knowledge, that erle Godwyn had refuſed to come to the Courte in ſuche order as he had preſcribed hym, and that he was departed the realm with his ſonnes: he proclaymed them outlawes, and gaue the landes of Harrolde vnto Algar, the ſonne of Erle Leofrik, who guyded the ſame right worthyly, and reſigned them agayne withoute grudging vnto the ſame Harrold when he was returned out of exile.

By thys ſtraight dealyng with the Queene that was daughter to Earle Godwyn, now in tyme of hir fathers exile, it hath ſeemed to many, that Kyng Edwarde forbare to deale with hir in carnall wyſe, more for hatred of hir kin, than for any other reſpecte. But to proceede.

Raufe was his nephew, as sonne to his sister Goda by hir first husband Gualter de Maunte. But although they were knowen to bee sufficiente men for the ordering of such businesse, yet he thought the necessitie to be suche, as his person coulde not be presently spared. Therefore he was diligent in foresceyng of things by good aduice, although age woulde not giue him leaue to execute the same by hys owne hand, and force of body: but as the Nauies on both partes were ready to haue ioyned, they were seuered by reason of a thicke mist that then rose, whereby theyr furious rage was restrayned for that time: and immediately therevpon, Eodwin and his complices were forced by a contrary winde, to returne to the places from whence they came. And shortly after by mediation of friends, a peace was made, and Earle Godwine restored home, and obteined againe bothe ẏ kings fauour, and al his former liuings: for he was such an eloquent wise man, that he cleared and purged himselfe of all such crimes and accusations, as in any sort had bin layde against him. Thus haue some written concerning this agreement betwixt King Edward and Earle Godwin, where other make somwhat larger report therof, as thus. The same time that the two sonnes of Earle Godwin, Harrold and Leofwine came fourth of Ireland and inuaded the West countrey, King Edwarde rigged forthe fortie Shippes, the whyche throughly furnished with men, munition, & victayles, he sente vnto Sandwich, commaundyng the Captaynes there to awaite for the comming of Earle Godwin, whome he vnderstood to be in a readinesse to returne into Englande: but notwithstanding, there wanted no diligence in them to looke to their charge, Earle Godwine secretly with a few Shippes whiche he had got togither, arriued in Kent, and sending forth his letters and messengers aboorde vnto the Citizens of Canterbury, to the of Sussex, Southrey, and others, required them of ayde, who with one consente, promised to liue and die with him. The Captaines of the naule at Sandwich aduertised hereof, made towardes the place where they thoughte to haue found Erle Godwin: but he being warned of their comming, escaped by flight, and gote him out of their daunger, wherevpon they withdrew to Sandwiche, and after returned to London. Earle Godwin aduertised therof, sayled to the Isle of Wight, and waited vp and downe those Seas, til his sonnes Harrold and Leofwine came and ioyned their naule with his, and ceasing from spoyle, only sought to recouer battailes to serue their turne. And increasing their power by suche ayde as they might any where procure, at length they came vnto Sandwiche, whereof K. Edward hauing knowledge, being then at London, hee sente aboorde to reyse all the power hee might make, but they that were appoynted to come vnto him, lingered time, in whiche meane while, Earle Godwin came into the Thames, & so vp the Riuer, arriued in Southwarke, on the day of the exaltation of the Crosse in September, being Monday, and there staying for the tide, solicited the Londoners, so as hee obteyned of them what hee coulde desire, and afterwardes withoute disturbance, with the tide passed vp the Riuer through the South arche of the Bridge, & at ẏ same instant, a mighty armie whiche he had by land, mustred in the fieldes on that South side the same Riuer, and herewith his naule made towardes the Northe side of the Riuer, as if they mentto enclose ẏ kings naule, for ẏ K. had also a naule and an armie by land: but yet sith ther were few either on the one part or the other, that were able to do any great feate except Englishmē, they were loth to fight one against another, whereupon, the wiser sort on both sides sought meanes to make an atonemente: & so at length by their diligent trauel, the matter was taken vp, and the armies being dismissed on both partes, Erle Godwin was restored to his former dignitie. There were pledges deliuered on his behalfe, that is to wit, Wilnotus one of his sonnes, and Hacun the son of Suanus, that was the eldest son of Godwin. These two pledges were sent vnto Willia Duke of Normandy, to bee kepte with hym for more assurance of Godwines loyaltie. Some write, that Suanus ẏ eldest son of Godwin was not reconciled to ẏ kings fauour at this time, but whether he was or not, this is reported of him for a troth, ẏ after he had attempted sundry rebellions against K. Edward, he lastly also rebelled against his father Godwin, & his brother Harrold, & became a Pyrat, dishonoring ẅ such manifold robberies as he made on the Seas, ẏ noble progenie whereof he was discended. Finally, vpō remorse of cōscience (as hath bin thought) for ẏ murthering of his cousin (or as some say his brother) Earle Biorne, he went on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, & died by the way in returning homeward of cold which he caught (as some write) in Licia: but other affirme, that he fell into the hands of Sarasins, that were robbers by the high wayes, and so was murthered of them. Polidor. King Edwards promiſe to duke William

Shortly after, or rather ſomewhat before, died Q. Emme the kings mother, and was buryed at Wincheſter. After that Earle Godwin was reſtored to the Kynges fauoure, becauſe hee knewe that Robert the Archbiſhop of Canterbury hadde bin the chiefe procurer of the Kings euill will towards him, he founde meanes to weare him out of credite, and diuers other ſpecially of the Normans, bearing the world in hande, that they had ſoughte to trouble the ſtate of the Realme, to ſet variance betwixte the King and the Lordes of the Engliſhe nation: whereas the Normans agayne alleaged, that Earle Godwin and hys ſonnes abuſed the Kings ſoft and gentle nature, and woulde not ſticke to ieſt and mocke at hys curteous and milde proceedings. But howſoeuer the matter went, the Archbiſhop Robert was glad to depart out of the Realm, and going to Rome, made complaynte in the Court there, of the iniuries ỹ were offered him: but in returning through Normandy, he dyed in the Abbey of Gemmeticum, where he had bin Monke before his cõming into England. Diuerſe other were compelled to forſake the Realme at the ſame time, both ſpiritual men and temporal, as William Biſhoppe of London, and Ulf Biſhop of Lincolne. Oſberne ſurnamed Pentecoſt, and his companyon Hugh, were conſtreyned to ſurrender their Caſtels, and by licence of Earle Leofrike withdrewe through his countrey into Scotlande, where of Kyng Mackbeth they were honorably receyued. These were Normans: for as partly yee haue heard, Kyng Edwarde brought with him no ſmall number of that nation, when he came from thence to receyue the Crowne, and by them hee was altogither ruled to the greate offending of his owne naturall ſubiects the Engliſhmẽ, namely Earle Godwine and his ſonnes, who in thoſe dayes for their greate poſſeſſions and large reuenewes, were had in no ſmall reputation with the Engliſh people.

The Archbiſhop of Canterbury baniſhed.

Normans baniſhed the Realme.

After that the Archbiſhop of Canterbury Robert was departed the Realme, as before ye haue heard, Stigand was made Archbiſhop of Canterbury, or rather thruſt him ſelfe into that dignitie, not being lawfully called, in like manner as he had done at Wincheſter: for where as he was firſt Biſhop of Shireborne, he left that Churche, and toke vpon him the Biſhoprycke of Wincheſter by force, and nowe attayning to be Archbyſhop of Cãterbury, he kept both Wincheſter and Canterbury in his hand at one inſtant. Thys Stigand was greatly infamed for his couetous practiſing in ſale of poſſeſſions appertayning to ỹ Church. He was nothing learned, but that want was a common fault amongſt the Biſhops of ỹ age, for it was openly ſpoken in thoſe dayes, that he was meete onely to be a Biſhop, which could vſe the pomp of the world, voluptuous pleaſures, rich rayment, and ſet himſelfe forthe with a iolly retinue of gentlemen and ſeruauntes on horſebacke, for therein ſtoode the countenance of a Biſhop as the worlde then framed; and not in ſtudy how to haue the people fed with the word of lyfe, to the ſauing of their ſoules. King Edward now in the twelfth yere of his raigne, hauing brought the ſtate of the Realme quite from troubles of warre both by Sea and land, he began to foreſee as well for the welth of his ſubiects, as for hy mſelfe, being naturally enclined to wiſh well to all men. He therfore conſidered, how by the manifolde lawes which had bin made by Britaynes, Engliſhmen and Danes within this lande, occaſion was miniſtred to ſome, whiche meaſured all things by reſpect of their owne priuate gaine and profit, to peruert iuſtice, and to vſe wrongful dealing in ſtede of right, clouding the ſame vnder ſome braunche of lawe, naughtily miſconſtrued, wherevpon to auoyde that miſchiefe, he piked out a ſumme of that huge and innumerable maſſe and heape of lawes, ſuche as were thought moſt indifferent and neceſſary, and therewith ordeyned a fewe, and thoſe moſt wholeſome, to bee from thenceforth vſed, according to whoſe preſcript men might line in due forme and rightfull order of a ciuill life. Theſe lawes wer afterwards called the common lawes, and alſo Saincte Edwarde his lawes, ſo muche eſteemed of the Engliſhmen, that after the Conqueſt, when the Normans oftentimes wente about to abrogate the ſame, there chaunced no ſmall mutenies and rebellions for reteyning of thoſe lawes. But heere is to bee noted, that although they were called Saint Edwardes lawes, they were for the more part made by King Edgar, but now by K. Edwarde reſtored, after they had bin abrogated for a time by the Danes.

About this time, Erle Godwin died ſuddainly (as ſome haue recorded) as he ſate at table with the King: and vpon talke miniſtred of the deathe of Alfred the Kyngs brother, to excuſe himſelfe, he toke a peece of bread, and eate it, ſaying: God let mee neuer ſwallow this bread downe into my cheſt, but that I may preſently bee choked therewith, if euer I was weeting or conſenting vnto Alfredes death: and immediately therewith, hee fell downe ſtarke dead. Other ſay, that hee ended his his life at Winchester, where being suddaynely surprised with sickenesse, as hee sate at the Table with the King vpon an Easter Monday, he lyued yet till the Thursday following, and then dyed. Hys Earledome was giuen vnto his sonne Harrold, & Harrolds Erledome which was Oxeford, was gyuen vnto Algar the son of Leofricke.

This Godwin, as hee was a man of greate power, wise, hardie, and politike, so was hee ambitious, desirous to beare rule, and soth that any other person should passe him in authoritie. But yet whether all be true that Writers report of his malitious practises to bryng hymselfe and hys sonnes to the chiefe seate of gouernemente in the Kingdome, or that of hatred such slaunders were reysed of him, it may of some perhappes be doubted, bycause that in the dayes of King Edwarde (whiche was a soft and gentle Prince) hee bare greate rule and authoritie, and so mighte procure to himselfe euill report for euery thing that chanced amisse, as oftentimes it commeth to passe in suche cases, where those that haue greate doyngs in the gouernemente of the common wealthe, are commonly euill spoken of, and that now and then without their gilt. But truth it is, that Godwin beeing in authoritie both in the dayes of K. Edward and his predecessors, did many thyngs as should appeare by Writers, more by will than by law, and so likewise did his sonnes vpō presumption of the great puissance that they and theyr father were of within the Realme. Hee had to wife the sister of K. Cnute, Editha, of whome hee begate three sonnes (as some write) that is to saye, Harrolde, Bioxne, and Tostie: also his daughter Editha, the which he found meanes to bestowe in marriage vpon King Edward as before ye haue heard. But other write, that he had but one sonne by Cnutes sister, the whiche in riding of a rough horse, was throwen into the Riuer of Thames, and so drowned. His mother also was striken with a thunderbolte, and so perished worthely, as is reported for hir naughty doyings. She vsed to buy great numbers of yong persons, and namely maides that were of any excellencie in beutie and personage, ẏ which she sent ouer into Denmarke, and there sold them to hir most aduantage. After hir decesse as the same authours record, Godwin married another woman by whome he had issue sixe sonnes, Suanus or Swayne, Harrolde, Tostie or Tosto, Wilnote, Gurth and Leofricke: of them mention is, and shall bee further made, as places conuenient shall serue thereto.

flight Mackbeth that had vsurped the Crowne of Scotland, and that done, placed Malcolme surnamed Camoyr, the son of Duncane, sometime King of Scotlande, in the gouernement of that Realme, who afterward slew the sayd Macbeth, and then raigned in quiet. Some of our Englishe writers say, that this Malcolme was K. of Cūberlande, but other reporte him to be sonne to the K. of Cumberland. But heere is to be noted, that if Mackbeth raigned till the yere. 1061. and was then slayne by Malcolme, Earle Siwarde was not at that battaile, for as our writers do testifie, he died in the yere. 1055. whiche was in the yeare next after (as the same writers affirme) that hee vāquished Mackbeth in fight, & slew many thousands of Scottes, & all those Normans which as ye haue heard, were withdrawē into Scotlande, when they were driuen out of England. It is recorded also, that in the foresaid battayle, in which Earle Siwarde vanquished the Scottes, one of Siwards sonnes chaunced to be slayne, whereof, though the father had good cause to be sorowfull, yet whē he heard that he dyed of a wound which hee had receyued in fighting stoutely in the forepart of his body, and that with his face towarde the enimie, hee greatly reioyced thereat, to heare that he died so manfully. But here is to be noted, ẏ not now, but a little before, (as Henry Hunt. saith.) ẏ Earle Siward, wente into Scotlande himselfe in person, hee sent his sonne with an army to conquere ẏ land, whose hap was ther to be slaine: and when his father heard ẏ newes, he demaunded whether he receiued the wound whereof he died, in ẏ fore parte of the body, or in the hinder part: and when it was tolde him ẏ he receyued it in the foreparte, I reioyce (saith he) euen with all my harte, for I would not wishe eyther to my sonne nor to my selfe, any other kind of death.

Shortly after, Aldred the Biſhop of Worceſter was ſent vnto the Emperour Henry the third, to fetch Edwarde the ſonne of Edmunde Ironſide into England, whome King Edward was deſirous to ſee, meaning to ordeyne him heire apparant to the Crowne: but hee dyed the ſame yeare after he came into England. This Edward was ſurnamed the outlawe: his body was buried at Weſtminſter, or as an other ſayth in the Church of S. Paules in London. This Earle aſſembling an army, came forth to giue battayle to the enimies, appoynting the Engliſhmen contrary to their manner to fight on horſeback, but being ready (the two and twetith of October) to giue the onſet in a place not paſt two miles from Hereford, he with his Frenchmen and Normans fled, and ſo the reſt were diſcomfited, whome the aduerſaries purſued, and ſlew to the number of fiue hundred, beſide ſuche as were hurt and eſcaped with

Griffin and Algar hauing obteyned this victory, entred into the Towne of Hereford, ſet the Minſter on fire, ſlew ſeuen of the Cannons that ſtode to defende the doores or gates of the principall Church, and finally, ſpoyled and brente the Towne miſerably. The King aduertiſed hereof, gathered an army, ouer the whiche, Harrolde the ſonne of Earle Godwine was made generall, who followed vpon the enimies that fled before him into Northwales, and ſtayed not, till hauing paſſed through Stradluyd, hee came to the Mountaynes of Snawdune, where hee pitched his fielde. The enimies durſt not abide hym, but gote them into Southwales, whereof Harrolde being aduertiſed, left the more parte of his army in Northwales to reſiſt the enimies there, and with the reſidue of his people he came backe vnto Hereford, recouered the Towne, and cauſed a greate and mighty trench to be caſt round aboute it, with an high rampire, and fenſed it with gates and other fortificatiõs. After this, he did ſo much, that comming to a communication with Griffin & Algar at a place called Biligelhage, a peace was concluded, and ſo the nauie of Earle Algar ſayled about, and came to Cheſter, there to remaine till the men of warre and Marriners were payed their wages, whileſt he went to the Kyng, who both pardoned his offence, and reſtored hym to his Earledome. After this, the very ſame yere being the. 15. yeare of King Edwardes raigne, as ſome writers affirme, the noble Earle of Northumberlande Siwarde dyed of the flixe, of whome it is ſayde, that when hee perceyued the houre of death to be at hand, he cauſed himſelfe to be put in armour, and to be ſet vp in his chayre, affirming, that a Knighte and a man of honor, oughte to die in that ſorte, rather than lying on a couch like a feeble and faint harted creature: and ſitting ſo vpright in his chaire armed at all peeces, hee ended his life, and was buried at Yorke. He was a man of a Giantlike ſtature, and thereto of a righte ſtoute and hardy courage, becauſe hys ſonne Waltef was but an infant, and as yet not out of his cradell, the Earledome was giuen vnto Earle Toſtie one of Godwines ſonnes.

sonne of Edmund Ironside into Englād, whom King Edwarde was desirous to see, meaning to ordeyne him heire apparante to the Crowne: but he died the same yere, after he was now returned into England. This Edward was surnamed the outlawe: his body was buryed at Westminster, or as other say, in ỹ Church of Saint Paule within London.

The same yeare, that is to witte, in the seuententh or in the sixtenth yeare of King Edwards raigne (as some write) Leofricke the noble Earle of Chester, or Mercia, that was sonne to Duke Leofwine, departed this life in his owne Towne of Bromeley the last day of August, and was buried at Couentrie in the Abbey there which he had builded. This Earle Leofricke was a man of greate honor, wise and discret in all his doynges. His high wisedome and policie stode the Realm in great steede whilest he lined. He had a noble Lady to his wife, named Godwina, at whose earnest suite he made the Citie of Couentrie free of all manner tolle, except for Horses: and to haue that tolle layde downe, also, his foresaide Wife rode naked through the middest of the Towne, without other couerture, saue only hir heare.

Moreouer, partly moued by his owne deuotion, and partly by the perswasion of that noble Lady his wife, he builded or beneficially augmēted and repared many Abbeyes and Churches, as the saide Abbey or Priory at Couentrie, the Abbeyes of Wenlocke, Worceter, Stone, Euesham, and Leof beside Hereford.

Also, he buylded two Churches within the Citie of Chester, the one called S. Johns, and the other Saint Werburgh. The valew of ỹ iewels and ornaments which he bestowed on the Abbey Church of Couentrie, was inestimable.

After Leofrickes death, his sonne Algar was made Earle, and entituled in all his landes and Seigniories. In the yeare following, to witte, 1058. the same Algar was accused again (through malice of some enuious persons) of treason, so that he was exiled the land, wherevppon, he repared agayne vnto his old friend. Griffin Prince of Northwales, of whome hee was ioyfully receyued, and shortly after by his ayde, and also by the power of a navie of Ships that by chaunce arriued in those parties at that selfe season vnlooked for out of Norway, the said Algar recouered hys Earledome by force, as some haue written. King Edward about the twentith yere of his raine, as then remayning at Glocester, appoynted Earle Harrolde to inuade the Dominions of Griffin King of Wales. Harrold taking with him a power of Horsemen, made speed, and came to Rutland, and there brenned Griffins Palace, and also his Shippes, and then about midlent returned againe into England.

After this, about the Rogation weeke, Harrold exersones by the Kings commaundemente, went against the Welchmen, and taking the Sea, sayled by Bristowe, round about the coast, compassing in maner al Wales. His brother Tostie that was Earle of Northumberland, met him by appointment with an host of Horsemen, and so ioyning together, they destroyed the countrey of Wales in suche sorte, that the Welchmen were compelled to submit themselues, to deliuer hostages, and conditioned to pay the auntient tribute which before time they had payd. And moreouer, they renounced their Prince the forenamed Griffin, so that he remayned as a banished person: and finally, about the fifth day of August, they slewe him, and sent his head to Earle Harrold. Afterwards King Edward graunted ỹ rule of Wales vnto Blengent or Blethgent, and Rivall Griffins two brethren, whiche did homage vnto hym for the same, and hadde serued vnder Harrold against their brother the foresaid Griffin. There be that write, that not onely Griffin, but also another of his brethrē also called Rise, was brought to his death by the manfull meanes, and politike order of Earle Harrold, and all the sauadge people of Wales, reduced into the forme of good order vnder the subiection of King Edwarde.

Shortly after, Earle Harolde chaunced to passe ouer into Normandy, whether of happe or of purpose it is harde to define, writers varry so much in report thereof. Some write, that he made earnest suite to King Edward, to haue licence to goe ouer to see his brother Wilnote, and his nephewe Hacun, which as yee haue heard, were deliuered as pledges to Kyng Edwarde, and sente into Normandy to remayne there with Duke William, and at length with muche adoe, gote leaue: but yet he was told afore hand of the King: that he would repēt his iourney, and do the thing that should be preiudiciall to the Realme.

Other write, that Harrold lying at his manor of Bosham, went aboord one day into his fishers boate or Crayer, and caused the same to launche forth to the Sea for his pleasure: but by misfortune at the same time, a contrary winde suddainly came about, and droue the vessell a lande into Fraunce vppon the coast of Ponthieu, where hee was taken by the countrey people, and presented to the Earle of Ponthieu named Guy or Guido, who kept him as a prisoner, meaning to put him to a greeuous raunsome. But Harrold remembring himselfe of a wile, dispatched a messenger forthe with all speede vnto William Duke of Normandy, signifying vnto him, that he beeyng sente from Kyng Edwarde to confirme suche Articles as other meane men that had bin sente to him afore hadde talked of, by chaunce hee was fallen into the handes of the Earle of Ponthieu, and kepte as priſoner againſt all order of law, reaſon, or humanitie. Duke William thus enformed by the meſſenger, ſent to the Erle of Ponthieu, requiring hym to ſet Earle Harrold at libertie, that he might repare to him accoꝛding to his commiſſiõ. The Earle of Ponthieu at the Dukes requeſt, did not onely reſtoꝛe Harrolde to libertie, but alſo bꝛoughte hym into Noꝛmandy, and preſented him there to the Duke, of whome he was moſt ioyfully receyued.

Harold is preſented to Duke William Duke of Normandy. Hen. Hunt.

There be that agree partly with this repoꝛte, and partly vary: foꝛ they wꝛite, that Earle Harrold toke the Sea vppon purpoſe to haue layled into Flaunders, and that by foꝛce of wind he was dꝛiuen to the coaſt of Pouthieu, and ſo after came into Noꝛmandy in manner as befoꝛe is mentioned. But by what meanes oꝛ occaſion ſoeuer hee came thither, certayne it is, that hee was ioyfully receyued, and had great cheere made vnto hym by Duke William, ẏ which at that time was ready to make a iourney againſte the Bꝛitaynes, and toke Earle Harrolde with him to haue his company in armes in that iourney, that hee myghte haue the better triall of his valiancie. Earle Harrold behaued himſelfe ſo, ẏ he ſhewed good pꝛoofe both of his wiſedome and policie, and alſo of hys foꝛwardneſſe to execute that with hand, which by wit he had deuiſed, ſo that Duke William hadde him in high fauour, and as it hath bin ſayd, Erle Harrolde (to pꝛocure him moꝛe friendſhip at the Dukes handes) declared vnto him, that Kyng Edwarde had oꝛdeyned him his heire if hee dyed without iſſue, & that he woulde not fayle to keepe the Realme of England to the Dukes vſe, accoꝛding to that oꝛdenance, if King Edwarde dyed without iſſue. And to perfoꝛme this pꝛomiſe, he receyued a coꝛpoꝛall othe, whether willingly to winne the moꝛe credite, oꝛ foꝛced therto by Duke William, wꝛiters repoꝛt it diuerſly.

Harold was highly welcomed of duke William.

Math. VVeſt. Duke William promiſed to Harroide his daughter in marriage.

At the ſame time, Duke William pꝛomiſed vnto him his daughter in marriage, whom Harrold couenaunted in like manner to take to wife. Finally, when he ſhould returne into Englande, Duke William deliuered vnto him his Nephew Hacun, but kepte his bꝛother Wilnote with hym ſtill as a pledge. Earle Harrold then returned into England, and declared vnto King Edwarde what he had done, who then ſayd vnto him: Dyd not I tell thee that thou wouldeſt doe the thyng whereof thou ſhouldeſt repent thee, and pꝛocure a miſchiefe to follow vnto thy countrey. But God of his mercie turne that euill happe from thys Realme, oꝛ at the leaſt, if it be his pleaſure, that it muſt needes come to paſſe, yet to ſtay it till after my dayes.

Polidor.

Thus they wꝛite, that affirme, howe Harrolde went ouer of purpoſe into Noꝛmandy: and gather thereof, that Kyng Edward foꝛeſaw the cõming of the Noꝛmanes, and that he meante nothing leſſe, than to perfourme the pꝛomiſe made vnto Duke William, as to adopte hym hys heire, which pꝛomiſe ſhoulde ſeeme to be made in time of his baniſhmente, when hee ſtoode in neede of his friendſhippe, as the manner of men in ſuche caſes is, to pꝛomiſe muche, howſoeuer they intend to fulfill. But rather it may be thought, that King Edwarde had made no ſuch pꝛomiſe at al, but pereeiued the ambitious deſire of Duke William, and therefoꝛe would not that any occaſion ſhoulde bee miniſtred vnto him to take holde of. Wherefoꝛe, he was ſo loth that Harrold ſhoulde goe ouer vnto him, leaſt that might happe, which hapned indeede. In the four and twentith and laſt yeare of King Edwarde his raigne, oꝛ thereabout, there fell variance betwixt the two bꝛethren, Erle Harrold, and Erle Toſtie at Windſoꝛ, where the Courte then lay, in ſo muche that Earle Harrold caught Toſtie by the heare of the head in the Kings pꝛeſence, and ſtroke him.

When the promiſe was made by K. Edwarde to make Duke William heire.

Hen. Hunt. Mat. VVeſt. Fabian. Falling betwixt theſe.

Hereupon, Toſtie departing from the Courte in great anger, came to Herefoꝛde in the marches of Wales, where Harrolds ſeruants were pꝛeparing foꝛ the Kings comming to theyꝛ maiſters houſe, which ſeruantes he toke and ſlew, chopped them in peeces, and thꝛewe into that hogſhed of wine a legge, into that barrell of cyder an arme, into this veſſel of ale an head, and ſo into ẏ lemes of methe, and tubbes of bꝛine, and other licoꝛ, he beſtowed the partes of the dead carcaſſes of his bꝛothers ſeruauntes, ſending the king woꝛd, that he had pꝛouided at his bꝛothers manoꝛ, againſte his comming, good plentie of ſouſe, and poudꝛed meate, what ſo euer he ſhould finde beſide. Thys rumoꝛ of this cruell deede, ſpꝛang ouer all the Realme, whereupõ the Noꝛthumbers, whom he hadde gouerned foꝛ the ſpace of tenne yeares very cruelly, toke occaſion to rebell againſte him, and ſlew his ſeruants both Engliſhmen and Danes, ſpoyled his houſes, and toke away his hoꝛſes, his armoure, and all other his goodes and houſehold ſtuffe. The chiefeſt cauſe (as is remembꝛed by ſome wꝛiters) that moued the Noꝛthumbers thus to riſe and rebell againſt Toſtie, was foꝛ ẏ deteſtable murther of certain Gentlemen of their countrey, ſeruauntes vnto Goſpatricke, whiche the Quene in behalfe of hir bꝛother had cauſed to be ſlayne in the Courte by treaſon, in the fourth night of Chꝛiſtmas laſt paſt, and alſo in reuenge of other noble men which in the laſt yeare Toſtie himſelfe had commaunded to bee murthered in his owne chamber at Yoꝛke; whither hee had allured them to come vnder colour of concludyng a peace with them. Alſo the greeuous payments wherewith hee charged the people of that countrey, ſet them in a great rage againſte hym.

The cruell dealing of Earle T.

The Noꝛthumbers againſt Toſtie.

But the Kyng aduertiſed heereof, liked not not their doings, for that they had done it without commaundement or commiſſion, and therefore ſent Earle Harrold with an army to chaſtice them, but they were ſtrong ynough to withſtand him, as thoſe whiche were aſſembled in armoure togither with the people of Lincolneſhire, Nottinghamſhire, and Derbiſhire, and hauing with them Marcherus or Malcharus, the ſon of Erle Algar, were come as farre as Northampton, doing muche hurte in the parties thereaboutes: but yet to haue ẏ kyngs peace, they offered to returne home, ſo that they might haue an other Earle appointed them, for that they plainely proteſted, ẏ they beeyng free men, borne and bred out of bondage, might not ſuffer any cruell gouernour to rule ouer them, being taught by their auncetors, eyther to liue in libertie, or to die in defence thereof. If therfore it might pleaſe the King to aſſigne Marcharus the ſonne of Earle Algar to be theyr Ruler, hee ſhoulde ſee how obedient ſubiects they would proue and ſhewe themſelues to be, when they ſhould be vſed after a reaſonable & courteous manner. All things conſidered, their requeſt ſeemed reaſonable, or at leaſt, it was thought neceſſary, that it ſhuld be graunted. And ſo was Marcharus or Malcherus made Earle of Northumberland. Teſtie in great diſpleaſure with his wife and children ſayled ouer into Flaunders, & there remayned till after the deceaſe of King Edward. Finally, after that this courteous Prince Kyng Edwarde had raigned three and twentie yeares ſeuen monethes and odde dayes, he departed this life at London the fourth of January, and was buried in the Church of Weſtminſter whyche he had in his life time royally repayred after ſuche a ſtately ſort, as few Churches in thoſe dayes were like thereto within this Realme, ſo that afterwardes the ſame was a patrone for other to bee built after the ſame fourme. This Edward was a Prince of ſuch a vertuous diſpoſition of minde, that his fame of holyneſſe ſprang ouer all. He abhorred warres and ſhedding of bloud, in ſo much, that when hee liued as a baniſhed man in Normandy, hee hadde this ſaying oftentimes in hys mouth, that he had rather liue a priuate life for euer, than to attein the Kingdome by the ſlaughter and deathe of any man. Hee coulde not abide to haue the people oppreſſed with tributes or exactions, in ſo much, that he cauſed the paymente called Danegelt, whiche had continued for the ſpace almoſt of fortie yeres to ceaſſe. It hath bin ſayd, that when the collectors of this money, or ſome other ſubſedy had gote an huge quãtitie of threaſure togyther, they brought it vnto him, and layd it altogither vppon an heape, ſo to delighte hys eyes: but he declaring that he ſawe a Deuil playing and fetching gambals about that heape of money, commaunded that it ſhoulde bee had away, and reſtored againe to them of whome it was leuied.

In dyet and apparrell hee was ſpare and nothing ſumptuous: and although on high feaſtes he ware rich apparrell, as became the Maieſtie of his royall perſonage: he ſhewed yet no proude nor lofty countenance, rather praying God for hys bountifull goodneſſe towardes hym extended, than eſteemyng therein the vayne Pompe of the worlde.

The pleaſure ẏ he toke chiefly in this worlde for refreſhing of his wittes, conſiſted onely in Hawking and Hunting, whiche exerciſes he dayly vſed, after he had firſt hin in the Church at deuine ſeruice.

In other things he ſeemed wholly gyuen to a deuoute trade of life, charitable to the poore, and very liberall, namely to Hoſpitalles and houſes of Religion in the parties of beyonde the Sea, wiſhing euer, that the Monkes and Religious perſons of his Realme, would haue followed the vertue and holineſſe of life vſed amongſt them of forraine parties. Is hath bin thought he was inſpired with the gift of Prophecie, and alſo to haue hadde the gift of healing infirmities and diſeaſes.

Namely, he vſed to help thoſe that were vexed with the diſeaſe, commonly called the Kyngs euill, and left that vertue as it were a portion of inheritance vnto his ſucceſſors the Kyngs of this Realme.

A tale of a Ring.

Hee was warned (as hath bin reported) of hys death certaine dayes before hee dyed, by a Ring that was brought to him by certaine Pilgrimes comming from Hieruſalem, which ring he hadde ſecretly giuen to a poore man that aſked his charitie in the name of God and Sainte Iohn the Euangeliſt. But to conclude, ſuche was the opinion conceyued of his holyneſſe of life, that ſhortly after his deceaſſe, hee was canonized amongſt the number of Saintes, and named Edward the Confeſſor.

King Edwarde canonized for a Saint.

Whileſt hee lay ſicke of that ſickneſſe whereof at length hee died, after he hadde remayned for two dayes ſpeechleſſe, the third day after when he had layne for a time in a ſlumber or ſoft ſleepe, at the tyme of his wakening, hee fetched a deepe ſigh, and thus ſayde, Oh Lorde God Almighty, if thys bee not a vaine fantaſticall illuſion, but a true viſion which I haue ſeene, graunt me ſpace to vtter the ſame vnto theſe that ſtande heere preſente, or elſe not. And heerewith hauing hys ſpeeche perfect, he declared how he had ſeene two Monkes ſtand by him as he thoughte, whome in his youth he knewe in Normandy to haue liued Godly, and died Chriſtianly. Theſe Monkes (ſaid hee) proteſting vnto mee that they were the meſſengers of God, ſpake theſe wordes, becauſe ẏ chiefe gouernours of England, the Biſhops and

Will. Malm. Mat. Weſt.

Abbots, are not the Miniſters of God, but the Diuels, the Almighty God hath deliuered this Kingdome for one yere and a day into the hands of the enimie, and wicked ſpirites ſhall walke abrode throughe the whole land. And whē I made aunſwere that I woulde declare theſe thyngs to the people, and promiſed on theyr behalfe, that they ſhoulde doe penaunce in following the example of the Niniuites. They ſayde agayne, that it would not be, for neyther ſhould the people repente, nor God take any pitie vpon them. And when is there hope to haue an ende of theſe miſeries ſayd I, then ſayde they, when a greene tree is cut in ſunder in the middle, and the parte cut off, is carried three acres breedth from the ſtocke, & returning agayne to the ſtoale, ſhall ioyne therewith, and begin to budde and beare fruite after the former manner, by reaſon of the ſappe renewing the accuſtomed nouriſhmente, then I ſay, may there be hope that ſuch euils ſhall ceaſſe, and diminiſhe: Although other that ſtode by, were brought in feare with thoſe the Kyngs wordes, the Archbiſhoppe Stigande yet made but a ieſt therof, ſaying, that the olde man raued nowe in hys ſickneſſe, as men of great yeares vſe to do. But the trouth of that Prophecie afterwards too playnely appeared, when Englande became the habitation of newe ſtraungers, in ſuche wiſe, that there was neyther gouernoure, Biſhoppe, nor Abbot remayning therein of the Engliſhe Nation.

But now to make an ende with K. Edward, hee was of perſon comely, and of an indifferente ſtature, of white heare, both head and beарde, of face ruddy, and in all other partes of his body fayre ſkinned, with due ſtate and proportion of limmes as was thereto conueniente.

In the yeare before the deathe of Kyng Edwarde, a blaſing Starre appeared, the whyche when a Monke of Malmeſbury that highte Eylmer beheelde, hee vttered theſe wordes (as it were by way of Prophecying:) Thou arte come (ſayth he) thou art come, muche to be lamēted of many a mother: it is long agone ſith I ſaw thee, but nowe I doe beholde thee, the more terrible threatning deſtruction to this countrey by thy dreadfull appearance.

In the perſon of Kyng Edward ceaſed by his deathe the noble progenie of the Weſt Saxon Kings, which had continued from the firſt yeare of the raigne of Cerdicke or Cerditius, the ſpace of fiue hundred. 47. yeares complete. And from Egbert two hundred ſixtie ſixe yeres, as by William Harriſons Chronologie is eaſie to bee collected, whoſe poſitions as moſt exact for the computation of the tyme, I chiefly followe.

MOreouer, ſith the progenie of the Saxon Kyngs ſeemeth wholly to take ende wt this Edward ſurnamed the Confeſſor, or the third of that name before the Conqueſt, we haue thought good for the better help of memorie, to ſet downe in order, the names as well of thoſe that reigned among the Weſt Saxons, (who at length as yee haue heard, obteyned the whole Monarchie) as alſo of them which ruled in the other ſeaue kyngdomes before the ſame were united vnto the ſayd Kingdome of the Weſt Saxons.

From this Aldhune the kingdome of the South Saxons was trãſlated to the weſt Saxons.

Here is to be remembred, that as partly before is expressed, wee finde in some olde Writers, howe the fyrst Kings of seuen of these Kingdomes of the Germaine Nation that bare rule in this Isle, fetched theyr pedegrees from one Woden, who begatte of Frea his wyfe seuen sonnes, that is to witte, 1. Uecta, of whom came the kings of Kent. 2. Fethelgeta, or Frethegeath, from whome the kings of Mercia discended. 3. Balday of whose race the Kings of the West Saxons had theyr originall. 4. Beldagius, auncetour to the kings of Bernicia, and the Northumbers. 5. Wegodach, or Wegdagus, frō whom came the kings of Deira. 6. Casser, from whom proceeded the kings of the East Angles. 7. Nascad alias Saxuad, of whom the kings of the East Saxons had their beginning.

Mat. VVest.

And here you must note, that although the kings of the .viij. kingdome, that is, of the South-Saxons or of Sussex, were discended of the same people, yet were they not of the same line. By other it should seeme, that Woden had but fiue sonnes: as Uecta, great Grandfather to Hengest: Wepedeg, antecessor to the kings of the East Angles: Uclac, from whom proceeded the kings of Mercia: Saxuad, from whom the kings of Essex came: & Beldeg, of whose generatiō proceeded the kings of the South Saxons, West Saxons, and the Northumbers. Moreouer, there bee that bring the genealogie from Noe or Noah, the son of Lamech, which Noe was the .ix. in discent frō Adam, & Woden the .xv. frō Noah, as thus: Noe was the father to Sem ẏ father of Bedwi, the father of Wala, the father of Hatria or Hathra, the father of Itermod, ẏ father of Heremod, the father of Sheaf or Seaf, the father of Seldoa or Seeldua, the father of Beatu or Beau, ẏ father of Teathwij alias Tadwa or Teathwy, the father of Geta, reputed for a God among the Gentiles, the father of Fingodulph otherwise Godulfe, the father of Fritwolfe otherwise Frinin the father of Freolaf alias Freolater, the father of Frethwold or Friderwold, the father of the aforenamed Woden or Othen.

Harold

King Edwarde departed this life An. christ 1065. after the account of the church of England.

Mat. VVest. Polidor.

KIng Edwarde beeing thus departed this life the Peeres of the lande were in great doubt and perplexitie to whom they might best cōmit the royall gouernmēt of the realm. For ther was not any among them that had iust title thereto, or able and apt to take the charge vpō him: for although Edgar surnamed Edeling, the sonne of Edward the Outlaw, that was sonne of Edmond Ironside, was the same time lately come into Englande, with his mother and sisters oute of Hungarie where he was borne: yet for that hee was but a child, and not of sufficient age to beare rule, they durst not as then commit the gouernment of the realme vnto him, least (as some haue thought) his tendernesse of age might first breed a contempt of his person, and therewith minister occasion to ciuil discord, whereby a shipwrak of the estate might to the great annoy and present ouerthrow of such ensue, as then liued in the same. But what consideration so euer they had in this behalf, they ought not to haue defrauded the yong Gentleman of his lawfull right to the Crowne. For as we haue heard and seene, God whose prouidence & mightie power is shewed by ouerthrowing of high and mightie things now and then, by the weake and feeble hath gouerned states and kingdoms oftentimes in as good quiet and princely policie by a childe, as by menne of ryper age and greate discretion.

Edeling was, a noble and such one as is come of the kings bloud.

But to the purpose, beside the doubt whiche rested among the Lordes, howe to bestowe the Crowne, the manifold and straunge wonders which were seene and heard in those days, betokening (as men thought) some chaunge to bee at hande in the estate of the realme, made the Lordes afrayde, and namely because they stode in great doubt of William duke of Normandie, who pretended a right to the crowne, as lawful heyre appoynted by king Edward, for that he was akinne to him in the secōd and third degree. For Richard the first of that name duke of Normandie, begot Richard the seconde, and Emme, which Emme bare Edward by hir husband Ethelred. Richarde the second also had issue Richard the thirde, and Robert, which Robert by a Concubine had issue William, surnamed the bastard, that was nowe Duke of Normandie, and after the death of hys cosin king Edwarde, made clayme (as is sayde) to the crowne of Englande. Whilest the Lordes were thus studying and consulting what shoulde be best for them to doe in these doubtes, Haraldo (the sonne of Godwin Earle of Kent, proclayned himselfe king of England.) The people beeing not much offended therewith, because of the great cōfidence and opinion which they had lately conceyued of his valiancie.

Dukes of Normandie.

Harold clayme to the crowne of England.

Some write, among which Edmerus is one, how king Edwarde ordeyned before his death, that Harold shoulde succeed him as heyre to the crowne, and that thereupon the Lordes immediately after the sayde Edwardes decease, crowned Harolde for their king, and so he was sacred by Aldred Archb. of Yorke, according to the custome

and maner of the former kings, or as other afſyrme, he ſet the crowne on his owne head without any the accuſtomed ceremonies, in the yeare after the byrth of our ſauiour. 1066. or in the yere of Chriſt. 1065. after the account of the Church of Englād (as before is noted.) But how and whenſoeuer he came to the ſeate royall of this Kingdome, certaine it is, that this Harolde in the beginning of his raigne, conſidering with him-ſelfe howe and in what ſort hee had taken vppon him the rule of the kingdome, rather by intruſion than by any lawfull right, he ſtudied by all mea-nes which way to winne the peoples fauour, and omitted no occaſion whereby hee might ſhewe any token of bounteous liberalitie, gentleneſſe, & courteous behauiour towardes them. The grie-uous cuſtoms alſo and taxes which his predeceſors had rayſed, he either aboliſhed or diminiſhed:
the ordinarie wages of his ſeruauntes and men of warre he encreaſed, and further ſhewed hym-ſelfe very well bent to all vertue and goodneſſe, wherby he purchaſed no ſmal fauour among ſuch
as were his ſubiectes.

Whyleſt Harolde went about thus to ſteale the peoples good willes, there came ouer vnlo-ked for ſundrie Ambaſſadours from William the baſtarde Duke of Normandie, with commiſſion to requyre hym to remember his othe ſometime made to the ſayde William in the tyme of his extremitie, whiche was, that hee the ſayde Haralde ſhoulde ayde him in the at-teyning of the Crowne of Englande, if King Edwarde ſhoulde happen to dye without iſſue.

This couenaunt he made (as it is ſuppoſed) in king Edwards dayes, (when by lycence of the ſame Edwarde, or rather (as Edmerus wryteth) agaynſt his will) he went ouer into Normandie to viſite his brethren, which lay there as pledges: howbeit at this preſent, Haroldes aunſwere to the ſayde Ambaſſadours was, that hee would be readie to gratifie the Duke in all that he coulde demaunde, ſo that he would not aſke the realme, which alredy he had in his full poſſeſſion.
And further he declared vnto the (as ſome write) Edmerus.
that as for the othe which hee had made in tymes paſt vnto Duke William, the ſame was but a conſtrayned and no voluntarie oth, which in law is nothing, ſince thereby hee toke vppon him to Mat. VVeſt.
graunt that whiche was not in his power to giue, hee beeing but a ſubiect whileſt King Edwarde was lyuing: for if a promiſed vowe or othe which a Mayde maketh concerning the be-ſtowing of hir bodie in hir fathers houſe without his conſent is made voyde, much more an othe by him made that was a ſubiecte, and vnder the rule of a king without his ſouereignes conſent, ought to be voyde and of no value.

He alledged moreouer, that as for him to take an othe to deliuer the inheritaunce of anye Realme withoute the generall conſent of the eſtates of the ſame, coulde not bee other than a greate peece of preſumption, yea althoughe hee might haue iuſt tytle thereunto, ſo it was an vnreaſonable requeſt of the Duke at this preſent to will him to renounce the Kingdome, the gouernance whereof hee had alreadie taken vpon him, with ſo great fauor and good lyking of all men.

Duke William hauing receyued this anſwer, Duke Willis eſſoones ſendeth to king Haroldo. and nothing lyking therof, hee ſendeth once againe to Harolde, requyring him then at the leaſt wiſe, that hee would take his daughter to wife, according to his former promiſe, in refuſal wher-of he could make no ſound allegation, becauſe it was a thing of his owne motion, and in his abſolute power, both to graunt and to perfourme.
But Harolde beeing of a ſtoute courage, with prowde countenaunce, frowned vpon the Norman Ambaſſadors, and declared to them that his minde was nothing bent as then to yeelde therevnto in any maner of wiſe. And ſo with other talke tending to the like effect he ſent them away without any other anſwere.

The daughter of Duke William which Harold ſhould haue maried, was named Adeliza, as Gemeticenſis hath, and with hir (as the ſame au- Gemeticenſis.
thour writeth) it was couenanted by Duke William that Harold ſhould enioy halfe the Realme in name of hir dower. Howbeit ſome write that VVil. Mal.
this daughter of Duke William was departed this life before the cōming of theſe Ambaſſadors, and that Harold therevppon thought himſelf diſcharged of the oth and couenants made to Duke William, and therfore ſent them away with ſuch an vntoward anſwere.

But howſoeuer it was, after the departure of Polidor.
theſe Ambaſſadours, King Harrolde (doubting what would enſue) cauſed his ſhippes to be newly rigged, his men of warre to be muſtred, & ſpee-dily put in a readineſſe, to the ende that if any ſo-paine

dame inuaſion ſhould be made and attempted by his enimie, he might be able to reſiſt them.

About the ſame time alſo, and vpon the .xxiiij. of Apꝛill (whileſt Harold was making pꝛouiſion to withſtande the Nꝛoꝛman foꝛce) there appeared a blaſing Starre, which was ſeene not onely here in Englande, but alſo in other partes of the woꝛlde, which continued the ſpace of .vij. dayes.

R. Houed. Sim. Dun.

In this meane while, Toſtie the bꝛother of king Harolde (who in the dayes of king Edward foꝛ his cruelties had beene chaſed out of the realme by the Nꝛothumbers) returning out of Flanders aſſembled a Nauie of ſhippes from diuerſe partes to the number of .lx. with the which he arriued in the Ile of Wight, and there ſpoiled the Country, & afterward ſayling about, by the coaſts of Kent, he toke ſundꝛie pꝛayes there alſo, and came at the laſt to Sandwich: So that Harolde was nowe conſtrayned to appoynt the Nauie whiche hee had pꝛepared agaynſt the Nꝛoꝛmans, to goe agaynſt his bꝛother Earle Toſtie: whereof the ſaid Toſtie being aduertiſed, dꝛewe towardes Lyndſey in Lincolnſhire, and there taking lande did muche hurt in the Countrey, both with ſwoꝛde and fire, till at length Edwyne Earle of Mercia, and Nꝛoꝛkarus Earle of Nꝛothumberlande, ayded with the Kings nauie, chaſed him from thence, and cauſed him to flee into Scotlande, not withoute ſome loſſe both of his menne and ſhippes.

This trouble was vneth quieted, when ſtreight wayes another came in the necke thereof, farre moꝛe daungerous than the fiꝛſt. Foꝛ Toſtie pꝛeceyuing that he coulde get no ayde in Scotlande to make any account of, he ſayled foꝛth into Nꝛoꝛway, and there pꝛerſwaded Harold Harfager king of that Realme, to ſayle with an armie into England, pꝛerſwading him, that by meanes of a ciuill diſſention lately kindled betwixt the king and his Lꝛoꝛds, (which was not ſo) it ſhould be an eaſie matter foꝛ him to make a conqueſt of the whole Realme, and raigne ouer them as his pꝛedeceſſoꝛs had done befoꝛe.

Some Authours affyꝛme, how Harolde king of Nꝛoꝛway toke this enterpꝛiſe in hande of hys owne minde, and not by pꝛocurement of Toſtie, ſaying that Toſtie meeting with him in Scotland, did pꝛerſwade him to go foꝛward in his pꝛoꝛpoſed buſineſſe, and that the ſayde Harolde Harfager with all conuenient ſpeede paſſed foꝛth, and with a Nauie of thꝛee hundꝛed ſayle, entred into the riuer of Tine, where after he had reſted a few dayes to refreſh his people, Erle Toſtie came alſo with his powꝛe (accoꝛding to an appointmẽt which ſhould be made betweene them.) They adde furthermoꝛe, that they ſayled foꝛth alongeſt the coaſt, till they arriued in the mouth of Humber, and then dꝛawing vp agaynſt the ſtreame of the riuer Oꝛſe, they landed at length at a place called Richehall, fꝛõ whence they ſet foꝛward to inuade the Countrey, and neare vnto Yoꝛke on the Nꝛothſide of the Citie, they fought with the powꝛer of the Nꝛothumbers, which was led by the Earles Edwyn and Marchar (two bꝛethꝛen) and there diſcomfited and chaſed them into the Citie, with great ſlaughter and bloudſhed.

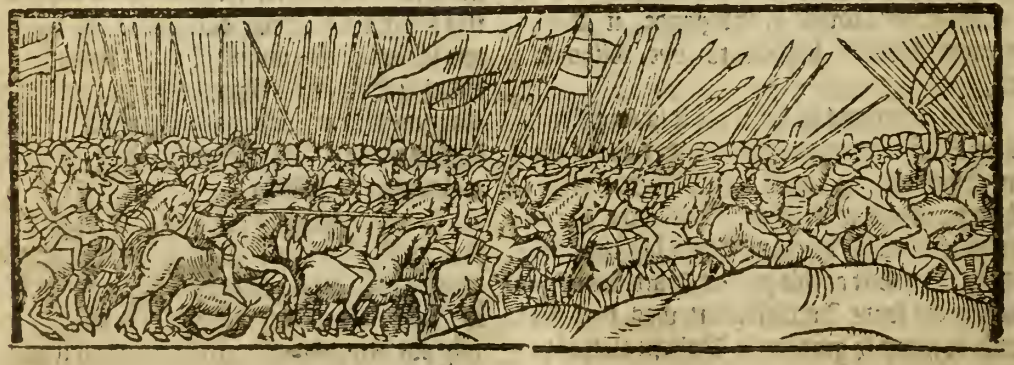
The Engliſhmen diſcomfited.

Harolde King of Englande beeing aduertiſed of this chaunce, hee made the moꝛe haſte foꝛwardes (foꝛ he was alreadie in the fielde with his armie, intending alſo to come towardes hys enimies) ſo that vpon the fifth day after he came to Stanfoꝛde Bꝛidge, finding there the ſayde King Harfager and Toſtie readie embattayled, hee fyꝛſte aſſayled thoſe that kept the Bꝛidge, where (as ſome Wꝛyters affyꝛme) a Nꝛoꝛwegian Souldier with his Axe defended the paſſage, mangre the whole hoſt of the Engliſh men, and ſlue foꝛtie of them oꝛ moꝛe with hys Axe, and might not bee ouercome, till an Engliſhe man went with a Boate vnder the Bꝛidge, and thꝛough an hole thereof, thꝛuſt him vppe into the bodie with his Speare: although Mat. Weſtm. noteth that hee was ſlaine with a Dart whiche one of King Harolde his ſeruauntes thꝛewe at him, and ſo ended his life. Which Bꝛidge being wonne, the whole hoſte of the Engliſh men paſſed ouer, and ioyned with theyꝛ enimies, and after a right great and ſoꝛe battayle, put them all to flight.



This battaile was fought the euen of S. Mathew the Apoſtle, anno Simon Dun.

The Nꝛoꝛwegians diſcomfited.

In this conflicte Harolde Harfager King of the Nꝛoꝛwegians was ſlain, and ſo likewiſe was Toſtie, the King of Englande hys Bꝛother,

The king of Norway and Toſtie ſlaine.

beſides a great number of other, as well in the battaile as in the chaſe: neyther did the Engliſhe men eſcape all free, for the Norwegians fought it out a long time very ſtoutly, beating downe and killing great numbers of ſuche as aſſayled them with great courage and aſſurauncē. The reſidue of the Norwegians that were left to kepe theyr ſhippes vnder the guiding of Olaue ſonne to the king of Norway, and Paule Earle of Orkney, after they vnderſtode by theyr fellowes that eſcaped from the field, how the matter went with Harkagar and Tolkie, they hoyſed vp their ſayles and directed theyr courſe homewardes, bearing ſorrowfull newes with them into theyr Countrey, of the loſſe of theyr King, and ouerthrowe of all his people.

Some write, that the K. of England permitted them frankly to depart with .xx. ſhippes, hauing firſt cauſed them to deliuer ſuche Hoſtages as they had receyued of the Citizens of Yorke. But howe ſo euer it was, Harolde, reioyſing in that he had atteyned ſo glorious a victorie, and being nowe ſurpryſed with pryde and couetouſneſſe togyther, he deuided the ſpoyle of the field nothing equally, but to ſuche as he fauoured, hee diſtributed liberally, and to other (though they had muche better deſerued) hee gaue nothing at all, reteyning ſtyll the beſt part of all to himſelfe, by reaſon whereof he loſt the fauor of many of his men, who for this his vncurteſie, did not a little alienate their good willes from him.

This done, he repayred to Yorke, and there ſtayed for a time to reforme the diſordered ſtate of the Countrey, which by reaſon of theſe warres was greatly out of frame.

In the meane tyme, William Duke of Normandie (hauing knowledge after what manner king Harolde was buſied in the Northy parties of his realme, and vnderſtanding that the ſouth parties thereof remayned without prouiſion of neceſſarie defence) haſted with all diligence to make his puruеyance of men and ſhippes, that he might vpon ſuch a conuenient occaſion ſet forward ſodenly to inuade his enimie. And amongſt other of his friends, vnto whom he laboured for ayde, his father in lawe Baldwine Earle of Flaunders, was one of the chiefe, who vpon promiſe of great ſummes of money and other large offers made, did ayde him with men, munition, ſhippes, and victayles very freely.

The French king alſo did as much for hys part as lay in him to helpe forwarde thys ſo high an enterpryſe. Wherefore when all things were now in a readineſſe, hee came to the towne of Saint Valerie, where he hadde aſſembled togyther an huge Naule of Shippes (to the number (as ſome Authours affyrme) of three hundred ſayle) and when he had tarryed there a long time for a conuenable wind, at length it came about euē as he himſelf deſired. Then ſhipping his armie which conſiſted of Normans, Flemings, French men, and Britonnes, with all expedition he toke the Sea, and directing his courſe towardes Englande, hee finally landed at a place in Suſſex, auncientlye called Peuenſſey the. 28. day of September, where he did ſette his men a lande, and prouided all things neceſſarie to encourage and refreſh them. Now Pemſey. Duke William landed at Pemſey.

At his going out of his ſhippe vnto the ſhore, one of his feete ſlipped as he ſtepped forward, but the other ſtacke faſt in the ſande, the whiche ſo ſoone as one of his knightes had eſpied, and ſeeing his hand whereupon he ſtayed full of earth, when he roſe, he ſpake aloude and ſayde. Now ſir Duke thou haſt the ſoyle of Englande faſt in thy hand, and ſhalt of a duke ere long become a King. The Duke hearing his tale laughed merily thereat, and comming a lande, by and by hee made hys Proclamation, declaring vpon what occaſions he had thus entred the Realme.

The firſt and principall cauſe whiche hee alledged was for to chalenge his right, meaning the Dominion of the lande that to him was gyuen and aſſigned (as hee ſayde) by hys Nephew king Edwarde late ruler of the ſame lande. Hen. Hunt.

The ſeconde was, to reuenge the death of hys Nephewe Alured or Alfred the brother of the ſame King Edwarde, whome Godwyn Earle of Kent, and his adherents had moſt wickedly murthered.

The thirde was, to be reuenged of the wrong done vnto Robert Archebiſhoppe of Canterburie, who as hee was enfourmed, was exiled by the meanes and labour of Harolde, in the dayes of King Edwarde. Wherein wee haue to note, that whether it were for diſpleaſure that the Pope hadde ſometyme conceyued for the wrong done to the Archebiſhoppe, or at the onely ſuyte of Duke William, certaine it is that the Pope as then named Alexander the ſeconde, fauoured thys enterpryſe of the Duke, and in token thereof ſent him a white Banner, whiche hee willed him to ſette vp in the decke of the Shippe, wherein hee himſelfe ſhoulde ſayle. VVil. Malm. The Pope fauoured Duke Williams enterpriſe.

In deede (as writers report) the Pope with hys Cardinalles, and all the whole Courte of Rome, had King Harolde euer in greate hatred and diſdeyne, becauſe that he had taken vppon hym the Crowne without theyr conſent, or any Eccleſiaſticall ſolemnitie or agreement of the Byſhoppes. And although the Pope, and his brethren the ſayde Cardinalles diſſembled the matter for the tyme, yet nowe beholding to what ende hys bolde preſumption was like to come, they with frowning for- *Mat. Gemeticenſis. At hys fyrſt landing at Peuenelley or Pemley (whether you will) hee fortifyed a peece of ground with ſtrong Trenches, and leauing therin a competent number of menne of warre to keepe the ſame, hee ſpedde hym towardes Haſtings, and comming thither, he buylt an other Fortreſſe there with all ſpeede poſſible without ſuffering hys Souldiours to robbe or harry the Countrey adioyning, ſaying that it ſhoulde bee greate folly for him to ſpoyle that people, which ere many dayes to come were lyke to bee hys ſubiectes.

VVil. Mal. King Harolde beeing as yet in the North partes, and hearing that Duke William was thus landed in Englande, hee ſpedde him ſouthwarde, and gathering his people togither out of the Countreys as he went forwardes, at length he came neare to his enimies, and ſending eſpyals into their Campe to vnderſtande of what Mat. VVeſt. ſtrength they were: the vnſkilfull meſſengers regarding ſmally their charge, brought worde againe of nothing elſe but that all Duke Williams Souldiers were Prieſtes. For the Normans beards ſhauen. mans had at that time theyr ouer lyps & cheekes VVil. Mal. ſhauen, whereas the Engliſhe menne vſed to Hen. Marle. ſuffer the heare of theyr ouer lyppes to growe at length: but Harolde aunſwered, that they were not Prieſtes, but ſtalworth and hardie Souldiours, and ſuche as were like to abide well by their Captaine.

Gyrth woulde not haue hys brother king Harold fight himſelfe. In the meane ſeaſon, Girth one of Haroldes yonger brethren (conſidering that periurie is neuer left vnpuniſhed) aduyſed his brother not to aduenture himſelfe at this preſent in the battaile, forſomuch as he had beene ſometyme ſworne to Gemeticenſis. Duke William, but rather to ſuffer him and other of the Nobilitye to encounter wyth the ſayde Duke, that were not bounde to him by former othe or otherwiſe: but Harolde aunſwered that hee was free from anye ſuche othe, and that in defence of hys Countrey he woulde fight boldely wyth him as wyth hys greateſt enimie.

VV. Mal. Before they came to fight alſo, diuerſe offers were made on both partes for an vnitie to haue beene had betwixte the two Princes: but when no conditions of agreement coulde take place, they forthwith prepared themſelues to trye the matter by dynt of ſworde. And ſo on the .xiiij. day of Octobet, beeing Saterdaye, both the Hoſtes mette in the fielde at a place in Suſſex not farre from Haſtinges, where as the Abbay of Battaile was afterwards buylded.

The Engliſhe menne were all brought into one entyre maine battaile a foote, wyth huge Axes in theyr handes, and paled afront wyth Pauyſes, in ſuche wyſe that it was thoughte impoſſible for the enimye to breake theyr array. The order of the Engliſh men.

On the other ſyde the Normans were deuided into ſeuerall battayles, as fyrſt the ſotemenne that were Archers, and alſo thoſe that bare Gleyues and Axes, were placed in the foreſroute, and the Horſemenne deuyded into Winges, ſtoode on the ſydes in verie good order. Mat. VVeſt. The array of the Normans.

All the nyght before the battayle, the Engliſhe menne made greate noyce and ſlept not, but ſang and fell to drinking and making of reuell and paſtime, as thoughe there had beene no accounte to bee made of the nexte dayes trayuayle. But the Normans behaued themſelues warily and ſoberly, ſpending all that night in prayer and confeſſing theyr ſinnes vnto God, and in the Morning earely they receyued the Communion before they wente forth to the battayle. Hen. Hunt. VVil. Mal.

Some wryte that when Duke William ſhoulde putte on hys armour to goe to the fielde, the backe halfe of his Curaſſes by chaunce was ſette on before by ſuche as holpe to arme hym, at whiche chaunce hee toke occaſion of laughter, ſaying merily to them that ſtood by, No force thys is good lucke, for the eſtate of my Dukedome ſhall bee ere night chaunged into a Kingdome.

Beſide this, hee ſpake manye comfortable wordes vnto his menne, to encourage them to the battayle. Neither was Harolde forgetfull in that poynte on his part. And ſo at conuenient tyme when both partes were readie, they made forwarde eche to encounter wyth other, on the foreſayde fourtenth daye of October, with great force and aſſurance.

In the beginning of the battayle, the Arrowes flewe abroade freſhly on both ſides, tyll they came to ioyne at hande ſtrokes, and then preaſſed eche ſyde vpon hys counterparte wyth Swordes, Axes, and other hand weapons tight egrely. Polidor. The battell betwixt king Harolde and Duke William is begun.

Duke William commaunded his Horſemenne to giue the charge on the breaſtes of hys enimyes battayles: but the Engliſhe menne keeping themſelues cloſe togyther wythoute ſcattering, receyued theyr enimyes vppon the poyntes of theyr Weapons wyth ſuche fiercenelle and in ſuche ſtyffe order, that manye of the Norman horſemen were ouerthrowne without recouerie, and ſlaine at the firſte brunte. When Duke William perceyued this inconuenience (as hee that well and throughlye vnderſtoode the ſkilfull poyntes of warre as well as the beſt) he gaue a ſigne to his men, (according to an order appoynted before hande vpon any ſuch occaſion,) that they ſhoulde giue backe, and make a countenaunce as though they did flee, which was quickly done by the Normans, and withall they embattayled theyr footemen in new order, ſo that their Horſemen ſhifted themſelues on the wings, readie to reſkue the footemen if their array ſhoulde happen to be diſturbed. By this wilie ſtratageme and pollicie of warre, the Engliſh men were deceyued: for they beholding the Normans ſomewhat to ſhrinke backe to bring themſelues into the aboueſayde order, thought verily that they had fledde, and thereuppon meaning to purſue them before they ſhoulde recouer theyr grounde, they brake theyr array, and beganne to followe the chaſe: whereupon the Normans (perceyuing nowe that all things came to paſſe as they deſired) ſpeedily returned, and caſting themſelues togyther quickly into arraye, beganne to charge them againe of newe, and ſo hauing them at that aduauntage, they ſlue them downe on euerie ſyde. The Engliſhe men on the other parte fought ſore, and thoughe theyr king were beaten downe among them and ſlayne, yet were they lothe to flee or giue ouer, ſo ſharpe was the battaile, that Duke William himſelfe had three horſes ſlaine vnder him that day, and not without great daunger of his perſon.

Some of the Engliſhe men got them to the heigth of an hill, and beate backe the Normans that forced themſelues to wynne the hill of them, ſo that it was long ere the Normans could preuaile, beeing oftentymes driuen downe into the bottom of the valley beneath.

At length the Engliſh men perceyuing themſelues to bee ouermatched and beaten downe on euerye ſide, and thereunto greatlye diſcouraged wyth ſlaughter of theyr King, beganne firſt to giue ground, and after to ſcatter and to runne away, ſo that well was him that might then eſcape by flight, after that they had fought the moſt part of all that Saterday.

The Normans followed the chaſe, with ſuche egre raſhneſſe, that a great number of them falling with theyr Horſes and armour into a blinde ditche (hadowed with Reede and Sedges which grewe therein) were ſmouldred and preſſed to death, ere they coulde be ſuccoured or get any reliefe.

The next day the Normans fell to gathering in the ſpoyle of the fielde, burying alſo the deade bodies of their people that were ſlaine at the battaile, gyuing licence in ſemblable maner to the Engliſh men to doe the like.

Of the death of Harolde diuerſe report diuerſly, inſomuch that Giral. Cambren. ſayth, how after king Harold had receyued many woundes, and loſt his left eye, hee fledde from the fielde vnto the Citie of Weſtchester, and liued there long after an holy life, as an Ankre in the Cell of S. James, ſtil by Saint Johns Church, and there made a godly ende. But the ſaying of Giral. Cambren. in that poynt is not to be credited, bycauſe of the vnlikelyhoode of the thing itſelfe, and alſo generall conſent of other writers, who affyrme vniuerſally that he was killed in the battayle, firſt beeyng ſtryken through the left eye by the ſcull into the braync with an arrow, whereupon falling from his horſe to the grounde, hee was ſlaine in that place, after hee had reigned nine Monethes and nine dayes, as Floriacenſis doth report.

n. Hunt. Vigor. The Chronicles o Normandie saue 67974. Englishmen slaine. and of Normans. 6013.

There was slaine in this battaile besides king Harolde and his two brethren, Gyth and Leofrike, what on the one side and on the other, aboue twentie thousande menne. And finally hereby the bloud of the Saxons ceassed to raigne in Englande after they had continued possession of the same, from the fyrst comming of Hengist, which was about the yeare of our Sauiour. 450. alias. 449. vntill that present yeare of King Harolds death, which chaunced in the yeare. 1066. So that from the beginning of Hengist hys raigne, vnto Haroldes death, are reckened. 616. yeares, or (after some) 617. as by supputation of the time will easily appeare.

By all the which time there raigned kings of the Saxons bloud within this lande, except that for the space of. xx. yeares and somewhat more the Danes had the dominion of the Realme in their possession: for there are reckened from the begynning of King Suenois reigne, (which was the first Dane that gouerned England) vnto the last yeare of King Hardicnute, (the last Dane that ruled here) .xxviij. yeares, in whiche meane space Egelred recouering the Kingdome reigned two yeares, and after him his sonne Edmonde Ironside continued in the rule one yeare, so that the Danes had the whole possession of the lande but. xxv. yeares in all.

The bodie of king Harolde being founde among other slaine in the fielde, was buryed at Waltham, within the monasterie of the holye Crosse which hee before had founded & endowed to the behoofe of suche Canons as he had placed there, with fayre possessions.

The bodie of king Harold is buried at Waltham.

Verily, as some writers haue reported, there was nothing in this manne to bee in any wyse dispraysed, if his ambitious mynde coulde haue beene stayed from coueting the Kingdome, and that hee could haue beene contented to haue liued as a subiect.

Among other manifest proufes of his highe valiancie, this is remembred of him, that beeing sent agaynst the Welchmen (as before is partly mentioned) hee knowing theyr readie nymblenesse in seruice, and howe with their light armed menne they were accustomed to annoy and distresse those that shoulde assayle them, hee likewise (to matche them) prouided light armed men for the purpose, and so being furnished with suche bandes of nymble men and light Souldiers, hee entered vpon the Mountaynes of Snowdone, and there remaynyd amongest the crimpes for the space of two yeares. Hee sore afflicted the Welche Nation, toke their Kings, and sent theyr heades vnto the King that sent him aboute this businesse, and proceeding in suche rigorous manner as mighte moue the hearers to lament and pitie the case, hee causeд all the masle kinde that might be mette with, to be miserably slaine: and so with the edge of his swoorde he brought the Countrey to quiet, and wythall made this lawe, that if anye Welcheman from thencefoorth shoulde presume to passe the limittes ouer Offes ditch with any weapon about him, he should lose his right hand.

Ex. 6. libro Policraticon, siue de nugis curialium Ioh n Sarisb.

To conclude, by the valiant conduct of this Chieftaine, the Welche men were then so sore brought vnder, that in maner the whole Nation might seeme to faile, and to be almost vtterly destroyed. And therefore by permission of the king of England, the women of Wales ioyned themselues in mariage with English men. But to returne where we left.

Nowe forsomuch as it pleased God by hys hidde and secrete iudgements so to dispose the Realme of Englande, and in suche wise as that the gouernaunce thereof shoulde fall after thys maner into the handes of William duke of Normandie, I haue thought good before I enter further into this Historie (beeing nowe come to the conquest of the Realme, made by the foresayde Duke of Normandie) to set down his pedigrew, thereby to shewe howe he discended from the first Duke of that Countrey, who was named Rollo (and after by receyuing baptisme cleped Robert.)

The sayde Rollo or Rou, was sonne to a greate Lorde in Denmarke called Guyon, who hauing two sonnes, the sayde Rou, and Gourin, and being appoynted to depart the Countrey, as the lottes fell to him and other, according to the maner there vsed (in time when their people were encreased to a greater number than the Countrey was able to sustaine) refused to obey that order, and made warre agaynst the King there, who yet in the ende by practise founde meanes to slea the foresayde Guyon, and his sonne Gourin, so that Rou, or Rollo, hauing thus lost his father and brother, was compelled to forsake the countrey, with all those that had holpe his father to make warre agaynst the king. And thus driuen to seeke aduentures, at length he became a Christian, and was created Duke of Normandie, by gift of Charles King of Fraunce, surnamed Le Simple, whose daughter the Ladie Gilla hee also maried: but shee departing this life without issue, hee maryed Popee daughter to the Earle of Bessin and Bayeulx, whome hee had kept as his wyfe before hee was baptised, and had had by hir a sonne named VVilliam Longue espee, and a daughter named Erlota.

William Long espee, or Longa Spata had to wife the Ladie Sporta, daughter to Hubert Earle of Senlis, by whome he had issue Richard the second of that name duke of Normandy, who maryed the Ladie Agnes, the daughter of Hugh le Grand le Grande, Earle of Paris, of whome no issue proceeded: but after hir decease, he maryed to his seconde wife a Gentle woman named Gonnor, daughter to a knight of the Danishe line, by whō hee had three sonnes, Richarde that was after Duke of Normandie the third of that name, Robert, † Mauger. He had also by hir three daughters. Agnes, otherwise called Emme, maried first to Egelred king of Englande, and after to King Cnute: Helloye, otherwise Alix, bestowed vpon Geffrey Earle of Britaigne: and Mawde coupled in mariage with Eudes Earle of Charters and Blais. Richard the thirde of that name maried Judith, sister to Geoffray Earle of Brytaigne, by whome he had issue three sonnes, Richarde, Robert, and William, and as manye daughters: Alix, maried to Reignault Earle of Burgoyne: Alienor, maried to Baldwin Earle of Flaunders: and the thirde dyed yong, being affianced to Alfonse King of Nauarre. Their mother deceased after she had beene maried tenne yeares, and then Duke Richard maried secondly the Ladie Estric, sister to Cnute king of Englande and Denmarke, from whome hee purchased to be deuorced, and then maried a Gentlewoman called Paule, by whom he had issue two sonnes, William Earle of Arques, and Mauger Archbishop of Rouen.

Richarde the fourth of that name Duke of Normandie, eldest sonne to Richarde the thirde, dyed without issue, and then his brother Robert succeeded in the estate, whiche Robert begatte vppon Arlete or Harleuina daughter to a Burgesse of Felais, William surnamed the bastard, afterwardes Duke of Normandie, and by conquest king of Englande.

Hitherto haue we continued the Hystorie of this land, wherein may appeare the variable chaunges of states by course of times, and especially foure notable Conquests: as first by the Romans, secondly by Saxons, thirdly by the Danes, and now lastly by the Normans: in euerie of which alterations of the state, what is chiefly to be considered (bycause wee haue partly touched the same in the Proheme) we here omit to make any further discourse, and so proceede to the second Booke as followeth.

Honorable the Lorde Robert Dudley, Earle of Leyceſter, Baron of Denbigh, Knight of the moſt noble order of the Garter, Maiſter of the Queenes Maieſties Horſe, and one of hir highneſſe priuy Counſell.

IT may ſeeme (right honorable) a gret preſumptiõ in me, to haue taken in hand the collection of this Scottiſh hiſtory, and other of diuers regiõs, conſidering ſo many ſufficient men as liue in theſe dayes, far more able to performe the ſame. But where at the motion of a ſpecial frend, I vndertooke to deale therin, more vpõ truſt of his promiſed ayde than of mine owne abilitie, it pleaſed God to cal him to his mercy before the worke could be fully brought to end: but yet to anſwere the expectatiõ of his frends, and truſt, which he had cõmitted to thẽ and me in this behalf, I haue done my good will to accõpliſh part of that, which in his life time was intended, although not to my wiſhed deſire, by reaſon of ſuch wantes as had bene ſupplied if he had liued to haue ſeene it publiſhed himſelf. It reſteth (right noble Earle) that it may pleaſe your Honor to accept my doinges in good parte, to whom I offer this parcell of my trauayles in this Hiſtorie of Scotlande, in regarde of the honour due to your noble Father, for his incomparable valure well knowen and approued, aſwel within that realme as els where in ſeruice of two Kings of moſt famous memory, Henry the. viij. and Edward the ſixte, ſounding ſo greatly to his renowme as 15 Of Biſhoprikes, Vniuerſities, and Counties in Scotland.

TO THE RIGHT VVORSHIPFVL Maiſter Thomas Secford Eſquier and Maiſter of the Requeſtes, William Hariſon vvisheth all knovvledge of God, with dayly increaſe of his giftes at this preſent, and in the worlde to come life eueriaſting.

HAuing by your ſingular curteſie receyued great helpe in my deſcription of the riuers and ſtreames of Britain, and by conference of my trauaile vvith the platformes of thoſe fevv ſhires of England vvhich are by your infinite charges alreadie finiſhed (as the reſt ſhall be in time by Gods helpe, for the ineſtimable benefite of ſuche as inhabite this Ilande) not a little pulliſhed thoſe rough courſes of diuerſe vvaters not exactly before time deſcribed by Leland our Countreyman, or any auncient vvriter, I coulde not deuiſe anye thing more agreable vvith mine abilitie & your good nature (vvhich greatly fauoureth anye thing that is done for a commoditie vnto many) than to ſhevv ſome token of my thankefulneſſe for theſe your manifold kindneſſes, by the dedication of my ſimple tranſlation of the deſcription of Scotland at this tyme vnto your vvorſhip. In deede the trauaile taken herein is not great, bycauſe I tie not my tranſlation vnto his letter, neither the treatiſe of it ſelfe ſuch, as taketh vp any huge rovvme in the volume of this Chronicle. But ſuch as it is, & vvhat ſoeuer it is, I yeeld it vvholy vnto you, as a teſtimonie of my good vvill, vvhich deteſteth vtterly to receyue any benefit though it be neuer ſo ſmal, and not to be thankfull for it. Certes my vocation is ſuch, as calleth me to a farre other kind of ſtudie, ſo that I exerciſe theſe things onely for recreation ſake: and to ſay the truth, it is muche vnſitting for him that profeſſeth Diuinitie, to applie his time any other vviſe vnto contemplation of ciuill Hiſtories. And this is the cauſe vvherfore I haue choſen rather, onely vvith the loſſe of three or foure dayes to tranſlate Hector out of the Scottiſh (a tongue verie like vnto ours) than vvith more expence of time to diuiſe a nevve, or followv the Latin copie, vvhich is farre more large and copious. Hovv excellently if you conſider the arte, Boethus hath penned it and the reſt of his Hiſtorie in the Latin, the skilfull are not ignorant: but hovv profitably and compendiouſly Iohn Bellendon Archdeacon of Murrey his interpretour hath turned him from the Latin into the Scottiſh tongue, there are verie fevve Engliſh men that knovv, bycauſe vve want the bookes. VVherefore ſith the learned reade him in his ovvne ſtile, and his Countreymen in their naturall language, vvhy ſhould not vve borovv his deſcription and read the ſame in Engliſh likevviſe, ſith the knovvledge thereof may redounde to the great benefit of ſo many as heare or read the ſame. Accept therefore (right vvorſhipfull) this my ſimple offer, and although I aſſure my ſelfe, your naturall inclination to be ſuch, as that it vvill take nothing in ill part that is vvell meant tovvard you, hovve rudely ſoeuer it bee handled in the doing, yet I vvill not let to craue pardon for my preſumption, in that I dare be ſo bold as to offer ſuch a trifle vnto you, whom more vveightie affayres doe dayly call from things of ſo ſmall importaunce. Almightie God keepe your vvorſhip from time to time in his feare, and bleſſe you and my good Ladie your vvife, vvith ſuch increaſe of his benefites, as may moſt redounde to his glorie, and your ovvne aduauntage.

¶ The boundes of Albion

with the sundry commodities thereof, and of the great infirmities that fall vnto the people there for their intemperancy, and finally of the Religion vsed there in old tyme. Chap. 1.

THe Ile of Albion containeth in the whole circũference two thousande myles, hauing in length 700. and in breadth 300. as appeareth well by the coast therof that lieth ouer against Fraunce where it is broadest, and from whence it gathereth narrower and narrower, till it come to the vtter Marches & last boundes of England and Scotland. For betwixte the Mule of Galloway that is on the west side ouer against the Irish seas, and Saint Ebbes head, that lieth vpon the Germaine Ocean towarde the east, are scarcely 130. myles, and thencefoorth it groweth smaller and smaller till it touch vpõ the North seas, where it is not aboue 30. miles, as I noted before in the description of Brytaine. This Ile is replenished with people, horses, and all other kindes of cattell and corne in moste aboundant maner, except it be in suche places where as God of his singular goodnesse hath otherwise indued the soyle with ritche mynes of Gold, Siluer, Tinne, Brasse, Copper, & quicksiluer, whiche for the most parte are so plentiful, that they suffise not onely for the necessaries of the whole Iland, but also of sundry regiõs that are situate round aboute it, if the inhabitauntes were skilfull and painefull to deale withall accordingly. But the abundaunce of all other things requisite for the vse of man, that is found generally in our Iland, maketh the people lesse carefull of these commodities, and more geuen to idlenesse. For beside the great plenty of those things whiche heauen and earth do minister, as grasse, corne, and cattell, and foules of sundry kindes, there is suche store of fishe in all parties of our seas, especially towarde the North, that the same would suffise to feede and sustayne all the people of the Iland, if there were none other commodities to be found within the same. For the inhabitants of all countries that border vpõ vs. as Fraunce, Flaunders, Zealande, Holande, and a great part of Germany (especially those whiche lie neare vnto the coast) do saile hither with great numbers of vessels daily to fishe vpon our coasts, and buie such as we haue already caught, not only for their owne vse, but also for the Lenton prouision of such nations as lie vpon the Leuant seas, where they sell the same at theyr owne willes, with very speedy vtterance. Many other riche and precious cõmodities are to be gotten in the sayd Ile, whereof the aforenamed nations do make no small accompte, besides these common things. What shall I say of our wolles, whiche are in so high estimation in all landes, because of their necessary vses, and wherof a great part is so fine, and softe, that of it are made, the costly skarlettes, pliaunt gloues, and many other grayned and delicate clothes, of whiche I thought good to make this mention, because the reporte thereof is not yet made common and generally knowe to all men.

Dionysius Alexandrinus saith that the wool of Brytaine is often sponne so fine that it is in manner comparable to the spyders draught.

Certes this I dare boldly affirme, that if the kingdomes of Brytaine had suche grace geuen them from aboue as that they might once liue in vnitie, or by any meanes be brought vnder the subiectiõ of one Prince, they should ere long ferle such a sauour in this amity, that they wold not onely liue frankly of their owne, without any forain purchase of things, but also resist all outward inuasion, with smal trauayle and lesse dammage. For as touching their persons, and likewise theyr notable wittes, apt bothe for the attayning of learnyng and knowledge of handycraftes, they are inferiour to no other nation.

Therevnto we finde them to be couragious and hardy, offering themselues often vnto the vttermost perils with great assurance, so that a man may pronounce nothing to be euer harde or past their power to performe, if they would giue themselues to liue temperately, and follow their predecessors in moderation of diet. Therfore it (is as I thinke) that almighty God in his prouidente disposition of al things, hath ordeyned their grounde (otherwise plentifully indued with all kindes of commodities) to be destitute and voyde of wine, as foreseeing that the sayde liquor whiche bringeth greatest benefite vnto other countries, would come in the ende to be most pernicious and noysome vnto them. For they are giuen to such vnnatural rauening and greedy desire of forraine thinges (whilest they contempne or not regarde their owne) that they cannot refrayne the immoderate vse of Wine, and excesse vsed in drinking of the same: In so much that we may see diuers to be ouertaken & haũted, not only with sundry kinds of grieuous maladies common to vs & them of the mayne, but also many other whiche they haue not, neyther be any thing at all acquainted, with as experience dayly teacheth. Some by long sicknesse and languishing greefes do grow into suche deformitie only through excessiue feeding, & greedy abuse of wine, that if you knew them whe they were children and young men, you shall hardly remember them when they be old and aged: and that which more is in comparison of other that lme more soberly, you will hardly thinke thē to be borne in the Ile, but rather suppose them to be chaungelings and monsters, brought out of other countries to gaze & looke vpon: diuerse of them thorow the cōtinuall vse of wine, are molested in their age, with phreneticall pangs and passions? seldome also shal you see those that are giuen much vnto wine and such welfare, to become parents of many children, sith their naturall moysture and generatiue force, is much abated, if not altogither extinguished by such immoderate diet. But to returne to our purpose, the Albanes or Brytons, as Cesar in his Commentaries, & Tacitus in his Annales do report, were very religious, after the maner of religion vsed in old time. For in those dayes the Priests of Brytaine named Druides, were very expert both in naturall and Morall Philosophy, and from thence came the first professors of that sect and opinion into Fraunce. The principall seat also of their Priestes was in the Ile of Man, whiche was reputed at that season, for the welspring and fountayne of all learning and knowledge, and after that their Priestes were ones conuerted to the Catholike fayth, they persevered in the same with great constancie, without any note of Heresie.

The description of the East west and middle borders of Scotland, with the most notable townes and flouds therof. Chap. 2.

The Pictes had sometimes the principall & most fertile parte of that countrey, whiche now is vnder the regiment of the Scottes, and after they had cōtinued in the same by the space of. 1171. yeares, ioyned in maner in perpetuall league with the Scots, & maintening mutually the warres sometimes with the Brytaines & Romaines, & sometimes also iarring with their Scottish neighbours, at the last they fel into extreme hatred one vnto another, till it was brought to passe by the diuine prouidence, that the sayde Pictes were ouerthrowen, their name extinguished, & the kingdome united vnto that other of the Scots for euermore. After this time furthermore, although the Scottes haue bene very oftentimes assayled with most daungerous and terrible warres & oftētimes inuaded by enimies from diuers regions, yet such hath bene the fauour of almighty God towards them, that still they flourish & retaine their estate inuiolate.

Whatsoeuer wee haue generally spoken of Albion, that is chiefly to be vnderstanded of the Scottes, & farre greater, especially among the Scottes, as they call them in the high lande, as people that haue lesse to do with forraine Merchants, & therfore are lesse delicate, & not so much corrupted with strange bloud and alliaunce. Hereby in like sorte it cōmeth to passe, that they are more harde of constitution of body, to beare off the colde blastes, to watche better, & abstayne long, wherevnto also it appeareth that they are bolde, nimble, and thereto more skilfull in the warres. As for their faith & promise, they holde it with greatest constancie, as Hector hath set downe. Towardes the Almaine sea, I find, that Scotland hath the Mers, sometime the moste plenteous region of the Pictes for their marche, which so long as the sayd people did inhabite it, was called Deera, or Dere, but after their expulsion it was named Mers, that is to say, the Merches or limites of their coūtrey. In processe of time also the Scottes extended their boundes euen vnto ẏ Twede, which now diuideth Northumberlande from the Mers. On the other side of the countrey towarde the West, sundry small bournes descend from the Cheriot hilles, & other mountaynes lying thereabout into the Solue, diuiding Cumberlād from Annandale, & so being brought into one chanel, they fall togither into the Irishe Ocean, and stande for the bounds of Scotland vpō that halfe of the countrey. The Cheriot hilles are in like sorte taken for the middle Marches of the region, whiche with certaine smal brokes that fall frō the same, do separate both the countries, whereby their limites are knowen. The Mers hath vnder marches at seuerall places (whether it is extended) as sometime the Germayne sea, sometime East Lowthian, sometime the Twede, & sometime the Forth, & among many strong holds & Castels, that stand vpon the borders, is the towne & Castell of Barwick in time paste called Ordoluicium, as the inhabitantes are called Ordoluci (if Hector be not deceiued.) The Twede springeth out from a meane head, and after his augmētation, with other small waters that fall into the same, it descendeth with a large course into the Almayne sea. Beyond ẏ Twede, to the middle March vnder the Cheriot hilles lieth Teuidale, that is to say, the vale of Tiffe: Beyond it is Eskedale, or the vale of Eske, of a riuer so called that runneth thorow the same: ouer against Eskedale on the other side lieth Eusdale, so named of the riuer Eus that passeth thereby, & falleth into the water of Annande: But Tif and Eske do runne into the Twede: furthermore on the west side ouer against ẏ Irish sea, lieth Innandale, wherevnto the Annand water giueth denomination, which marcheth sometimes without the boūdes of Middesdale, where al the three riuers aforesayd, that is to say, Eus, Annand & Sulway descende togither in one bottome into the Irish seas.

In Innādale is a Loch or lake named Lochmaben. 5. miles in legth & 4. in breadth, not only very very ful of fish, but of such kinde as few men are acquainted with. Beside this lake also there is a castell of ỳ same name builded of purpose to restraine the furious dealing of theeues whiche do great hurt in those quarters. For not only in Innandale, but in all the Dales or Vales afore rehearsed, are many strong theeues, which often spoile the countrey, and exercise much cruel slaughter vpon such as inhabite there in any troublous time. These robbers (because the English do border vpō their dry marches, & are their perpetual enimies) do oftē make forcible rodes into the English boundes, for their better maintenaunce & sustētation, or els they pilfer priuily from them, as men leading in the meane season a poore beggerly & very miserable life. In the time of peace also, they are so inured to theft and rapine, that they cānot leaue off to steale at home: & notwithstāding that they be often very sore handled therefore, yet they thinke it prayse worthy to molest their aduersaries, as they cal the truer sorte, whereby it cōmeth to passe, ỳ many riche & fertile places of Scotlād lie wast & voyde of culture for feare of their inuasion.

Not far from the Sulway (a water where great plenty of fish is to be had) are many quicke sandes, & those so perillous that no man may well go ouer the same, but with great difficultie & daunger of his life. This vale of Annand was somtime called Ordouitia, & the people thereof Ordouices, whose auncient barbaroulnesse is reported to be suche, that in times past they refused not to kill and eate such prisoners as had yeelded themselues vnto them. The very womē in like sort would slea their husbands, if at any time they fled frō the field, and returned to their houses, only to giue occasion vnto other mē to stand to their tacklings at euery such aduenture.

On the West borders & toward the North lieth Middesdale, so called of the water of Midde. It beginneth with a very narrow course, and increasing broder in the middle marches of Scotland, it finally restrayneth it self againe, till it cōmeth at the sea, whether it ranneth with a swift course, as ỳ Scottish writers do report. In this vale stādeth a towne named Dunfrise, wherein many fine clothes especially whites are made, which are brought vp & carried into England, Fraunce, Flaūders & Germany where they are had in great price and estimation.

The Description of Galloway, Kyle, Carricke and Cunningham, with the notable Townes, Lakes and Riuers in the same. Chap. 3.

Aboue Middesdale is Galloway (named somtime Brigantia) the people whereof were in times past called Brigantes: this region is deuided by the water of Cree into two partes, whereof that which lieth nearest to Middesdale, is called nether Galloway, & the other that is aboue the Cree is named vpper Galloway. In nether Galloway is Kirkcowbry, a rich towne & of a good trade in merchaundize, and in vpper Galloway is Whitherne in Latine Candida casa, an Abbay dedicated to S. Minian the Bishop, & there lieth his carcase, which is honored of the people with great superstition and errour. Aboue Whitherne is Wigton towne, & not far from thence is the great lake of Myrton, the one half whereof doth freze by naturall congelation as other poles and plashes do, but the other is neuer seene to beare any Ice at all, whiche vnto me doth seeme to be great wonder. In Galloway moreouer are two other lakes, the Salset and the Neutramen, of equall length and breadth with the Lochmyrton: As for Galloway it selfe, it yeeldeth out a great point promontory or cape (which the Scots call a Mule or Nuke) into the Irish sea. The common sorte name it the Mules Nuke, & by the rounding of it selfe, it maketh two great lakes, named Rean and Lowis, except I be deceyued, one of these lakes or poles is xxx. and the other xvj. myles of length, & both full of Oysters, Herring, Congers, Cockles, and other like kindes of fishe.

Some are of the opinion that Brigantia was the same region of Britain ỳ is now called Wales, wherein the Britons inhabited many yeares after their expulsion out of Britaine. But this opiniō is false, sith the Romaynes write how that Man the Iland lieth ouer against Brigantium and midde-way betwene the same and Ireland: for albeit that the bayes or bayes are now worne wider and farder distant ech from other by the washing and working of the sea, yet the same latitude and eleuation of the pole that Ptolomy ascribed to the Brygantes, agreeth well to the height of the pole ouer Galloway, which is very farre from Wales, sithence the Ile of Man lieth also 300. miles from thence, and in the sight of Galloway. In like sort by the testimony of sundry Authors both Irish and Spanish, we affirme that out of Brigantium, a citie of Spaine, (now named Compostella) there came a new company of people into Ireland called Spaniardes, & out of Irelād another crew of the same nation with king Fergus into Albion, and in remembraunce of the citie Brigance, wherein they inhabited whilest they were in Spayne, they called themselues Brygantes. To this opinion in like sort Cornelius Tacitus doth seeme to leane, who saith, that the Brygantes descended from the Spaniardes, whiche in his time dwelled in the vttermost partes of Britaine, including vnder ỳ name the whole Iland of Albion. These regions afore rehersed, that is to say, Innandale, Middesdale and Galloway, beside fine wolles and store of cattell, doth also abounde with all kindes of graine, wheate onely excepted.

Aboue Galloway is Carrike, sometime a portion of the region of the Silures, of whose name it is not yet certainely knowne, whether it was deriued from the famous citie Carricke, whose ruines do yet remaine, or not. Silury is diuided into three parts, videlicet Carrick, Kyle & Cunningham: In the first as I sayd, was Carrick the noble citie: and in this countrey are many strong Castels, bothe by naturall situation and policy of mã: herein also are fayre kine, and oxen whose flesh is delicate, and very tender to be eaten. the tallow moreouer of theyr wombes is so moyst & sappy that it neuer wareth harde; but relenteth of the owne accorde, and becõmeth like vnto oyle. Beyond Carrick is Kyle, so called of Coile King of Brytaine, sometime slaine in the sayd region, and therein is a stone, not much aboue xij. miles from the towne of Air, ful xxx. foote high, & three elles of breadth, called the deafe stone, not without cause: for when a man is on the one side thereof, he shal not heare what is sayde or done on the other, though there be neuer so great noyse made, no not if a Canon should be discharged of set purpose, which to me doth seeme impossible, neuertheles the farder a man standeth from the same, the better shall he heare what soeuer the noyse be. Next vnto Kyle is Cunninghã the third part of Silurie, whose inhabitãts in time past were most noysome to ỳ Romaines. In Kyle is a pole named Doune, from whence the riuer Doune, doth runne thorow the middest of that region into the Irishe sea. In Cunningham likewise is a lake called Garnoth, equall in quantitie vnto the Doune, and no lesse famous for the abundance of fish that is dayly found therein: and not farre from the same is the towne called Largis, where Alexander the third King of Scotland of that name, sometime ouercame the Danes and Norwegians, whereby it grewe to be famous, and of more reputation among vs.

Reade in the Latin Hector, 12 foote highe 30 foote in length, & three elles thicke.

The situation of Renfrew, Cliddisdall, Lennox, Lowmund, Argile, Louchquhaber, Lorne, and Kentyre, with all the notable things contayned in the same. Chap. 4.

THe water of Clide, deuideth Lennor on the North side from the Barrony of Renfrew, & it riseth out of the same hill in Caledon wood, from whence the Annand falleth, and goeth with a long course into the Irish sea: some cal this riuer Gluda, & Cluda, but Tacitus nameth it Glota. Not far also from the fountaines of Clide, ariseth the water of Forth, that runneth on the contrary side into the Germaine Ocean. In like sorte after the water of Clude hath run for a season towarde the North, it gathereth somwhat inward til it come to the moũtaine of Granzeben, & from thence holdeth on with a swift course, til it fall as I sayd into ỳ Irish seas. The coũtrey where it rũneth is named Clidesdale. Betwixt Clide & Lennox lieth ỳ Barony of Renfrew, wherin are two poles named Quhinsouth & Leboth, of which the first is xij. miles in compasse, the other xx. and both very riche & plentifull of fish. But in Lennox that lieth next aboue Renfrew toward the Ocean (called by Ptolomy Lelgouia) is a great mere or lake that hight Lochmond, of xxiij. miles in length, & eight in breadth, and within this Lhin or pole, are 30. Ilandes wel replenished with Churches & dwelling houses, & in the same also are three things worthy consideration, whereof the first is, that the pleasant & very delicate fishe there breddeth doth want finnes. The secõd is, that the water will often swell with huge waues though no winde be stirring, and that in such wise that the best Mariners in the countrey dare not aduenture to sayle thereon. There is also a very fruiteful and commodious Ile therein, very necessary for the pasturage of cattel, whiche fleeteth hither and thither as the winde bloweth. This lake is situate at the foote of the hill called Granzeben, whiche were sometime the marches or limites betwixt the Scots & Pictes, & are extended frõ Lochlowmund to the mouth of Dee. Certes the Pictes had no parte of the country beyond the Granzeben, nor toward the Irish seas, for this region was inhabited by the Scots. Eight miles frõ Lochlowmund is the castel of Dumbritaine named sometime Alcluid, and here the water of Leuen falleth into the Clide.

Beyond Lochlowmũd is Argile, an hilly coũtry and full of cragges and mountaines, therin also are two lakes Lochfine and Lochquho, that diuide the region into three partes, that in the middest beyng called Knapdale. In Lochfine likewise is more plenty of herring than in any parte of the coast that compasseth the Iland, but in Lochquho are suche kindes of fishe to be dayly had as are commonly breddе in fresh waters. There are moreouer in Argile two castels Glenunquhart and Enconell, and in it are 12. Iles, whose chiefe commoditie resteth rather in pasturage for cattell, than abundance of grayne. In Argile furthermore are many riche mynes full of mettall, but the people there haue no skill to find and trie out the same. The constant report also goeth there, how there is a stone of suche nature, that if it be hidde in straw for a certaine season, it will kindle of it selfe & consume the straw to ashes. There are seuen other lakes in Argile, whereof some are thirty miles in length and breadth, and other lesse. It was told me once by Doncan Campbell a noble Knight, that out of Garloll one of the poles of Argile, there came a terrible beast in the yeare of grace, 1510. which was of the bignesse of a Greyhound, and footed like a gander, and issuing out of the water early in the morning about Midsomer time, did very easily and without any visible force or strayning of himselfe ouerthrow huge okes with his tayle, and therevnto killed three men out right that hunted him with three strokes of his sayd tayle; the reste of them saued themselues in trees there aboutes, whyleste the afore sayde Monster returned to the water. Those that are giuen to the obseruations of rare and vncouth sightes, beleeue that that this beast is neuer seene but against some great trouble & mischief to come vpō the realme of Scotland. For it hath ben discried also before that time, although not very often. Lorne abutteth vpon Argile, which was once a part of Argile, and reacheth out into the Irishe sea, in maner of a cape or toūg, full 60. miles. This point also was called Nouantia, but now it is named Kyntyre, that is to say, the head of Lorne, whose vttermost part is not full 16. miles frō Ireland. Some Authors affirme, that both Argile and Cantyre, were called Nouantia in old time, sith Ptolomy maketh no mention of Argile in his Cosmography. In this Lorne is great abundance of Barley whiche the Scottes call Beir. Beyond Lorne is Lochquhaber, heretofore a portion of Murrayland, very riche in mines of Iron & Lead, & no lesse beneficial to the countrey in all kindes of cattel. There are likewise many woodes, many lakes, & many riuers, but two of them are most notable for the plenty of Salmons, & other delicate fishe, aswell of the salt as fresh water, which is there taken & almost without any trauaile: neyther is there any where els in all the Ile such store. The one of these is named Lochty, and the other Spanze, but vpon what occasiō these names were giuen vnto the I finde as yet no certainty. The Lochty riseth not aboue eight miles from Lochnes, & falleth beneath the same into the Germaine Ocean, & beside it, there is a rocky cragge, running out at length into the sea, named Hardnemouth. In ỹ mouth of Lochty likewise was somtime a riche towne named Innerlochty, whether the marchaunts of Fraunce and Spaine did make their dayly resort, till at the last it was so defaced by the warres of the Danes, that it neuer was able sithence the sayde time to recouer hir pristinate renowne. But whether the negligēce of the due repayre of this towne, procedeth of the slouth of our people, or hatred that some enuious persons do beare to cities & walled townes in our countrey, as yet it is vncertayne. Beyond Lochty is the castell of Dunstafage, in time past named Euonium: beyōd Dunstafage also is the mouth of the water of Spanze, where it falleth as I heare into the Germaine Ocean.

The discourse of Ros, Stranauern, and Murrayland, with the lakes, riuers and notable townes in them. Chap. 5.

BEyond the water of Spanze lieth Ros somtime called Lugia, a very narrow regiō God it wote, but running out in greate legth thorow the middest of the Iland, being enuirōned on both sides with the Ocean. That portion thereof whiche lieth nearest to the Irish seas, is very difficulte for suche as trauell by the countrey, by reason of the high Mountaynes, whiche maketh the countrey more apt for wilde beastes than mankind to inhabite: neuertheless waxing more fertile on that part whiche stretcheth toward ỹ Germaine sea, it yeldeth it self to culture, & rendreth some grayne. In pasture also it is not altogither vnprofitable, sith there is good grasse, and very batable for their beastes: for the baleys there, being watered with sundry pleasant streames, do yeelde a sweete & very sauoury grasse, wherewith all sortes of cattell are very much delited. In Ros are sundry lakes, but Lochbrun is the greatest. There are also many fresh riuers, fraught with excellent fishe, and finally a notable Futh or safe hauen called Cromart, whereunto diuers in time of necessitie do resort, to auoyde the daunger of shipwracke, that otherwise would assuredly annoy thē. The Scottish men call it hell of shipmen. In this regiō moreouer is ỹ towne called Thaue, where the bones of Duthoc an holy man (as they say) do reste, & are had in greater estimation among the superstitious sorte (as sometime ouer the whole Iland) then the holy Gospel of God and merites of his Sonne, whereby we are onely saued. Two auncient houses are likewise maintained in one vale of the Ros, whose fornices resemble so many belles, but to what ende as yet I do not find. Next vnto the sayd Ros lieth the Stratnauerne, as the vttermost regiō of Scotland, ỹ coastes whereof abutting for a while vpō the Deucalidon sea, do afterwarde turne againe towarde the Almaigne seas, hauing partly the Deucaliden coast, and partly Cathenese vpon the North side, Sutherland on the east, Rossia on the south, & Deucalidō againe vpō the west. There are three great cragges or pointes lying on the vttermost side of Stranauerne, that is to say, the Hoye, Howbrun the greatest of ỹ three) and Downisby, which bicause they shote farre off into the sea, do make two great Futhes and lakes, eche of them being seuerally distinguished from other. Next vnto Cathenese lieth Sutherland, a profitable regiō both for grayne and all kindes of prouision, but chiefly for the nourishment of bestial, whervnto it chiefly enclineth, as do the other two last before rehearsed. On the farder side also of this, lieth Murray land, somtime called Varavis, although the marches therof are changed from that they were of old. For whereas in time past all the regiō lying betweene Spay and Nesse to the Irelād sea, was named Murray, now it is knowen to be only beyond the water of Spay & Lossocke, & reacheth on vntill it come to the Irish sea. Betwixt Ros and Murray land, is a great Baie, & likewise a diseet of sundry waters: for thervnto fal the Nesse, Mardin, Findorn, Los and Spay, whereof this latter runneth with so fierce and violent a streame, that the force of the sea at the flood striuing to enter into the same, is put backe & may not resist ỳ inuincible fal, & beats backe the water that descendeth into the Ocean. The Nesse issueth out of a lake of the same name (which is not passing eight myles from the sayde plaine, from whence the Lochtie runneth) and thence goeth into the Irishe seas: And this properly it hath, that neither the streame, neyther the lake it selfe will yeelde to be frozen in the very deepe of winter. Such also is the force therof, that if any Ice or whatsoeuer frosen substance be cast therinto, it will by and by relent and dissolue againe to water, whereby it becommeth very profitable for suche cattell as are benūmed with colde. In the mouth of the Nesse, standeth a towne called Inuernesse, where sometime was great abūdance of herring taken, but now they be gone, by the secrete working of God. The common people put the fault in the riche & men of higher calling, who enuying the commoditie of the poore inhabitantes, will often seeme to bereeue them of this emolumēt, by force and slaughter. Whereupon (as they say) it cōmeth to passe, that the encrease ceaseth decayeth, & very smal store is taken there by many yeares after such iniurie offered. But to proceede: beside Lochnesse, which is 24. miles of length & 4. in breadth; by reason of the great woods there standing, is great store of sauage beasts, as Harts, wild Horses, Roes, and suche like. There are likewise Martirnes, Beuers, Foxes, & Weesselles, whose skinnes and tales are solde vnto straungers at huge and excessiue prices. In Murray land also is not allonly great plenty of wheate, Barley, Otes, and such like grayne, beside Nuttes and Apples, but likewise of all kindes of fishe, and especially of Salmon. The people thereof in like sort do vse a strange maner of fishing: for they make a lōg Weele of wicker, narrow necked & wide mouthed, with such cunning, that whē the tide commeth the fishe shoote themselues into the same, & forthwith are so inclosed, that whilest the tide lasteth he cannot get out, nor after the water is gone, escape the hands of the fishers. In this region moreouer is a lake named Spiney wherein is exceeding plenty of Swannes. The cause of their increase in this place is ascribed to a certaine hearbe which groweth there in great abundāce, and whose seede is very pleasant vnto the sayde foule in the eating, wherfore they call it Swan Grys: & hereunto such is the nature of ỳ same, that where it is once sowen or plāted, it wil neuer be destroyed, as may be proued by experience. For albeit that this lake be fiue myles in length, & was sometime within the remembrance of man very well stored with Salmon and other great fishe, yet after that this hearbe began to multiply vpon the same, it became so shallow, that one may now wade thorow the greatest parte therof, by meane whereof all the great fishe there is vtterly consumed. In this portion furthermore, is the Churche of Pette, where the bones of litle John remayne in great admiration. Certes this carcase hath bene 14. foote long, his members well proportioned according to his stature, and not fully fiue yeares before this booke was written (by Boethus) hee sawe his hanche bone, whiche seemed so great as the whole thighe of a man, and he did thrust his arme into the hollownesse therof, whereby it appeareth what mighty people grew vp in our region before they were ouercome with gluttony and excesse. In this quarter finally is the towne called Elgyn, not farre from the mouth of Spaye, and therin is a Cathedral church furnished with Chanons: there are thereto sundry riche and very wealthy Abbayes in Murray, as Kyllos of the order of the Cisteaux, and Pluscardy of the Cluniackes.

Of Boene, Anze, Buchquhane, Mar, Mernis, Fiffe, and Angus, with the lakes, floudes, Abbayes, townes, and other notable things conteyned in the same. Chap. 6.

NExt vnto the Murray lieth Boene, and Anze, two fertile and plentifull regions, which extend their boundes euen vnto the seas. They are both very notably indued with batable pastures, and by reason therof are very full of cattell, they yeelde moreouer excellent corne, & by meanes of their large woodes and forests not without great store of wilde beastes, of sundry kindes and natures. Neare also vnto the Douerne water, which is a riuer marueylously stored with fish, stādeth a towne named Bamf, and vnder these two regions aforesayde lieth Buchquhane, a very batable soyle for all kindes of cattell, but especially of sheepe, whose woll exceedeth that of the like beast of all other countries there aboutes for whitenesse and finenesse. The riuers that are in this countrey do in lyke maner abound with Salmons, so that there is no one of them voyde of this commoditie, except the Rattra onely, wherein it is not heard that any hath ben seene: herein also standeth the castell of Slanis, in which the high constable of Scotlād dwelleth, and neare vnto the same is a marueylous caue: for the water that droppeth into the same, in a short processe of time becommeth an harde white stone, and except they had bene oft remoued heretofore, the caue it selfe had bene filled vp with the same many yeres agone.

This

This region is voide of ratte, & ſuch is the nature therof, that if any be brought thither from other places, they are found to die immediatly: finally it is moſt marueylous of all, ẏ as Otes do growe there in many places of themſelues without culture & tillage, ſo if a man come thither of ſet purpoſe to mow downe the ſame, he ſhal finde nothing els but empty hulles & ſtraw: but if he chaunce vpon the ſodaine and without premeditatiō of the thing to cut downe any (a matter impoſſible in my minde) he ſhall finde them ſo good & ful as any are elſwhere to be gathered & ledde home. Certes it appeareth hereby, that this is nothing els but an illuſion, wherewith the wicked fends do captiuate & blinde the ſenſes of the ſuperſtitious ſort: for that it ſhould be ſo by nature, it is a thing altogither impoſſible.

Nexte vnto this, lieth the greate region of Mar, whiche is very plentifull of cattell, and extendeth 60. miles in length, frō the Almaigne ſeas to Badzenoch.

In this is the Citie of Aberdene, wherein is a Biſhops ſea, and noble Vniuerſitie, ſometime founded by William Elphinſton Biſhop there. This citie lieth betwixt two riche riuers, the Done & the Dee, wherin is the greateſt ſtore of Salmons that is to be founde againe within the compaſſe of Albion, and likewiſe the greateſt & longeſt if you reſpect their quantitie. Next vnto Marre, we haue Mernis toward ẏ ſea, a very fatte ſoyle ful of paſture, & abundantly repleniſhed with euery ſort of cattell. In this portion ſtandeth Dunnother the Marſhall of Scotlands houſe, & likewiſe the towne of Fordon, in whiche the bones of Palladius do reſt, who is taken generally for the Apoſtle of our nation. The water of Eſke is bound vnto this region, whiche is otherwiſe called Mortheſke, a very daungerous chanell, & wherin many haue periſhed for default of a bridge, as they haue attempted to paſſe & repaſſe ouer the ſame. Angus bordereth vpon the Mernis, it was ſometime part of Horreſtia, & now watered with three notable riuers, as the Mortheſke already mentioned, & marueylouſly repleniſhed with Salmōs, likewiſe the Southeſke, & finally the Tay, the nobleſt water in all Scotland, and remembred by the Romayne writers vnder the name of Tau.

In Angus alſo is an highe Mountayne or Promontory, called the redde Brayes, whiche lieth out farre off into the Almayne ſeas. The Tay alſo riſeth farre beyond the Mountaynes of Granzeben out of Loch Tay, whiche is a poole of 24. miles of length, and 10. of breadth, wherein are not onely diuerſe Iſlandes with Caſtels in them, but the water of the lake it ſelf (beyng moſte fine and ſubtile) is notably repleniſhed with great ſtore of fiſh, and therfore very commodious for ſuch as dwell about it. It falleth into the Almayne ſea beſide Dundee, a towne called in olde tyme Alectum, wherein I was borne, and in whiche the people trauayle very painefully about weauing and making of cloth. There are in Angus alſo many other cities & riche Abbayes, as Muntros, Brechin & Forfayr, beſide ſo many Caſtelles as lieth not in me to number. This likewiſe is not to be paſſed ouer with ſilence, that whereas Forfair was in tyme paſt a notable Citie, ſtrengthened with two royall Caſtelles, as the ruynes do yet declare, now it is brought vnto litle more than a countrey village, repleniſhed with ſimple cotages. Many lakes and poles are alſo in Angus, and thoſe well fraught with fiſh. There is alſo in this countrey one place called the vale of Eſke, whoſe ſheepe haue ſuch white, fine, and excellent woll, as the lyke vnto it is hardly to be founde againe within the whole Iſlande.

After wee be ouer the Tay, we come vnto Fife, ſometime a parte of Otholine: In this region groweth all maner of grayne ſo plentifully as elſwhere in any part of Albion, and where no corne, is there is no leſſe foyſon of cattell. There are blacke ſtones alſo digged out of the grounde, whiche are very good for firing, and ſuche is their intollerable heate when they are kindled, that they reſolue and melte yron and therefore are very profitable for Smithes, and ſuche Artificers as deale with other mettalles: neyther are they founde any where els (that I do knowe of) but betweene the Tay and the Tine within the whole Iſlande. Salt is likewiſe made in this region in great quantitie of Sea water, whiche they boyle according to theyr maner. There are furthermore ſundry cities in the ſame, of whiche S. Andrewes is the cheefe, wherein is bothe the ſeeof an Archbiſhop and a famous vniuerſitie. There are moreouer ſundry lakes, as Loch Tore and Loch Leuin, and in this later are diuerſe Iles, and in one of them alſo the Churche of Saint Phillane, a Scottiſhe ſaint, of no ſmall name and reputation.

Such are to be ſeene alſo in Luke.

Fife is diuided of Lowthian by the riuer of Forth that runneth a large and broade chanell into the Ocean ſeas. Certes it is a water very plentifully indued with Cockles, Oyſters, Muſkles, Scales, Pollockes, Herelwyne, Whales, and greate foyſon of white fiſhe: and among many other Iles that are to bee founde in this Fyrth, that of Maie is of greateſt fame, becauſe Adrian and his fellowes were killed in the ſame. In the middeſt of this Ile ſpringeth vp a fountayne of freſhe and cleare water, from an high rocke, whiche is not a litle to be marueyled at, considering the quantitie and situation of the Ile. Beside this also is a wonderfull cragge, rysing within the Sea, whereunto is so striste and narrow a passage, that a man shall hardly come vnto it by a sisher boate, and thereto but at one place. This rocke (called the Basse castell) is inuincible, and therein are many caues very profitable for defence, made heretofore by great labour and industry of man. Certes, there is nothing in this rocke that is not full of admiration and wonder: therein also is great store of Soland geese (not vnlike to those which Plinie calleth water Egles or as we, sea Herons) & no where els but in Iulsay and this Rocke. At their first comming which is in the spring of the yeare, they gather suche great plenty of sticks & bowes together for the buylding of their nestes, that the same doth suffice the keepers of the castel, for the yearly maintenaunce of their fewel without any other prouision. These foules do feede their young with the most delicate fish that they can come by. For though they haue already prayed vpon any one, and haue it faste in their becke or talons, yet if they happen as they flie toward the land to espy a better, they let the first fall againe into the sea, & pursue the later, with great & egre swiftnesse vntill they take holde thereof. Sometimes their pray is taken from them by the keepers of the castel, as are also their sticks from time to time for the aforesayde vse: but they making small or rather no resistaunce, do turne againe forthwith, for more wood or sishe (as their losse requireth) not ceasing till they haue buylded their nestes with the one, & nourished vp their young with the other, so that what by the timber of their nests, the beguiling them of their pray, and stealyng away of their young, they bring yerely no small commoditie vnto the owner of the castell. Within the bowells of these geese there is a kinde of greace to be had of singular force in Medicine, and flaying likewise the skinne from their bodies with the fatte, they make an oyle very profitable for the Gowte and many other diseases in the haunches and groynes of mankinde. In this cragge more, there groweth an hearbe very pleasaunt & delicious for Salades, but if it be taken vp and planted elsewhere, it eyther groweth not at all, or vtterly giueth ouer the vertues wherewith it was earst indued. There was sometime a stone found here in this rocke much like to a water sponge or pumise, hollow on the one side, and of such nature, that if any salte water had bene powred thereinto, and suffred to runne thorow, it would forthwith lose the naturall saltnesse, and become fresh and very pleasant vnto the mouth and taste: we heare in these dayes that this stone is to be seene in Fast castell, whether it was brought after it had passed many handes for the triall of this matter.

In this Firth also is the Ile Aymon, wherein is an Abbay. There are likewise diuers other Ilandes, and those very full of Conies: and in the sayde Firth are sundry sisshes oftentimes seene of monstrous shape, with cowles hanging ouer their heades like vnto Monkes, and in the rest resembling the body of man. They shewe themselues likewise aboue the water to the nauell, howbeit they neuer appeare but against some great Pestilence of menne, or Murren of cattell: wherefore their onely sight doth breede great terrour vnto the Scottishe nation, who are very great obseruers of vncouth signes and tokens.

The description of Lowthian, Striueling, Menteith, Calidon wood, Bowgewall, Gareoth, with the notable Cities, Castels and Floodes thereof. Chap. 7.

On the Southside of the Forth lieth Lowthian, so called of Lothe or Loth, one of the Kinges of the Pictes, it was sometime named Pictlande: but nowe it is parcell of the Scottish kingdome, and thereto for bounty of soyle is not inferiour to any region of Scotlande. In Lowthian are many Abbayes, Castelles and townes, as Hadington, Dunbar, Northberwise and Leith: but Edenborow passeth them all, aswell in policy of regiment as in forme of buylding and wisedome, and riches of the inhabitantes: therein also is the castell of Maydens remembred by the moste renowned Authors, and also the Kings cheefe pallace, whiche tripleth the renowne of the aforesayde citie. Not farre from thence moreouer, is a certayne oyly spring whiche riseth out of the ground in suche aboundance, that the more is caried from thence, the more is restored: and the people are perswaded hereof, that it is very medicinable against all Cankers and skalles. Not farre from the mouth of Forth is the castel of Dunbar, whiche by naturall situation and industry of man, is now become one of the chiefe holdes in Albion. It was sometime the principall house appertayning to the Earles of Marche: and there harde by is a towne of the same name, wherein is a rich Abbay, or Colledge of Chanons founded by those Earles. Nexte vnto Lowthian lieth Mers, whereof I haue spoken already, but wee will nowe goe vp higher into the lande. Nearest vnto Mers therefore lieth Teuidale, and aboue it is Twedale: nexte vnto

Twedale

Twedale is Dzuysdale, Walcopdale, Douglasse-dale, and Clidisdale, and all these are suche names as the riuers haue that runne along their boromes. The principall towne of Clidesdale is Glasco the Archbishops see, wherein is a notable Church erected in the honour of Saint Mungow, and buylded with great magnificence. In Glasco also is a noble Vniuersitie where the liberal Artes and Sciences are very zealously taught. In this region mozeouer is a very riche mine of Gold, and another of Azure, the commoditie of whiche later is reaped with small trauayle. There are sometimes founde diuers precious stones also, as Rubies and Diamodes. Certes this myne was disclosed in the time of James the fourth, who would no doubt, haue brought it to full perfection if he had longer liued, whereas now litle profite redoundeth thereby to the common wealth, bycause it is eyther vtterly neglected oz not very much regarded. Nozth of Glasco lieth Menteith, and Striueling shire bordering vpon Argile & Lennor. In Striueling shyre is the towne of Striueling, and aboue it is the Castell of Striueling, which was sometime called the dolozous Mountaine. At this towne also began the great Calidon wood, whiche ranne thozow Menteith and Stratherne, to Atholl and Lochquhaber, as Ptholomy writeth in his first table. In this wood were somtime white Bulles with shagge heares and curled manes like fierce Lions, otherwise they were lyke vnto the tame, neuertheles so wilde and sauage, that they would neuer be made familiar, noz tast of any hearbe oz grasse that mans hande had once touched, after many dayes. Being taken also by the industry of man (whiche was very hard to do) they would refuse all sustenaunce, and sterue themselues to death. As sone as any did inuade them, they would rushe vpon him with great violence, and beare him to the earth: as foz Dogges, Nettes, oz any kinde of weapon they feared not, neyther cared foz any maner of engine. It is sayd that Robert Bruze after his Cozonation did hunt one of these Bulles in the aforesayde wood, being accompanied but with a small trayne, in whiche voyage he escaped narowly with his life. Foz after the beast felt himselfe soze wounded by the hunters, he rushed vpō the King, who hauing now no wrapon left in his hande wherewith to defend himselfe, he had surely perished if reskue had not come: howbeit in this distresse one came running vnto him who ouerthzew the Bull by playne force, and held him downe till the Hunters came that killed him out right. Foz this valiant acte also the King indued the aforesayd partie with great possessions, and his linage is to this day called of the Turnebulles, bicause he ouerturned the beast, and saued the kings lyfe, by such great prowes and manhood. Certes the flesh of these beastes were reputed in old time as a most delicate foode, and only meete foz the nobilitie, notwithstanding that it be very ful of sinewes and gristles, whereat some delicate feeders do often take offence. In times passe also they were bred in many places of the Caledon, but now they be all consumed by the gluttony of the inhabitants, so that none of them are left, but only in Comernald. On the east side of Menteith lieth Stratherne, & bozdereth also vpon Fife: thozow the valeys likewise of this region runneth the water of Ern, that falleth into Tay. This is mozeouer wozthy to be noted, that not foure miles from the confluence of Ern & Tay, there is a stone of small quantitie, and yet of great wonder, foz in what place soeuer it be layde, it will not be remeued from thence by manuall practise, arte oz engine, and yet one man may so sone moue it as an hundzed. On the other side of Tay beyond Angus and Gowzay lieth Sterimond, a region plentifully indued both with grasse and corne. Not farre from Sterimond is Athole, wherein are many noble valeys and ryuers full of fishe, as pikes Lempetnes &c. The soyle there also is so bountifull, that it yeeldeth corne in maner without any tillage: there is likewyse therein a towne called Kud, whose fieldes are so plentrous that (if they be well tilled and dressed) they will yeelde greate stoze of Barley without any sowing of seede. Howbeit as this is in that parte of the region often verified, so in other there is a contrarious disposition to bee founde in the earth, whiche turneth wheate sone into gold, & perfite Rye, the like whereof I heare, to be not farre from Luke and in the countreys thereaboutes. West of Buchquhane and Borne, lieth Bosgewell, and Carcoth very plentifull soyles bothe foz grasse and corne. In Carcoth also is an hill called Dundoze, that is to say, the Golden mountayne: foz the Sheepe that feede thereon are yellow, and their teeth of the same hewe, resemblyng burnished golde. Their fleshe mozeouer is redde as it were tyzned with Saffron, and so is their woll muche after the same maner. There is furthermoze in the same region, an heape of stones lying togither in maner of a Crowne which yeeld a founde when one of them is stricken as if it were a bell. Some are of the opinion, that one Idoll Temple oz other stode heretofoze in that place whyleft the Scottishe nation was addicted to the wozshipping of Diuels. Many other regions are in Scotlād, as Brzedalbane. Strabzann and Badzenoth with diuers small territozies and floudes, howbeit they are not so notable as those which we haue already touched, and therefoze I thinke it but folly to deale any farther with them.

Of the great plenty of Hares, redde Dere, and other wilde beastes in Scotland, of the strange properties of sundry Scottish Dogges, and of the nature of Salmon.

Hauing

HAuyng made this speciall description of the Realme of Scotland, now will I touche such thynges as concerne the same in generall. First of all therefore in the fieldes and wilde places of the countrey there is great plenty of Hares, red Dere, Fallow dere, Roes, wilde Horses, Wolfes and Foxes. These Horses are not gotten but by great slight and pollicie: for in the winter season the inhabitants turne certayne tame Horses and Mares amongst them, wherewith they growe in the ende to be so familiar, that afterward they go with them to and fro, and finally home into theyr Maisters yardes, where they be taken & soone broken to their handes. The Wolues are most fierce and noysome vnto the heardes and flockes in all partes of Scotland, sauing in one parcell of Angus, called Glennoys dale, where these beastes do no maner of hurt vnto the domesticall cattell, but pray only vpon the wilde. Foxes do much mischiefe generally in all steades, but chiefly in the Mountaynes, where they be very hardly hunted, howbeit arte hath deuised a meane to preuent their malice, and to preserue theyr poultrie. Certes there is almost no house that dothe not for certayne dayes cherishe vp a yong Foxe, which the Scottes do call a Todde, and then killing the same, they mince the flesshe thereof amongst suche meate, as they giue vnto their foules and other litle beastial, and by this meanes so many foules and cattell as eate hereof are preserued from daunger of the Foxe, almost by two monethes after, so that they may wander whether they will, for the Foxes as it were winding or smelling the flesshe of their fellowes yet in their croppes, will in nowise meddle with them, but eschew and knowe suche a one, although it were among an hundred of other. In Scotland moreouer are Dogs of meruailous condition: for beside the common nature and vniuersall properties of Dogges of all other countries, there are three sortes with vs, whiche are not seene elswhere in any quarter of the worlde. The first is an Hounde of greate swiftnesse, hardinesse, and strenght, fierce and cruell vpon all wilde beastes, & egre against theeues, that offer their Maisters any violence. The second is a rache or hound very exquisite in followyng the foote (which we call drawing) whether it be of man or beast, yea he will pursue any maner of foule, and finde out whatsoeuer filth is cast vp, or lurketh among the rockes, by that excellent sence of smelling wherewith he is indued. The thirde sorte is no greater than that of Raches, in collour for the most parte red with blacke spots, or els blacke and full of redde markes. These are so skilfull that they will pursue a theefe or theefe stolen goodes in moste precise maner, and finding the trespasser, with great assurance, they will make a rayse vpon him. Or if it be so that he haue taken the water for his sauegarde, he shrinketh not to follow him, and entring and issuyng at the same places where the partie went in and out, he neuer ceaseth to raunge til he haue noised his footing, and be come to the place wherein the theefe is shrowded. The Dogges of this kinde are called Sleuthhoundes. Certes this report would seeme more incredible, excepte it were dayly had in experience vpon the borders of Englande and Scotland, where pillage is good purchase indifferently on both sides. There is a lawe also among the borderers in time of peace, that who so denieth entraunce or sute of a Sleuthhound in pursuyte made after fellons and stolen goodes, shalbe holden as accessary vnto the theft or taken for the selfe theefe.

Of foules suche (as I meane) as liue by pray, there are sundry sortes in Scotlande, as Egles, Faucons, Gosshaukes, Sparhaukes, Marlions and such like, but of water Foules there is so great store that the report thereof may seeme to exceede all credite. There are other kindes of birdes also in this countrey, the like of whiche is no where els to be seene, as the Capercailze or wilde Horse greater in body than the Rauen, and liuing only by the rindes and barkes of the Pine trees. We haue in like maner many Moore cockes and Hennes, whiche absteyning from corne do feede vpon nought els, but the leaues of Cytisus, whiche the Scottes do commonly call Hadder. These two are very delicate in Eating. The thirde sorte is reddish blacke of colour, in quantitie comparable to the Phesaunt, and no lesse delicious in taste and sauour at the table, our countrey men call them wild Cockes, and their cheefe sustenaunce is by wheate. Beside these, we haue moreouer another foule in Mers more straūge and vncouth than all these afore mentioned, called a Gustard, fully so great as a Swanne, but in colour of feathers and taste of flesshe, little differing from a Partriche, howbeit these byrdes are not very common, neyther to be seene in all places, suche also is their qualitie, that if they perceiue their egges to haue bene touched in theyr absence by mans hād (whiche lie commonly on the bare earth) they forsake those nestes and lay in other places. All other our foules are common to vs and other nations. Salmon is more plentifull in Scotland than in any other region of the worlde, and bicause the nature of this fish is strange, I wil set downe somuch as I do knowe hereof at this present time as followeth. The Salmon in Harueste time, commeth vp into the small riuers, where the water is moste shallow, and there the male & female rubbing their wombe one agaynst another, they shedde theyr spawne, which forthwith they couer with sand and grauell & so depart away, from henceforth they are gaunt & slēder, & in apparance so leane ẏ thei appeare nought els but skin & bone, & therfore worthely sayd to be growne out of vse and season, it is sayd also ẏ if they touche any of their full fellowes, during the time of this theyr leanneſſe, ẏ same side which they touched touched will likewise become leane, whereby it cometh to passe, that a Salmō is oft seene to be fat on the one side of ẏ chyne, & leane on ẏ other. But to proceede, the aforesayd spawne & milte being hidden in the sande (as you haue heard) in the next spring doth yeelde great numbers of litle frie, but so nesshe & tender, for a long time that till they come to be so great as a mans finger (if you catch any of thē) you shal perceyue them to melt & their substance to dissolue & fade euen as if it were gelly, or if layd forth against ẏ sunne. Frō henceforth they go to the sea, where within the space of xx. dayes they grow to a maruelous greatnesse, & then returning againe toward the place of their generation, they shew a notable spectacle not unworthy to be considered of. Certes in Scotlande there are many linnes or poles, whiche being in some places among the rockes very shallow aboue, & yet deepe beneath, with the fall of the water, & thereto the Salmon not able to pearce thorow the Chanell, either for swiftnesse of the course or depth of the discent, of such water as cōmeth against him, he goeth so neare vnto the side of the rocke or damme, if I shall so call it, as he may, & there aduentureth to leape ouer & vp into the lin, if he leape well at the first, he obtaineth his desire, if not he, assayeth eftsones the second or third time, till he returne now into his coūtry: a great fish able to swimme against the streame, that before was a litle hod & maugre his resistence, caried with the violent course of the water into the mayne Ocean, such as assay often to leape, and cannot get ouer, do browse thēselues & become Measelled: others that happen to fal vpon dry land a thing often seene, are taken by the people (that watch their times) in cawdrons of hote water, which they set vpon the shallow & dry plottes with fire vnder them, in hope to catche the fattest, & suche as by reason of theyr weight do oftenest leape shorte. Certes ẏ tast of these is reputed to be most delicate, and therfore their price is cōmonly greater than of the rest. It is inhibited in Scotland to take any Salmon from the eight of September, vntill the xv. of Nouember. Finally there is no mā that knoweth readily whereon this fishe liueth, for neuer was any thing yet found in their bellies, other than a thicke slymy humour.

Of the sundry kindes of Muskles and Cockles in Scotland, and pearles gotten in the same: of the vncouth and strange fish there to be seene, and of the nature of the herbe Cythisus commonly called Hadder. Chap. 9.

HEre it resteth that I shewe the nature of Muskles & Cockles, wherof we haue many & sundry kindes amongst vs: of these also some are small, and yet if they be eaten fresh, are not without a naturall delicacy in tast. Others are greater & not vnlike in forme & quātitie to those that haue the purple: & albeit that they are vterly voyde thereof, yet is their meate and substance right pleasant in the eating. There are of an other sorte whiche are longer & greater, than either of these, called horse Muskles, to be had in the Dee & the Done, & in these are the pearles ingendred. Certes they loue to be resident in the deepest and clerest waters that are voyde of mudde & filth, & such is their estimation among the delicatest kindes of foode, that they were not vnworthely called of old time, widowes lustes. Their shelles also are as it were wrought euen from the very toppes, and thereto ful of spottes, wherein (as in yeld of gaine) they farre exceede al other. These early in the morning, in the gētle, cleere, & calme ayre, lift vp their vpper shells & mouthes, a litle aboue the water, and there receiue of the fine & pleasant breath or dew of heauen, & afterwardes according to the measure & quantitie of this vitall force receyued, they firste conceyue, then swell, and finally produce the pearle. They are so sensible & quicke of hearing, ẏ although you standing on the bray or banke aboue them, do speake neuer so softly, or throw neuer so small a stone into the water, yet they wil descrie you, and settle againe to the botome, without returne for that time. Doubtlesse they haue as it were a naturall carefulnesse of their owne commodity, as not ignorant, how great estimation wee mortall men make of the same amongst vs, and therefore so soone as the fisher men do catche them, they binde their shelles together, for otherwise they would open, and shead theyr pearles of purpose, for whiche they know themselues to be taken and pursued. Their maner of apprehension is this, first foure or fiue persons go into the riuer together, vp vnto the shoulders, and there stand in a compasse one by another with poles in their handes, whereby they rest more surely, fith they fixe thē in the ground, & stay with one hand vpon them: Then casting their eyes downe to the botome of the water, they espie where they lie by their shining and clearenesse, and with their toes take them vp, for the deapth of the water will not suffer them to stoupe for them (& giue thē to such as stand next them. The perles that are so gotten in Scotlād, are not of small value, they are very orient and bright, light & round, & somtimes of the quantitie of ẏ naple of ones litle finger, as I haue had & seene by mine own experience. Almost such another muskle found on the coast of Spaine, the shels whereof are gathered by such as go in pilgrimage to S. Iames, & brought into Scotlād, but they are wont perles, bicause thei liue in salt water, which is an enimy to ẏ Margarite: but but Cardane alſo denieth it. In all the ſea coaſtes alſo of Scotlãd are Cockles & Muſkles of the ſame forme, but without this commodity. Many vncouth and ſtrange ſhapes of fiſh likewiſe are ſeene there, whereof ſome are armed with ſhelles, ſome with harde ſkales, and diuers round as a ball ſkinned like an Irchcon or Hedgehogge, hauing but one conduct bothe for purgation of their excrements, and reception of their ſuſtenaũce. To ſhew euery kinde of fiſh that is in Scotlãd, it were but a vaine trauaile, ſith the ſame are knowẽ almoſt in euery region. In like ſorte we haue ſuch pleuty of fiſhe vpon our ſeuerall coaſtes, that although Millions & infinite numbers of them be taken on the one day, yet on the nert their loſſe wil ſo be ſupplied with new ſtore, that nothing ſhal be miſſing by reaſon of the yeſterfang: ſo bountifull is God in theſe his benefites vnto vs. Furthermore, there is another gift beſtowed vpon vs by the ſingular prouidence of God. For the greater dearth and penury of fleſh and corne is ſeene in Scotland, the greater ſtore of fiſhe is taken vpon our ſhores. In like ſorte in the deſertes and wilde places of this realme, there groweth an hearbe of it ſelf called Hadder or Hather very delicate, as Columella lib. 9. cap. 4. ſayth, for Goates and all kinde of cattell to feede vpon, and likewiſe for diuers Foules, but Bees eſpecially. This herbe in June yeeldeth a purple floure, ſweete as hony, whereof the Pictes in time paſte did make a pleaſaunt drinke, and very wholeſome for the body: but for aſmuche as the maner of making hereof is periſhed in the hauocke made of the Pictes, when the Scottes ſubdued their countrey, it lieth not in me to ſet downe the order of it, neyther ſhewed they euer the learning hereof to any but to their owne nation. Finally there is no parte of Scotland ſo barren and vnprofitable, but it produceth eyther yron or ſome other kinde of mettall, as may be proued eaſely thorow out all the Iles that are annexed to the ſame.

Galen lib. 1. de Anti. loris ſaith that Cytiſus is no hearbe but a ſhrubbe, and ſo dothe Pliny lib. 12. cap 3. lib. 13. cap 24. lib 16. cap. 8. And Columella in the end of his 5. boke, where he accompteth it amog trees.

Of the Iles of Scotland, and ſuch notable things as are to be found in them. Chap. 10.

BEing fallen at the laſte into mention of our Iles, I wil addreſſe my ſelf to deſcribe the ſame in maner and forme as followeth. In the Iriſhe ſea betwixt Ireland and Scotlande are forty and three Iles, whereof ſome are xxx. myles long, diuers xij. and others more or leſſe. Theſe are called by ſome writers Euboniæ, and by other Hebrides. But the principall of them all is that of Man, whiche lieth ouer againſt Galloway, and was ſometime the principall ſeate of the Driuydes, as Cornelius Tacitus, Ceſar in his Cõmentaries, and other Romayne writers do teſtifie at large. Forth from the Ile of Man lieth Arran, otherwiſe named Botha, after S. Brandons time, who dwelled there in a little cottage, whiche (as all other the like were in thoſe dayes) was called Bothe. Frõ Arran wee go to Hellaw and Rotheſay, whiche later is ſo named of ỹ Scot, which brought the Scottes firſte out of Ireland into Brytaine. Not farre from this Ile is Iſlay, where there is ſuch ſtore of Soland geeſe as the ſayde before to be in Bas. Beyond Iſlay lie many other diſtinguiſhed by their ſeuerall names, but full of mynes, as of Iron, Tinne, Lead, and ſundry other mettals. Howbeit the moſte notable Ile belonging to Scotland is Ila, that lieth beyond the promoutory of Nouant cliffe, (in Scottiſh the toũ of Lorne) within ſight of Lochquhabre. Certes it is a riche parcell, xxx. miles of length, and full of corne and mettall, if the people were cunning to finde and trimme the ſame. Not farre from thence is Cumbra, and Mula, fully ſo large as Ila both for length and breadth. In Mula is a fayre ſpring two miles from the ſea, from whence runneth a little brooke or ſtrippet, whereof you ſhall reade more in the deſcription of Brytaine, lib. 1. cap. 8. Neare vnto this is Iona, otherwiſe called Columkill, in whiche is an Abbay, wherein the Kings of Scotlande were commonly buried from the time of Fergus the ſecond, vnto Malcoline Canmor, who erected the Monaſtery of Dunfermelin, where ſithence that time the moſte parte of our Kings haue bene of cuſtome interred. Paſſing forward to ỹ Northnorthweſt ſeas, ouer againſt Roſſe is an Ile named Lewis. lx. myles in length, in this Ile is but one fiſhe riuer, and it is ſayd that if a womã wade thorow the ſame at the ſpring of the yere, there ſhall no Salmon be ſeene there for a twelf moneth after, whereas otherwiſe that fiſhe is knowen to abounde there in very great plenty. Beyonde Lewis lie the Sky and the Rona, in the later wherof, it is incredible to ſay what of Seale, of Pellock & Porpaſſe is to be ſeene, whiche are nothing abaſhed at the ſight of any man. The laſt and vttermoſt Ile is named Hirtha, where the eleuation of the pole, is lxij. degrees, and ſithence the latitude of Man, is but lvij. I conclude, that from the Ile of Man the firſt Ile of Albion, to Hirtha the laſt Ile hereof are 377. myles, after 62. miles and an half to euche degree, as Ptholomy hath ſet down. It is named Hirtha, which in Iriſh ſoundeth ſo much as a Sheepe in Engliſh, for herein that kinde of cattell aboundeth, euche one being greater than any Bucke, their hornes longer and thicker than of the Bugle, and thereto they haue ſide tailes that reach vnto the earth. It is enui-

rõned on euery part with rochy or rocky crags, whereby fewe vessells may lande there but at one place, where the working of the sea is often times so terrible and rough, that no man dare aduenture thither without daunger of his lyfe. They that go thither therefore, do watch theyr times when the sea is calme and still. In the moneth of June also, a Priest commeth vnto them out of Leuissa, and ministreth the sacrament of Baptisme to all the children that haue bene borne there sithe that moneth in the yeare precedent: whiche beyng done, and a certayne number of Masses sayde, he receyueth Tithes of all their commodities, & then returneth home againe.

In the Ile of Lewis are two Churches or Chappels, wherof one is dedicated to S. Peter, another to S. Clement. The same is, that so soone as the fire goeth out in this Ile, the man that is holden of most cleane and innocent life, goeth to the Aultare with great solemnity, and there layeth a wisp of straw, which being done they fall all to prayer, in the middest whereof fire commeth downe from Heauē and kindleth or setteth the same on fire.

Beyond this, is yet another Ile, but voyde of people and all other liuing Creatures, sauing certen kinde of beastes like vnto Sheepe, whose nature and forme I haue already touched in the description of Brytaine, and therefore omitte it here, for haste and breuitie sake. Betwixt these Iles also is a right daungerous passage, sith the sea by working of opposite streames hath ingendred a goulf, whiche sometime taketh in an incomprehensible deale of water, and somtimes casteth it forth agayne, by meanes wherof many shippes that by rage of winde and weather are inforced to come that way, are eyther swallowed vp by the waues, or throwen against the rockes to their bitter daunger and ruine. The greatest rage of this confluēce is at a place called Corebrecke, where it will eyther sinke or at the least wise draw any ship vnto it, though it be a full myle distant from the same.

Of the nature of the Claike geese, and sundry maners of their procreation, and of the Ile of Thule. Chap. ii.

NOw it is come to hande that I entreate of those Geese, which are ingendred by the sea, whose procreatiō hath hitherto bene thought to haue bene made vpon trees. But the opinion is false, and yet sith theyr generation is strange in deede, I haue not a litle trauayled, and with no small diligence indeuoured to search out the truth hereof, whereby I learne that their ingendrure is rather to be referred to the sea, than any thing els, if my coniecture be oughtes: for although that they are in sundry wise produced, yet I finde the same to be performed continually in the sea, and not elswhere, as shal appeare hereafter. All trees cast into the Element in processe of tyme become wormeeaten, & in the holes thereof are the sayde wormes to be founde though very little and small (in comparison to that they be afterwarde) to be perceyued at the first. In the beginnyng, these wormes do shew their heades and feete, & last of all their plumes and winges. Finally when they are come to the iust measure and quantitie of Geese, they flye in the ayre as other foules do. This was notably proued in the yeare of grace 1490, in sight of many people, beside the Castell of Petslego, whether the body of a greate tree was brought by working of the sea. This tree beyng taken, it was carried to the Lord of the soyle, who sone after caused it to be slitte in sunder with a sawe which being done, it is incredible to see, what a multitude of wormes came out of these holes. Of these also some appeared as if they had bene but newe shapen; diuerse had head, foote and winges, but no fethers, the rest were formed into perfite foules. At the last when the people had gazed thereon by the space of an whole day, they caried it to S. Andrewes Churche beside Tire, where the saide blocke remayneth still to be seene. Within two yeares after there happed such another tree to come into the fyrth of Tay beside Dundee, wormeeaten and full of young geese after the same maner: the thirde was seene in the hauen of Leith beside Edenborow: also within a fewe yeares, in like sorte a ship named the Cristopher, after she had lien three yeares at ancre in one of these yles was brought to Leith, where because hir timber was found to be rotten shee was taken in sunder, and in hir keele were found infinite holes as if they had bene eaten with wormes or bored with a wimble, and eche one of them filled with such creatures as I haue sayde before. Here if any man will alledge that the Christopher was buylded of such timber onely as grew in these Iles, and that all rootes & trees there growing, are of such nature as in their corruptiō do turne into these foules, I will disproue his assertion by one notable example shewed before mine eyes. Master Alexander Galloway parson of Kinkell, was with vs in these Iles, and giuing his minde with attentiue diligence to searche out a full resolution with vs of these obscure and hidden matters, it happed on a tyme that he tooke vp a braunche of Alga, called in Scottishe, Seatangle, whiche hanged ful of muskle shelles from the roote euen to the very top. Being also desirous to see what was in them, he grewe to be more astonished than before: for when he had opened one or two of them, he saw no fish but a foule perfitely shaped, fully answering to the capacitie of the shell.

Finally, knowing that I was very inquisitiue of these and the like rare nouelties, he came hastily with the sayde hearbe and shewed it vnto me, who founde no lesse by experience than I before reported. By these and many other reasons and examples I cannot beleeue that these Claikes (or Barnacles as I call them) are produced eyther by the qualities of the trees or the rootes thereof, but only by the nature of the sea, whiche is the cause and productrix of so many wonderfull creatures. Furthermore, because the rude and ignorant people saw oftentimes the fruytes that fell from trees, which stode neuer in the sea, conuerted within shorte time into geese, they beleeued that these geese growe vpon trees, hanging by their nebbes as apples and other fruyte do by their stalkes, but their opinion is vtterly to be reiected. For so soone as these apples or fruyte fall from the tree into the Sea, they grow first to be worme eaten, and in processe of time to be conuerted into geese.

Thus haue I spoken sufficiently of the Iles of the Hebrides adiacent vnto the realme of Scotland, and therewith all would shut vp my discourse of the same, were it not that I haue somwhat to say also of Thule, not vnknowen vnto the Romaynes, as may appeare by Tacitus, who telleth how the Romaine nauy by the cõmaundement of Agricola, was sent to vewe the coastes of the whole Iland of Brytaine; and in their returne reported how they had seene the Thule, with other Ilandes lying aboute the same. Ptholomy writeth that the Ile of Thule is one of the Shetland Iles, whiche lie neare vnto Norway, and beyond the Orchades, but this cannot be proued so by late experience: for Thule is many miles distant from Shetland. Some say that Thule is the same whiche wee call Iland: other write that it is the last Ile of the Ocean sea, and so is Iland, which lieth in the colde frosty sea, beyond the Artike circle toward the North pole. The people of Iland bycause no corne groweth among them, lyue onely by fishe, whiche they drie and powder so small as meale doth come backe from the mill, afterward they mixe it with water, and worke it vp for bread.

Of the description of Orkenay, and Shetland with sundry other smal Iles, and of the maners and conditions of the people dwelling in the same. Chap. 12.

BEyond the Iles of Scotlond lie those of Orkenay partly toward the Northwest, and partly toward the Almaine seas. The principall Ile of these is called Pomonia, wherein is a Bishops see, and two strong castels. In these groweth no wheate, they are in like sorte voyde of wood, howbeit al other graine groweth there very plentifully, they be without all venemous beasts: also neither can such as are brought thither liue any while, more than in Irelãd, which sufferyneth no creature that is aduersarie to mãkinde, ouer and beside this, there are no frogges: as for Eels they are seldome found & to be seene in the Orchades. Hauing thus fallen into the mentiõ of Ireland, I thinke it good among diuers other rare gifts of nature to remember one thing that I haue proued by experience to be done there (although the tractation of Ireland & hir commodities appertaine not to this place) whiche farre passeth all that euer I haue redde in bookes. Certes there is a Loch, linne, or poole there, neare vnto the whiche by many miles, there groweth neyther hearbe nor tree, howbeit such is the qualitie of this water, that if a stake be pitched in the same, the nature thereof dothe within one yeeres space, alter and change exceedingly, for that parte thereof which standeth in the grounde is conuerted into harde stone, the same that is enuirõned with water turneth into tough yron, onely that portion whiche is aboue the sayd Element retaining hir former woddy substaunce, whereby it is often seene how in one and the same body, three distinct substances are found, that is to say, stone, yron, & wood, which farre exceedeth all credite. But to returne againe to our Orchades, whereof things of litle or no lesse importaunce are to be rehearsed, for sith there is great abundance of Barley whereof they make the strongest Ale that is to be founde in Albion, and thereto knowen, that they are the greatest drynkers of any men in the worlde, yet was there neuer dronken or man disguised with drinke seene there, neyther any fole, or person otherwise bereft of his wittes thorow phrenesie or madnesse. There is herevnto small vse of Phisicke: for mankinde liueth there most commonly vnto extreme age in sound & perfite healthy, whose bodies also are of strong constitution & very white of colour. The Ewes that are to be found in these Ilandes haue for ỹ most part two or three Lãs a peece, at euery eening, and therewithall they haue in this countrey suche plenty of foules bothe wilde and tame, as the lyke number agayne is not to be founde in Brytaine. Their horses are litle greater than the French Asses, but in their labour they exceede all other, what shoulde I speake of the plenty of fishe there to be had, which passeth al credite: among whiche there is one sorte greater than any horse, of marueylous and incredible sluggye desire to sleepe. This fish when she prouideth to sleepe, fastneth hyr huge teeth vpon some cragge that lieth aboue the water, & then slumbreth or falleth into a moste sounde reste, whiche the seafaring men espying, they forthwith cast ancre, and then letting downe theyr shippe boates, they conueigh themselues to the fishe, and bore a greate hole thorow hir tayle, whereinto they put one ende of a cable, and so make it sure, the other ende is fastned to a great ancre, whiche is let fall of purpose into the sea, and thus is their enterprise attempted ere long to be atchieued. For after this wounde, it is not long ere the fishe awaketh, who feeling hir selfe to be hurt, leapeth at once into the sea, thinking to hide and shrowde hir in the deepes: but being staied by the weight of the ancre, and indeuouring in vayne to breake the cable, she laboureth so vehemently, that at the last she windeth hir selfe out of hir skinne, for the which she is commonly taken) and some after also turneth vp hir belly, yeelding hir life vnto the waues, and hyr body to the Mariners, who make an excellent oyle of hir greace, and passing strōg cables of hir hide or skinne. Certes such is the force of Rope made of the skinne of this fishe, that they will holde at a plunge no lesse than the Spanishe Sparto. Herein also they exceede ẏ same in that they will continue very long without fretting asunder.

In hundred miles beyond the Orchades are the Schetland Iles, whose chiefe commodities stande onely by fish which is dried in the sunne. There are brought also into Scotland out of these Ilandes great store of Sheepes felles, oxe hides, Goate skins, & cases of Martienes dryed in the sunne. And in the same maner the Marchaunts of Hollande, Zeelande and Germany, fetch them yearely by barter and exchaunge for other common and necessary wares, with the people of that nation, who for maners and conditions resemble much the Orchanois. The same in like sorte that is sayde of the Orchanoys, concerning drunkennesse and frenesy, is verified on them, as is also their length of lyfe, although not in so rare maner: Sith these in steede of strong Ale, content themselues with water, and very slender diet. Beyōd the Schetlandes there are diuers other Ilandes, of lyke condition, but without corne and all maner of flesshe to feede vpon. These dry their fishe at the Sunne, and when they are thorowe stiffe, they grinde them to smal powder, which they worke vp with water into loaues, and so vse the same in lieu of other bread. Theyr liuing consisteth of the boanes of suche fishes as they take, and yet they content themselues in suche maner with this their poore kinde of lyuelode, that they thinke their estate moste happy in respect of such as inhabite in the Maine. Certes there is no quarelling amongst these for wealth or gaine, but eche one prouideth suche store of fishe in Somer whiche he taketh himselfe, as shall finde his family for keepe his house in winter. They are voyde of all ambitious mode, & neuer troubled with ciuile or forren warres, as men that deeme firme peace and quietnesse, with mutuall loue and amity, to be the chiefe felicity to be sought for in this life, and to remaine therin, eche one to his power dothe shewe his whole indeuour. This finally is to be added vnto their cōmendation, that they are simple, playne, voyde of crafte, and all maner of Serpentine suttlety, whiche endeth commonly with mischiefe, and reigneth in the Maine. Once in the yeare there commeth a Priest vnto them from Orkenay (of whiche Diocesse they are) who ministreth vnto them the Sacrament of Baptisme, and after a certayne tyme (hauing taken vp in the meane time his Tithes in fishe, whiche is their sole increase, and very truly payde) he returneth home againe the same way that he came. If any giftes of nature are to be numbred as parcelles of worldly riches and renowne, they are not without these also: for the people of these Iles are lusty, fayre, strong of body, and highe of stature, so ẏ nature hath not failed to indue them with these things, and that in most excellent maner. What should I say of their helth, whiche is and may be preferred aboue all treasure, as they well know that are oppressed with long and grieuous infirmities: for here among these men, you shall very seldome heare of sickenesse to attache any, vntill extreame age come that killeth them altogither, and this is that exceeding benefit naturally appropried vnto their carcases. As for their quietnesse of minde, it is alwayes suche as is constant, vnchaungeable, and therefore incompareable vnto any riches or huge masse of worldly treasure.

Herevnto furthermore, if it be true riches (as it is in deede) for eche one not to couet other mēs goodes, but to content himself with that which is his owne, and not to stande in neede of any thing, can any men be founde in any other region more riche and fortunate than the Shetland men and these Ilanders? Finally, if those be the true honors, and reuerent dueties whiche the obedient sonne with greate sincerity and boyde of all flattery, doth shewe vnto his good parents, and wherewithall the best sort do meruaylously reioyce and delite themselues, & that these are also not wanting in these regions, can we iustly say that these mē do lacke any thing, or shall we not rather affirme with greate assurance that they rather stand in neede of nothing that any mortal man can iustly wish or desire? But if there be any man that will accuse me of vntruth in the recitall of these things, as one that lieth lowde and by authoritie of a people dwelling far off, for so much as I my selfe was neuer in those Ilandes, he shal vnderstand that I learned all these things of the reuerent father Edward Bishop of the Orchades, with whom one of these Ilanders dwelled, who not onely made a like rehearsall of these things with his owne mouth, but also verified the same in his owne person, for his height farre passed the cõmon stature of men, thereto he was excellently well featured in his limmes, so white of skinne ouer all, that he might contend in beauty with any lady of the lande, & finally so wight & strõg of body, that no man in all those quarters durst rũne or wrestle with him. Hereby also we may see, how far they are deceyued whiche iudge thẽ to be barbarous, & miserable creatures that inhabite far from the Tropike lines, for there are no people more happy than those that dwell in these quarters, as I haue proued already.

Furthermore, among the rockes & cragges of these Iles groweth the delectable Amber, called Electrum, Chrysolectrũ, or as Dioscorides hath Pterygophoron, indued with so vehemẽt an attractiue force, ẏ being chafed it draweth straw, flore, and other like light matter vnto it. This gumme is ingendred of the sea froth whiche is throwen vp by continuall repercussion of crags & rockes against the sea walles, & through perpetual working of ẏ waues groweth in time to become tough as glew, til it fall at ẏ last from ẏ rocke againe into the sea. Suche as haue often viewed & marked the generation of this gũme, whilest it hãgeth on ẏ rocke, affirme it to be like a froth & bubble of water without al massy sadnesse, bycause that as yet it is not sufficiently hardned by the working of the Element. Sometimes ẏ Seatangle is found enuironed also wõ al, bicause it is driuẽ hither & thither by the working of ẏ waues, & so lõg as it fleetes to & fro in this maner, so long is it apte to cleaue to any thing that it toucheth. Two yeeres before I wrote this booke, there came a great lompe of Amber into Buchquhane, in quantity so bigge as any horse, which the heardmẽ that kept their cattell neare hand caught vp, & not knowing in deede what it was, they caried it home, & threw a portion thereof into the fire: finally perceiuing a sweete & delectable sauour to proceede frõ the same, they ran by & by to the Priest of ẏ towne where they dwelled, telling him how they had found a peece of stuffe whiche would serue very well in steede of frãkensence, wherwith to perfume his sainctes or rather Idols in the church. These mẽ supposed that sir John had ben more cunning than themselues, but contrary to their expectation, it fell out that he was no lesse vnskilful & voyde of knowledge than they, & therefore refusing the whole lumpe, he took but a small portion therof, and returned the rest vnto thẽ, whereby it came to litle prowe & lesse gayne among the common sorte, who suffred it to perish by reason of their vnskilfulnesse. Certes when they brake it in peeces, it resembled in colour vnto the purest golde, & shined as if it had bene the late or flame of a cãdle. Herein also the Prouerb was proued true, that the Sow reckes not of Balme. But so sone as I vnderstode of the matter, I vsed such diligence, that one portiõ therof was brought to me at Aberden. And thus much of the Hebrides, Orchades & Shetland Iles subiect vnto the Scottish regiment. I might no doubt haue made rehersall of diuers other things worthy the noting in this behalfe. But I haue made choise onely of the most rare & excellent, and so would finish this descriptiõ, were it not that one thing hath stayed me right pleasant to be remembred, as an vncouth and strange incident, whereof master James Ogilby Imbassadour from James our King, (among other) vnto the King of Fraunce, hath certified me, & whereof he had experience of late at such time as he was constrayned by tempest of weather to get to land in Norway. Thus standeth the case, being driuen, as I saide, vpon the shore of Norway, he and his company saw a kinde of people raungyng vp & downe in the mountaynes there, much like vnto those which diuers pictures giue forth for wilde men, heary and vgly to behold. In the end being aduertized that they were sauage & wilde beastes, yet nevertheless deadly enimies to mãkind, they vnderstood therunto that although in the day time they abhorred & feared the sight of man, yet in the night they would by great companies inuade the small villages & countrey townes, killing & sleying so many as they found, or where no dogges were kept to put by their rage & fury. Certes such is their nature, that they stande in great feare of dogges, at whose barking & sight they flie and runne away with no small haste & terrour, wherefore the inhabitants are inforced to cherish great numbers of the said beasts, thereby to keepe off those wilde men that otherwise would annoy them: they are moreouer of suche strength, that sometimes they pull vp yong trees by the rootes to fight withall amõg themselues. The Imbassadors seyng these vncouth creatures, were not a litle astonied, & therfore to be sure frõ all inuasion, they procured a strõg gard, to watch al night about thẽ, with great fires to giue light ouer all that quarter, till on the morrow that they tooke the sea & so departed thence.

Finally

Finally the Norwegiãs shewed thẽ, that there was another people not far of, whiche liued all the Sõmer time in the sea like fish, & fed of such as they did catch, but in ẏ Winter half (bicause the water is cold) they prayed vpon such wilde beasts as fedde on the mountaynes, whiche cõming downe from the snowy hilles to grase in the baleys, they killed with dartes & weapons, & carried vnto their caues. In this exercise also they tie certaine litle bowdes to their feete, which beare them vp from sinking into the snow, & so with a staffe in their handes, they make the better shifte to clime vp and come downe from the cragges and mountaines, wherof in that region there is very great plenty and aboundance.

Of the maners of the Scottes in these dayes, and their comparison with the behauiour of the old, and such as liued long since within this Iland. Chap. 13.

FOrasmuch as diuers noble men haue desired me to shew apart the old maners of the Scots touched in my history, to the end it may be knowen how far our nation in these present dayes are different in their maners & behauiour frõ those of our forefathers, & herevnto although I assure my self already ẏ the reuealing of these things will procure vnto me the hatred of sundry worthy or renowmed personages (of which few wil yeelde to heare their doings touched, or their errours reproued) yet bicause I owe such duetie & seruice vnto those that haue made this request vnto me, & least I should seeme ingrate not to herken vnto thẽ in this behalf I haue cõdescended to the performaunce of their desires, & somuch the rather, for ẏ they alledge how it wil be very profitable vnto al readers, but especially such as are not immoderately giuen ouer vnto their owne affections, nor so wholly drowned in their owne sensuality & pleasures, but vpon consideration of wholsome admonition will be very willing to leaue what soeuer offendeth in them. First of al therfore, I will declare what vsages haue ben among our elders both in time of warre & peace, and by what wisedome & industrie they haue preuailed so long time against such & so many mighty aduersaries, as first the Brytons, then ẏ Saxons, next of al the Danes whiche haue entred into this Iland with huge armies, to spoyle and subdue the same. Furthermore, I wil set downe with somuch breuity as I can, how the failing by litle & litle frõ the frugalitie and customes of their Forefathers, their vertue & force also began in like order to decay. And finally how in these daies either by the clemẽcy of our neighbours, or by their delicate negligence rather than by our owne prowes, wee liue in security, & thereby as it were ouerwhelmed & wrapped vp in al auarice, & excesse, wherinto our want of exercise and martiall prowesse doth marueylously impell vs. Certes I beleue that by this meanes such as are of ẏ more couragious sort (& yet reteyning a sauour of the tẽperancie of theyr elders) will reioyce to heare their manhode and great prowes cõmended in this wise, as others of the cõtrary sect (in seruile maner addicted to gather good, and spende their times in idle excesse & riot) seeing their errours iustly reprehended, & the dishonor gotten thereby openly reuealed, will the rather addresse themselues to reformation of their estate, thereby to recouer the auncient renowme of their Forefathers, in answering to their prowes, than proue a reproche vnto their successours, thorow their lewde behauiours neuer to be forgotten. This also I protest before al men, that what soeuer I shall speake of the euill maners of our times, I do not meane it vnto all, but those only whome blind self loue, couetousnesse, intemperancy, excesse and abuse of al Goddes good giftes haue so touched, that they deserue much more to be reprehended then I will vouchsafe to attempt in this my lateward treatize, therefore if any man shall thinke him selfe to be rubbed on the gall by me, I counsell him that he conceale not his infirmity, by seeking reuenge on otherwhẽ, but rather indeuour to procure the remedy in first acknowledging his misdemeanors, whiche is the one and better halfe of his cure.

Our elders although they were right vertuous both in warre abrode, and at home in peace, were yet neuertheless in conuersation & behauiour very temperate, whiche is the fountaine & originall of al vertues. In sleepe they were cõpetent, in meate & drinke sober, & contẽted with such fode as was ready at hande and prepared with litle cost. Their bread consisted of suche stuffe as grew most readily on ẏ ground, without al maner of sifting and boulting, wherby to please the palate, but baked vp as it came frõ the mill without any suche curiosity, whiche is a great abasing of the force therof vnto our dayly nourishment. The flesh whereon they chiefly fed, was either such as they gate by hunting, wherin they toke great delite & which increased not a litle their strength and nimblenesse, or els suche tame cattell as they bredde vp at home, wherof beefe was accompted the principall, as it is yet in our dayes, though after another maner & far discrepant from the vse and custome of other countries. The stirkes or young befettes vngelded, we either kill yõg for beale, or geld, to the end that they may serue afterwarde for tillage in caring vp of the ground, but the cowcalues and heighfers, are neuer killed till they be with Calf, for then are they fattest & most delicious cious to the mouth. The common meate of our elders was fish, howbeit not only or so much for the plenty therof, as for that our landes lay ofte waste and untilled, because of the great warres which they cõmonly had in hand. They breake also their fast early in the morning wᵗʰ some slender repast, & so cõtinued without any other diet untill supper time, in which they had but one dish, whereby it came to passe, ꝑ their stomackes were neuer ouercharged, nor their bones desirous of rest thorow the fulnesse of their bellies. At such time as they determined of set purpose to be merry, they vsed a kinde of Aquavite voyde of al spice, & only consisting of such herbes and rootes as grew in their owne gardens, otherwise their common drinke was Ale: but in tyme of warre when they were inforced to lie in campe, they contented thẽselues with water as rediest for their turnes. Euery souldier also had so much meale as might serue him for a day, which he made vp in cakes, and baked on the coles, as the Romaines sometimes vsed to do, and the Emperour Caracalla himselfe as Herodian hath remembred. Seldome did they eat any flesh in their tentes, except they gate it frõ their aduersaries, such as they had likewise was eaten half rawe, because they supposed the iuyce therof so vsed to nourish very abundantly. But fishe was much more plentifull amongst them, especially when they wãted their vsuall prayes, or could not attayne vnto them. They brought furthermore from their houses to the field with them, a vessel of butter, cheese, meale, milke, & vineger tempred togither as a shorte ancre against extreme hunger, on which they would feede & sucke out the moysture, when other prouision couldе not be gotten. In like maner whensoeuer they had entred into league and amity with their enimies, they would not liue in such security, that therby they would suffer their bodies and forces to degenerate, but they did keepe themselues in their former actiuity and nimblenesse of limmes, eyther with continuall hunting (a game greatly esteemed among our auncestors) or with running from the hilles to the valeys, or from the valeys to the hilles, or with wrestling, and such kindes of passime whereby they were neuer idle. Their heads were alwayes shauē, after the maner of ꝑ auncient Spaniardes, with a litle tuft of heare only left on their foreparts, & neuer couered, except whẽ they were troubled wᵗʰ sickenesse, by which meanes it came to passe that fewe of our nation in olde time was seene to be balde & hearelesse. They went also bare foted, or if they had any shone, they dipped them first in ꝑ water ere they did put thẽ on, especially in Winter when sharpest weather shewed it self, to the end that ꝑ soles of their feete (which were wel hardned in Sommer with heate and in winter with cold, might be more strong and able to sustayne great labour and dayly trauaile. Their apparell was not made for brauery & põpe, but as should seeme best to couer their bodies & serue their appointed vses, their hosen were shaped also of linnen or woollen, whiche neuer came higher than their knees, their breches were for the most part of hẽpe, clokes also they had for winter made of course woll, but in the sommer time they ware of the finest that couldе be gotten. They slept moreouer eyther vpon the bare floore or pallets of straw, teaching their childrẽ euen from theyr infancy to eschew ease, & practise the like hardnesse: & sith it was a cause of suspitiõ of the mothers fidelity towarde hir husbande, to seeke a strange nurse for hir childrẽ (although hir milke fayled) eche womã wold take intollerable paines to bring vp & nourish hir owne children. They thought them furthermore not to be kindly fostered, except they were so well nourished after their birthes with the milke of theyr breastes, as they were before they were borne with ꝑ bloud of their owne bellies, nay they feared least they should degenerate & grow out of kinde, except they gaue them sucke themselues, and eschewed strange milke, therfore in labour & painefulnesse they were equall, and neither sexe regarded the heate in sommer or cold in winter, but trauailed barefooted, & in time of warres the mẽ had their cartages & victuals trussed behinde thẽ on their horses, or els vpon their owne shulders without refusall of any labour, enioyned vnto them by their Captaines. If it hapned them at any time to be banquished, they fled with such speede to ꝑ mountaines, that no horse might ouertake thẽ, & very oft escaped. The violence that was done to any one of them, was reputed comon to al, & such was their deadly hate conceyued in these cases, that vntil they had requited the like with more extremity, they would neuer be quiet nor let go their displeasure. The noblest & most couragious Gentleman would soonest desire to be placed in the forewarde, where his vassalage or seruice & manhood should readiliest be seene, and such was the friendship of the nobility amongst thẽselues, that whylest they contended which of them should be most faithful & frendly to other, they would oft fal out, & quarel one wᵗʰ another. Somtimes it hapned ꝑ their Captaine was beset wᵗʰ extreme peril, or peraduenture some other of the nobility, in which cases they ꝑ were of his bãd wold suddenly rush in thorow ꝑ thickest of their enimies vnto him, & deliuer him, or els if they could not so do, they would altogither lose their liues with him, thinking it a perpetuall note of reproche to ouerliue their leader. The graues & sepulchres of our noblemen, had com-

mõly ſo many Obeliſkes & ſpires pitched about them, as the deceaſed had killed enimies before time in ẏ fielde: if any ſouldier had ben found in the fielde without his flint & tinder bore, or had walked or gone vp & downe with his ſworde at his ſide, and not naked in his hãd, for then vſed they light armor for ẏ moſt part, he was terribly ſcourged: but he that ſolde or mortgaged his weapon, was forthwith cut frõ his company & baniſhed as an exile: he that fled or went frõ the battayle without leaue of his Capitayne, was ſlayne whereſoeuer he was mette afterwarde, without any iudgement or ſentence, and all his goodes cõfiſcated to the Prince: Their light armour in thoſe dayes conſiſted of the launce, the bow, the long ſword which hanged at the ſide of ẏ owner, & therto a buckler, but afterward heauier armour came into generall vſage. In theſe dayes alſo the womẽ of our country were of no leſſe courage than the men, for al ſtout maydẽs & wiues (if they were not with childe) marched ſo wel into the field as did the men, & ſo ſone as the army did ſet forward, they ſlew the firſt liuing creature ẏ they foũd, in whoſe blond they not onely bathed their ſwordes, but alſo taſted thereof with their mouthes, with no leſſe religiõ & aſſurance conceyued, than if they had already bene ſure of ſome notable & fortunate victory: when they ſaw their owne blond run frõ them in the fight, they wexed neuer a whit aſtonnied with the matter, but rather doubling their courages, with more egernelle they aſſailed their enimies. This alſo is to be noted of thẽ, that they neuer ſought any victory by treaſon, falſhed or ſleight, as thinking it a great reproch to winne the fielde any otherwiſe than by mere manhood, proweſſe, & playne dealing. When they went forth vnto the warres, eche one went with the King of his owne coſt (except the hyred ſoldier) which cuſtome is yet in vſe. If any were troubled with the falling Euyll, or Lepre, or fallen frantike, or otherwiſe out of his wits, they were diligẽtly ſought out: & leaſt thoſe diſeaſes ſhould paſſe further by infectuous generatiõ vnto their iſſue & poſterity, they gelded the mẽ. But ẏ womẽ were ſecluded into ſome odde place farre off from the cõpany of men, where if ſhe afterward hapned to be gotten with childe, both ſhe & the infant were runne thorow with a launce: gluttons & rauencrs, dronkardes, & egregious deuourers of victualles, were puniſhed alſo by death, firſt being permitted to deuour ſo much as they liſted, & thẽ drowned in one freſh riuer or other.

Furthermore, as iuſtice in time of warre was cõmonly vſed to perke, ſo in daies of peace our countreymen that offended, were oft ſeuerely puniſhed & with inconuenient rigor. For they wel conſidered that after their people ſhould returne and come home againe from the warres, they would be giuẽ to ſo many enormities, that the ſame theyr exceſſe ſhould hardly be reſtrayned but by extreme ſeuerity: ſuche alſo was theyr nature, that ſo ſone as they knew themſelues guilty of any offence committed againſt the eſtate or cõmon wealth, their firſt attempt was to ſet diſcord amongſt the Peeres & Princes of the realme, neuertheleſſe when they are gently intreated, & with courteous moderation, they are found to be very tractable, & pliant vnto reaſon: in priuate bargaines & contractes they are ſo willing to giue euery man his owne, that they will yelde the more. And ſo farre is it growne into a cuſtome euẽ in theſe our dayes, that except there be ſome ſurpluſage aboue the bare couenaunt, they will breake of and not go forwarde with the bargayne. They vſed at the firſt the rites and maners of the Egyptians frõ whence they came, & in al their priuate affayres they vſed not to write with common letters as other nations did, but rather with Cyphers and figures of creatures made in maner of letters as their Epitaphes vpon their tombes & ſepultures remayning amõgſt vs do hitherto declare. Neuertheleſſe in our times this Hieroglyphical maner of writing (I wote not by what meanes) is periſhed & loſt, and yet they haue certaine letters propre vnto thẽſelues, which were ſometime in cõmon vſe: but among ſuch as retaine the auncient ſpech, they haue their aſpiratiõs, dipthõgs, & pronunciation better than any other. The cõmon ſorte are not in vre withall, but onely they which inhabite in the higher part of the coũtry, & ſith they haue their language, more eloquent and apt than others, they are called Poetes, they make alſo Poetes wt great ſolemnity & honour, being borne out therein by the authority of the Prince. Beſide ẏ ſkil alſo of many other artes & ſciẽces, whoſe rules & Methodes are turned into ẏ ſayd language, are giuẽ by tradition frõ theyr elders, they chiefly excel in Phiſick, wherin they go far beyond many other, who learning of thẽ ẏ natures & qualitie of ſuch herbes as grow in thoſe quarters, do heale al maner of diſeaſes cuẽ by their only applicatiõ. Certes there is no regiõ in ẏ whole world ſo barrẽ & vnfruteful, through diſtaũce frõ the Sunne, but by ẏ prouidence of God all maner of neceſſaries for the ſuſtentatiõ of mankind dwelling there, are to be had therin, if ẏ inhabitants were ſuch as had any ſkil how to vſe ẏ ſame in order. Neuertheleſſe our elders which dwelled continually vpõ the Marches of England, learned ẏ Saxon toung through cõtinuall trade of marchandize and hazard of the warres, long ſince, whereby it came to paſſe that we neglected our owne language, and our owne maners, and thereto bothe our auncient order in writing and speakyng is vtterly left among vs, that inhabite neare vnto the, whereas contrarywise those that dwell in the mountaines reteyne still their auncient speach & letters, & almost all their olde rites, whereunto in time past their Forefathers haue bene accustomed. One thing hereof also may euidently be seene (for an example) in their boates whiche they call Carrockes, for being made of Oziers & couered with Bull hides, they vse to passe & repasse with them ouer their riuers & waters in catching of Salmons, & when they haue done, they beare them on their backes vnto what place soeuer it pleaseth them. But we will now leaue the maners of our auncient friendes, & intreate of our later countreymen. In processe of time therfore, and chiefly aboute the dayes of Malcolme Cammor, our maners began greatly to chaunge & alter. For when our neighbours the Brytons began, after they were subdued by the Romaynes, to waxe idle & slouthful, and therevpon driuen out of their countrey into Wales by their enimies the Saxõs, we began to haue alliãce (by proximity of the Romaines) with Englishmẽ, especially after the subuersion of the Pictes, & thorow our dayly trades & cõuersation with them, to learne also their maners, & therewithall their lãguage as I haue sayd already. Hereby shortly after it came also to passe, that the temperaunce and vertue of our auncestors grew to be iudged worthy of small estimation amongst vs, notwithstanding that a certayne idle desire of our former renowne did still remayne within vs.

Furthermore as men not walking in ẏ right pathe, we begã to follow also the vaine shadow of the Germaine honor & titles of nobility, and boasting of the same after the English maner, it fell out ere long, that where as he in times past was accompted only honorable, which excelled othermen not in ritches and possessions, but in prowesse and manhode, now he would be takẽ most glorious that wẽt loden with most titles, whereof it came to passe, that some were named Dukes, some Erles, some Lords, some Barõs, in which vain puffes they fixed al their felicity. Before time the noble men of Scotlãd were of one condition, and called by the name Thanes, so much in Latine as Questores regij, gatherers of ẏ kings duties, in English: and this denomination was giuen vnto them after their desert & merite. But how far we in these present dayes are swarued from the vertues and temperaunce of our elders, I beleeue there is no man so eloquent, nor indued with such vtterance, as that he is able sufficiently to expresse. For whereas they gaue their mindes to doughtinesse, we apply our selues to dronkennesse: they had plenty with sufficiency, we haue inordinate excesse & superfluity: they were temperate, we effeminate: and so is the case now altered with vs, that he which can deuoure & drinke most, is the noblest man and most honest companion, and thereto hath no peere if he can once find ẏ vaine, though with his great trauaile to purucy himself of the plentifullest number of newe fine and delicate dishes, and best prouoke his stomacke to receiue the greatest quantitie of them, though he neuer make due digestiõ of it. Being thus drowned in our delicate gluttony, it is a woorld to see, how we stuffe our selues both day and night, neuer ceasing to ingorge and poure in, till our bellies be so full that we must needes depart. Certes it is not supposed meete that we should now content our selues with breakefast and supper only as our elders haue done before vs, nor inough that we haue added our dinners vnto their aforesayd meales, but we must haue thereto our beuerages and reare suppers, so that small time is spared wherein to occupy our selues vnto any godly exercise, sith almost the whole day & night do scarcely suffice for the filling of our paunches. We haue also our marchants, whose charge is not to loke out, and bring home suche things as necessarily appertaine to the maintenance of our liues, but vnto the furniture of our kitchen, and these search al the secrete corners of our forrestes for venison, of the ayre for foules, & of the sea for fishe, for wine also they trauayle not onely into Fraunce, whose wines do now grow into cõtempt, but also into Spaine, Italy and Greece: nay Affrike is not voyde of our factours, no nor Asia, and only for fine and delicate wines if they may be had for money. In like sorte they gad ouer all the woorld for sweete and pleasant spices, & drugges (prouokers vnto all lust and licentiousnesse of behauiour) as men that aduenture their owne liues to bring home poyson and destruction vnto their countreymẽ, as if the minde were not already sufficiently bereft of hir image of the Diuinity, but must yet more be clogged & ouerladen with such a franked case, therwithall to be extinguished outright whiche already dwelleth or is buried rather in such an vgly sepulchre. The body likewyse being oppressed with such an heape of superfluous fode, although otherwise it be indued with an excellent nature, cannot be able to execute his office, nor keepe it selfe vpright, but must needes yeelde as ouercome, & to be torne in peeces and rent with sundry maladies.

Hereof also it commeth to passe that our coũtreymen trauayling into the colder regions are now a dayes cõtrary to their former vsage taken sometime with feuers, whereby their inwards partes do burne & parch as it were with continuall fire, the onely cause whereof we may ascribe alcribe vnto those hoate spices and drugges which are brought vnto vs from the hoate coũtreys. Others of them are so swollen & growen full of humors, that they are often taken sodenly and die of behemēt apoplexies, and although here & there one or two recouer for a litle while, yet are they but dead people reuiuing agayne, leading the rest of their lines like shadowes, and walking aboute as if they were buried already. Our youth also following these vnhappy steps of theyr parentes, giue themselues wholy to lust & licentiousnesse, hauing all vertue and knowledge in contempt, and eschewing the same as a Pestilence and subuersion of their pleasures, wherevnto they apply themselues as vnto the most excellent trade. But sithence they are now inured and as it were haunted with these vices, when tyme doth come of seruice and that our countrey shall stand in neede of manhood, these will be becomen so effeminate, that they must now ride on horsebacke as cladde in beauy armour, for on foote they cannot go by reason of their fatnesse whiche choketh vp their vitall forces, neyther be able to performe any thing at all in comparison of the soueraigne manhode and prowesse of theyr elders. So some also as they returne home, bicause their possessions are not otherwise able to nourishe them vp in pleasure and pampering of their mawes, they must fall to couetous and greedy practizes, thereby to enriche themselues, or els proue strong theeues, or finally sowers of dissention and discord among the Noble men, thereby to pray some commoditie. Certes these and other vices followyng them necessarily, proceede generally from none other fountayne than voluptuous life & intemperancy, the whiche if we would refrayne, there is no regiõ vnder the Sunne that would proue more wholesome, lesse subiect to Pestilence, nor more commodious and profitable for the sustẽtation of hir people. Certes I dispayre not of the redresse of these things, but still hope that in shorte tyme these corrupted maners of my coũtreymen will be turned into a better frame, wee are not yet become impudent, neyther altogither haue cast of vnshamefastnesse, sithe that in a great many some remaynder of our auncient soberneſſe and manhode doth yet appeare, and thereto newnesse of lyfe with feruent deuotion increase euery day, through the working of the zeale of our Christian religion in vs. This also will I adde, without offence I trust vnto other nations, that there was neuer people more stedfast to my knowlege in the Christian faith, nor more constant in theyr faithfull promises, than the Scots haue bene sithence their first beginning: and for a conclusion I will say more, not onely for their prayse, but also in exhorting them vnto perseuerance, that as our people now liuing do passe their auncestors in sumptuous & curious attyre, so they are more nette and fine in their houses, better giuen to learning, & much more magnificent in buylding and decking of theyr Churches. God graunt them also to returne to their former frugality, and that with speede. Amen.

Hetherto haue I translated Hectors description of Scotland out of the Scottish into the English toung, being not a litle ayded thereiñ by the Latine, frõ whence somtime the translator swarueth not a litle, as I haue done also frõ him, now and then following the Latine, and now and then gathering such sence out of both as most did stande with my purposed breuity. Now will I set downe the description of an Auncient Pict, as I haue gathered it out of Herodian & other, and then I will giue ouer not only to wryte more at this present, but for euer hereafter of any Historicall matters, sith I see that this honest kind of recreation is denied me, and all time spent about the same in these dayes vtterly condemned, as vayne and sauouring of negligence, and Heathenish impiety.

The description of an auncient Pict. Chap. 14.

THe Pict (saith Herodian) hath generally no vse of apparell, howbeit the nobler sorte of them do wrappe theyr heades and wombes in roules of yron, which they take for great bravery, esteeming this kinde of attyre in suche as weare the same, to be a token of wealth and riches, and so great an ornament, as if they had worne Golde or any costly iewelles. Beside this, and the shauing of theyr nether lippe, they paynted ouer their bodies with the images of al kindes of beastes, so that he was the gayest mã, that had his skinne most disguised in this maner. Certes none of them regarded to weare any apparell, bycause they esteemed it a greate glory to haue these paintings seene. In warres they were bolde, and desirous to shedde bloud, contenting themselues (in steede of other armour) with a shorte launce, and narrow target, or buckler, theyr swordes were tied to their naked sides with a thong, and as for Jacke, shirt of Mayle, or Helmet, they made no regarde of them, bycause they would trouble thẽ in swimming, or otherwise at a pinche, whẽ they should be compelled to wade. Dion wryting generally of the whole countrey, diuideth it with Herodian into the Calidons, and Meates, saying that the sayde countrey is very sauage, their Cities bereft of walles & fields, without townes: they liue moreouer (saith he) by hunting and pray, and often times with the fruite of their trees: & albeit that they haue exceeding plenty of fish, yet they eate not of it. They liue naked in tents and without shoes on theyr feete, theyr wiues are common, and children generally loked vnto: they haue moreouer a populous regiment, & are very ready to steale: they fight in wagons, & haue little light & swift horses, whiche runne also very swiftly, and stande at their feete with like stedfastnesse. In ẏ nether end of their launces they haue hollow bullets of Brasse, in eche is a litle peece or two of yron, whiche ratleth when they shake it, & maketh a strange noyse where many of them are togither. They haue also narrow daggers: but chiefly they can sustayne hunger and colde best of all men, & likewise sore labour: and if it happen them to hunger and haue no meate at hand, they wil sitte in the marrishes vp to the chinnes by many dayes togither. In the woodes they feede on rootes or barkes of trees, and they haue a kinde of meate among them, whereof if they take but so muche as a beane, they neyther hunger nor thirste in a long time after. And thus much of the meates (whiche were the nearest vs) and the Caledons that dwelled beyond the wall, and both in their prouince called Maxima Cesariensis, whereof let this suffice.

FINIS.

THE HISTORIE of Scotlande.

THE Scottiſh men, according to the maner of other nations, eſteeming it a glorie to fetche their beginning of great auncientie, ſay that their original diſcent came from the Greekes and Egyptians. For there was (as the Scottiſhe olde Hiſtoriographers haue left in writing) a certaine noble man among the Greekes, named Gathelus, the ſonne of Cecrops, which builded the City of Athens: or as ſome other would, he was the ſonne of Argus Nealus, the fourth king of the Argiues. This Gathelus playing in his youth manye wilde and vnruly partes in the Countrie of Macedonia and Achaia, was dyuerſe tymes ſharpely rebuked by his father and other of hys friends: ſo that in fine diſdeining their correction and wholſome admonitions, he was baniſhed by his father: after which he got togither a number of ſtrong and luſtie yong men, ſuch as had vſed the like trade of liuing, and togither with them fled ouer into Egypt: & comming thither in the xxxiij. yeare of Pharao Ozus, as then king of that Countrey, was receyued of him in moſt gladſome wiſe, for that his ſeruice (as it was thought) might ſtande in great ſtead, in thoſe warres which the Egyptians helde the ſame time with the Ethiopians that had inuaded the realme of Egypt, euen vnto Memphis. This Gathelus, to bee ſhort, went forth with his bandes agaynſt the ſame Ethiopians, vnder Moſes the Captaine generall of the armie, choſen thereto by diuine Oracle (as Joſephus writeth) which Moſes obteyned the victorie, and conquered Saba by force, he the chiefeſt and principall Citie which ſtoode in the Iſle Meroe.

Gathelus went agaynſt the enimies.

Moyſes Captaine generall vnder Pharao. Lib. 2. Cap. 7.

For ſuch tokens of valiancie and worthie prowes as Gathelus ſhewed, both in this Countrey, & in other places, he grew alſo into ſuch eſtimation with Pharao, that he gaue him his daughter in mariage. But Moſes was rather enuied than honored for his doying, becauſe the Egyptians doubted leaſt the Iſraelites ſhould encreaſe to ſuch a puyſſant multitude, that in the ende they might vſurpe and chalenge the gouernance of the whole Realme, and bring it by rebelling into their owne handes: wherefore diuerſe informations were made to the king agaynſt him, ſo that when he once perceyued himſelfe to be in daunger of the lawe, and looked for no mercie at their handes, fled from thence out of the Countrey, and gate him into the lande of Madian.

Gathelus hiſt doings adnaunced.

Moiſes doings not alowed.

Moyſes fled.

Unto Gathelus and his people, there was giuen a Citie called Thebes (Egyptiaca) being taken from the Iſraelites.

The Citie Thebes was giuen vnto Gathelus.

Here muſt you vnderſtande, that Pharaos daughter whiche Gathelus thus maryed, was called Scota, of whom ſuch as came of the poſteritie of that nation, were afterwardes, and are at this preſent day called Scoti, that is to ſay Scottiſh men: and the land where they inhabite Scotia, that is to ſay, Scotlande.

Scota daughter to Pharao.

Gathelus thus being aduaunced by ſuch honourable mariage, lyued all the dayes of his father in law Pharao Ozus, in great honour. But after his diſceaſe, and in the thirde generation, an other king named Pharao Chencres, ſucceeded in his throne, who oppreſſed the people of Iſrael then abyding in Egypt, with more bondage, than euer his father, or grandfather had don before him. Neither was there hope of any redreſſe, till Moyſes returned by Gods appoyntment from amongſt the Madianites (where he had remayned in exile) into Egypt, and there declared vnto this Pharao Gods commaundement, touching the deliuerance of his people.

The credite of this hiſtorie of Gathelus, we leaue to the authors.

Iſrael oppreſſed.

Moſes called out of Madian into Egypt.

But forſomuch as his wordes were regarded, neyther with the king nor with his ſubiects, that lande was plagued in moſt horrible and terrible maner: and moreouer it was ſignified vnto ſuch as ſought to know what was meant by way of Oracles, that ſorer and more grieuous plagues ſhould after follow, if remedie were not founde the ſooner.

Moſes not regarded. Exodus. 5.

Gathelus leauing Egypt, seeketh other countreyes.

Gathelus therefore being certified hereof, and giuing credite to the Oracles aforesayde, determined out of hande to forsake the countrey, and seeke him a new place of abode in some other partyes of the worlde. Wherefore he caused a number of shippes to be rigged, and all necessarie purueyance to be prouided,, and when the same was once readie and all things set in order, he tooke with him his wife and children, and a great multitude of people both Greekes and Egyptians, whom he embarqued in those shippes, and hoysing vp sayles, departed out of the mouth of the riuer Nilus, in the yeare of the worldes creation 2453. when hee had dwelled in Egypt. 39. yeares and more.

Gathelus departing was, Anno mundi. 2453. W.H. 3643. H.B.

Being thus departed, after some trouble in the voyage, they arriued first on the coastes of Numydia, whiche is one of the regions of Affrike, now called Barbarie; but beyng put backe from thence by the stowte resistaunce of the inhabitauntes, they tooke the Seas agayne, and landed in a part of Spayne, whiche long after was called Lusitania.

He was repulsed in Barbary

There be that haue written how it should be cleped Portt Gathele of this Gathelus, and certaine yeares after Lusitania, and eftsones agayne in a maner to haue got the former name being somewhat corruptly called Portingale. But who is able in a mater of such auncientie to auowche any thing for truth?

He landed in Portingale.

Gathelus with his companie beyng thus come to lande, sought abrode in the countrey for bytayles and such other necessarie things as they wanted (for their long being on the Seas had wasted all their purueyance: whose arriual being once knowen in the countrey, the people assembled together, and fiercely encountring with the straungers, after sharpe and cruell fight, in the ende the Spanyardes were put to the worse and chased out of the fielde.

The inhabitants resist Gathelus.

Were ouerthrowne.

This victory put Gathelus and his folkes in hope of good successe to haue their a place for them to inhabite in, and so to end their long wandering in straunge and vncertaine places. And to the intent they might bring their purpose the more easily to passe, they found meanes by way of communication to ioyne in friendshyp with the Spanyardes, and obtayning of them a plotte where they might buylde a place for to inhabite in: shortly after they began the foundation of a Citie neare to the bankes of the Riuer called of auncient tyme Mundus, and afterwardes Bracchara.

A communication.

Gathelus buildeth the Citie Bracchara.

It chaunced after this, that the Spanyardes (perceyuing these straungers to increase further in puyssaunce, than (as they thought) stoode well with theyr securitie) sought diuerse occasions to fal at debate with them, and to make warres vpon them: But when they vnderstoode that Gathelus was as ready to defend, as they were to inuade, they eftsones fell to a communication, and perswaded with Gathelus that it should be best for him and his people, for the auoyding of variance, to remoue vnto the Northside of Spayne, lying vpon the coastes of the Cantabrian seas, nowe called Galitia (where he should finde much voyde grounde, by reason of the smal number of Inhabitants) adding that if they would so do, they would ayde them to the vttermost agaynst all such as shoulde attempt to disquiet their indeuours in any maner of wise.

A consultation

This offer Gathelus gladly accepted, and causing publike sacrifice to be celebrate in honour of the Goddes, he departed with all his people into Galitia, and there concluding a league with the inhabitants, buylded a Citie, which he named Brigantia, but after it was called Nouium, and nowe Compostella.

Gathelus left Portingale, and went into Galitia.

He builded a Citie called Brigantia, and nowe Compostella.

HEre Gathelus being intituled by the name of a king, deuiſed and ordeyned lawes for his people to liue by, that the Citty myghte not only be fenced with ſtrong walles, but alſo with good and holeſome ſtatutes and ordinaunces, the chiefeſt fortifications that may be for al Cities and Countreys. And by cauſe he would not onely haue his ſayde people to liue vnder one lawe, but alſo to be knowne and called by one name, he gaue cõmaundement that they ſhould be all called Scottiſhmen (as before is ſayde) of his wife Scota.

In continuance of time, this nation grewe to a wonderful multitude, ſo that the Spaniards doubting the worſt, determined to forſee remedie in tyme, and hereupon purpoſing vtterly to deſtroy them, got them againe to armour, and with their whole puiſſance comming vpon the Scottiſh men, gaue them a ſore battaile, though in the ende they were put to flight, the victorie remayning with the Scottiſh men, albeit not without great bloudſhed on eyther part, as the Scottiſh hyſtorie ſayth.

The Spaniardes fight with the Scots infortunately.

At length a neceſſarie peace was agreed vpon betwixt both parties, the conditions whereof were theſe: that aſwell Scottiſh men as Spaniards ſhould liue after their owne lawes, and neither of them to inuade other.

Gathelus hauing peace thus with his neighbors, ſate vpon his Marble ſtone in Bigantia, where he gaue lawes, and miniſtred iuſtice vnto his people, thereby to mainteyne them in wealth and quietneſſe.

This ſtone was in faſhion like a ſeate or Chayre, hauing ſuch a fatall deſtinie, as the Scottes ſay, following it, that whereſoeuer it ſhould be founde, there ſhoulde the Scottiſh men raigne and haue the ſupreme gouernance. Hereof it came to paſſe, that firſt in Spaine, after in Irelande, and then in Scotlande, the Kings which ruled ouer the Scottiſh men, receyued the Crowne ſitting vpon that ſtone, vntill the time of Robert the firſt king of Scotlande. The inſcription alſo of the ſtone though ingraued long time after, as ſhoulde appeare, was this:

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti quocunq; locatum

Which may be thus tranſlated:

The Scots arriue in Ireland

At their firſt arriuall there, they came into the hauen of Dundalke, where getting a lande, they firſt encamped themſelues neare vnto the ſhore, and then ſente forth certaine of their folkes to ſearch if they could learne what people inhabited in the countrey, by whom at their returne, and by ſuch as they had happened vppon and brought with them, they vnderſtoode howe there was no great number of Inhabitants in that Iſle, and that they which dwelled there were verie ſimple, ſuch I meane as liued onely by mylke and hearbes, with other the like things as the earth by nature brought forth of hir owne accorde, without mans helpe or vſe of any tyllage.

Herevpon Hiber with his brother Himecus, went not aboute with force, but by gentleneſſe to wynne thoſe people, myndyng to ioyne them in friendſhippe ſo wyth theyr Scottiſhe men, that bothe the people myghte bee made as one.

Neyther was this harde to bee done, ſithence the Inhabitauntes (perceyuing the Scottiſhe men not to goe about to harme them) came flocking in wholy about them, ſubmitting themſelues into their handes with gladneſſe.

WHEN thynges were once ſette here in a ſtaye, and that orders were gyuen howe the land ſhoulde be conuerted vnto tillage, and manured for the better bringing forth of ſuche thynges as ſerue for mans ſuſtenance, Hiber (leauing his brother in charge with the gouernaunce of all thoſe whiche were appoynted to abyde there in Irelande with the moſt part of the ſhips and reſidue of the company, ſayled backe into Spaine, where finding his father Gathelus deade, hee ſucceeded in hys place of gouernment, to the great reioycing of all the people there.

Hiber returned into Spain.

Hiber ded Gathe

This Hiber was a man of great courage, and more gyuen to the warres than his father before him, ſo that where his father contenting himſelfe with the bounds and limittes of the Countrey aſſigned him by compoſition, ſought no further (as is ſayde) to enlarge the ſame: Hiber ceaſſed not to conquere Cities and townes neare adioynyng to the borders of his ſubiectes, by reaſon whereof hys fame ſpredde ouer all thoſe parties: And in the ende conſtreyned his enimyes to ſeeke for peace, whiche hee willingly graunted: ſo that a league being concluded betwixte the Scottes and Spaniardes, the ſame toke ſuche good ſucceſſe, that within certayne yeares after, both the Nations, what by mariage and other contractes whiche they exerciſed togyther, became one: The ſucceſſion alſo of the Kings continued after Hibers deceaſſe in hys poſteritie a long ſeaſon. Amongeſt the whiche, Metellus, Hermoneus, Ptolomeus, Hibertus, and Simon Brechus, were of moſt worthie fame, as is recorded by ſuche as haue wrytten the Hyſtories of that Nation more at large.

IN the meane whyle that theſe things were thus a doing in Spaine, Himeeus being left, as is before remembred in Irelande, to haue the gouernaunce there, ruled bothe the people of Scottiſhe men, and the former Inhabitaunts, with as muche indifferencie as was poſſible: yet coulde he not ioyne them ſo in one, but that after his deceaſſe eyther of them woulde haue ſeuerall Rulers of their owne Nation to gouerne them: by reaſon whereof, falling eftſoones at diſcorde amongſt themſelues, there enſued ſharpe and cruell warres betwixte them, whiche being ended ſome tymes by truce (when bothe partyes happilye were throughlye wearyed,) they renued notwithſtanding theyr malicious ſtryfe againe, ſo ſoone as they had once recouered theyr decayed ſtrengthes, ſo that the one ſeeking the others deſtruction, they continued in great diſquiet for a long time.

These Scottiſh men being thus troubled in Irelande, finally addreſſed an Ambaſſade vnto Metellus, who as then raigned amongeſt the Scottiſhe menne in Spaine, requiring him of ayde and ſuccour againſte theyr enimyes, who went aboute wyth tothe and nayle to expell all the Scottiſhe Nation out of Irelande, which which they were like ynough to bring to paſſe, if in time there were not ſpedy remedie throughe his ayde prouided for the contrarie.

Metellus hearing theſe newes, as a man moued with a naturall zeale towarde all the Scottiſh linage, gaue care to their requeſt, ſuppoſing it ſhould be his part to defende his kinnel folke from all wrong and iniuries: immediately therefore he ſent his three ſonnes, Hermoneus, Ptolomeus, and Hibertus, with a choſen power of warriours ouer into Irelande, where vanquiſhing the enimies with fierce and cruell battailes, they ſet the Scottiſh men in ſure and quiet poſſeſſion of all their lands and liuings. This done, Ptolomeus, and Hibertus remayned there to rule and inhabite the countrey, but Hermoneus who was the eldeſt brother, returned backe againe into Spain, there to ſucceede his father when time ſhoulde ſerue thereto. After this the Scottiſhe eſtate continued many yeares in good quiet in Ireland, the people ſtill increaſing in welth and puiſſance, till proſperitie the mother of contention, ſtirred vp greadge and partialities amongſt them, whiche ſhortly would haue decayed the force of ẏ Scottiſh nation, if the auncient Lords had not prouided redreſſe in time, which was to perſwade the people to haue a king of theyr owne, who beyng partaker with none of them in their factions, might haue the abſolute gouernãce of the whole: ſo that by common cõſent they ſent into Spaine for one Simon Brek, whoſe name was right famous amongſt them in that ſeaſon, both aſwel for that hee was lineally deſcended of the bloud royall, as alſo for that he had ſhewed many proues of his noble valiancie in ſundrie aſſayres and buſineſſe.

This Simõ being glad of theſe tidings, ſayled quickly into Irelande, and brought thither with him amongſt other princely iewels and regall monuments, the fatal ſtone of marble, wherein he cauſed himſelfe to be crowned, in token of his full poſſeſſion, and eſtabliſhment ouer that kingdom.

Brechus beeyng thus crowned, was ẏ firſt king ẏ raigned ouer the Scottiſh men in Irelande, who began his raigne there, in the yeere from the creation of the worlde, 3270: which tyme by maiſter Harlons account is after the floud, 6161: from the firſt buylding of Rome, 55. after the entrie of Brutus into Brytaine, 870. and before the Incarnation of our Sauiour, 697.

And hauing ruled his ſubiects with great iuſtice by the ſpace of .xl. yeres or therabout, he died, after whoſe deceaſſe ſucceeded Fandufus, who had iſſue Ethion, and he begat Glaucus, whiche Glaucus begat Noitafilus, the father of Rothſay: all of them raigned ſucceſſiuely ouer the Scotiſh men in Irelande, as in the deſcription of that land more plainly may appeare. Fandufus.

This Rothſay (perceyuing the Scottiſh nation encreaſed to a greater multitude in Ireland than the country was wel able to ſuſtaine) tranſported ouer certaine numbers of them into the Iles auncientlie called Ebonides, afterwards Hebrides, but now by the Scottes, the weſtern Iles, becauſe they lie on the weſt halfe of Scotlande: and there they placed them to inhabite. He named alſo that Iſle which he firſt beganne to poſſeſſe, Rothſay, after his owne name. Which tranſlation of theſe Scottiſh men into thoſe Iles was 133. yeares after the coronation of Brechus. Rothſay. The Scottes ſerie ouer into the weſterne Iſles. They inhabite the Iſle of Rothſay.

This Rothſay had not beene long in thoſe Iles, but that hearing of his fathers deceaſſe, he returned into Irelande to ſucceede in his place. Where the Scottiſh men perceyuing the fertilitie of the Iles, and how the ſame ſerued wel for the breeding of cattel, became ſo deſirous to inhabite the ſame, that they went ouer thither dayly in greate numbers, with their wiues, children, and whole families, ſo that within a ſhorte time, they multiplied in ſuch wiſe, that the Iles were not large ynough to finde them ſuſtenance, by reaſon wherof diuerſe companies of them got them ouer into the maine lande of the North part of this our Bryttaine, called as then Albion, where they firſt inhabited a waſte and deſert portion thereof, lying towarde the weſt, ouer againſt the forerememberd Iles, by them alreadie inhabited. The Scottes inhabite the maine lande of Scotlande.

That part where they firſt beganne to ſettle themſelues, they named Argathelia, after the name of their firſt Captain and guide Gathelus, but the Inhabitantes at this day call it Argyle. They inhabite the country called Arguile.

At their firſt comming becauſe they perceyued they coulde not liue without lawes and ciuil gouernment they ſeuered themſelues into tribes, or as it were into hundreds, or weapentakes, euery of the ſame hauing a ſpeciall gouernour to ſee their lawes miniſtred, and iuſtice maintayned: whiche gouernours were had in ſuche reuerence, that they were as much afrayde to ſweare by the name of any one of them, as they were by the Goddes. They make lawes and ordinances. Gouernours had in reuerence.

In this ſtate they continued many a yeare, encreaſing in proceſſe of time vnto a mightie nation, and liued in good reſt without trouble of warres or inuaſion made vpon them by any forraine enimie. They liue in peace.

In this meane time alſo, the Pictes, whiche were a certain people of Germanie, as moſt writers do agree, came and ſet foote alſo in another The Pictes came into Scotland out of Germanie.

part of Brytayne, which nowe is comprehended likewiſe within Scotlande.

Some ſay that they came forth of the hyther part of Scithia, and other there be whiche holde opinion, that they diſcended of the people named in olde time Agathirſi, whiche inhabited in a part of Sarmatia, & were called Pictes, becauſe they vſed to paynt and colour theyr faces, or as ſome ſuppoſe, for that they vſed gay apparell of diuerſe and ſundrie colours: but the ſame wryters generally confeſſe, that they firſt came into Germanie or hyther Scithia (that is to meane Denmarke) many yeares before they entred into Brytaine.

Pictes came out of Denmarke.

Truth it is that they firſt came out of Germanie, into the Iſles of Orkeney, and there inhabiting for a ſeaſon, ferryed ouer into Cathenele, whereof it came to paſſe, that the ſtreyte there at this preſent is called Pictland firth: and ſo in continuance of time encreaſing in number, they paſſed further into the lande, and got poſſeſſion of Roſſe, Murray land, Merne, and Angus, and after that, entring into Fife, and Lowthian, they droue ſuch Brytaynes from thence as inhabited there before, whiche were but a ſimple kinde of people, as thoſe that applyed nothing but onely nouriſhing and breeding of cattaile.

The Pictes came firſt into Orkney, chaunging their ſeates came into the maine lande of Scotlande, Pictlande, Firth.

Theſe Pictes, as by conference of tymes may appeare, entred firſt into Scotlande, aboute the yeare after the creation of the worlde 3633, and being once ariued, they began to erect and builde certaine fortes, wherein they might defend themſelues, if any force of enimies ſhoulde chaunce to put them vnto ſuch ſhiftes: but perceyuing they could not continue any time without wiues to maintayne their ſtock and progenie by bringing forth iſſue, they thought it expedient to require of the Scottiſhe men ſome number of women to marrie with, that thereby a ſure alliance might be had betwixt both nations, and that if neede required, they might the better defende them from their common enimies the Brytaynes, whome they knewe woulde be lothe to ſee the encreaſe of eyther Scottes or Pictes, as thoſe that were ſtraungers to them, and vſurpers vpon theyr confines.

The Pictes make ſtrong holdes.

The Pictes require wome of the Sottes.

This requeſt was graunted, and a full league ratifyed betwixt the Scottiſhe men, and Pictes, with couenauntes, that neither of them ſhoulde ſeeke to vſurpe anye peece of that whiche the other helde, but content themſelues wyth theyr owne marches. And further, hee that attempted to wrong the one, ſhoulde bee accompted an enimie to bothe: and againſte whome they ſhoulde bee readie to ioyne theyr powers in eyther others defence.

A league made.

Alſo it was accorded, that if at any tyme it were doubtfull who ought to ſucceede in the gouernment of the Pictiſhe kingdome, ſome one diſcended of thoſe Scottiſh women ſhould be admitted to the throne.

The ſucceſsion of the gouernment.

This allyaunce was euen at the firſt miſlyked of the Brytaynes, who doubted that if theſe two Nations ſhoulde once bee ioyned inſeparatly togyther, they might in tyme to come, encreaſe to greater puiſſaunce than ſhould ſtand well with the ſuretie of their eſtate. Therefore ſtudying howe to preuent that daunger, they thought the readyeſt meane to deſtroy both thoſe Nations was (if they might bring it to paſſe) to ſette them firſte togither by the eares amongeſt themſelues, that afterwardes when their powers were by ſuche meanes ſore abated, they might the more eaſily ſubdue them at their pleaſures.

Their alliance miſliked.

Diſſention, preſent deſtroyer.

This deuiſe the Brytaynes kept ſecrete for a time, till occaſion ſerued to worke theyr intent. In whiche meane while the affinitie betwixt the Scottes and Pictes increaſed to the welth of both nations, and for the iſſue ſake great loue and friendſhippe was mainteyned amongſt them: the Pictes applyed themſelues to tylling the grounde, and buylding of fortreſſes: the Scottes ſette all their delighte in hunting and fowling, vſing about the ſame to go armed in Jackes and light iſſternes with bowe and arrowes, no otherwyſe than if it had beene in open warre: For in this exerciſe they placed all the hope of the defence of their poſſeſſions, lands, and liberties.

The Pictes good husbandmen.

The Scottes giuen to hunting and fowling. Good boys.

At length, the Brytaynes perceyuing happily ſome grudge or enuie to bee entred amongſt them, they ſende ſolemne Ambaſſadours vnto the Pictes, declaring that it were more honourable for them to ioyne in league with the Brytaynes, than with the Scottes: whiche Brytaynes were knowne to bee right famous, both in peace and warre, and inhabited a Countrey moſt fruitefull and replenyſhed with all commodities neceſſarie, hauing therein riche mynes of diuerſe kindes of mettall, where the Scottes being a rude Nation, wilde and ſauage, inhabited a barraine Countrey, full of roughe and fruitleſſe mountaynes, delyting therto in nothing but in the ſlaughter of men and beaſtes: And hereunto they added that, (whiche moſt moued the Pictes) howe it was foretolde by prophecies, that the Scottes through treaſon ſhoulde vtterly in time to come extinguiſhe and deſtroye all the Pictiſhe bloudde, whiche perſwaſions induced the Pictes at the laſt, to make a league with the Brytaynes, who promiſed their ayde at all tymes in whatſoeuer enterpriſe the Pictes ſhoulde take in hande againſt the Scottes, and as often as occaſion ſhould require.

This

Thys league thus beeyng confirmed wyth the Brytaynes, encouraged the Pictes so, that they sought dayly howe to pyke quarelles, and fall out with the Scottishe men: whereuppon making Proclamation that no Scottish man shoulde enter into their bozders, upon paine of death: some suche as they toke within the same, they cruelly slue, other they ransomed at excessiue summes: whereupon the Scottes beeing kyndled with iust displeasure, on the other side, requyted them with the like, euer as they caught any of the sayd Picts by hap or otherwise amongs them or in their walkes.

The one nation seeking thus to bee reuenged of the other, there ensued open warre betwyxte them: whereupon the Scottishe men, to the ende they mighte bee the better able to maintaine their quarell, sent ouer their Ambassadours unto their kinnesmen in Irelande, requyring them of ayde in that present daunger, as hauing nowe not onely warres with the Pictes, but also wyth the Brytaynes, who mynded nothing, but the vtter destruction of them and their linage, except speedie remedie were founde. And for that they saw it needefull, to haue one onely head and gouernor, they made sute also to haue some captayne of honour wyth them into Albion, unto whome as unto their king they woulde submyt themselues.

In that season amongest the Irish Scottishe men, there raigned a king named Ferguhardus, who inclyning to the petition of the Brytishe Scots, caused an huge army forthwith to be leuied, & thereto he appoynted his owne sonne Fergusius to be generall of the same, a worthie yong gētleman, and an expert warriour: whom he sent ouer with this puissant cōpany, with such speede as was possible. He had also with him the marble stone, that he might conceyue the better hope to raigne there as a king, bycause he went forth unto such a daungerous warre.

Such also as went with him in this iourney, had theyr wyues, their children, and all theyr substance with them, as the maner of the nation then was, when they went forth into any foreyn countrey.

Nowe it came to passe that this Fergusius was no sooner come into Albion amongest the Scottishe men there, but that in a Parliament called and assembled in Argile for the purpose, they first consulted after what sort they myghte mainteyne themselues against their enimies, and what order for gouernment shoulde be obserued amongst them: where finally for auoyding of such inconueniences, as might rise through many gouernours, they decreed to chose onely one, whom in all things as their king and heade, they would from thencefoorth follow and obey.

Fergusius the first king in Scotlande.

Fergusius.

But bicause there was none thought so meete to beare that office, as Fergusius, and that the chaire of hope was also broughte wyth him: they cōcluded by whole cōsent to commit that charge unto him, & so to the great reioysing of the people, he was placed upon his marble stone, and crowned king, being the first of the Scottish nation that euer ruled in Albion as absolute gouernour, who began his raign in the yeare after the creation of the worlde 3640, which is (as Harison sayth in his Chronologie) before the incarnation of our Sauiour 327. after the buylding of Rome 420. and after the entring of Brutus into Brytayne 790.

The kingdome of the Scottishe men beeing thus begunne in Albion, Fergusius toke upon him to rule as king, making prouision on al sides to resist his enimies: who whylest these things were a doing in Argile, had assembled theyr powers: unto whome also the Brytaynes had ioyned themselues, and were now entred into the Scottish bozders.

The Brytaines and Pictes agaynst the Scottes.

Fergus hauing hereof knowledge, speedily got togyther hys people, and came wyth Banners displayed to encounter hys enimyes. In king Fergusis Banner, there was a redde Lion portrayed rampant, wyth hys tayle folden towardes his backe, as thoughe hee dyd beate the same, whiche is the maner of them, when they bee mooued to displeasure.

The kings Banner with a Lion gueles in it.

Fergus was the first that bare this cognisance in Albion, which euer sithence hath bene borne by those Kings that haue successiuely raigned after him there.

Both the armies were nowe come within ſight of other, and readie to haue giuen the onſet, when there went a murmuring amongeſt the Pictes, that their companions the Brytaynes were gotten to a hyll a little beſide them, minding to ſee the ende of the battell before they did ſturre, and then if occaſion ſerued (as theyr hope was it ſhoulde) they purpoſed to fall vpon both partyes, as well Pictes as Scottes, and ſo to deſtroy them both, the vanquiſhers togyther with the vanquiſhed, as they founde them out of aray in following the chaſe.

The Brytayns are about to deceyue the Pictes.

The like repoꝛt was brought vnto Fergus, by one that fled vnto his ſyde from the enimies campe, touching this treaſon of the Brytaynes, conſpiring the extermination of both the people. By reaſon whereof, eyther parte being put in feare of that whiche might enſue through the malicious purpoſe of the Brytaynes, they kept their tents certaine dayes togither without making any haſte to battayle. And in the meane while Fergus ſent a meſſenger vnto the King of the Pictes, requyring him to come to a communication before they ſhould fight, for that he had to informe him of ſuch matters as pertayned no leſſe to the ſafegarde and preſeruation of the Pictes, than of his owne people the Scottes.

Treaſon reuealed vnto Fergus.

Fergus ſendeth to the Pictes.

The king of the Pictes willingly gaue eare to this meſſage, and ſo a little beſide both the armies ſtanding in battayle array, the two kings accompanied with a fewe of their nobles mette togither, where in the ende the danger in whiche they both ſtoode, beeing plainly diſcloſed, and throughly wayed, they condiſcended to haue a further treatie of peace, whiche the King of the Pictes alledged hee might not conclude without the publike conſent of his ſubiects, and therfore he appoynted on the day following to returne to the ſame place againe, there to giue a reſolute anſwere, after he had vnderſtoode the mindes of his lords and commons in the ſame.

A peace to be concluded.

The king of the Pictes called his counſaile and commons.

Herevpon therfore returning to his campe, he called his counſaile afore him, declaring the ſubſtaunce of the communication which had bene betwixt king Fergus and him, whiche was in effect tending to this ende. Firſt conſydering the preſent deuiſes of the Brytaynes, there was nothing more expedient than a peace to be agreed vpon, as well for the commoditie of the Pictes, as Scottes, if they would yeeld withall to auoid the imminent perill of their vtter ruine and common deſtruction intended by the Brytaynes.

Herevpō alſo he required their aduiſe what they thought good to be don: declaring that according as they counſayled him he would worke therin.

Diuerſe heads, diuerſe opinions.

This matter being thus propoſed, as there were diuerſe heades, ſo were there ſundrie opinions. Some iudged that in no wiſe they coulde enter friendſhip againe with the Scottes, who had ſo cruelly ſlaine and murthered a great number of the Pictiſh nation: and had ſhewed ſuch tokens of a beaſtlyke furious nature, that there was no hope to continue long in amitie with ſuche a raging kind of people: & hereto they held that it was not vnknowne how the prophecie went that the Scots ſhoulde in the ende deſtroy all the Pictiſh progenie. So that it were wiſdom to keepe their power vnder ſo lōg as was poſſible, & not to encreaſe the ſame by ioyning with thē in frendſhip. A Prophee

Other were of a contrarie minde, eſteeming that in no wiſe the Scottiſh mens friendſhippe ought to be refuſed, vnleſſe they would determin to ſeeke newe dwellings in ſome other forrayne parties, ſith the Brytaines would not fayle, but vpon occaſion take what vantage they could to expulſe them both, aſwel Scottes as Pictes, out of the countreys nowe by them poſſeſſed. And as for that, which was alledged touching the prophecie, if the Goddes had ſo determined, then might no policie of man preuent it: and if there were no ſuch thing appointed by the ſame gods, what follye then were it to caſt ſuche dreadfull doubtes where no cauſe was. Ouer and beſides this, they had taken them wiues of the Scottiſh nation, and therby ingrafted their ſeede (the hope of their poſteritie) in that ſtock, which is the neareſt meane and forcibleſt occaſion to nouriſhe friendſhip, that is or may be amongſt people deuiſed: therefore it ſhould not be onely profitable but neceſſary alſo, to haue peace with the Scots, to renue againe with them the former league to the perpetual ſtrengthning and aduancement of both the nations.

The Pictes admoniſhed by their wiues to peace.

Whileſt the Picts were thus in debating the matter, their wiues alſo being preſent there in the armie, came in amongeſt them with their children, & in moſt lamentable wiſe beſought their huſbands to haue pitie vpon them, in their ſo ſorowfull caſe, and not to ſuffer thtir handes to be defiled with vnnaturall murther, ſithe it were leſſe diſcōfort to them with their ſillie little ones to die any kynd of death whatſoeuer it were, rather than to behold theyr huſbands with their fathers, their brethren, and other kinneſfolke ioyne togyther in battaile, and there to kill one another wythout all mercie and compaſſion.

The Picte moued to pitie.

The Nobles and Gentlemen of the Pictes hearing the cries of theſe women, and being nowe ſomewhat moued to pitie, conſented at laſte to haue peace with the Scottiſh men, and to renew againe the olde league that was heretofore betweene them: And for mutuall iniuries heretofore committed, that there ſhould be had a mutuall recōpence according as might ſtande with equitie & reaſon. So that where the Bryttains had bene the chiefe procurers of all that miſchiefe and diſcorde betwixt them, in hope therby to deſtroy bothe the parties, they ſhould now be reputed from henceforth as cõmon enimies to them both: as for all other articles or conditions of agreement, it was ordeined that their king ſhould do therein as vnto him might ſeeme good.

and

In the morning therefore, as was appointed, the king of Pictes meeting with king Fergus, declared what his ſubiectes were agreed vpon: & further opening his mind touching the eſtabliſhment of the peace, thought it conuenient to haue a day of meeting betwixt them to ratify the ſame. Wherwith Fergus being well contented & glad that through his motion a peace ſhould thus enſue, a day was appointed betwixt them and kept accordingly, ſo that comming together, the auncient league was in all poynts renewed, with ſome conditions added therto, auaylable as was thought, for the ſtronger confirmation therof.

Before this, & after the firſt meeting betwixt the Scottes and Pictes, I meane ſo ſone as the Brytains had vnderſtanding of this agreement, they had no luſt to tarie longer in the fielde, but rayſing their power, they departed their wayes homewardes, doubting leaſt the ſayd agreement might turne finally to their gayne.

The Pictes and Scottiſh men alſo after they had thus fully ratified the peace and league betwixt them, brake vp their campes, euery man repayring to the place of his abode.

The kyng alſo of the Bryttaines named Coil (ſoiourning in that ſeaſon neare aboute Yorke,) being informed of this ſodeyne renouation of the league betwixt the Scottiſh men and Pictes, was nothing ioyfull of the newes: for he doubted leaſt in time to come their confederacie might be occaſion of their further increaſing in puiſſance, and after that ſome new occaſion of his trouble. Wherefore ſtudying by what wayes and meanes he might beſt prouide remedie for ſuche inconueniences as might enſue, he attempted nothing openly for the ſpace of two yeares, but onely watched his time, to the ende that if he might in that ſeaſon chaunce (through the inſolent courage of eyther nation) to eſpie any occaſiõ ſeruiſeable for his turne, he might ſet vpon and be a plague vnto them bothe.

At length alſo he cauſed his ſubiectes (ſuch I meane as bordered neare to the marches of both the people) to fetche prayes and booties out of the Pictiſh confines. So that when the Pictes ſent thither with requeſt to haue reſtitution made, it was by and by aunſwered that the Scottes had done ſuch treſpaſſes, (being a people inured vnto ſuch feates by nature,) and not the Bryttaines, who were nothing guilty in that kind of matter: & thus would the Bryttans do in like ſort when they had robbed the Scots, ſo that with ſuch iniurious diſſimulation, aſwel Scots as Pictes being not a litle offended, they entred ſone after into the Bryttiſh confines, robbing & ſpoyling the ſame, as their cuſtome is, with al maner of cruelties. When Coil of Bryttaine had notice of theſe doings, he toke grieuous indignation thereat, & therupon determined to proue whether he might with open warres atchieue his purpoſe, which he could not bring to paſs by his former cloked practiſe. And herwith aſſembling an army, he entred into the Scottiſh borders lying towards the Iriſh ſeas, waſting with fire & ſworde whatſoeuer he founde in his wayes, till he came euen to the riuer of Dune, where encampyng himſelfe vpon the bankes therof, he ſent forth companies of his Souldiers to deſtroy the countrey, and to bring in all ſuche priſoners as they ſhould lay handes vpon. But in the meane tyme, and ſo ſone as Fergus heard of the approche of the Bryttons, he cauſed all the people in the countrey to gette them with their goodes and cattayles vnto the Mountaines, except ſuche as were able to beare armure: whom he appoynted to attend vpon him, to defende the countrey as occaſion ſerued. Wherof Coil hauing knowledge brought by an eſpiall, he ſent forth about fiue thouſand nimble men, and ſuch as had bene vſed to clyme craggie hilles, to go before and winne the paſſages, purpoſing the next day to follow himſelfe with the whole army. But the Scottiſhmen and Pictes being now aſſembled togither, and certified hereof alſo by their ſpies, they firſt fell in conſultation what they were beſt to do: & in the ende agreed that the ſame night they ſhoulde ſette vpon the Bryttiſhe camp: Fergus with his Scottiſhmen on the one ſide, and the kyng of the Pictes on the other: ſo that in the dead of the night the Scottiſh men killyng the watche, were entered into the Brittiſhe campe, ere Coil had knowledge of any ſuch thing: whereby it came to paſſe that whileſt the Bryttaines (awaked with the noyſe) drew vnto that parte where the Alarme roſe, to beate backe the Scottes, the Pictes commyng ouer the riuer of Dune, by a certayne blinde fourde, aſſayled them on the backes, to the great confuſion of the whole armie, by reaſon wherof the Bryttaines (ſeyng none other remedie but to ſaue themſelues by flight,) turned their backes and fled, in whiche turmoyle they were troden downe and fell by heapes one vpon an other and were not able to helpe themſelues, nor yet to make ſhifte to auoyde the handes of their aduerſaries. In this buſineſſe alſo Coil himſelfe chaunced to be oppreſſed amongſt the reſt, ſo that he was founde dead in the ſearche of ſuch as were ſlayne, & after ſolemnly buried according to his eſtate in Troynouant, leauing the kingdom vnto his ſonne Sicellius, who with his his mother Mertia gouerned the ſame together by the ſpace of many yeares.

Such Brytains alſo as eſcaped out of theyr enimies handes, gote them togither in the nexte morning, & perceyuing what loſſe they had ſuſteyned not only by the death of their Prince, but alſo in the ſlaughter of a greate parte of theyr whole armie, ſent an Herault vnto the Scottes & Pictes to require a peace, which though the moſt part of the people were not in will to haue cõſented vnto, yet perſwaded in the end by their Princes, they were contented to yeeld thereto: ſo that a generall peace was concluded, and ſpeedily publiſhed betwixt them.

Peace concluded.

Immediatly herevpon the Pictes with theyr part of the ſpoile gotten at this iourney departed to their homes, & Fergus returned into Argile: where ſtudying daily for the quiet aduancement of the Scottiſh cõmune wealth, he called a parliament of his nobles, & firſt declaring to the aſſembly how much bound they were to the Gods for giuing them this victory ouer ſo puiſſant enimies as the Brytains were, he exhorted them to liue in friendly concord amongſt themſelues, and to abſtaine frõ violating the leagues, now concluded, aſwell with the Brytains, as before hand with the Pictes.

A parliament.

An exhortation vnto quietneſſe and peace.

Alſo for the auoyding of enuious contention, and for the better aſſurance of euery mans eſtate, he iudged it neceſſary to haue a partition made of al the landes belonging to the Scottiſh dominion. For before they occupied the whole as in commune, without knowing to whom this peece or that did belong. Whiche politike aduiſe of Fergus, the Scottiſh men praiſed moſt highly, promiſing not onely to follow his counſayle herein, in all that he ſhoulde wiſhe, but alſo in all that he ſhould otherwiſe commaunde.

The lande is parted.

Wherupon ſhortly after there were choſen by his aduiſe. xij. auncient perſonages, men of good conſcience & great experience: which were apointed to be Surueyours of the whole countrey, & to deuide the ſame as neare as they coulde into a ſet number of equal portions, (but with this cõſideration, that according as the fruitfulneſſe or barraynneſſe of the ſoyle required, ſo they ſhould enlarge or diminiſh the circuite of their bounds.) Whẽ they had vewed the countrey, & according to their commiſſion, ſeuered forth the ſame into parts, they returned into Argile where Fergus then ſoiourned, & there in his preſence, the names of al his noble men that were reputed as Gouernours were put in lottes, euery of them to haue ſuch parte of the realme for his owne, as ſhoulde fall to him by good lucke and preſent happe.

Men diuide the lande into portions.

The gouernment is giuen vnto the nobles by lottes.

By this meanes eche of them being placed as his chaũce fell, they inhabited their quarters with ſuch people as they had the leading of, ſo that afterwardes the countreys toke theyr names of thoſe the firſt Gouernours: which names for the more parte (being a little chaunged) remayne amongſt them euen vnto this day.

Fergus hauing thus without occaſion of enuie deuided his countrey amongſt his nobles and ſubiects, ſtudied furthermore to deuiſe lawes for the mayntenaunce of commune quiet amongſt them. And therfore amongſt other ordinances he made ſtatutes againſt murder, roberies, burning of houſes, and ſpecially againſt theefte.

Statutes and lawes are made.

He buylded alſo the caſtell of Berigoniũ in Loughquhabre on the weſte ſide of Albion, ouer againſt the weſterne Iſles, where he appoynted a courte to be kept for the adminiſtration of iuſtice: that both the Albion Scots, and alſo thoſe of the ſame Iſles might haue their acceſſe and reſorte thyther for redreſſe of wrongs, and endyng of all controuerſies. The reſidue of his life, he paſſed in reſte and peace with his neyghbours the Pictes and Brytaines, endeuouring by all meanes, to knit and couple the hartes of his ſubiectes in one friendly bande of inwarde loue and amitie.

A place apointed for iuſtice.

Finally, ſayling afterwarde into Irelande to be arbitratour in a matter of variance betwixte the Nobles of that lande, as he returned homewardes, by force of tempeſt, the ſhippe wherein he was embarqued, was dryuen vpon a rocke, where he periſhed, after he had raygned as kyng amongſt the Scottiſh men in Albion aboute xxv. yeares. The rocke where he was thus caſt away, hath bene euer ſithence called Rocke Fergus, after his name.

Fergus went into Ireland, and in his turne was drowned.

Rocke Fergus, otherwiſe Knock Fergus.

In the ſame ſeaſon there raygned amongſt the Brytains one Elanius, named by Hector Boetius Eldadus, and amongſt the Pictes one Cruthneus Camelonus, that buylded a famous Citie, vpon the banke of the riuer called Carone, as the Scottiſh wryters affirme, appointyng it to be the chiefe Citie of all the Pictiſhe kyngdome, where in times paſte there was a fayre commodious hauen apt to herbrough ſhippes in at all ſeaſons, but now it is damned vp in ſuche ſorte, that vnneath there appeareth any token where that hauen was: and the citie it ſelfe was finally ſubuerted by Kenneth kyng of Scotland, as after ſhall appeare.

Eſdadus.

Cruthneus Camelonus.

This citie the Scottiſhe wryters take to be Camelodunum of the which there is ſo mention made in the Romaine writers: but verily hetherto they do grossely erre.

The forenamed Cruthneus buylded alſo the Towne of Igneda, afterwardes called Edynbrough, of Ethus kyng of the Pictes, the caſtell was named, the caſtell of Maydens, for that the daughters of the Pictiſhe kings, were there kept vnder ſtrayte cuſtodie, appoynted to learne to ſow and worke, till they came to yeares of mariage.

Igneda now called Edynbrough.

The caſtell of maydens.

But nowe to returne to the Scottiſh men. After the death of Fergus, the Nobles of the Realme Realme aſſembled togyther, to take councell whom they might chooſe to ſucceede in his place. Many of them in reſpect of the highe benefites whiche theyr nation had receyued by the politike gouernment of kyng Ferguſe, would not in any wiſe that his ſonnes, though young of yeares, ſhould be forgotten, but that accozding to reaſon & equitie, the eldeſt of them ſhould be elected, ſith they might not otherwiſe deliuer themſelues of the note of ingratitude towards his father, vnto whom they were more bounde than with young might well be expreſſed.

Other hauing a ſpeciall regarde to the quiet of theyr common wealth, doubted leaſt if they crowned a chylde to theyr kyng during his minoritie, it coulde not be, but that there ſhoulde follow ſtryfe, enuie, and contention, for the gouernaunce of his perſon and realme amongſt the Nobles, and that in ſuche wiſe, as the people being diuided into ſundrie factions, the due adminiſtration of iuſtice ſhoulde be neglected, the Nobles bearing and bolſtering vp all kindes of iniuries done or committed by any of their partakers.

And though it might ſo happen that they agreed vppon one ſpeciall gouernour, as reaſon was they ſhoulde, yet ſhoulde he ſeeke to aduaunce his kinſfolkes more than reaſon happely required, and peraduenture do things otherwaies muche diſpleaſant to no ſmall number of them, by that his priuate authoritie.

And againe the King ſhoulde no ſooner come to yeares of any diſcretion, but one or other woulde put him in minde to take vpon him to rule the whole himſelfe, before he vnderſtode what charge he had in hande: and by reaſon of his fraple youth he lightly woulde not followe the councell of any, but ſuche as conſented vnto him in his ſenſuall luſtes and inordinate fanſies, whiche commonly raygne in ſuche Princes as take vppon them gouernaunce of realmes before they knowe (through wante of ſufficient yeares) how to gouerne themſelues.

For theſe and the like conſiderations, alleaged by ſome of no ſmal authoritie amongſt them, it was agreed in the ende, that one Feritharis the brother of the late deceaſſed Ferguſe ſhoulde ſhoulde be crowned King and haue the gouernance of the Realme during his life: and herewith in the meane time to ſee his Nephewes king Ferguſe his ſonnes brought vp in princely nurture and diſcipline, as appertayned to the Sonnes of a king: that after his deceaſſe, if he liued till any of them were come to rype yeares, they might ſucceede him in the eſtate and kingdome.

This ordinance alſo they decreed to be obſerued as a lawe from thence forth euer after, that if the king died leauing no iſſue, but ſuche as were vnder age to ſucceede him, then ſhoulde one of his neareſt Couſins, ſuch as was thought moſte meete to occupie the rome, be choſen to raigne as king during his life, and after his deceaſſe the crowne to reuerte vnto his predeceſſors iſſue without controuerſie, if the ſame were ones growne vp to lawfull age.

By this meanes then were children excluded from obtayning the crowne, leaſt the publike libertie of the realme might chaunce to be put in daunger. But yet was it afterwardes perceyued that this deuiſe for chooſing of kings, miniſtred occaſion ſometimes to the vncle to ſeeke the deſtruction of the Nephew, and likewiſe to the Nephew to procure the diſpatche of the vncle and vncles Sonnes, with the committing of many haynous murders of right worthie princes, to the no ſmall daunger of ouerthrowing the whole ſtate of the commune wealth, ſo that finally that ordinance was clearly abrogated, as you ſhall heare hereafter.

The chooſing of kings was not alowed.

Feritharis.

But nowe to my purpoſe. After Feritharis with the full conſente of al the people was thus elected king, hee was inthronized with all ſolempnities in receiuing his kingly ornamẽts, as his two edged ſwoord, his Scepter royal, & his crown of gold faſhioned in forme of a rampire made for defence of a towne or fortreſſe, ſignifying that hee toke vppon him to preſerue the libertie of his countrey to ſee offendours duely puniſhed, and the execution of lawes with equall iuſtice truely miniſtred.

A two edged ſword.

Theſe ornamentes of inueſture remayned vnto the Scottiſhe kings, without being in any point chaunged, till the dayes of Achaius kyng of Scotlande, who eſtabliſhing a perpetuall league with Charles the greate Emperour and king of Fraunce, to endure for euer betwixte the Scottes and French menne, added vnto the crowne foure Flowers de Lyces together with foure croſſelettes deuided in ſunder by equall ſpaces, riſing ſomewhat higher than the Flowers de Lyces, that thereby the obſeruing of the Chriſtian Religion and ſincere faithe, maynteined by the Scottiſhe nation, might be the more euident to all men that beheld it.

The crowne chaunged.

But now as touching Feritharis, ſhortly after he was thus inueſted kyng, he came to an enterueiw with the king of the Pictes, where many things

The league with the Picts confirmed.

The league with the Picts confirmed.

things being communed of, touching the wealth of bothe nations, the league was in solempne wise confirmed, and suche punished as had done any thing sounding to the breache of the same.

After this, beyng returned home, he ordered himselfe in the administration of his charge very vprightly, without giuyng iust occasion vnto any to finde himself grieued: and thus continued he certaine yeares in such loue of all the estates of the realme, that afterwards when his Nephewe Ferlegus the eldest sonne of king Ferguse, beyng nowe come to full age, through instigation of some insolent persons, and such as by alteration hoped for aduauncement, required contrary to the ordinance before established, to haue of him the crowne: the mater was taken in such ill part, that where before the same Ferlegus was highly beloued and honored of all the people, they were now ready (if Feritharis had not with authoritie and gentle perswasions stayed them) to haue torne him all to peeces: but although their rage was somwhat appeased by Feritharis as is sayd, yet would they not be pacified thoroughly, till that all such as had bene of councell with him in that practise, had suffred death, and new gouernours appointed to haue the ouersight of him.

Feritharis lyued not passing a three moneths after this businesse, but died sodenly in the night, the trueth not beyng knowen whether by natural death, or through treason of Ferlegus and certaine of his complices, (whereof there was no small suspition raysed) for that he togither with them found meanes to flee first to the Pictes, and after to the Brytains, were he passed the residue of his lyfe in great shame and ignominie.

Feritharis suddainly died.

Ferlegus exiled.

Feritharis beyng thus dead in the .xv. yeare of his reygne, the Nobles assembled togither for the election of a new king, and in the end they agreed vpon Mainus the younger sonne of king Ferguse, as then beyng about .xxiiij. yeares of age.

An election of a new king.

Mainus.

THys Mainus beyng of contrarie conditiõs to his brother Ferlegus, was thus aduãced to the crown by the whole cõsent of the Nobles & cõmons, who yet kept in freshe memorie the noble gouernement of his father Ferguse. He therfore studying to answeare the peoples expectation in following his sayde fathers worthie actes, mainteyned iustice in all points without sufferyng any bearing or bolstering of wrong. If there were any controuersie risen betwixt neyghbour and neighbour within one hundred or hundrede, he willed that the same might be taken vp and ended amongst them at home by order of some authorized courte there. But if the mater were of such importãce as that it could not well be decided wiihout auctoritie of some higher courte, he would then haue the hearing thereof himselfe, at such time as he vsed euery yeare once to haue a publyke assemblie out of al partes of his realme, to conferre togither for such purposes: At what time also suche as were notorious offenders, were arraigned and punished by death or otherwise, accordyng to the faulte which they earst had cõmitted. Also for the more quiet of his subiects he cõfirmed the ancient league with the Pictes, theyr king named Chyrinus, requiring the same by his ambassadours sent vnto him. Moreouer this Mainus vpõ a religious deuotion towarde the Goddes, hauing an assured beliefe, that without their fauours al worldly policies were but vayne, deuised sundry new ceremonies to be added vnto the olde: and also caused certaine places in sundrie partes of his dominions to be appoynted out, and compassed about with great huge stones round lyke a ring: but towardes the South was one mightie stone farre greater than all the rest, pitched vp in maner of an aulter, wheron their priests might make their sacrifices in honour of their Goddes.

Great matters determined by the king.

Mainus confirmed the league with the Pictes.

Mainus about his religion.

In witnesse of the thing there remayneth vnto this day certaine of those greate stones standing rounde ring wise, which places are called by the cõmon people the old chapels of the Gods. I mã wold maruel by what shift, policy or strẽgth such mightie stones were raysed in that maner.

Amongst other the Goddes also, whiche the Scottishmen had in most reuerence, Diana was chiefe, whom they accompted as their peculiar patronesse, for that she was taken to be the Goddesse of hunting, wherein consisted their chiefest exercise, passtime and delite.

Unto hyr therefore he inſtituted monethly ſacrifice, by reaſon wherof this vſe was take vp, that ſo ſone as any of them got ſight of the new Mone nexte after hyr chaunge, he ſaluted hyr with certaine prayers or ſalutations moſt reuerently. Whiche cuſtome endured amongſt them many hundred yeares after.

Mainus did alſo appoint forth liuings for the Prieſts to be taken of ſuche ſacrifice as was offered vp to the Goddes.

Finally, when he had thus inſtructed his people in lawes and ordinances, aſwel touching the religious ſeruice of the Goddes, as alſo for politike gouernment of his countrey, he ended his life, after he had raigned about .xxix. yeares: leauing the eſtate to his ſonne Doruadille, Eliduerus raygning the ſame time in Brytaine, and Thaara amongſt the Pictes.

Doruadille.

Doruadille beyng crowned king of the Scottes, eſtabliſhed a newe league with the Brytaines by ſending his Imbaſſadours vnto them: and with the Pictes hee renewed and confirmed the auncient aliaunce. Doruadille a louer of peace.

He ſet all his pleaſure on Hunting and keeping of hounds and greyhoundes, ordayning that euery houſeholder ſhoulde finde him two houndes and one greyhounde. Doruadill had pleaſure in hunting.

If a hunter chaunced in following the game, to loſe an eye or a limme, ſo that he were not able to helpe himſelfe after that time, he made a ſtatute that he ſhould be found of the common treaſory.

He that killed a Wolf ſhould haue an oxe for his paines. This beaſt in deede the Scottiſh men euen from the beginning vſed to purſue in al they might deuiſe, becauſe the ſame is ſuche an enimie to cattayle, wherein conſiſted the chiefeſt portion of all their wealth and ſubſtance.

Thus the Scottiſh men in this ſeaſon, ſetting all their delite on hunting, began alſo to vſe lawes and ſtatutes in proceſſe of time concerning the ſame. And firſt it was ordeyned, that he whoſe dogge did tryſe & go through to the end of the courſe with ỹ Deare, ſo that he were ſeene to be at the fall, ſhould haue the ſkinne: the head and the hornes to remayne to him whoſe dogge did beſt next. The bodie being drieſt and broken vp, ſhoulde be diſtributed at the pleaſure and diſcretion of the Maiſter of the game. The bowels and paunche were caſt to the dogges as the caſe required. And if there roſe any doubte in any of theſe points, they ſhould chooſe by common conſent, a iudge to determine of the matter. The dogges rewarded.

But whether theſe deuices were lawes made by the kyng as then for the further aduancement of his pleaſure, or rather cuſtomes growen, and ratified by long and continual vſe, I can not tel, but certaine it is, they were obſerued through all the Scottiſh regiõs as hauing the force of lawes, and ſo are vſed euen vnto theſe dayes.

Beſide theſe ordinaunces for hunting, Doruadille commaunded alſo that all ſuch ſtatutes as Fergus had made ſhoulde be kept and obſerued: whereunto he added certaine new, namely diuers ſortes of puniſhments for ſundrie kindes of tranſgreſſions, according to the qualities of the ſame: whiche hee cauſed to be ingroſſed in bookes of recorde, and committed to the cuſtodie of a graue counſellour, who by a common conſent ſhould haue the interpretatiõ of thoſe lawes if any doubt aroſe, and that when any offender Old lawes allowed, & newe eſtabliſhed.

ſhould come before the iudge, & heare the ſentence redde by him, the ſame offender might vnderſtād that he receyued nothing but right at the iudges handes: by reaſon whereof it came to paſſe, that ſuch offenders without repining willingly were contented to ſuffer any puniſhment what ſoeuer it was that the law did ſo appoynt them.

This cuſtome grewe into ſuche force, that it neuer might yet be abrogated amongſt them of the weſterne Iſles, but that euen vnto this day they haue theyr Lawiers amongſt them, without whoſe denunciation or decree taken out of the regiſter, no iudgement is reputed lawfull.

Theſe were the actes and doynges of kyng Dorſuadile, who in the .xxviij. yeare of his raigne departed this world at Berigonium, now called Dounſtafage, leauing behind him a ſonne called Reuther as yet not of ſufficient age to ſucceede in the eſtate. By reaſon whereof Nothatus the brother of Dorſuadille a man of comely perſonage and witte, apte (as was thought) to haue a Realme in gouernaunce, was crowned king by force of the law aboue remembred, debarring children vnder age to inherit in ſucceſſiō of ỹ crowne.

Nothatus.

Nothatus.

This Nothatus had vnneth raygned two yeares, when all the people beganne to crie out vpon him, for ſuche tyrannicall partes as he practiſed aſwel againſt the meane eſtates as the highe. And for ſo muche as he being admoniſhed of his duetie and required to reforme certaine diſhonorable vſages by him exerciſed, he would giue no care thereto: Therfore one Doualus gouernour of Brigantia, conſpiring with other Nobles of the Realme to depoſe him, entited Reuther kyng Dorſuadilles Sonne, to take parte with them, and to clayme the crowne as dewe to hym by diſcente from his Father.

Brigantia called as the Scottes ſay Galloway.

And ſo aſſembling a companie of their faction, ſufficient for their enterpriſe, they entered the palayce where Nothatus lay, and after reaſoning with him of certayne points touching his miſgouernment in the eſtate, diuers of theyr companie not tarying till they were commaunded, raſhly fell vpon him, and murthered him together with diuers of ſuche Nobles and Gentlemen, as they knewe to be enimies to Doualus and his frendes.

Nothatus murdered.

Reuther.

After this they proclaymed Reuther king, and crowned him with all due ſolēpnitie, diuers of the Nobles of ỹ realme being highly diſpleaſed therewith, for that they iudged it not only a great offence to haue the king thus traiterouſly murthered, but alſo ſaw hereby the ancient ordināce of chooſing their king through conſent of the people, to be broke by the wicked attempt of a priuate perſon, & an vnskilfull yong man aduaunced to the crowne, crowne, cõtrary to ỹ decree of an autentike law.

Amongſt other one Ferquhard the ſonne in law of Nothatus gouernour of Lozne & Cantyz called an aſſemblie of the people, and beganne to declare what enoꝛmities were like to enſue thoꝛow this tiranuicall attempt of Doualus.

Doualus hearing whereaboute Ferquhart went, haſtly came to the place where this aſſemble was made, & there ſlaying diuers of the chiefe, he did put Ferquhard alſo in great hazarde of his lyfe, who by flying yet eſcaped his hands and, got him ouer into the Iſle of Ila, whither reſoꝛted vnto him diuers of the Nobles (that fauoꝛed not Douale) with a great number of the commons.

In the end, Ferquharde perſwaded his cõpanions to ſet al feare a parte, and to returne with him into Scotlande to take reuenge of Douale and his complices, being traytours and enimies to the realme and common wealth, ſo that firſte ioyning handes, whiche they did wette in mans bloud accoꝛding to the cuſtome then vſed, they pꝛomiſed one to an other to liue and die in the quarel: and after embarquing themſelues in certaine veſſels, they entred the ſea and paſſed ouer into Scotlande, where gathering togither no ſmall number of ſuch as willingly reſoꝛted vnto them to their ayde, they encountred with Douale in battayle, whoſe hoſte twyce in one day was put to flight neare to the citie Berigonium with the loſſe of an eyght thouſande men.

Ferquhart returneth into Scotland for to reuenge his iniurie.

Berigonium.

The night parted the fray, but in the nexte moꝛning Douale & his partakers thꝛough greate indignation conceiued foꝛ that they were ſo beaten backe by Ferquhard (hauing in all his hoſte not paſt a x.M. perſons) fiercely came fowth of theyꝛ tentes to giue battaile afreſhe, & finding their enimies ready to receyue them, there was fought ſo cruell a battayle betwixt them, that in the end eyther parte being ſoꝛe trauayled with ſlaughter and long fight, was glad to giue place to the other, not paſſing an eight hũdꝛed of all thoſe that were pꝛeſent that day in the fielde, as then being left aliue. Vpon Douales parte there was ſlaine Gethus kyng of Pictes, whoſe daughter kyng Reuther had maried, with a great number of his people: alſo Douale himſelfe with diuers of the Nobles of Scotlande, beſide Gentlemen and commons that toke parte with him.

On the cõtrary ſide there died alſo Ferquhard himſelfe with diuers gouernours of Trybes, beſide the reſidue of the Nobles, Gentlemen and commons of Roſſe, Cathenele, Marne, Argile, Cantyz, and Lozne, with them of the weſterne Iſles which were there with him.

Reuther eſcaping with lyfe from this bloudie encounter, in the night followyng departed his wayes with ſuch of his people as were left aliue. Wheꝛof his enimies being aduertiſed in the next moꝛning, purſued after him with ſuch diligence, that in the end they toke him within a caſtell in Cathenele whither he was fledde foꝛ ſuccour: he was pardoned of life, partly in reſpect of his fathers merites, and partly againe foꝛ that it was knowen how his tender youth was ſuch as had not deſerued death by any fact, otherwiſe thã in that he had followed the councell of malicious perſons. By this cruel murder & huge ſlaughter thus committed betwixte theſe two nations of Scottiſh men & Pictes, bothe their foꝛces were ſo greatly enfeebled, that they became an eaſie pꝛay to their aũcient & cõmon enimies the Bꝛytains, who in ſuch opoꝛtunitie of occaſion thought not to ſit ſtil til the ſame might haply be paſt & gone.

He is pardoned of life.

Firſt theꝛfoꝛe with a mightie armie the Bꝛytains inuaded the Pictes: the nobles of which nation pereeyuing themſelues not able to make reſiſtance, fled with theyꝛ wiues, their children, and the moſt parte of their goodes, ouer into the Iſles of of Orkeney, and there aſſembling togither, they created them a new king to haue the gouernance ouer them, who was alſo named Gethus, and brother to the other Gethus a little before mentioned. Here alſo they remayned certaine yeares after, liuing in peaceable manner with the former inhabitants whom they found there, wrong-ing them by no iniurious dealing at all (if the Scottiſh hiſtorie be true.)

Gethus king.

Hereof moreouer as ſome ſuppoſe it came to paſſe, that theſe Iſlãds of Orkeney are named by diuers writers the auncient kingdome of ỹ Picts.

Why Orkeney was called Pictland as ſome ſuppoſe, but the trueth ſhoulde ſeeme to be that they were ſo called becauſe the Pictes inhabited there before they ſet foote in Brytaine.

In the meane while the Brytains ſeaſing vpon ſuch countreys as theſe Pictes had forſaken, that is to ſay, the Mers, Louthien and other, they left in diuers places wher they thought expedict, garyſons of men of warre, to keepe the ſame in due ſubiection: and after entred into the confines of the Scottiſh kingdome, burning and waſting all afore them, wherewith ſuche Scottes as yet remayned aliue, being highly moued to indignation, came ſtoutly into the fielde to defende their countrey, & encõtring with their enimies neare to Kalendar wood, they loſte a .ij. M. of their companie: the reſidue alſo being ſore chaſed, fled into ſundrie parties for ſauegard of their liues.

The Brytaines inuade the Scottes.

The Scottes ouerthrowen.

This diſcomfiture put the Scottiſhe nation into ſuch feare & terrour, that they vtterly diſpaired of al recouerie, where contrarywiſe the Brytains were ſo aduaunced (in hope vtterly to expel all aliens out of their Iſle) that purſuying the victory in moſt earneſt wiſe, they forced Reuther and all the Nobilitie of the Scottiſh nation that was yet left aliue, to flee for ſauegarde of their liues into the caſtell of Berigonium, where they helde themſelues as in the ſureſt holde.

The Brytains being certified of the repaire of their enimies to Berigoniũ, enuironed the caſtell with a ſtrong and vehement ſiege, vntill that the Scots within were conſtreyned through wante of vitayles to eate each other, according as ỹ lots fell by a cõmon agreement made amongſt them.

Scots beſiged deuoure one an other.

But when it came to paſſe, that euen thoſe that were reputed as heads and gouernours, & in whom conſiſted the hope of their whole defenſe, did now and then come to the ſhambles aſwell as other of leſſe reputation, they thought it beſte to trie by iſſuying forth, if any of their happes might be ſo good as to eſcape the daũger preſent, whereas by tarying ſtill within the fortreſſe, they ſhould but deuoure one another without any reuenge for loſſe of their liues, had vpon their fierce and cruell enimies.

Wherevpon by common conſente there iſſueth forth, firſte one Colane Lorde of Cantyr with an hundreth of his owne Souldiers, and fiercely skyrmiſhing with the Brytains, defended himſelf a good ſpace right mãfully, though in the ende bothe he and his whole bande were borne downe and ſlayne with preaſſe and multitude of his enimies that aſſailed him on each ſide.

The Scots come forth to fight.

In the meane ſeaſon, whileſt he thus occupied the Brytains in fight on one ſide, Reuther with the reſidue of his people brake forth by an other way, and eſcaping to the ſea ſide, got ſhippes and fled ouer into the weſterne Iſles, where he found a great number of other Scottiſh men, that were gotten thither, being compelled by Denus king of the Brytains, to auoyde forth of the countreys whiche they before inhabited.

Reuther eſcapeth.

Reuther remayned not long in the Iſles, but paſſed ouer into Ireland. The Brytains not a littell moued for his eſcape with the other of the Scottiſh Lordes, reuenged their diſpleaſure on ſuch cõmons and other meane people as fell into their handes, ſo that ſuche as might eſcape, gatte them into the mountaynes, & liued there by rootes, berries, & other wilde fruytes in ſommer, and in winter by ſuch veniſon and fleſh of wilde beaſtes as they killed in the wilderneſſe: and ſometimes they came downe & made reyſes vpon the Brytaines that occupied theyr houſes and landes, fetching great booties very often from amongſt them.

This cruell warre laſted a. xij. yeares, till in maner all ſuch Scottes and Pictes as remayned in Albion were brought vnder ſeruitude to the Brytains. In which meane while, Gethus king of the Pictes kepte his ſiege royall in Pomonia the chiefeſt Iſle of the Orkeneys. Reuther alſo begot of his wife a ſonne named Thereus, and ſhortly after being procured by letters and meſſengers ſent vnto him from the foreſayd Gethus and ſuch Scottes as were yet remayning in Albion, he aſſembled a number of ſhippes togither, & firſt with a choſen power of warriours ſayled to the weſtern Iſles, where increaſing his numbers, he paſſed ouer into Albion, landing on the weſte halfe of Roſſe at Lough Bruum, & there comming a land, the firſt perſon that they mette with (according to a cuſtome vſed amõgſt them in thoſe dayes) they ſlew, & wetting the pointes of theyr weapons in his bloud, they firſte taſted thereof after theyr manner, then holding vp their weapõs into the ayre, they deſired of the Goddes that they might reuenge the bloud of their elders with happy battaile againſt the Brytons their enimies. After this, hearing that Gethus king of the Picts was alſo entred the lãd with a mighty power of Germains which were come to his ayd and was not paſt a. xxx. miles of, he ſtayed there abidyng for his comming, to the intent that ioyning theyr powers togither, they might be the better able to furniſh theyr enterpriſe.

The Germains in ayde of the Pictes.

The third day after they mette togither with great ioy and cõgratulations, vnto whom with all ſpeede a great number alſo of thoſe Scottiſhmen and Pictes that had ſtill continued in the countrey (during the time of the perſecution by the Brytains) dayly reſorted and came flocking in from eche ſide vnto them.

Reuther and Gethus meete & ioyne their powers togither.

Sibillius king of the Brytains who ſucceeded after Denus, as then lately deceaſſed, hauing knowledge hereof, aſſembled a great army of his ſubiectes, and hearing that the Scots and Picts were entred into the borders of his Realme, hee haſted forth to encounter with their powers, & ſo ioyning with them in battaile, after long and cruel fight, in the end the victory remayned with the Scottiſh men and Pictes, by the greate valiauncie and manfull prowes of Reuther: wherevpon the place where that battaile was fought hath bene euer ſince called Reoirdail, as ye wold ſay Reuthers valley.

The Brytaines are diſcõfited by the Scottes and Pictes.

Whereof Reothirdail tooke the name.

This victorie was not very pleaſant to any of the parties, by reaſon of the greate numbers of men ſlaine on bothe ſides, in ſo muche that they were gladde to fall to agreement immediatly after, & concluded a peace, with conditions that the Scottiſh men & Pictes ſhould be reſtored againe vnto their auncient poſſeſſiõs & lands in Albion.

This peace cõtinued a long time after inuiolate betwixte theſe nations. The yeare that Reuther returned thus into Albion, was before the birth of Chriſte. 216. after the buylding of Rome. 529. and from the creation of the woꝛld. 3750. Reuther by Beda in his Eccleſiaſticall hiſtorie of England is named Reuda: who alſo ſuppoſeth him to be ẏ firſt of al ẏ Scottiſh princes ẏ ſet any foote in Brytain there to inhabite, his cõming thither was (as ſeemeth to ſome) lõg after the ſuppoſed time here before alledged. And verily there is great cauſe to moue a doubt of ẏ truth of that which Hector Boetius hath writte in following (as he ſaith) other authors, touching the firſte comming into Brytaine, aſwell of the Stots & Picts: for if it were true that so long before the comming of the Romains into this Isle they were here plãted & growẽ to such puissance, it is strange that no mentiõ is made of them in any of their writings, till aboute the yeare. 360. after Christ, as in place conuenient it shall more plainely appeare. Reuther passed the residue of his dayes without any further warres, forrayne or ciuill, and so departed this worlde at Berigonium, in the. xxvj. yeare of his raygne.

Reutha.

After Reuther his decease, his vncles Sonne called Reutha succeeded in the kingdome, chosen thereto by the common agreement of all the estates, because that Thereus Sonne to Reuther vnneathe come to the age of tenne yeares, was thought vnable to take the charge vpon him.

Reutha therfore being thus elected to raygne as king ouer the Scottish mẽ, ordained that such noblemen as had atchieued any notable exployte in defence of their countrey, should be had in perpetual memorie, & buried in solempne wise in sepulchres aloft vpõ hilles or mountaines, vpõ the which were set so many Obelisks or lõg pointed stones, as they had slaine enimies in the warres: wherof some remaine there to be seene euen vnto this day.

An ordinance for buriall of theyr Princes.

Obeliskes or pointed stones

This Reutha also vnderstanding of the lacke of all maner of craftes men in his Realme, & of suche as were expert in the liberall sciences, caused a great number of moste perfect artificers to be sent for, to inhabite amongst his people, the better to instruct them in their occupatiõs. Vnto these also as vnto other professing any liberall arte, were appointed honest liuings, by way of fees assigned to be receiued, of suche oxen & beefes as were killed, to euery man of science & artificer his parte. And further eche of them had certaine measures of Otes and Barly in steede of yearly annuities. For as yet the vse of coigne was not knowen among the Scottish men. The whiche custome of distributing theyr beasts, which they killed in this wise, is still vsed in the Westerne Isles euen vnto these our dayes. Reutha perceiuing furthermore that through vnskilful Chirurgions & Phisitions many wounded & diseased persons were oftentimes cast away, ordeined by the aduice and consent of his counsell, that none should take vpõ them as a Chirurgion or Phisition, vnlesse they were by long experience well practised afore hand in those sciences. For before that time they vsed to carie forth such persons as were sicke or otherwise hurte, and to lay them in some open place in the streetes or market steede, that al such as came by, might according to their knowledge declare their aduise, and shew (if they had bene vexed with the like disease) by what meanes they had escaped the daunger, & recouered agayn theyr health. For no mã might without the note of high reproche passe by in keeping silence in this behalf. And this was according to the custome of the olde Egyptians.

Craftes men brought into Scotlande to instruct the people.

Liuings appointed forth vnto these craftes men.

A law for Phisitions & Chirurgions.

Reutha thus studying for the aduauncement of the common wealth of his subiects, continued in the estate with great prosperitie, til finally perceyuing himselfe farre growen in age and not so able to trauell in the affayres of the realme as he was before, he caused a parliament to be assembled, and there in presence of all the estates he required to be discharged of the gouernment: and that the same might be cõmitted vnto his cousin Thereus, who as then was not onely of sufficient age to take it vpon him, but also of suche towardnesse as that in eche mans opinion he was thought likely to atteyne vnto the prowesse of any of his noble progenitours.

Thus, Reutha after he had raygned a. xvij. yeares, returned to a priuate lyfe, resigning the whole rule of the realme vnto the forsayd Thereus being through his perswasion receyued as king of all estates by common consent there in that present assemble.

Reutha resigned the estate vnto his cousin Thereus.

Thereus.

This Thereus for the first. vj. yeares was equall in al points of princely gouernmẽt to any of his predecessors, but afterward he chaũged his copie in such maner, that iustice and all other kindes of vertue being set aparte, he neyther regarded the lawes of the Gods nor yet of men, but gaue himselfe to al sortes of filthinesse & most detestable vices, so farre forth, that his subiectes (as their custome is in following the maners & vsages of theyr Princes,) became so outragious in theyr licentious liuings, and namely the Nobles and Gentlemen, that thereof ensued theft, murder, rape, spoyling, and all kindes of oppression of those seely soules that had not meane to resist, so as in fine diuers gouernours of the tribes perceyuing no hope of amendmẽt whilest Thereus should raygne, conspired togither, deuising meanes how to depose him of al kingly authoritie. But he hauing notice of their purposed intentions, and doubting the sequele thereof, conueyed himselfe out of the way, in moste secrete wise, fleyng for succour vnto the Brytaines, vnto whom though he made earnest suyte for ayde to be restored home againe, yet coulde hee purchase no suche fauour amongst them: so that leading a miserable lyfe long time after within the citie of Yorke, hee finally there ended his daies. He raigned in Scotland about. xij. yeares or more.

Iustice reiected and neglected embraced.

The nobles conspire against Thereus.

Imme-

IMmediatlye after this his auoyding ỳ Realme, the Nobles and peeres chose one Conanus Lord of Galoway to rule ỳ estate as Gouernour, whose authoritie had bene euer great amõgst the people. His studie was chiefly imployed how to reduce the Lordes & Nobles of the Realme, into concorde and friendly amitie, where before through the negligence of Thereus eche sought others destructiõs. Also he caused due punishment to be executed vpon all such as liued by robbyng & reuing, of whom in the beginning of his gouernment there was no smal nũber: but he weeded them forth, in suche wise that ere he lefte off, there was not one of them to be founde. Conanus persecuteth offendours.

At length, after it was vnderstood that Thereus was deade, this Conanus renounced the administration in presence of all the estates assembled in parliament at Berigonium, where by common consent Iosina the brother of Thereus was chosen to raygne as king, for that Thereus had lefte no issue behinde him to succeede. Iosina elected king.

THis Iosina, being proclaymed king, renewed the auncient leagues with the Picts and Brytaines.

He had Phisitions in greate estimation: for that during his abode in Ireland, he was nouriched of a childe amongst them, and by reason thereof had some knowledge in their facultie, specially he vnderstode the vertues and properties of hearbes, wherwith in those dayes the Scottes vsed to heale and remedie all maner of sores and diseases, diſeaſes, which as then were few in nũber in reſpect of the ſundrie kinds which are now knowẽ amongſt vs: and al by reaſon of the ſuperfluous feeding and exceſſe of meates and drinkes vſed in our time, where as our elders ſuſtũed with a little, liued without ſurfeyting, the chiefeſt breeder of ſuche ſtraunge and manifolde ſicknẽſſes. In this Joſina his dayes it chaũced that a Portingale ſhippe was driuen and drowned by force of a ſtreyneable tempeſt, neare vnto the ſhore of one of the Scottiſh Iſles, where diuers of thoſe that were within the ſame ſhippe, Maryners and other, eſcaped to land, amongſt whom were two auncient and fatherly old men of right reuerend aſpect and countenance. Theſe two in companie with ſome of the inhabitaunts of that Iſle came ouer vnto Berigonium, where the king as then ſoiourned. They were Spaniſh prieſtes of the Pagane religion, whoſe purpoſe was to haue gone vnto Athens in Grecia, as ſome wryte: But whence ſoeuer they were, and what purpoſe ſoeuer they had, certaine it is, they were Philoſophers: and therefore the king receyued them moſt ioyfully, doing them al the honour he could deuiſe, and commaunding that they ſhoulde be lodged within his owne palayce, where they had all things needefull, and accordingly miniſtred vnto them.

Surfeiting the cauſe of ſtrãge diſeaſes, which ſo commonly now raigne.

Two auncient philoſophers through ſhipwracke arriue in Scotland, & are ioyfully receyued of the king.

These Philoſophers after they had refreſhed themſelues at theyr eaſe for the ſpace of. xiij. dayes, the king cauſed them to come before him, requyring them to ſhew their opinion what they thought by the nature of the ſoyle, the maners and cuſtomes of his people, ſo farreforth as they had ſeene and heard. They without pauſing for anſwere declared, that as yet they had not had time to learne thoſe things but onely thus farre, by coniecture they ſuppoſed that the ground was more likely to be fruitefull of metall mines, than of corne and grayne, as conteyning farre more riches vnderneath the earth than aboue, and this they ſayde that they gathered by the influence of the Heauens vnder the whiche it lay. And as for the rites and blages of the people, in one pointe they coulde in no wiſe commende them, for that in religiõ they followed the ſuperſtitious rites of the Egyptiãs, worſhipping the immortall Gods in the ſhape of beaſtes and foules, where as God was euen the ſame that did comprehende bothe heauen and earth, with the waters and al things in them conteyned, whom they named Nature, and as it were the prymordiall cauſe or beginning of all things, vnto whom it was not poſſible to deuiſe any ſimilitude of liuing thing that might in any wiſe repreſent him. Therefore (ſayd they) mẽ ought to worſhip the liuing God with fire and deuoute prayer, buylding him a temple for that purpoſe, and onely vnto him to burne incenſe, and to perfourme vowes: at whoſe hãds ſuch as liued chaſtly, vprightly, and according to the rules of iuſtice, ought euer to looke for ſome high benefite, where other that liued contrarily might euer ſtande in doubte of contrary reward.

The Scottiſh religion reproued.

Vpright liuing well warded at Gods hand.

With theſe theyr ſenſible inſtructions they perſwaded many of the Scottiſhe nation vnto theyr opinion, though the greateſt parte woulde by no meanes follow any other kinde of religion, than that whiche they had receyued from theyr elders: neyther coulde any of them be brought to thinke otherwiſe of the Sunne, the Mone & Starres, but that there was a certaine deuine power or godhead in euery one of thẽ. And thus much of theſe ſtraungers briefly and by the way, who came into Scotlãd at this preſent, but now to proceede with our purpoſe, when Joſina had raigned. xxiiij. yeares, hee departed out of this worlde at Berigonium, beyng a man of greate age. He lefte behinde him a ſonne named Finnanus, who a little before his Fathers deceaſſe was by conſent of the people proclaymed king of Scotlande.

Joſina departeth this life.

Finnanus.

This Finnanus had the nobles of his realme in ſuch eſtimatiõ, that he ordeyned that nothing ſhould be decreed or practiſed touching the publike affayres of the realme, except they were firſt made priuie and of counſell in the ſame. He ſought alſo to winne the fauour of his people by meekeneſſe & gentle intreating of thẽ, in ſomuch that that though he wente aboute to restore the olde religion somewhat defaced by his father through information as is sayde of the twoo aboue mencioned sage Philosophers, yet did he not constreyne any man to worshyp the Goddes, otherwise than his fansie serued him.

He was the firste that instituted those Prelates whiche gouerned after the manner of Bishoppes, in all maters pertayning to religion, and were called in the Scottish tounge Durcerglijs and in Latine Druides.

These Druides were appointed to be resident within the Isle of Man, as the Scottish menne holde opinion; but other thinke rather that they were resident in Angleley in the Brytish tongue called Mon.

Unto these also hauing great liuings assigned them, were the inferiour priests subiect, as receyuing at their handes all iniunctions & orders for the vse of their sacrifices and other ceremonies.

These Druides afterwardes applied theselues so earnestly to the studie of Philosophy, aswell naturall as morall, that they were had in no small reuerence of the people, as they that were bothe accompted and knowen to be men of most perfect lyfe and innocencie: by meanes whereof theyr authoritie dayly so farre forth increased, that finally iudgements in moste doubtfull maters were committed vnto their determinations, offenders by theyr discretion punished, and suche as had well deserued, accordingly by theyr appoyntments rewarded.

Moreouer suche as refused to obey theyr decrees and ordinaunces, were by them excommunicate, so that no creature durste once keepe companie with such till they were reconciled agayne, & clerely by the same Druides assoyled.

Plinie, Cornelius Tacitus, Strabo, and Julius Celar, with diuers approued Authours, make mencion of these Druides, signifying how the first beginning of their religion was in Brytaine, (which some comprehende all wholly vnder the name of Albion) and from thence was the same religion brought ouer into Fraunce.

Finnanus was not onely praysed for his setting forth of that heathen religion, but also for his politike gouernment of the estate in toyfull reste & quietnesse. Neyther was his fame a little aduaunced for the mariage concluded and made betwixt his sonne Durstus and Agasia daughter to the kyng of Brytains, for by that aliaunce he wanne diuers of the Brytish nation vnto his friendship.

Finally, this Finnanus died at Camelon beyng come thither to visite the kyng of Pictes as then sore diseased, after hee had raigned about the space of .xxx. yeares. His bodie was conueyed vnto Berigonium, and there buried amongst his predecessours.

After hym succeeded his sonne Durstus. farre differyng from his noble father in all vertuous demeanour. as he that was altogether gyuen to banquetting and excessiue drunkennesse. Suche of the nobles as his Father had in highe reuerence he made light accompts of: accepting onely those that of theyr wicked deuises could finde out new kindes of voluptuous pleasures, through whose perswasions some of his peares he cõfined, some he spoyled of al their substance & inheritance, other he put to death without iuste cause or any kinde of lawfull meanes. Wicked counsellers.

Furthermore he forsoke the cõpanie of his lawfull wife Agasia, causing hyr to be forced and abused by diuers vile persons in moste vilanous maner.

A conſpiracie.

With theſe and the ſemblable inordinate practiſes he procured the indignation of his people ſo farre forth againſt him, that thoſe of the weſterne Iſles with them of Cantyr, Lorne, Argile and Roſſe, conſpyred togither in the reformation of ſuche diſorders as were dayly vſed in the adminiſtration of iuſtice, by the wicked ſuggeſtion of euill diſpoſed councellours, againſt whom they pretended to make theyr warre, and not againſt theyr king.

A craftie and cloked diſſimulation.

There were ſo many alſo that fauoured them in this quarell, and ſo fewe that leaned to the king to ayde him againſt them, that he was conſtreyned to diſſemble with them for a tyme, in promiſing not onely to remoue from him ſuche as they woulde appoint, but alſo to be ordered in all things according as they ſhoulde thinke good. And to put them in beliefe that hee ment as hee ſpake, he committed ſome ſuch councellours as hee had aboute him vnto warde, and other ſome (of whome he little paſſed) he ſente vnto them as pryſoners, to receyue ſuch puniſhment by death or otherwiſe, as they ſhould thinke conuenient.

Craftie diſſimulation.

He further alſo in preſence of Dozo the gouernour of Cantyr, ſente to him for that purpoſe, ſware in ſolempne wiſe afore the image of Diana, to performe all ſuche promiſes and couenantes as he was agreed vpon and had made vnto the conſpiratours.

With whiche cloked diſſimulation they being deceyued, came without ſuſpect of further guile vnto Berigonium, where at their firſte comming he was readie to receyue them (as ſeemed by his fayned countenance) with gladſome harte and moſte friendly meanyng: but they were no ſoner entred the Caſtell, but that a number of armed menne appointed for the purpoſe, fell vpon them, and ſlewe them all without mercie.

A cruell ſlaughter.

This haynous act being once ſignified abrode in their countreys amongſt their friendes and kinſfolke, cauſed a new commocio, ſo that within a fewe dayes after, many thouſandes of men in furious rage came before the caſtell, and beſieged the king moſte ſtraitly therein. Who perceyuing himſelfe in ſuche daunger as he knewe not well howe to eſcape, came forth with ſuche companie as he had about him, and encountring with his enimies, was ſtraight wayes beaten downe amongſt them, and ſo at once loſte there bothe kingdome and life in the. ix. yeare of his raygne.

A new tumult.

King Durſtus beſieged.

Durſtus is ſlayne.

Durſtus being thus diſpatched, his children doubting the indignation of the people conceyued againſt them for theyr fathers faulte, to auoyde the peril, fledde ouer into Ireland, and immediatly the Nobles of the Realme aſſembled themſelues togither for the chooſing of a newe king, in no wiſe minding to haue any of Durſtus his race to raygne ouer them, leaſt they woulde ſeeke by ſome meanes to reuenge his death: howbeit at length when they were at poynt to haue fallen at variaunce in ſuſteyning of contrarie opinions aboute the election of their Prince, through a wittie oration made by Cozanus gouernour of Argile, who alledged many weightie reaſons for the auoyding of ſedition, they all agreed to committe the free election vnto the ſame Cozanus, promiſing firmely to accept whome ſo euer hee ſhoulde name. Hereupon Cozanus conſulting a little with the peares of the Realme, named one Ewyn the vncles ſonne of Durſtus, who as then remayned in Picte lande, whither hee had withdrawen himſelfe in Durſtus his dayes, beyng baniſhed the realme by him, for that he coulde not away with his corrupt maners.

Ewyn is ſet king.

This

This election was acceptable to all eſtates, for that thereby the adminiſtration of the kingdome continued in the lyne of theyr former kings.

NEwin ſhortly after was brought forth of Pictlande with al regall ſolempnitie, and at Berigonium placed vpon the ſtone of Marble, to the great reioyſing of the people there aſſembled. Herewith alſo the nobles of the realme putting theyr hands in his, bound themſelues by othe to be loyall and faithfull ſubiectes vnto him in all points, which cuſtome of ſwearing fealtie then firſte by Ewins commaundement begon, and continued many hundred of yeares after amongſt his and their poſteritie: in ſomuch that the Captaines of the Trybes alſo required the ſame kinde of othe of them that inhabited within theyr liberties, whiche in parte remayneth yet vnto this day amongſt thoſe of the Weſterne Iſles, and ſuche as inhabite in the mountaynes. For at the creation of a new gouernour, whom they name theyr Captaine, they vſe the like ceremonies: whiche being ended, at the nexte fayre kept within that countrey, proclamatiō is made, that no man inhabiting within his iuriſdiction, ſhall name this newe gouernour by any other name from thenceforth, than by the auncient and accuſtomed name as ſuche rulers aforetime haue bene called by. And that ſo often as they heare him named, they ſhall put off theyr cappes or hattes, and make a certaine curteſie in ſigne of honour due to him, in ſuche maner as we vſe in hearing diuine ſeruice, whē any holy miſterie is in doing, or any ſacred name of the almightie creatour recited.

But now touching king Ewyn, his chiefeſt ſtudie was to maintayne iuſtice throughout his dominion, and to weede out ſuche tranſgreſſers as went aboute to trouble the quiet eſtate of his ſubiectes.

Furthermore conſidering what inconuenience proceeded through the vſe of voluptuous pleaſures and wanton delytes, he ordeyned that the youth of his realme ſhoulde be trayned to endure hardneſſe, payne and trauell, as to lie vpon harde bordes without any feather beddes or pillowes vnder them. Alſo to exerciſe themſelues to throw the darte, to ſhote, to wraſtell, and beare armure aſwell in time of peace as of warre: that when neede required, trauell and ſuche kinde of exerciſes, ſhould be no payne but pleaſure vnto them: where otherwayes lacke of vſe, might make the ſame intollerable. Whileſt Ewyn is thus occupied aboute the ſetting forth of neceſſary ordinaunces for the wealth of his Realme, the kyng of the Pictes did ſende vnto hym Ambaſſadours, to require his ayde againſt the Brytons, who were entred his countrey in robbing and ſpoyling the ſame.

Ewyn conſenting quickly to that requeſt, leuied an armie forthwith, and with all ſpeede paſſed forward to ioyne with the Pictes, in purpoſe to reuenge the olde iniuries done to his nation by the Brytayns, who likewiſe were as readie to receyue battayle as the Scottes and Pictes were deſirous to giue it, ſo that bothe the armies encountring togither (the Scottes and Pictes on the one ſide, and the Brytayns on the other) there enſued a ſore conflict betwixte them, continued with vnmercyfull ſlaughter, till night parted them in ſunder: No man as then able to iudge who had the better, but either parte beyng priue to their owne loſſes, withdrew themſelues further off from the place of the battell, ſo that the Scottes and Pictes the ſame night gotte them into the mountaynes of Pictlande, and the Brytons ſo ſone as it was day made homewards with all ſpeede towardes their countrey, leauing no ſmal pray and bootie behind them, which the Scottiſh men and Pictes recouered cōming downe withall ſpeede frō the mountaines, when they once heard that their enimies were departed.

A doubtfull battayle.

King Ewyn being returned from this iourney, determined to paſſe the reſidue of his lyfe in reſte and quietneſſe, appointyng iudges in euery parte of his Realme, for the miniſtring of iuſtice and executing of the lawes according to the due forme and ordinance of the ſame.

He appointed alſo ſuch as ſhould watche for the apprehenſion of thieues and robbers by the high wayes, aſſigning them liuings of the common treaſorie to liue by. And there be euen vnto this day that holde ſtill ſuch liuings, though the office be worne out of vſe and forgotten.

After this, he buylded a caſtell not far diſtaunt from Berigonium, whiche hee named after his owne name Euonium: but afterwardes it was called Dounſtafage, whiche is as muche to ſay, as Steuennes caſtell, whiche name it beareth at this preſent. Finally, this Ewyn after he had raygned to the great weale of the Realme, about xix. yeares, he departed this life, leauing behinde him a ſonne baſe begotten, named Gillus, who cauſing his fathers funerals to be executed with all ſolempne pompe and ceremonies, raiſed vp ſome after ſundrie Obeliſkes aboute his graue neare vnto Dounſtafage, where he was buried.

Dounſtafage is buylded,

There were preſent alſo at the buriall, two of Durſtus his ſonnes, whome Ewyn in his life time had reuoked home out of Ireland where they were in exile. Bothe theſe, aſwell the one as the other, bicauſe they were twinnes and not knowē whether of thē came firſt into the world, looked to be king after Ewyn. Their names were Dothan & Dorgal. And ſuch malicious emulatiō and enuious ſpite, roſe betwixt the two brethren for the attayning of their purpoſe, that greater could not be deuiſed, whiche Gillus, like a craftie & ſubtill Foxe, by couert meanes ſought ſtill to augment: and in the end cauſing them to come togither for ſome concluſion of agreement, at length when he had ſet them further at oddes than they were before, he procured a number of Souldiers appoynted for the purpoſe to rayſe a tumult, (as though it had bene in taking of contrary partes) and there to ſlea them bothe. Thus Gillus hauing brought to purpoſe that he came for, ſheweth in countenaunce as though he had bene much offended therewith, and done what he coulde to haue appeaſed the matter, and herewith he commeth running forth with a highe voyce, declaring to his cōpanie, that if he had not made good ſhifte for himſelfe, he had bene ſlaine by the handes of Dothan and Dorgall, who fell into ſuche miſchiefe themſelues, as they had prepared for other. Herevpon alſo he required his friendes and ſeruaunts moſt earneſtly to conuey him into ſome ſure place where he might be out of daūger, and in better ſecuritie: in ſo much that many of thoſe that hearde him, giuing credite to his wordes, went with him with all ſpeede vnto Dounſtafage, where being receyued into the caſtell with diuers of the Nobles that followed him, he gotte him into a galery, and there making an inuectiue oration againſt the Sonnes of Durſtus, and touching by the way what perill might enſue to the common wealth by ciuill diuiſion, he perſwaded them to committe the rule vnto his handes, vntill it might be certainely knowen, vnto whom the ſame of right appertayned.

The crafty working of Gillus.

Durſtus twoo ſonnes are ſlaine.

Thoſe that were preſent, perceyuing to what iſſue his paynted proceſſe tended, and doubting leaſt if they ſhoulde ſeeme to ſtande againſt him at that inſtant in this his demaunde, they might happely be the firſte that ſhoulde repent the bargaine, conſented to proclayme him king: wherevpō he required al ſuch as were preſent, to ſweare to him fealtie, and to do him homage accoꝛding to the cuſtome. And herewith agreably as he had before promiſed, and accoꝛding to his fathers will, (as he alledged) he diſtributed among them all ſuche cattell as belonged to his ſaide father. Whereby he wanne the greater fauour of many, but yet not iudging himſelfe altogether in ſurtie, by reaſon that Dothan had left behinde him three ſonnes, as then remayning in the Iſle of Man, in the bringing vp of the Druides, he purpoſed therefore to diſpatche them alſo for the better aſſurance of his eſtate, and therevpon made a iourney thither himſelfe, fayning as though he meant nothing but al loue and friendly affection towards the children, by whiche meanes he gate twoo of them into his handes, the one named Liſmoꝛus, being about twelue yeeres of age, and the other Cormacus that was twoo yeares yonger. The yongeſt of the three named Ederus, being aboute ſeuen yeares olde, as his better happe was, chaunced to be ſicke at that time, by reaſon whereof hee eſcaped his handes: for fayning as though he wiſhed to haue the other two brought vp like the children of a Prince, he ledde them away with him into Scotland, leauing certaine of his ſeruants behinde him, to riddc Ederus the yongeſt out of the way at leyſure, and as for the other twaine, the night following after his comming home to Dounſtafage, hee cauſed them to bee murthered, euen in their Tutors armes, whoſe ayde moſt pitifully they beſought and required.

But the woman that had the keeping of Ederus now in his ſickneſſe, prouided more warely for his ſauegarde, for ſhee ſmelling out what was the kings purpoſe, in the dead of the night gotte hir ſelfe togither with Ederus into a ſhip, and paſſed ouer into Argyle, where being ſet a lande, ſhe caried him on hyr ſhoulders vp into the mountaines, and there within a ſecrete denne ſuſteyned his languiſhing life for certaine monethes in great care and miſery.

Gillus notwithſtanding theſe his cruel acts, ſhewed yet in outward appearaunce, that no man was more deſirous of the quiet ſtate and proſperous ſucceſſe of the common wealth than hee: euer euer reaſoning amongeſt his nobles, and that in the preſence of his cõmons, touching the maintenance of iuſtice, and puniſhment of miſdoers, whereas hee himſelfe thyrſted continually and moſt of all after the bloud of thoſe whõ he doubted any thing likely to attempt the reuenge of his wicked miſgouernance: inſomuch that he cauſed in one place and other, all ſuch to be murthered and ſlaine as bare any good wil toward the lawfull line of Durſtus.

Nowe the people ſeeing the dayly ſlaughter of the nobilitie, and at the laſt growing to be verie ſore moued againſt him, namely thoſe of Galloway, Kyle, Carrike, and Coningham, wyth them of Cantyr, Lorne, and Argyle, they aſſembled their powers togyther, and with all ſpeede marched forth towardes the place where they thought to finde the Tyrant: who hearing of this their conſpiracie, aſſembled ſuch puiſſance as he could make, and hauing no other refuge but to trie the matter by battell, made towardes hys enimies with more ſpeede than good ſucceſſe: for ere the two armies came to ioyning, a greate number of Gillus his friendes fled to the contrarie part, ſo that herevpon doubting the iſſue if hee were conſtrayned to fight, hee ſtale priuily from amongſt the reſidue of his folkes, and getting into a fiſhers boate, conueyed himſelfe ouer into Irelande: whoſe departure being once knowne, his Souldiours yelded themſelues vnto Cadall, gouernour of Galloway, who was Captain generall of all the conſpirators, and nowe by conſent of all the eſtates created gouernour of the realme, till they had choſen a king.

This Cadall immediately vpon the greate authoritie giuẽ him, gat firſt al the beſt fortreſſes into his handes, as Berigonium, Dunſtafage, and other: then hee paſſed ouer into the Ile of Ila, to prouide the better for the reſiſting of Gillus, if hee ſhoulde attempt any thing by purchaſing ayde amongſt them of the weſterne Iſles. Thither was brought vnto him alſo, the yong Ederus (by ſuch of Durſtus his friendes, as had eſcaped the cruel handes of Gillus) whom Cadall cauſed to be honourably conueyed vnto Eptake the chiefeſt Citie of Galloway, there to bee brought vp in princely nuriture, that cõming to full age he might the better bee able to take vpon him the gouernance. In whiche meane while Gillus made all the friendes in Irelande that he could, inſomuch that vpon ſuch golden promiſes as hee made vnto the chiefeſt gouernours there, they conſented to ayde him with all their forces. Whereof Cadall being aduertiſed, he thought it beſt that a king ſhould be choſen, and thereby an vnitie to be framed amongſt all the eſtates of the realme, wherevpon cauſing a counſell to be aſſembled for the ſame intent, by common agreement, one Ewen, a man of worthie fame, nephew to king Finnane by his brother Douall, was in the end proclaimed king: who was lately come frõ the Ile of Gowere into Albion, in cõpany with Cadall, & kepte himſelfe cloſe hitherto within the ſayde Ile, for doubte of Gillus that ſought amongſt other to haue deſtroyd him alſo.

Ewyn the ſeconde of that name choſen king.

Ewin.

This Ewin beeing the ſeconde of that name, made great prouiſion in the beginning of his raigne to reſiſt the ſayde Gillus his enimie. And hearing that he had bene in the Ile of Ila, and put the ſame to fire and ſworde, he prepared an army and ſhips alſo, to tranſport therewith ouer into Irelande, there to reuenge that iniurie vpon ſuche as had ayded Gillus therein, to the hinderance of his countrey.

Cadal with an armie is ſent into Irelande

The forenamed Cadall, gouernour of Galloway, was appoynted alſo to haue the leading of this armie: who taking the ſea at Dunſtafage, directed his courſe ſtreyght ouer vnto the coaſtes of Irelande, where taking lande and encountring with his enimies, he put them to the worſe, inſomuch that Gillus fearing to fall into his aduerſaryes handes, fled out of the fielde into the next wood, where hee thought to haue ſaued himſelfe. His ſouldiours alſo perceyuing him to bee fled, gaue ouer the fielde, and yeelded themſelues vnto Cadal, who toke them to grace, and forthwith ſent out certaine companies to ſeeke Gillus, who found him in a den cloſed about with thicke woodes and buſhes, where he had lien hid certain dayes & was almoſt ſterued for hunger.

Gillus is take.

Gillus beheaded.

Thoſe that found him immediately ſtroke off his heade, and preſented the ſame vnto Cadal, to the great reioycing of all the companie.

Thus after that Eadall had atchiued his enterpriſe with good ſucceſſe, he toke the ſea againe to returne into Scotlandr, but by meanes of a grieuous tempeſt, he loſt the greateſt part of hys armie, with all the ſpoyle and ryches that they had gotten in that voyage. Whiche miſchaunce ſore blemiſhed the glorie of ſo famous a victorie, ſo that the reioyſing of many, was turned into dolefull mourning for the loſſe of their friendes and kinnefolke, but namely Eadall toke it ſo grieuouſly, that nothing couldc bee more offenſiue vnto him. Howe beeit, after he was come a lande, the King and other of the Nobles recomforted him in all that they might, and the king gaue him alſo much fayre landes, with diuerſe Caſtelles in Galloway in recompence of hys good and faythfull ſeruice at ſundrie tymes ſhewed in defence of hys Countrey, and made hym Gouernour of Galloway alſo, whiche hee berye thankefully accepted.

A ſhipwrake by a tempeſt.

Eadal for his good and faythful ſeruice is rewarded.

After this king Ewin came to an enteruiew with the king of Pictes in the bozders of Galloway, and there renued the auncient league betwixt the Scottiſhe men and Pictes. For more corroboration whereof, Sibylla the daughter of Gethus the thirde king of the Pictes, was ioyned in maryage with Ederus, the ſolemnization being kept at Epiake.

An enterview betwixt the kings of Scot and Picte.

These thinges thus accompliſhed, Ewin returned vnto Dunſtafage, where being certified by letters from the Lieutenant of Roſſe, that the Flanders of Orkney had paſſed Pictland Fyth, and were entered into Cathenele, robbing and ſpoyling that Countrey with a greate part of Roſſe, he leuied an armie with all ſpeede, and haſted towardes the enimies, conſtrayning them by his ſodaine comming to fight whether they woulde or not, hauing no leyſure to gette away, ſo that with ſmall reſiſtaunce they were vanquiſhed and chaſed, ſome into the mountaynes, and other to the Sea ſide; of whome part eſcaped by Boates ouer into their Countreys, the reſidue of them in this their ſodaine ouerthrow being eyther ſlaine, drowned, or taken. But Bladus the king of Orkney, for that he woulde not come into his enimies handes, ſlue himſelfe. And thus ended this enterpriſe againſt the enimies of Orkney: greatly to the encreaſe of Ewins fame amongſt the Scottiſh nation.

The people of Orkney inuade Cathneſe.

Bladus king of Orkney ſleeth himſelfe.

After this he viſited the weaſt partes of hys Realme, and at the mouth of the ryuer of Lochtey he buylded a Citie whiche he named Enuerlochtey, enfranchiſing the ſame with a Sanctuarie for the refuge of offenders. Thys Citie afterwardes was muche frequented wyth Marchauntes of Fraunce and Spaine, by reaſon of the great aboundance of Salmons, Herrings, and other fiſhe whiche was taken there. The olde ruines of this Citye in part remayne to be ſeene in that place where it ſtoode, euen vnto this day.

Enuerlochtey is buylded.

He likewiſe buylt an other Citie in the Eaſt parte of the Realme neare to the water called Lochneſſe, which he named Enuerneſſe, after the name of the ſame water. Whither in tymes paſt there reſorted many Marchantes of Germanie, wyth ſuch marchandiſe as the Inhabitantes of the Countrey there ſtoode in neede of, exchaunging the ſame with them for Marterne ſkinnes, and other ſuch furres, wherewith they made their returne. This Citie is as yet remayning, and beareth the olde name, rich and well ſtored with diuerſe kinds of Marchandiſe, ſo that this Ewin proued a moſte famous Prince for his worthie exployctes right fortunately atchieued, bothe in peace and warre. And finally vnderſtanding the death of his deare and entyerlye beloued friende Eadall, hee repayred vnto Epiake, as well to Comming therefore to Epiacke: and setting an accorde betwixt the yong men, hee caused an Image to be made in all poyntes resembling the personage of Cadal, as neare as might be: which he placed in the myddest of the Market steede, commaunding the same to be honoured wyth burning of Incense and other diuine Ceremonies.

Within fewe dayes also, through inwarde sorrow, as was thought, for the losse of so deare a friende, he began to ware sicke himselfe, and at length perceyuing he shoulde not escape present death, he caused Ederus (of whome before mention is made) to be brought vnto him, into whose handes with many wholsome aduertisementes howe to vse himselfe in gouernment of his subiects, he wholy resigned the estate, the which after his decease he knew to be due vnto him without all question and controuersie: and afterwarde departed this worlde when he had raigned seuentene yeares continually for the most part in high wealth and felicitie.

Ewin resigneth the estate.

Ewins decease.

Ederus.

After the decease of Ewin, Ederus was in maner before expressed receyued for king by the whole assent of all the Scottishme. Whose chiefe delighte was altogyther in hunting and keeping of Hounides and Greyhoundes, to chase and pursue wilde beastes, and namely the Woolfe the herdmans foe, by meanes whereof his aduancement was muche the more acceptable amongest the Nobles, who in those dayes were wholly gyuen to that kynde of pleasure and pastyme.

In the begynning of his raigne there was no trouble towardes, the publike state of the Realme being mayntayned by vpright iustice, and all transgressions through terrour of due punishmente politikely repressed.

The first that went about to put him to any notable trouble, was one Bredus of the Iles, neare of kinne to Gillus that vsurper and murtherer, who with a power of Irish men and other of the westerne Iles landed in Argyle, wasting and spoyling the countrey with fire and sworde; whereof Ederus being aduertised (who was the same time in those partes a hunting amongst the mountaynes) gathered an armie with all speede, and hasting to the place where his enimies ships lay at ancre, he first burned ẏ same, to take away all meane from them to escape by flight.

Ederus burneth his enimies ships.

The

The morning next following he did set vpon them also at vnwares: of whome some hee slue, and the residue being taken, either in the fight or chase, by his commaundement were hanged, and cruelly executed to the example of all others.

Ederus went into the western Isles.

After this, he passed ouer into ỳ western Iles, where hee did execution vpon such as had ayded Bzedus, putting some to death, and causing other to fine at his pleasure, and depziuing some vtterly of all that euer they had.

Cassybilane king of the Brytaynes, requireth of the Scottish men ayde agaynst the Romaines

At his returne againe into Scotlande, there met him Ambassadours sent from Cassybilane king of the Bzytaynes, requzying him of ayde agaynst Julius Cesar, who (as the same king had perfite vnderstanding) was appoynted very shortly to passe the seas from Fraunce, ouer into this Ile, with a mightie power of Romaynes, to subdue the Inhabitants vnto the seigniozie and iurisdiction of Rome.

Androgeus chiefe Ambassadour of the Brytaynes, declareth the effect of his message.

Ederus receyued these Ambassadours very courteously: and forsomuch as their maysters request requzyed counsell, hee caused his Lozdes whiche were then present, to assemble togyther the nexte daye, afoze whome he willed that Andzogeus chiefe of the Bzitish Ambassadours, shoulde declare the effect of his message, which he did so eloquently and vttering such sensible matter, howe it stoode the Scottish men vpon, to ayde the Bzytaynes agaynst suche common enimies to all nations as the Romaynes were, that in the ende it was concluded by the king with the aduice of his nobles, that he shoulde not onely sende a power to ayde the Bzytaynes agaynste the Romaynes, but also sende some of his Lozdes with Andzogeus and his associates vnto Gethus king of the Pictes, to moue him to doe the lyke: who hearing howe reasonable their demaundes were, promised further to accomplish the same.

The Scottes graunt to ayde the Brytaynes agaynst the Romaynes.

Thus the Bzitishe Ambassadours hauing spedde, accozding to their desires, repayzed homewardes: immediately vppon whose departure both the kings, Ederus, and Gethus, leuied their armies, and sent them fozth towardes London where as then Cassybilane soiourned.

Cadallane and Dovald wyth ten thousande Scottish men send to ayde the Brytaynes.

I finde that the Scottes were a ten thousande men vnder the leading of Cadallane gouernour of Galloway, the sonne of Cadall before remembzed, and one Donalde gouernour of Argyle. But what succes followed of this first iourney which Cesar made into Bzytayne, ye shall finde the same in the Hystozie of England moze at length expressed.

The yeare that Julius Cesar came to inuade Bzytaine, was the fourth of Ederus hys raigne, from the creation of the wozlde 3912. complete, whiche is after maister Harisons account 54. before the comming of our Sauiour, and 692. after the buylding of Rome.

The Scottishe men and Pictes hauing theyr part of the spoyle which the Romaynes at theyr departure left behynde them, were sente home to their Countreys with great thankes and rewards foz their paynes, but the Bzytaynes were so exalted in pzyde by the departure of the Romaynes, that they beleeued verily they shoulde haue no moze to do with those enimies, oz if they had, they thought themselues strong ynough to repulse them without ayde of other. By meanes whereof when king Ederus was informed howe the Romaynes prepared to inuade them afresshe, and had sent them word thereof, offering to them his ayde: they made no account of that offer, but answered ỳ it was not necessarie foz euery light inuasion of fozraine enimies to seeke helpe at other mens handes, being of puissance sufficient of themselues to resist the same well ynough.

The Bryt exalted in pride.

The Bryt refuse ayde being offe them.

But of this refusall of so friendly an offer, it was not long ere the Bzytaynes sore repented them. Foz shortly after Julius Cesar with a far greater power than that which he brought wyth him at the first time, landed here in this Ile amongst them againe: and being at three sundzie times fiercely encountred by king Cassybilan, at length hee put the same Cassybilane wyth hys Bzytaynes to flight, slaying and taking a great number of them. Amongst other of the prisoners, were three of their chiefest Captaynes, Andzogeus, Cisentoziges, and Tenantius. By reason of which ouerthzow Cassibylane was so discouraged, that doubting further mischiefe, he yeelded himselfe vnto Cesar, accepting suche conditions of peace as were appoynted him, and foz performance of couenants, delyuered sufficient pledges.

Cesar hauing thus conquered the Bzytayns, sent his Ambassadours vnto the Kings of the Scottish men, and Picts, requiring them to submit themselues as Cassybilane had done, oz else he bad them looke foz open warres at the Romaynes handes, which they might assure themselues they should in no wise be able to sustaine, considering their mightie and huge puissance, hauing the most part of the whole wozlde at theyr commaundement alreadie. Wherevnto aswell the one king as the other, made this oz muchwhat the like answere, that they were bent sooner to lose theyr liues than theyr lybertie. Which their resolution if they were putte to the tryall, shoulde be euidently proued by the deed it selfe.

After the returne of theſe laſt meſſengers, Ceſar was fully reſolued to enter into their Countreys, to force them vnto that by dynt of ſworde, whereunto by treatie he might not enduce them: and had ſet forwarde on that iourney ſhortly after in deede, if he had not beene called backe into Fraunce, to pacifie ſundrie commotions there rayſed by the reuolting of the people inhabiting thoſe Countreys, where the Picardes and Normans, with other the inhabitantes neare aboute Chartres, now dwell.

The common Scottiſhe Chronicles record, howe Julius Ceſar came as farre as Kalendar wood, & there wan by force the citie of Camelon where the Pictiſh kings vſed moſt to ſoiourne.

Hereunto the ſame Chronicles adde, that Ceſar buylded a great ſtone houſe of. xxiiij. cubites in heigth, and of .xij. cubites in breadth, of ſquare hewen ſtones, right workemanly framed, which houſe they ſaye Ceſar cauſed to be vſed in ſteede of a iudgement Hall, and here placed it neare the Ryuer of Caron, ouer againſt the forenamed Citie of Camelone, as a witneſſe that the Romaynes armie had beene ſo farre forwarde within that Countrey.

Howbeit, other more agreeable to the likelyhoode of a troth, wryte that this houſe was ſometymes a Temple, buylded to the honour of Claudius Ceſar, and of the Goddeſſe Victoria, by the Romaine Captaine Veſpaſian, at ſuche tyme as he made warres in that Countrey, before hys aduauncement to the Empyre. Iulius Hoff.

But to returne vnto Ederus. About the ſame time in which he looked to be inuaded by Julius Ceſar and the Romaynes, and for that purpoſe had ſent for them of the weſterne Iſles to reenforce his hoſt, he was now inforced to conuert it another way, for there was one Murketus, nephewe vnto the aboue remembred Gillus, that came with a nauie out of Irelande to robbe and ſpoyle thoſe Iſles, being deſtitute as then of men to reſiſt him. But Ederus hearing thereof, diſpatched Cadallanus with an armie into thoſe parties for defence of his ſubiects: which Cadallanus behaued himſelfe ſo politikely in this exployte, that ſetting vpon the enimies as they lay at ancre, he toke thē in the night ſeaſon without making any great defence, and after hanged thē vp along the ſhore ſide within ỳ Iſle of Gowre: Murket himſelfe being honoured with an higher place to hang in than al the reſt, due to him that was their chief head and leader in that voyage.

The remnant of Ederus his raigne paſſed without any other notable trouble: and ſo after he had raigned 38. yeares, he deceaſſed a very olde man, about the 23. yeare of the Empyre of Auguſtus Ceſar. He was buried alſo at Dunſtafage with all due pompe and ſolemnitie, hauing dyuerſe obelyſkes (as the cuſtome then was) reſted and ſette vp aboute the place where hee was ſo intumulate.

Ewin.

After hym raigned his ſonne Ewyn, the third of that name, nothing lyke in anye princelye qualityes vnto hys noble progenitors, but contrariwiſe infamed in all kynde of vices.

In the firſt yeares of his raigne he was wholy drowned in laſciuious lecherie, abandoning himſelfe altogither to lie waltring amongſt a ſort of vile ſtrumpettes, hys luſt beeing neuer thorowely ſatiſfied, thoughe neuer ſo often awearyed.

A licentious king.

The nobles of the realme he had in no regard at all, of whom ſome he confined, and ſome hee cauſed to be murthered, onely becauſe hee might the more freely without gainſaying haunte hys vile trade of liuing with their wiues and coſins.

Such delite he had alſo in his filthie and moſt abhominable ribaldrie, that he made lawes for maintenance of the like amongſt his ſubiectes, as thus: That it might be lawful for euery man to marrie diuerſe and ſundrie wiues, some ten, according to their ſubſtance and qualities. And as for poore mennes wiues, they were appoynted to be common vnto the Lordes of the ſoyle: and further that the ſame Lordes ſhoulde firſt deflowre the Bride after hir mariage: which laſt ordinaunce toke ſuch effect, that of manye hundred yeares after it coulde by no meanes be abrogated, thoughe the two former liberties were by authoritie of the Kings ſucceeding, ſhortly after this Ewins deceaſſe taken away and reuoked.

Fylthie lawes.

But now to cõclude touching ẏ doings of this Ewin, ye ſhal vnderſtand, ẏ at length ſuch lords as greatly abhorred his vile conditions and vſages, conſpired againſt him, and raiſing an armie of their friendes and partakers, encountered with him in the fielde, and there toke him priſoner, being deſtitute of all ayde and ſuccours: For ſuch as he brought with him not once offered to ſtrike one ſtroke in his quarell.

Ewin is purſued and forſaken of his ſubiectes.

Ewin being thus taken, was by and by condemned to perpetuall priſon: and Cadallane of whome ye haue heard before, immediately proclaymed gouernour of the Realme. Howbeit the night following after that Ewin (according to the iudgement pronounced againſt him; was committed vnto warde) a preſumptuous yong man, in hope to haue thankes of Cadallane, entred into the chamber where he was cnclоſed, and there ſtrangled him. But in ſtede of thankes he was recompenced with death: for Cadallane deteſting ſuch a wicked deed, cauſed him to be hanged in open ſight of all men.

Ewin condemned to perpetual priſon.

Ewyn is ſtrangled.

Such was the ende of Ewin: being thus diſpatched in priſon, in the ſeuenth yeare after he began his raigne ouer the Scottiſh men, being the 11. yeare of Auguſtus Ceſar his gouernment of the Romaine Empyre.

32. H.B.

After Ewin ſucceeded Metellanus, ſonne to one Carrane, the brother of Edgrus a prince of moſt gentle behauiour.

Metellanus.

This Metellanus mainteyned his ſubiects in great quietneſſe and reſt, without any maner of warres, either forraine or Ciuill.

Such

Such wicked lawes as his predecessour had established, he did what he could to abolishe. But such yong Gentlemen as delited in sensuall lust, and licentious libertie, stoode so stiffely therein agaynst him, that in the ende he was glad to leaue off his purpose.

About the same time also there came vnto Kymbaline king of the Brytayns an Imbassa-dor from Augustus the Emperour, with thanks, for that entring into the gouernment of the Britishe estate, he had kept his allegeance towarde the Romaine Empyre: exhorting him to keepe hys subiects in peace with all their neighbours, sithe the whole worlde through meanes of the same Augustus, was now in quiet, without al warres or troublesome tumults.

These Imbassadours went also vnto Metellanus the king of the Scottish men, exhorting him to acknowledge a superiorite in the Romaine Emperour, vnto whome the people inhabiting in the furthest partes of the East, had sent their ambassadors with rich iewels to present his person withall. Wherewith Metellanus being partly moued to haue a friendly amitie with the Romaines, he sent vnto Rome certaine rich presents to the Emperour, and to the Goddes in the Capitoll, in signe of honour, by whiche meanes he obteined an amitie with the Romaines, which continued betwixt them and his kingdome for a long time after.

Thus a generall peace as then raigning thorowout the whole worlde, it pleased the gyuer and author of all peace to bee borne at the same tyme, of that blessed virgin Marie, in the Citie of Bethleem in the tribe of Juda. Which blessed and salutiferous byrth came to passe in the xij. yeare of Metellanus hys raigne, and in the xlij. of Augustus hys Empyre: from the fyrste establishing of the Scottishe kingdome by Fergusius 324. yeares, and after the creation of the worlde 3966. as Harison in his Chronologie doth manifestly conclude.

After this, Metellanus raigned certain yeares in continuall peace and quietnesse, euer readie to do the thing that might bee to the contentation and weale of his people.

Finally, hee passed oute of this life in the xxxix. yeare of his raigne, which was the. xxxij. after the byrth of our Saiuour, and. xij. of Tyberius the Emperor. Howbeit he left no issue aline behind him to succeede in the gouernment of the kingdome: for those children which hee had begotten, hee buried in his life time, by meanes whereof, one Caratake, sonne to Cadallane, and nephewe to king Metellane by his sister Europeia, was proclaymed King, as he that excelled in ryches and puyssaunt auctho*r*itie aboue all other the peeres and highe estates of the realme, and had not a little to doe in the administration of publike affayres in the latter dayes of his vncle Metellane.

Metellane departeth this worlde. 29. H.B. 14. H.B.

Caratake is proclaymed king.

This Caratake all the Brytish and Englishe writers take to be a Brytaine, and inhabiting within that portion of the Ile now called Englande.

Caratake.

The first thing he did after he was established in the estate, he sailed into the westerne Iles to appease a rebellion moued by the Gouernour there. Which done, and the authours punished, he returned into Albion, and came vnto Carricronium, whiche was sometymes a famous Citie, and Metropolitane of Scotlande, situate within the Countrey cleped Carryche, as it appeareth by the ruynes there remayning euen vnto thys daye.

In this Citie was Caratake borne, and therfore fauouring it the more, hee lay there moste commonly, and did what he coulde to aduaunce the wealth and state thereof.

Caratake was borne in Carricke.

Whilest these things were a doing in Scotlande, Kymbaline king of the Brytaynes dyed, who for that hee had beene brought vp in Rome, obserued his promised obedeince towardes the Empyre: but Guiderius succeeding disdayned to see the libertie of his countrey oppressed by the Romaines, and therfore procuring the Brytains to assist him, assembled a power and inuaded the Romaines with such violence that none escaped with life, but suche as saued themselues within Castels and Fortresses. The Emperour Claudius that then gouerned the Romaine Empyre aduertised hereof, sent two Captaynes, Aulus Plancius, and Cneus Sensius to appease that rebellion. They landing in Brytaine with their armie, vanquished Guiderius in battaile, so that he was constrayned to send vnto Caratake king of Scots for ayde agaynst the common enimies of both nations. Caratake hauing considered the effect of this Message, gaue counsaile to the Brytaynes to sende into Fraunce then called Gallia, to practise with the people there to moue some rebellion agaynst the Romaines, in hope of helpe, whiche they were assured to haue by the Brytaynes. This counsaile was followed, for immediately immediatly vpon the Ambaſſadours returne, there were ſent ouer into Fraunce certain intelligenſaries to moue ſome conſpiracie which had taken effect (by reaſon of the generall hate of ſeruitude wherein the Romaines kepte the people ſubiect to them in thoſe dayes) if Guiderius had not beene conſtrayned to giue battayle, and chaunced to be ſlaine in the ſame ere the Gaulles coulde bee reſolued vppon any determinate purpoſe. This ouerthrowe beeing reported in Fraunce, cauſed the Gaulles to ſtay theyr intended rebellion. Shortly after Claudius hymſelfe came ouer into Brytayne, and receyuing the Brytaynes vnder his obeyſaunce, ordered things among them at his pleaſure. And after preparing his nauie and armie with all purueyaunce conuenient, hee ſet forwarde towardes the Iſles of Orkney, purpoſing to conquere the ſame, for that they had ayded the Brytaynes in theſe laſt warres againſt the Romaines. But approching neare to thoſe Iſles, he was in danger to haue beene caſt away by a tempeſt ryſing by chaunce, euen as he was entered the ſtreyte betwirt the Orkeneys and Dungſbie heade in Catenese called Pictlande Fruth: yet at length getting to lande, hee founde in that Iſle where hee kyſt arryued, no bodie at home, all the people through feare vpon the firſt ſight of the great multitude of ſhippes beeing fled to hyde themſelues in caues and dennes amongeſt the rockes and mountaynes.

Guiderius ſlaine.

The Emperor Claudius cometh into Brytaine.

Claudius ſayleth into the Orkneys.

Claudius therefore leauing this Iſle, paſſed into Pomonia the chiefeſt of all the Orkneys, where diſcomfiting ſuche as appeared abrode to make reſiſtance, he beſieged the king of theſe Iſles named Ganus, within a Caſtel whither hee was withdrawne, and finally cauſing him to yeelde himſelfe priſoner, led him with other nobles of Brytayne (whome hee had for pledges) vnto Rome, the more to ſet forth the glorie of his triumph at his returne vnto the Citie.

Now Kirkewale.

Claudius taketh the king of the Orkneys.

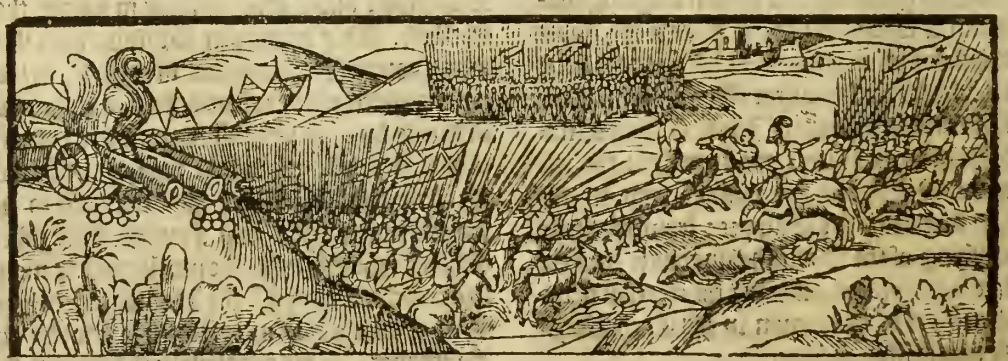
But whatſoeuer Hector Boetius and others write of this paſſage of Claudius into the Orkneys, it is not like that he came there at all, for if he ſtayed not paſt .xbj. dayes in Brytayne, as by Dion Caſſius it appeareth that hee did not in deed, how ſhould we ymagin that he coulde both pacifie the South partes of Brytayne, and after go into Orkney and conquere the ſame within ſo ſmall a time, being readie to returne towardes Rome at the ende of thoſe .xbj. dayes, as the ſayd Dion affirmeth? But this diſcourſe haue I made according to their owne Hiſtories, leaſt I ſhould ſeeme to defraude them of whatſoeuer glorie is to be gotten by errours, as the maner is of them as well as of other Nations, whiche to aduaunce their antiquities and glorie of theyr auncetours, take the aduantage oftentymes of writers ſcant worthie of credite.

The doubt of Claudius going into the Orkneys.

Dion Caſſius.

But nowe againe to our purpoſe. Aruiragus being eſtabliſhed in the kingdome of Brytayne, vpon ſome priuate diſpleaſure forſooke his wyfe named Voada, the ſiſter of Caratake king of the Scottiſh men, and maryed one Geniſſa a Romaine Ladie, whiche acte manye of the Brytaynes diſallowed, the more in deede, bycauſe he had fayre iſſue alreadie by Voada, as a ſonne and two daughters. But this was done, as all men iudged, by the counſell of Iulus Planctius, thereby to breake all friendſhip and alliaunce betwirt the Brytaynes and Scottes, to the ende that in no eaſe of rebellion they ſhould ioyne their powers togither.

Aruiragus ſaketh ful wife.



Neither did he onely refuſe Voada, whom al men knewe to be his lawfull wife, but alſo cauſed hir to be kept in priſon, till that the Brytayns (hauing indignation thereat) got hir out of the place where ſhe was kept, and conueyed hir into Wales, togither with hir children.

Voada ſeuered.

Voada ſeuered priſon, conueyed Wales.

With which dealing Aruiragus being highly moued, determined with force of armes to puniſh them that had thus miſuſed him: but perceyuing that not onely thoſe people which inhabited the Countrey, nowe called Wales, and other that adioyned on the North Marches therof were readie to defende the Queene againſte his malice, he was fayne to require ayde of the Romaynes, who with their Captaine Iulus Planctius aſſembling togyther with ſuch of the Brytayns as toke part with Aruiragus, ſet forwarde towarde the enimies, and ioyning with them in battail, did giue them the ouerthrow.

Aruiragus ueth his mies an uerthrow

The

The next day after this victorie thus gotten, worde was brought that the people inhabiting in the countreys, which we now cal Lancaſhire, Yorkſhire, and Darbiſhire, were vp in armor agaynſt the king and the Romaines, by reaſon whereof Aruiragus and Iulus Planctius withdrewe towardes London, that defending the ſea coaſtes towards Fraunce, they might yet haue the ſea open at all tymes whatſoeuer chaunced.

And to reenforce their power, Iulus Planctius ſent ouer for two Legions of Souldiors into Fraunce, to come with all ſpeede to his ayde.

The Brytaynes who had gone ſo farre in the matter that they could not wel withdraw themſelues, now being certified of al their enimies doings, thought beſt to make themſelues ſo ſtrong as was poſſible. And to the ende that they might proceede in ſome orderly meane, all the greateſt Lordes & eſtates aſſembled togither at Shrewſburie, in thoſe dayes called Cozuminum, where they concluded vppon a league to ayde one another with all their might and maine agaynſt the Romaines and Aruiragus, who went aboute to bring them wholy vnder ſeruile ſubiection and thraldome of the ſame Romaines.

They beeing thus agreed to make warres in this quarell, and for the ſame purpoſe to ioyne theyr whole puyſſance togither, there roſe a doubt whome they myght chooſe for theyr generall Captaine, for that it was feared leaſt there might growe ſome ſecrete enuie amongeſt the Nobles being of equal power, if one ſhould be in this caſe preferred before an other.

For the auoyding of which miſchiefe, by the graue admonition of one Comus, a noble man of the parties of Wales, they accorded to ſende Meſſengers vnto Caratake the King of Scotlande, requyring him to ayde them in their right and iuſt quarel agaynſt Aruiragus and the Romaines, whereby hee might reuenge the iniurie done to his ſyſter Queene Voada and hir iſſue, whome the father throughe counſayle of the Romaines purpoſed to diſenherite, to the ende, ſuche chyldren as he had by Geniſſa (for that they were of the Romain bloud) might enioy the kingdome.

They further declared, that all the Brytiſhe Lordes, whiche were confederate in this enterpriſe, had choſen him by common aſſent to bee their general and chief leader, if it might ſo pleaſe him to take it vpon him, as their truſt was hee would: conſidering the iuſt cauſes of their warre, and the ſurertie whiche by victorie gotten might enſue vnto al the inhabitants of the whole Iſle of Albion.

Caratake hauing heard the ſumme of their requeſt, and throughly waying the ſame, promiſed them to be readie with his whole puiſſance in the beginning of the next ſpring, to come to theyr ayde, vnto what place ſoeuer they ſhoulde thinke expedient: and thereof hee tolde them, they myght be moſt aſſured: willing them in the meane time ſo to prouide for themſelues, as theyr enimyes myght haue no aduauntage at their handes.

With this agreeable anſwere the Brytiſhe Meſſengers returned vnto Shrewelburie to the confederates, who reioyſing at the newes, made proviſion agaynſt the next Spring to goe agaynſt the Romaines, in hope of good ſucceſſe, ſpecially throughe ayde of the Scottes and Pictes, who alſo wyth theyr King called Conkyll were willing to helpe towardes the delyuering of the lande from bondage of the Romaines, whoſe neſtling ſo neare their noſes, they were loth to ſee or heare of.

The Pictes ioyne with Scottes and Brytaynes, agaynſt the Romaines.

So ſoone therefore as the ſpring approched, all thoſe three people, Brytaynes, Scottes, and Pictes, gathered theyr powers togither, and met in Yorkeſhyre, in purpoſe to encounter wyth theyr enimyes in battayle, whereſoeuer they founde them.

Aruiragus & Iulus Planctius hauing knowledge of all the doings of the confederates, likewyſe aſſembled their power, and comming towardes them, for a while forbare to ioyne in battayle, throughe counſaile of Planctius, who perceyuing the moſt part of the Brytaynes and Scottes to be but newe Souldiers, taken vp of late to fil the numbers, knew that by protracting tyme they woulde be ſoone out of heart, throughe watching and euill harborough, in ſuch ſort that in the ende they ſhoulde be eaſie ynough to deale with: and euen ſo it came to paſſe. For the Romaines refuſing to fight a generall battayle, yet ſcoured ſo the fieldes on eche ſide abrode, that neyther the Brytaynes nor Scottes coulde goe forth any wayes for forrage or vittailes, but they were ſtil ſnatched vp, ſo that what through hunger, lacke of ſleepe, and other diſeaſes, many of the Brytaynes began to conuey themſelues from the campe home to theyr houſes, of whome ſome beyng taken by the enimies, declared y the whole armie of the confederates was in great diſtreſſe and ſore enfeebled by ſuche vnaccuſtomed trauaile and diſeaſes as they were enforced vnto in the campe. Whereupon Aruiragus and Iulus Planctius determined the next day to giue battaile. And ſo in the morning they arrayed theyr people and marched forth betymes towardes the campe of the confederates.

The Brytaynes awearied through trauaile.

Caratake who (as ye haue heard) was generall of all the confederates, vnderſtanding the enimies intent, was as readie to receyue battayle as they were to offer it: whereupon there enſued right great and vnmercifull ſlaughter betwixt

Caratake returneth home to Caricto-nium.

Aruiragus and Plancius got them vnto London: and Caratake commaunding his people home eche man into his Countrey, he himſelfe withdrewe firſt towardes Yorke, and after vnto the Citye of Carrike. Whither ſhortly after there came vnto him Ambaſſadors from Aulus Plancius, ſent to knowe vpon what occaſion hee did ayde the Britiſhe rebelles againſt the Romaine Empyre, declaring that if he woulde not be conformable to make a worthie amendes for ſo preſumptuous an enterpriſe, he ſhoulde be ſure to haue the Romaines his enimies: and that in ſuche wiſe, as he ſhoulde perceyue, it were muche better for him to ſeeke their friendſhippe, than to abyde their eminitie. Hereunto Caratake anſwered, that he had iuſt cauſe to do that which he did. Conſidering the iniuries which his ſiſter Voada with hir ſon Guiderius had & were lyke to receyue by their counſel & meanes: & therefore he was ſo little mynded to make any amendes for that was done, that he thought it more reaſon that the Romaines ſhoulde clearly auoyd out of the whole poſſeſſion of Britaine, eyther elſe they might aſſure themſelues to haue aſwell the Britaynes, as alſo the Scottes and Pictes to be their perpetual enimies, and that onely for the chalenge of their auncient liberties & freedom.

Ambaſſadors are ſent vnto Caratake from Aulus Plancius.

Caratake his anſwere vnto the Ambaſſadours.

The Romaine Ambaſſadors being returned with this anſwere, Plancius toke no ſmall indignation therat, ſore menacing to be reuenged of ſo high and contumelious wordes pronounced againſt the maieſtie of the Romaine Empyre.

About the ſame tyme Aruiragus vpon truſt conceyued by ioyning his power with the other confederate Britaynes to expulſe the Romaines quite out of the realme, and ſo to recouer the entyre eſtate reuolting from thē, fled vnto Shrewſburie, where the ſame time ſuch Britiſh Lordes as were enimies to the Romaines, were aſſembled againe in coūſail, by whom Aruiragus was receyued with great gladneſſe (ye may be ſure) of thoſe Lordes, truſting by his meanes to haue their force in maner doubled. Aruiragus reuolteth.

His wife Geniſſa being the ſame ſeaſon great with childe, toke ſuch thought for this reuolting of hir husband, that trauayling before hir tyme, ſhe immediately dyed therewith. Geniſſa the wife of Aruiragus dieth.

But Iulus Plancius perceyuing now thoroughly how little truſt there was to be put in the Britaynes, diſpatched a meſſenger in all haſte with letters vnto Claudius the Emperour, who as then ſoiourned at Rome, ſignifying vnto him in what daunger the ſtate of Britaine ſtode, if tymely prouiſion were not the ſooner made. A meſſenger ſent vnto Claudius the Emperour by Plancius.

Claudius waying the matter by good aduiſe of counſaile, ordeyned by decree of the Senate, that Veſpaſian (of whom ye haue heard before) ſhould be ſent hither with an armie to tame the proude and loftie ſtomackes of the Britaynes, with their confederates the Scottes and Pictes.

Veſpaſian hereupon departing from Rome, came into Fraunce, and encreaſing his legions, with a ſupplie of ſuch ſoldiers as he found there, paſſed ouer into this our Britaine, where contrarie to the report which he had heard afore hys comming, he founde euery fortreſſe ſo wel furniſhed after ỳ warlik order of the Romaine vſage, and moreouer all ſuche companies of menne Veſpaſian commeth to Bryu of warre as kept the field, ſo well appoynted and ordered, that he coulde not but much prayſe the greate diligence and politike gouernment of Plancius.

Nowe when Veſpaſian had a little refreſhed his men, and taken order howe to proceede in the reducing of the Brytaynes to theyr former obedience, he ſet forwarde towarde Aruiragus and other the enimies, whome he vnderſtode as then to be at Yorke making their aſſemble, not generally of all that were able to beare a Clubbe, as they did the yeare before, but out of all parties a choſen number of pyked men were ſent for, as out of Deuonſhire and Cornewal there came ſix thouſande: forth of Wales and the marches xij. thouſande, and the lyke number forth of Kendal, Weſtmerlande, and Cumberlande. Out of Oxfordſhire and other the partyes of Brytayne ſubiect vnto Aruiragus, there came a. xxxb. thouſād. All which numbers aſſembled neare vnto Yorke, euery man bringing hys prouiſion with him to ſerue him for two Monethes ſpace. Vnto the ſame place came alſo Caratake with. xxx. thouſande Scottiſhe men: and Illythara otherwyſe called Tharan, king of the Pictes, with almoſte as many of his ſubiects.

Veſpaſian being certified ſtill from tyme to tyme of all the doings of hys enimies, haſted with all ſpeede towardes them. And by the leading of truſtie guydes comming to the place where they were encamped within a Marriſhe grounde not paſſing. xij. myles from Yorke, hee fiercely vpon a ſodaine ſetteth vpon them wythin their campe ere they thought that he had beene neare them. But yet notwythſtanding they manfully ſtode to their defence: inſomuch, that thoſe in the right wing of the Romaines armie, were lyke to haue beene diſtreſſed, if Veſpaſian perceyuing the daunger, had not ſent a Legion to their ayde in tyme, wherby the battayle was newly in that part reſtored.

Veſpaſian aſſayleth the Brytaynes in their campe.

The Captaynes on eyther ſyde did what they coulde to encourage their ſolkes to ſticke to their tackle without giuing ouer by any meanes, conſidering what gaine came by victorie, and what loſſe enſued by receyuing the ouerthrow.

The Brytaynes, Scottes, and Pictes, lyke enraged Lyons, ranne vpon the Romaines, with ſuch cruel deſire of reuenge, that euen when they were thruſt through vpon the poynt of any weapon, they woulde runne ſtill vpon the ſame, to come vnto him that helde it, that they might requite him with the like againe. But yet would not all that their fierce and deſperate hardineſſe preuaile, for fortune by fatall appoyntment being bent to aduaunce the Romains vnto the dominion of the whole worlde, ſhewed hir ſelfe ſo fauourable vnto them in this battaile, that in the ende, thoughe the Brytaynes wyth the confederates did what lay in men to do for attayning of victorie, yet were they beaten downe and ſlain euerie mothers ſonne, a fewe onely except, which eſcaped by flight.

Aruiragus ſeeing the ſlaughter of his people, woulde haue ſlaine himſelfe, but that ſome of his ſeruantes caryed hym by force out of the fielde, that hee myght bee preſerued yet vnto ſome better fortune.

Caratake eſcapeth. Tharan king of the Pictes is ſlaine.

Caratake eſcaping by flight, fled into hys countrey, but Tharan king of the Pictes, not coueting to liue after ſuch loſſe of his people, threw away his armor with al his kingly ornaments, & ſitting downe vpon a ſtone, as a mā paſt himſelf, was there ſlain by ſuche as followed in the chaſe.

Aruiragus being conueyed out of danger, and gotten into Yorke, conſydered howe by reaſon of this great diſcomfiture, it was impoſſible to reſiſt the Romaine puiſſaunce, and therefore with consent of the residue of his Nobles that were escaped from the battaile, hee sent an Heralde vnto Vespasian, offering to submit himselfe in moste humble wyse vnto any reasonable conditions of peace and agreement. Whereupon Vespasian commaunded that Aruiragus should in priuate apparell come in vnto him, for he would not talke of any peace, except he had Aruiragus present, and therefore hee sent vnto him his safe-conduct to assure him safe both to come and goe.

Aruiragus cõmeth in vnto Vespasian. Aruiragus is restored again to his former dignitie.

Aruiragus seeing no other remedie, came in vnto Vespasian, according to his appoyntment, and vpon his submission was pardoned of all his trespasse, and placed againe in the kingdome.

The Brytaynes are pardoned but yet deliuer newe hostages.

The Cities and good townes also that were partakers in the rebellion, were in semblable wyse forgiuen without fining or other indemnitie, and so likewise were all the Nobles of the Countrey. Howbeit for the better assuraunce of their loyaltie in tyme to come, they delyuered new hostages.

Their lawes abrogated. New lawes.

Their auncient lawes also were abrogated, and the Romain lawes in their place established. For the administration of the whiche, in euery prouince was appointed a Romaine iudge to see good orders obserued according to the fourme thereof. By which meanes the Brytishe nation eftsoones returned vnto hir former obedience of the Romain Empyre.

All the winter following, Vespasian laye at Yorke, making his appresses agaynste the nexte spring to go againste the Scottes and Pictes. So soone therefore as the Sommer was come, Vespasian setteth forward with his armie, and entering into the marches of his enimies, hee did put them in such feare, that the Pictes were glad to yeeld themselues vnto him, a few of the nobles & some other except, which were withdrawne into Camelon, in hope through strength of that town to defend themselues from all assaultes.

Camelon sieged by Vespasian.

Vespasian being certified therof, came and besieged them within the same city, not minding to depart till he had them at his pleasure. This siege cõtinued til they within being in dãger to famish through want of vittailes, surrendred themselues with the towne into Vespasians handes.

Camelon rendred.

The kings regall ornaments taken.

In this towne were founde all the regall ornaments: as the crowne, and swoorde, with other iewels belonging to the kings of the Pictes. The swoorde hauing the haft of golde, and a purple scabbarde verie finely wrought and trimmed, Vespasian vsed to weare in all the warres wherein he afterwardes chaunced to bee, in hope (I cannot tell) of what good successe and lucke to follow thereof.

The Pictish Lordes which were within Camelon, were commaunded to deliuer pledges: and after licẽced to depart without any other domage Camelon peopled with Romaines.

Also ouer agaynst the towne vpon the banke of the Ryuer of Carone, he buylded a Temple, in honour of the Emperour Claudius, wherein he sette vp two Images, the one representing Claudius, and the other the Goddesse Victoria.

Caratak assembled armie.

Whilest he was thus occupied, tidings came to him, that Caratake king of the Scottish men had assembled in Galloway, a great armie of Scottes, Pictes and Brytaynes, in purpose to come agaynst the Romaines, to reuenge the last ouerthrow. Whervpon Vespasian with al speede sent forth a strong power vnder the leading of Iulus Planctius to encounter the enimies.

Planctius sent for an armie gaynst ratake.

Planctius being approched within foure miles of them, encamped himselfe in a strong place, as as thoughe hee minded not to passe further, tyll Uespasian with the residue of his whole puissance were come to his ayde. Neuertheless nyght was no sooner come on, but that hee gaue generall commaundement throughe his hoste, that euerie man shoulde make him readie to depart at a certaine houre vnder the Standarts of their captaynes in order of battaile. And so in the second watche of the night, he set forwarde, following certaine guydes, (which knew all the straytes and passages of the countrey) till he came to the place where Caratake with his armie was lodged: and first killing the watche that stoode to defende his entrance, till the armie was raysed, he set vpon the whole campe, and though he founde suche resistaunce, that the battaile continued right fierce and cruell from the dawning of the daye, tyll it was highe Noone, yet in the ende the victorie remayned with the Romaines, and the Scottes with the Pictes, and suche Brytaynes as were on their parte, put to flight and chased. Caratake escaping out of the battaile, fled into Argyle, and got him to the Castel of Dunstafage.

Dyuerse of the Brytaynes and Pictes which as yet had not submitted themselues, were put in such dread throughe brute of this ouerthrow, that immediately thereupon they came in and yeelded themselues vnto Uespasian. And in semblable wise the people of Galloway vtterly dyspayring longer to defende theyr Countrey against Plancius (who was nowe entered into their confines, and had taken the Citie of Carricke) offered to become subiectes vnto the Romaines, which they might neuer be brought vnto before that tyme.

These newes being certified vnto Uespasian by a Purseyaunt, he rode streight wayes vnto Carrike, and there receyued the othes of the nobles, and other the inhabitants of the countrey.

That done, he sent Ambassadours vnto Caratake, to trie if he might perswade him by any meanes to become friende vnto the Romaine Empyre, in acknowledging some maner of subiection thereunto: but this deuise was to small purpose, for Caratake was determined rather to ende hys lyfe as a free Scottishe man in defence of libertie, than to become thrall vnto any forrayne Nation, in hope to liue long tyme in seruitude, doubting least if he came any wayes forth within the daunger of the Romaines, they woulde vsurpe the whole dominion vnto themselues.

Whose mynde when Uespasian vnderstoode by his answer made to the Ambassadours which were sent vnto him, he was minded to haue gone with an armie vnto Dunstafage where Caratake lay, but that he was informed what daungerous passages he must marche throughe, all full of dearte Mountaynes, bogges and quauemyres, without any prouision of vitailes or forrage to be found by all the way as the army should passe.

Leauing therefore this enterpryse, hee caused so many besselles to be assembled, as coulde bee prouided on all partes, purposing to haue passed ouer into the Isle of Man, into the which there were gotten togither a great sort of Brytaynes and Pictes, that had escaped the Romaines handes. But this iourney was also broken by an other incident, for euen the same tyme newes were broughte that the Brytaynes of the Isle of Wyght, with the Kentish men, and diuerse other the inhabitantes vppon the South coast, were reuolted, and had slaine diuerse Romaines, which lay in garisons in those partes.

Vеſpaſian returneth to Rome.

Shoꝛtly after being ſent foꝛ by the Emperour Claudius, hee returned vnto Rome with great glozie foꝛ his noble and high atchieued victoꝛies. Iulus Planctius was left in charge with the gouernment of Bꝛytayne after Uеſpaſians departure: who hearing that Caratake had aſſembled a great armie of Scottes and other ſuch Bꝛytaynes and Pictes as had not yet ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Romains, in purpoſe to recouer againe thoſe Countreys which Uеſpaſian had lately cõquered, he likewiſe pꝛepared to mette them, ſo that both the armies encountering togi-

The Romains through policie vanquiſh the Scottiſh men.

After this ouerthꝛowe the warre was continued foꝛ a two yeares ſpace by rodes and incurſions, made one vppon another in the confines of Kyle and Galloway. In whiche meane tyme Planctius fell ſicke of the Flixe, whiche ſtyll continuing wyth hym, bꝛought hym at length in ſuche caſe, that he was not able to trauayle at all in the publyke affayꝛes of hys office. So that hee wꝛote his Letters vnto the Emperour Claudius, ſignifying vnto him in what caſe hee ſtode, and therevpon requyꝛed that ſome ſufficient perſonage might bee ſent to occupie his rome.

Planctius falleth ſicke.

Claudius hauing receyued his Letters, and vnderſtanding the effect of the ſame, ſente one Oſtoꝛius Scapula, a man of highe lynage, and of good experience both in peace and warre, to haue the gouernance in Bꝛytayne.

Oſtorius Scapula is ſent into Brytayne.

About the tyme of whoſe arriuall into Bꝛytayne, Iulus Planctius departed out of thys woꝛlde at Camelon, where hee then ſoiourned. Hys bodye was burned, and accoꝛding to the vſage of the Romaines in thoſe dayes, the aſhes were cloſed in a Cheſt, and buryed within the Church of Claudius and Victoꝛia, which (as is ſayde) Uеſpaſian buylded neare vnto Camelon, vpon the Riuer ſide there. Hereof was a cuſtome taken vp amongſt both Scottes and Pictes, as ſome thinke, to burne the bodies of the deade, and to burie the aſhes. Whereof there hath beene founde diuerſe tokens and monuments in thys our age. As in the yeare 1521. at Findour a village in Mearne, fiue miles diſtant from Aberdine there were founde in an olde graue two Cheſtes of a ſtraunge making ful of aſhes, either of them being engrauen with Romaine letters, whiche ſo ſoone as they were bꝛought into the ayꝛe, fell to duſt. Likewiſe in the fieldes of an other towne called Kenbacken in Marre a ten myles diſtant from Aberdyne, about the ſame tyme were found by certayne Ploughmen two Sepulchꝛes made of cut and ſquared ſtones, wherein were a foure Cheſtes, of woꝛkemanſhippe, bigneſſe and inſcription lyke to the other two. Many the ſemblable monumentes haue beene founde in diuerſe places in Scotlande in tymes paſt: but it is to be thought, that in theſe Sepultures there were Romaynes buryed, and neyther Scottes noꝛ Pictes.

But nowe to our purpoſe. Immediately vppon the comming of Oſtoꝛius into Bꝛytayne, the the people of the west Countreys rebelled, prosecuting the Northren men with the Scottes of Galloway, and all the Pictes to doe the like.

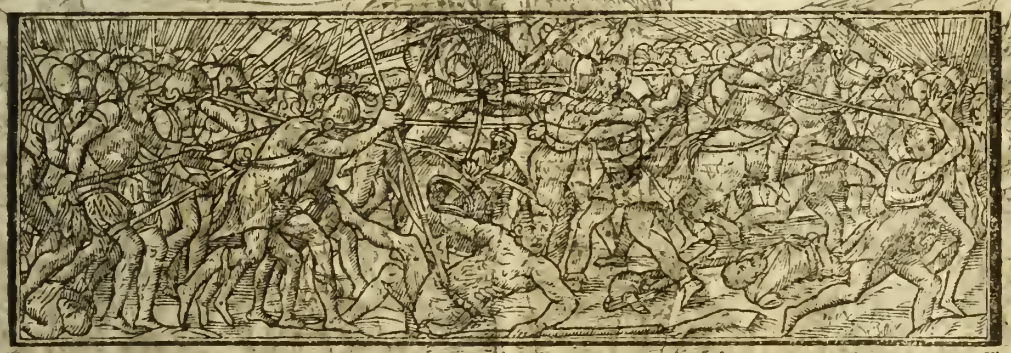
They sent also vnto Caratake, requyring him to in this common quarell against the Romaines to put to his helping hande for recouerie of their auncient libertie of the whole lande of Albion, considering it was like they shoulde matche well ynough with this new Romain captaine Ostorius Scapula, that vnderstoode little of the maners and vsages of the Brytaynes.



But this notwithstanding, Ostorius being enformed of all these practises, and remembring what furtheraunce it were for a captaine in the beggynning to win a name by some prayse worthy enterprise, he made first towards the western Brytaynes, whome he thought to surprise ere they shoulde assemble with the other rebels, and so meeting with them, he chased and toke a great number of them as they fled here and there, out of all order.

After this, he went against the people called Iceni. Iceni, which as some think inhabited the Countrey nowe called Oxfordshire, but others take them to bee Norffolke men, who being gathered together, were gotten into a strong place, enclosed about with a great ditche, as they vse to fence pasture grounds, that no horsemen shoulde

But of this battaile, and likewise of other enterprises which Ostorius and other of the Romaine Lieutenants atchieued here in Brytayne, ye shal find more thereof in the hystorie of Englande according to the true report of the Romaine writers, the which verily make no mention either of Scottes or Pictes tyll the yeare of our Lorde 520. at the soonest. And as for the Silures and Brygantes removed by Hector Boetius so farre Northwarde, it is euidently proued by Humfrey Lluyd and others, that they inhabited Countreys conteyned nowe within the lymyttes of Englande. The lyke ye haue to vnderstande of the Ordouices where Caratake gouerned as king, and not in Carricke, as to the well aduised Reader I doubt not but it may sufficiently appeare, as well in the description as hystorie of Englande aforesayde.

After this he entered into the confines of Kile and Cantyre, spoyling and wasting those countreys, and brought from thence a great number of captiues.

Kile and Cantyre wasted and spoyled.

With which iniurie Caratake being not a little kindled, he assembled a mighty army, wherein he had at the least xl. thousand mē, what of his own subiects & other such as came to his ayde. For after he was entered into Pictland, there came vnto him out of all parties no small number, of such as desired either to be reuenged on the Romains, either else to lose life and libertie both at once, for the taste of bondage was so bitter vnto all the inhabitants of Albion in this season, that they in maner were wholy conspired togither to remoue that yoke of thraldom from their shoulders which so painfully pinched them.

Caratake assembleth an armie.

Caratake thus furnished with an armie, chose forth a strong place to lodge in, fenced on the one side with the course of a deepe swadlesse Ryuer, and on the other sides it might not bee approched vnto for the steepenesse of the cragges and such fencing as they had made with great stones, in places where there was any easie way to enter.

The strength of the place where Caratake was encamped.

Of this matter ye may reade more in Englande.

All suche women as were somewhat stept in age, and came thither with them, in great numbers, were by Caratake placed on eyther syde hys battayles, both as well to encourage the men to doo valiauntly wyth showting and hallowing vnto them, as also to assayle the Romaines with stones as they shoulde approche. Other suche as were yong and lustie, were appoynted to keepe aray amongest the men to fight in the battaile.

Caratake and his Captaynes exhort their men to fight.

Caratake hauing thus ordered his fielde, and hearing that Ostorius was come to giue battail, he exhorted his people to sticke to it like men, and so in semblable wise did all his Captaynes and Sergeantes of the bandes, going from ranke to ranke to encourage their Souldiers, declaring howe that thys was the armie that must eyther bring libertie or thraldome to them and theyr posteritie for euer.

On the other part, Ostorius minding to trie the matter by battaile, sette his people in araye after the auncient maner of the Romaines, willing them to consider that they were discended of those parents and auncetours whiche had subdued the whole worlde: and againe, that those with whome they shoulde now matche, were but naked people, fighting more with a certayne maner of a furious rage and a disordered violence, than with anye politike discretion or constancie.

Ostorius encourageth his Romaines.

Herewith vpon commaundement giuen on both partes, the battaile began right hote, and for a good space verie doubtfull, till the practised knowledge of the Romaines vanquished the furious violence of the Scottes, Pictes, and Brytaynes: who being put to flight, fledde into the Mountaynes to escape the enimies handes, who pursued them most egrely.

Caratake ouerthrowne by the Romains. His Queene was taken.

Amongest other of the prisoners there was taken Caratakes wife, with his daughter and brethren. He himselfe fledde for succour vnto his stepmother Cartimandua: but as aduersitie findeth fewe friends, she caused him to be taken and deliuered vnto Ostorius.

Caratake betrayed by his stepmother.

This was in the ninth yeare after the beginning of the warres.

Ostorius vsed him verie honourably, according to the degree of a king: Finally he sent him vnto Rome, together with his wyfe, his daughter, and brethren. Hys fame was suche through all places, that where hee passed by, the people came flocking in on ech syde to see him, of whom they had hearde so muche report for his stoute resistaunce made so long a time agaynst the Romaine puissance.

Caratake is sent vnto Rome.

At his comming to Rome hee was shewed in tryumphe, all the people being called to the sight: for the victorye and apprehension of him was iudged equall wyth anye other atchieued enterpryse agaynst whatsoeuer the most puissant enimies of former tyme.

The Emperour Claudius vpon respecte as was thought of his Princely behauiour and notifyed valiauncie, restored hym to libertye, and reteyning hys daughter and eldest brother at Rome as pledges, vpon his othe receyued to bee a true subiect vnto the Empyre, he sent him home into his Countrey againe, assigning vnto hym the gouernance of Galloway, with Kile, Carricke and Cunningham.

Caratake restored to libertie.

He lyued not passing a two yeares after hys returne into Scotlande, studying most chiefely during that tyme howe to preserue hys people in peace and quietnesse. Hee departed thys worlde one and twentie yeares after the decrasse of hys vncle Metellane, in the yeare of our Lorde. 54.

Caratake departeth this life.

A little before hys falling into the handes of the Romaines, there were sundrye straunge syghtes seene in Albion, as fighting of horsemenne abroade in the fieldes, wyth greate slaughter, as seemed on bothe partyes: and forthwyth the same so vanyshed awaye, that no appearaunce of them coulde any where bee perceyued.

Also a sort of Wolues in the night season set vpon suche as were keeping cattayle abroade in the fieldes, and caried away one of them to the woodes, & in the morning suffred him to escape from amongst them againe.

Moreouer at Carrike there was a chylde borne, perfit in al his limmes, sauing ẏ head, whiche was lyke to a Rauens. These vnketh sightes and monsters put the people in no small feare: but after that Caratake was restored to his libertie and countrey, all was interpreted to the best.

After Caratakes decease his younger brother Cozbrede was chosen to succeede in his place, in the. lbiij. yeare after Chriſte, for his elder brother was departed at Rome throughe chaunge of aire not agreable to his nature.

This Cozbred was a stoute mã of stomake, much resembling his brother Caratake. In the first beginning of his raigne he did his endeuour to purge his dominion of suche as troubled the quiet state thereof by robbing & spoyling the husbande men and other the meaner people of the coũtrey, of the which robbers there was no small number in those dayes, specially in the westerne Iſles, also in Rosse and Catnese.

In the meane time the Pictes hauing created there a newe king called Conkist, gouernour of Mers & Lothian, they set vpon the Romains being aboute to make fortresses in those parties. And but that succours came in time from the next Townes and Castels adioyning, they had slaine all the whole number of them, and yet ayded as they were, the maister of the campe, and eight other of the captaines, with diuers officers of bands, beside common souldiers, lost their lyues there. The Pictes moue warre against the Romains.

Shortly after also, the same Pictes ouerthrew a number of forragers with suche companies of horsemen as came to defende them. The Pictes ouerthrow the Romaine forragers.

Herewith Ostorius being not a litle moued, made ready his bandes, and fiercely encountred with the Pictes, who defended themselues so vigorously, that the fore warde of the Romains was neare hande discomfited. Whiche daunger Ostorius perceiuing, speedily came to relieue the same, but prealling to farre amõgst his enimies, he was sore wounded, and in greate daunger to haue bene slaine. The night comming vpon parted the fraye, not without huge slaughter on both partes. Ostorius encountreth the Pictes. Ostorius is wounded.

After this, the warre continued still betwixte them with often incursions and skirmishes. At length the Pictes with suche other Brytains as were come vnto them out of the Isle of Man & other parties, encountred with the Romains in battayle, and vpon the firste ioyning, of purpose gaue backe, trayning some of the Romains to pursue them vnto suche places, where they had layde theyr ambusshes, and so compassing them about, slewe a great number of them, and chased the residue into the straytes of the mountaynes, where they were also surprysed by suche of the Pictes as returned from the battayle. The Romains trayned forth into ambusshes and so distressed.

Ostorius vnderstanding how the mater wẽt, withdrewe with the reste of his people vnto his campe: and shortly after sent a Purseuant vnto Rome, to enforme the Emperour in what state things stoode in Brytaine, by reason of this rebellion of the Pictes, who neyther by force nor gentle perswasions could be pacified.

The Emperour determining to prouide remedie therfore, sent worde againe that he would not that the Pictes shoulde be eftsones receyued vpon theyr submission, if they were driuen to make suyte for pardon, but vtterly to be destroyed and exterminated. For the accomplishment whereof, he appoynted two legions of suche men of warre as soiourned in Fraunce to passe ouer into Brytaine.

But in the meane whyle Ostorius departed this worlde, whether of his hurtes as the Scottishe chronicles make mention, or through sicknesse as shoulde rather seeme by Cornelius Tacitus, it forceth not. Ostorius dieth the chiefest charge, who bringyng his army forth to encounter the Pictis that came to seeke battell, was fiercely fought withall. Notwithstãding the victory had abidẽ on his side, if at the very point there had not come succours to the Picts, (that is to witte) iiij.C. horsemen out of the countrey of Kendall, by whose fresh onset the Romains were discõfited and chased vnto their campe, there being slayne aboue.iij.thousande of them at that ouerthrowe, and on the Pictes side there wanted a two thousande of theyr numbers at the least.

The Romains are discõfited by the Picts.

About the same time there arriued in Brytain an other Romain captaine to be generall in place of Ostorius now deceased, his name was Aulus Didius. With him came the.ij.legions afore remembred. At his first comming ouer he mustered the old crewes of the Romaine souldiers first, much blaming them for their negligence in suffering the enimies so to encrease vpõ them, to the great daunger of losing all that, (through slouth and fayntnesse of courage) whiche lately before in Brytaine had bene wonne and cõquered by high prowes and valiant cõduct of his predecessours. In the ende he exhorted them to put away all feare, and fully to determine with themselues, to recouer againe the honour which they had lately lost, whiche he sayde would easily be brought to passe, if they would take vnto them manfull stomackes, and obey him and suche other as had the gouernaunce and leading of them.

Aulus Didius commeth into Brytaine.

The Picts being enformed that this Aulus Didius was arriued with this newe supplie of men and prepared to come against them, they thought good to sende vnto Cozbreide king of Scotlãd to require his ayd against the Romains reputed as commune enimies to al such as loued libertie, and hated to liue in seruile bondage.

The Picts sent to the Scottes for ayde.

For whiche respect Cozbreide was the sooner moued to cõdiscend vnto ỹ request of the Picts: & therupõ assembling an armie entred into Galloway. Whereof Aulus Didius being certified, sent an Herauld vnto him with all speede, commaunding that he should depart out of those quarters, sithe hee had no right there, considering that Galloway was assigned vnto Caratake but for terme of his own life, by force of the Emperours graunt, and now by the death of the same Caratake was reuerted againe vnto the Empire.

The Herauld had vnneath done his message when worde came vnto Cozbreide how an armie of the Romains vnder the guiding of Cæsius Nasica was entred into ỹ marches of Galloway to the great terrour of all the inhabitants, doubting to be spoyled and robbed on eche hande. These newes put the Herauld in no smal daunger of his life, had not Cozbreide vpon regarde to the law of armes licenced him to departe.

Cæsius Nasica entred with an armie into Galloway.

The hoste which Cozbreid brought with him into Galloway, he bestowed in castels and fortresses abrode in the countrey, for more safegard, but he himselfe rode in all haste vnto Epiake, to haue the aduise & ayd of one Venusius, that had maried the forenamed Cartimandua that vnkind stepmother of Caratake, as ye haue heard before. This Venusius was of councell with his wife Cartimandua in the betraying of king Caratake, & therfore was growen into much hatred of the people for that facte, but through support of the Romains he was for a time defended from all their malices. Notwithstanding in the ende being awearied of the proude gouernment of the Romains, he reuolted frõ them vnto Cozbreide. Wherewith his wife being offended, foũde meanes to apprehend bothe him and his brethren with certaine of his kinsfolkes, and layed them fast in prison.

But nowe Cozbreide at his cõming thither, did not onely set them at libertie, but also toke & caused Cartimandua to be buried quicke.

In the meane while a certaine number of Scottes distressed a fewe forragers of the Romains, but following the chase somwhat rashly, they were enclosed by the enimies and slayne. This mischaunce put the Scots in great feare, and the Romains in hope of good successe, so that Nasica was in purpose to haue assayled a certaine strõg place, wherin a numbre of the Scottish nie were gotten, & had fortified ỹ entries, had not other newes altered his purpose: for hearyng howe an other armie of the Scottes was ioyned with the Pictes, and were approched within a three myles of him, hee brought his hoste forth into a playne where hee ordered his battayles ready ready to receyue thē. Whereof the Scottiſh men hauing knowledge, haſted forth towardes him, & were no ſooner come in ſight of the Romains, but that with great violence they gaue the onſet, moſt fiercely beginning the battaile, which continued till ſunne ſetting with great ſlaughter on bothe ſides: At what time the Romains were at the point to haue diſcomfited theyr enimies, had not thoſe Scottiſhmen (whiche were left in forteſſes (as is ſayde) abroade in the countrey, come at that ſelfe inſtant to the ayde of their fellowes, by whoſe meanes the battaile was renewed againe, whiche laſted till that mirke night parted them in ſunder. The Romains withdrewe to theyr campe, and the Scottes and Pictes gotte them vp into the mountaynes.

Shortly after a peace was concluded betwixt the parties, with theſe conditions: that the Romains ſhould content thēſelues with that which they had in poſſeſſiō before the beginning of theſe laſt warres, and ſuffer Corbreide to enioye all ſuche countreys as his brother Caratake held. And likewiſe the Picts paying theyr former tribute for the finding of ſuche gariſons of Romains as lay at Camelone, they ſhoulde be no further charged with any other exactiōs. Moreouer it was agreed, that neither the Scottes nor Pictes from thence forth ſhould receyue or ſuccour any rebelles of French men or Brytains, nor ſhoulde ayde by any maner of meanes the inhabitantes of the Iſle of Man, who had done many notable diſpleaſures to the Romains during the laſt warres.

This peace continued a. vj. yeares during the life of Iulus Didius, who at the end of thoſe vj. yeares, departed this life at London, leauing behinde him all things in good quiet.

After his deceaſſe the Emperour Nero who ſucceeded Claudius, appointed one Uerannius to be lieutenant of Brytaine, a man very ambitious and muche deſirous of honour, by meanes wherof, in hope to aduaunce his name, he ſought occaſiōs to haue warres with the Scottiſh men: And at lengthe hearing that certaine of them being borderers had fetched bootes out of Picte land, he ſent a great power of Romains to make a rode into the nexte Marches of the Scottes, from whence they brought a great ſpoyle, bothe of men and goodes.

With which iniuries the Scottes being moued, ſought dayly in ſemblable ſorte to be reuenged, ſo that by ſuche meanes the warre was renewed. But before any notable encounter chaūced betwixte them, Uerannius died. His laſte wordes were full of ambitious boaſtes, wiſhing to haue liued but two yeares longer, that he might haue ſubdued the whole Iſle of Albion vnto the Romaine Empyre, as if he might haue had ſo muche tyme he doubted not to haue done.

Paulinus Suetonius ſucceeded in his place, a man of an excellent witte and very deſirous of peace. He firſt cōfirmed the auncient league with Corbreide king of Scotlande: a recompence being made in euery behalfe for all wrongs and iniuries done on eyther parte. Paulinus Suetonius.

After this (as Hector Boetius hath gathered) he conquered the Iſle of Man: but for aſmuche as by probable reaſons it is apparant inough that it was not Man, but the Iſle of Angleſey whiche the Brytaines name Mon, and at this time was ſubdued by Suetonius, wee haue here omitted to make report thereof, referring you to the place in the Engliſhe chronicle, where wee haue ſpoken ſufficiently after what ſorte Suetonius bothe attempted and atchieued this enterpriſe, whiche being brought to ende, he was ſent for into Gallia, to repreſſe certaine tumults rayſed among the people there. In whoſe abſence the Brytaines thinking to haue a meete time for their purpoſe, moued a new rebellion, but by the relation of Cornelius Tacitus, this chaunced whileſt Suetonius was buſie in conquering the Iſle of Angleſey, as in the Engliſh chronicle it likewiſe appeareth, with the ſtraunge ſightes and wonders whiche happened about the ſame time, wherevpon the Southſayers (as Hector Boetius hath declared that the Romains ſhould receyue a great ouerthrow. Shortly after he toke vp his tentes and returned towardes Kent, where Catus the procuratour or receyuer as I may call him of Brytaine as then ſoiourned, who vnderſtanding howe the whole Iſle was on eache ſide in an vprore, fled ouer into Fraunce than called Gallia. Charanat king of the Pictes.

Cozbride receyuing but a scorneful answere from him, found meanes to ioyne in league with Charanat king of the Pictes, and gathering together a mightie armie of one and other, pursued the Romains and their associates, slaying down a wonderfull number of them. He also brenned and destroyed diuers townes, such as in keeping their allegiance to the Romains, stode earnestly to their defence as Barwike & Carlile with other.

Dutchmen arriue in Scotland.

About the same season there arriued in the Frithe a number of Dutche ships, fraught with people of Merherne or Mozouia, a regio in Germanie situate betwixt Boheme and Hungarie. They were driuen out of theyr owne countrey by the Romains, and assembling togither vnder a famous captaine named Roderike, came down to the mouth of ỹ Rhine, where making shift for vessels, they toke the seas to seke them some new habitations: and thus arriuing in Pictelande, were ioyfully receyued of the Pictes and Scots, for that they were reputed right valiant men, & glad to reuenge theyr owne iniuries against the Romains. Namely with the Pictes they were much esteemed, for that they came forth of the same countrey from whence theyr auncetours were discended.

Merhernes were men of goodly stature

Theyr huge bodies and mightie limmes did greatly commend them in the sight of all men before whom they mustered, so that comming to the place where the kings of Scottes and Pictes were incamped with their people ready to marche forth towardes the enimies, they were highly welcomed and vpon theyr offer receyued into companie and appoynted to goe forth in that iourney, in ayde of Queene Uoada against the Romains.

Women come with the queene in armor.

With this Uoada was assembled a mightie hoste of the Brytains: amongst whome were a v.M. women, wholy bent to reuenge the villanies done to theyr persons by the Romains, or to die in the payne. And for this purpose were they come well appointed with armor and weapon, to be the first that should giue the onset.

Uoada hearing of hyr brothers approch with the king of Pictes and their armies, met them on the way accompanied with a greate number of the Nobles of Brytaine, and brought them to hyr campe with great ioy and triumphe.

After taking aduise how to behaue themselues in theyr enterprise, they thought it good to make haste to fight with the Procuratour Catus, ere any new power of men of warre might come to his ayde forth of Gallia nowe called Fraunce. Whereupon marching towardes him, they met togither in the fielde, where betwixte them was striken a right fierce and cruel battayle: but in the ende the horsemen of the Romains, parte being first put to flight, the footemen were beaten downe on eache side: Catus himselfe being wounded escaped very hardly by flight, and shortly after got him ouer into Fraunce.

The Romaines are put to flight and ouerthrowen.

Catus was wounded.

The Scottes and Pictes with other the Brytaines hauing atchieued this victory, pursued their enimies fro place to place, so that there died by the sword, what in the batayle and els where in the chase a.lxx.M. Romains & other straungers which serued amongst them, besides a.xxx.M. of such Brytains as ayded the against their owne nation.

The Gouernour Suetonius being then in Gallia, hearing of this ouerthrow, and in what daunger things ſtoode in Brytayne, by reaſon of the ſame, came ouer with two Legions of ſouldiours, and .x. thouſande of other Brygants, as ayders to thoſe Legions.

Uoada the Queene vnderſtanding his arriuall, aſſembled againe hir people, and ſent vnto the Scottes and Pictes to come to hir ayde: who togither with the Mozauians came wyth all ſpeede vnto hir. When they were thus aſſembled, Brytaynes, Scottes, Pictes and Mozauians on one part, and Romaines with theyr aydes on the other, they marched forth to encounter togyther with deliberate myndes to trie the matter by dynt of ſwoord, being earneſtly exhorted therto by theyr gouernours on either ſide. So that ioyning puiſſance againſt puiſſance, they fought a right cruell battaile, manye in the beginning being ſlaine and borne downe on both ſides. But in the ende the victorie abode with the Romaines, the Brytaynes wyth other the Albians were chaſed out of the fielde. There were ſlaine of them at the poynt of a. lxxx. thouſande perſons as Tacitus wryteth. The more part of the Mozauians, togither with their captaine Roderike were in that number. Uoada the Queene doubting to come into the handes of hir enimies, ſlue hir ſelf. Two of hir daughters were taken priſoners, and brought armed euen as they were founde fighting in the battaile, vnto Suetonius.

The eldeſt of them within a fewe monethes after was maryed vnto a noble Romaine named Marius, who had defloured hir before time. He was alſo created king of Britaine by the Emperours authoritie, that thereby the ſtate of the Countrey might bee reduced vnto a better quiet. He vſed to lie moſt an ende in the partyes of Kendale, and named a part thereof (where he paſſed the moſte parte of his tyme altogither in hunting) Weſtmerlande, after his owne name, though afterwardes, when the Romaines were expulſed, a portion of the ſame adioyning nexte to the Scottes, was called Cumberlande.

The Mozauians which eſcaped from the diſcomfiture, had that portion of Scotlande aſſigned forth vnto them to inhabite in, that lyeth betwixt the Riuers of Tozne and Spey, called euen vnto this day Mourrey lande.

Cozbreyd being thus ouerthrowne, and hauing his power greatly infeebled thereby, paſſed the reſidue of his life in quietneſſe: For the Romaines being troubled with ciuill warres, medled neither with the Scottes nor Pictes, but only ſtudied to keepe the ſouth partes of Brytayne in due obedience.

Finally Cozbreyd departed this worlde, after he had raigned a .xxxiij. yeares, and was buried amongſt his elders neare vnto Dunſtafage, with many obeliſkes ſet vp about him. Corbreid dead. Anno Chriſti. 71. H B.

Dardan.

After Cozbreyd ſucceded one Mardan, which for his huge ſtature was afterwarde ſurnamed the great. He was lyneally deſcended from Metellane, who was his great grandfather.

The Nobles and Commons of the Realme choſe him to their king, onely for the good opinion they had conceyued of him in his predeceſſours dayes, by whome he was had in great eſtimation, and had atchieued vnder him manye worthie enterpriſes, ſo that he was thought moſt meeteſt for the rowme, conſidering the ſonnes of Cozbreyd were not as yet come to ripe yeares to enioy the ſame. For the ſayd Cozbreyd had three ſonnes in all, Cozbreyd, Tulcane, and Breeke. The eldeſt had beene brought vp with Uoada, Corbreyd his three ſonnes.

Queene

Queene of the Brytains, whereby he had learned the maners & vsages of the Brytish natiõ, and therevpon was surnamed Galde: for so the Scottish men vse euen vnto this day to name any of theyr owne countrey men that hath learned the courtesie and manners of straunge countreys. But to returne to Dardane, in the beginning of his raigne he gouerned the estate by good indifferent iustice, but after he had cõtinued therin by the space of two yeares, he began to fall into all kinde of vices, remouing from offices such as were vpright bearers of themselues in the same, and aduancing to their places bribers and extorcioners.

Dardane falleth into all kind of vices.

The nobles he had in suspect, fauouring onely suche as through flatterie were by him preferred: And where he was drowned beyond all the termes of honestie in fleshly and sensual lust, yet was his couetousnesse so great, that all was to little which he might lay handes vpon.

He also put to death diuers honorable personages, suche as hee perceyued to grutche at his doings. Hee likewise purposed to haue made away the Sonnes of his predecessour Corbreide, but his trayterous practise being disclosed, the moste parte of the Nobles and commons of the Realme rebelled against him, and sending for Corbreide Galde the eldest sonne of the former Corbreide, remayning as then in the Isle of Man, (where hee shoulde haue bene murthered) they chose him to their King. And at length beating downe all suche as made resistance, they gotte that cruell tyrant Dardane into their handes, and bringing him forth before the multitude, they caused his heade to bee openly striken of.

Corbreide Galde being thus chosen (as I haue sayde) to succeede in the gouernment of Scotland after Dardane, is called by Cornelius Tacitus Galgacus, a prynce of comely personage, and of right noble porte. In the firste beginning of his raygne he punished suche as had bene furtherers of his predecessours misgouernment, and afterwardes hee passed ouer into the Westerne Isles, where he appeased certayne rebelles, which went aboute to disquiet the state of the common wealth there. From thence he sayled vnto the Isles of Lewys and Skie, and put to death certaine offenders that woulde not be obedient vnto their gouernours and iudges. After this hee returned by Rosse, and set a stay also in that countrey, touching certaine misdemeanours of the people there.

Corbreide Galde

Galdus otherwise called Galgacus, a Scotte, Brytaine as other thinke. See more of him in Eng.

Galde punisheth such as disturbe the quiet state of his subiectes.

To bee shorte, hee purged the whole realme of all suche robbers, theeues, and other the lyke offenders agaynst the quiet peace of his subiectes, as were hugely increased by the licencious rule of his predecessour Dardane, and hereunto hee was mightely ayded by the Mozauians, who pursued suche offenders moste earnestly, and brought in vnto him no small number of them, euer as they caught them.

The Mozauians help to apprehende theeues and offenders.

By this meanes was the state of the common wealth brought into better quiet, and the yeare next ensuing being the thirde of Galde his raygne, hee called a counsell at Dunstafage, wherein hee laboured muche for the abrogating of the wicked lawes instituted by king Ewyn, as before is partely specified: but hee coulde not obtaine more than that poore men from thence forth should haue their wiues free to themselues without being abused from time to time indifferently by their landelordes as heretofore they had bene.

Galde labored to abrogate wicked lawes.

Whilest he was thus busied about the establishing of holsome orders and statutes for the wealth of his subiectes, worde was brought him that Petilius Cerialis a Romaine Captaine being sente from Uespasian the Emperour to haue the gouernment of Brytaine, was landed with a puissant armie in the countrey, and minded shortly to inuade the borders of his realme, as Annandale and Galloway.

Petilius Cerialis a Romaine captaine sent by Vespasian into Brytaine.

With these newes Galde being somewhat astonied, thought good to vnderstande the certaintie of the enimies doings, before hee made any sturre for the leauying of his people, & therefore appoynted certaine light horsemen to ride forth, forth, and to bring certaine newes of that whiche they might heare or ſee: who at theyr returne declared that the enimies armie was abroade in the fieldes, vppon the borders of Pictelande, and had giuen the Pictes already a great ouerthrow, and further, howe they were turned weſtwarde on the lefte hande, in purpoſe to enter into Galloway.

Galde being thus certified of the Romains approche towardes his countrey, determined to giue them battayle before they entred into the inner partes of his Realme, and therefore with all ſpeede hee aſſembled his people, to the number of fiftie thouſande menne, all ſuche as were able to beare armor, being readie to repayre vnto him in ſuche preſent neceſſitie for defence of theyr countrey.

It hath bene reported, that as hee marched forth towardes his enimies, ſundrie ſtraunge ſights appeared by the way. An Egle was ſeene almoſt all a whole day, flying vp and downe ouer the Scottiſhe armie, euen as though ſhe had laboured hyr ſelfe weary. Strange ſights appeare to the Scottiſhe armie.

Alſo an armed man was ſeene flying round aboute the armye, and ſuddenly baniſhed away.

There fell in lyke manner out of a darke cloude in the fieldes through the whiche the armie ſhoulde paſſe, diuers kindes of birdes that were ſpotted with bloud.

Theſe monſtruous ſightes troubled mennes mindes diuerſly, ſome conſtruing the ſame to ſignifie good ſucceſſe, and ſome otherwiſe. Alſo the chiefeſt captaynes amongſt the Scottes were not all of one opinion, for ſome of them waying the great force of the Romaine armie, beyng the greateſt that euer had bene brought into theyr countrey before that day, counſelled that they ſhoulde in no wiſe be fought withall, but rather to ſuffer them to weary themſelues, till vitayles and other prouiſions ſhoulde fayle them, and then to take the aduauntage of them as occaſion ſerued: Other were of a contrarie minde, iudging it beſte (ſith the whole puiſſaunce of the Realme was aſſembled) to giue battayle, leaſt by deferryng time, the courage and great deſire which the people had to fight, ſhould waxe faynt and decay; ſo that all things conſidered, it was generally in the ende agreed vpon to giue battayle, and ſo comming within ſight of the enimies hoſte, they made ready to encounter them. At the firſte the Scottes were ſomewhat amazed with the greate multitude of theyr aduerſaries, but through the cheerefull exhortations of theyr King, and other their Captaines, theyr ſtomackes beganne to reuiue, ſo that they boldely ſette vppon the Romaines, whereof enſued betwixte them a righte fierce and cruell battayle, howbeit in the ende the victorie inclined to the Romains, and the Scottes were chaſed out of the fielde. Galde himſelfe was wounded in the face, yet eſcaped hee out of the battaile, but not without great daunger in deede, by reaſon the Romaines purſued moſt egerly in the chaſe. The Scots are diſcomfited.

There were ſlaine of the Scottiſh menne (as theyr chronicles make reporte) aboue a twelue thouſande, and of the Romains about ſixe thouſande.

This victorie beyng thus atchieued, the Romains gote poſſeſſion of Epiake with the greateſt parte of all Galloway, and paſſed the reſidue of that yeare without any other notable exployte: but in the ſommer followyng Petilius the Romaine gouernour wente aboute to ſubdue the reſte of the countrey, the Scottes The citie called Epiake, is wonne by the Romains.

oftentimes making diuerſe ſkirmiſhes with him, but in no wiſe durſte ioyne with them puiſſance againſt puiſſance, leaſt they ſhoulde haue put their Countrey into further daunger, if they had chaũced eftſones to haue receyued ẏ ouerthrow.

Here haue wee thought good to aduertiſe the Reader, that although the Scottiſh wryters impute all the trauayles whiche Petilius ſpent in ſubduing the Brygantes, and Frontinus in conquering the Silures, to be employed chiefly againſt Scottes and Piſtes: the opinion of the beſt learned is wholy contrarie thereunto, affyrming the ſame Brygãtes and Silures not to be ſo farre Northe by the diſtance of many myles, as Hector Boetius and other his Countreymen do place them, which thing in the Hiſtorie of Englande wee haue alſo noted, where ye maye reade more of all the doings of the Romaynes here in Brytaine, as in their wryters we finde the ſame recorded. But neuertheleſſe we haue here followed the courſe of the Scottiſhe Hiſtorie, in maner as it is written by the Scottes themſelues, not bynding any man more in this place than in other to credite them further than by conference of authours it ſhall ſeeme to them expedient. In the meane time then, whileſt Petilius was occupied as before ye haue heard in ẏ cõqueſt of Galloway. Vodicia the daughter of Aruiragus (whõ the Romains had before time miſuſed as before in this treatiſe is partely touched) gathered togither a crew of ſoldiours within the Iſle of Man, partely of the inhabitants, and partely of ſuche Scottiſh men of Galloway as were fledde thither for ſuccour: with theſe ſhee toke the ſeas, and landing in Galloway, vpon purpoſe to reuenge hyr iniuries in times paſt receyued at the Romains handes, ſet vppon their tentes in the night ſeaſon, when they looked for nothing leſſe than to be diſquieted, by reaſon wherof they were brought into ſuche diſorder, that if Petilius had not cauſed ſuche fire brandes to be kindled as he had prepared and dreſſed with pitche, roſen and tallow, for the like purpoſe, the whole campe had bene in great daunger: but theſe torches or fyre brandes gaue not onely light to ſee where to make reſiſtaunce, but alſo being caſte in the faces of the enimies, ſtayed theyr hardie forwardneſſe, whereby the Romains hauing leaſure to place themſelues in array, defended the entries of theyr campe, till the day was ſprong, and then giuing a full onſet vppon theyr enimies, they put them quite to flight.

Touching al the doings of the Romains in Brytain yee ſhal finde ſufficiently in the hiſtorie of England.

But Vodicia not herewith diſcouraged, haſted with al ſpeede vnto Epiake, and taking that Citie ſhe ſetteth fire on it, and ſlewe ſuche Romains as ſhe founde there, whereof Petilius being certified, ſente forth a legion againſt hyr to withſtande hir attemptes. Thoſe that had the charge of them that were thus ſent, vſed ſuch diligence, that laying an ambuſhe for hir in a place fitte for that purpoſe, they ſo incloſed hir, that ſlayng the moſte parte of hir companie, ſhe was taken pryſoner hir ſelfe, and being brought aliue vnto Petilius, vpon hir ſtoute anſwears made vnto him, as he queſtioned with hir aboute hyr bolde enterpryſes, ſhee was preſently ſlayne by the ſouldiers.

Anone after Petilius was certified, that the inhabitaunts of the Iſle of Wight, with other ſoutherne Brytains, had rayſed a commotion againſt king Marius, ſo that without ſpeedy ſuccors they were like to driue him out of his kingdome: wherevpon he haſted thither with al conuenient ſpeede, and ſubduing the rebelles, ſet all things there in good order and ſtay. And ſo remayning there till the next yeare after, he fel ſicke of the flixe and died. Immediatly wherevpon the Emperour ſente one Julius Frontinus to ſucceede in his place.

Iulius Frontinus ſente Brytaine.

This Frontinus brought with him a two legions of ſouldiours, and after he had taken order with king Marius for the keeping of the Brytains in due ſubiection of the Empire, he purpoſed to bryng ſuche vnto obedience as inhabited within and beyond the woodes of Calydone, and as yet not banquiſhed by any man.

The Silures miſtaken for Scottiſh.

Therefore entring firſt into Galloway, and viſiting ſuch garriſons of the Romaines, as Petilius had left there for the keping of that quarter, he commended their loialtie and diligence, in that they had looked ſo well to their charge, that the enimie had gayned no aduauntage at theyr handes, whileſt the armie was occupied in the ſouth partes about other affayres there.

Frontinus poſeth to ſue the conqueſt of Sylures in the Scottiſh ſtake for Galloway.

Hee alſo ſent an Heralde vnto the king of the Piſtes with letters, requiring him to renue by confyrmation the former league betwixt hys people and the Romaines, and not by any meanes to ayde the Scottes as before time they had done to their great loſſe and hinderance.

Frontinus quiereth ioyne in warre with Piſtes.

Herevnto

Hereunto the king of Pictes muche ſuſpecting the matter, made a direct anſweare, that hee ſawe no cauſe why hee ſhoulde in fauour of the Romains ſuffer his confederates the Scottes to be ſubdued and brought to deſtruction without all reaſon or equitie: and therfore he was determined by the aduice of his peeres and counſellours, to ayde the Scottes againſt ſuche as ſought nothing but the meanes howe to bring the whole Ile of Albion into thraldome and ſeruile bondage.

Frontinus little regarding this vntowardly anſweare, ſette forewarde to ſubdue ſuch Scots as were yet diſobedient. And ſo entring into the borders of Kile, Carrike and Coningham, had diuers ſkirmiſhes with ſuche as king Galde had aſſembled to defend his countrey, but for ſo much as hee was diſeaſed with ſickeneſſe, hee was at length conſtrayned to withdrawe himſelfe into Argile, leauing his power behinde him to reſiſt the enimies attemptes: but ſhortly after his departure from amongſt them, they were fought withall by the Romains and diſcomfited, three thouſande of them being ſlaine in the fielde. By reaſon of whiche ouerthrowe thoſe countreys ſubmitted themſelues to the Romains, perceyuing no hope otherwiſe howe to eſcape that preſent daunger.

These Scots of Carrike, Kile, and Coningham, being thus brought into ſubiection, the armie was licenced to withdraw to their lodgings for the winter ſeaſon, during the which, Frontinus fell ſicke of ſuperfluous abundance of fleume, which vexed him in ſuche ſorte, that the Emperour Domitian, who as then gouerned the Romaine Empyre, ſent for him home vnto Rome, and appointed a right valiaunt perſonage, one Julius Agricola to ſucceede as lieutenaunt of Britaine in his roume.

Frontinus being vexed with ſickneſſe, returneth to Rome.

Julius Agricola is ſent into Brytaine.

Aboute the time of whoſe arriuall there, the Scottes of Annandall ſlewe a great number of the Romains, with whiche ſucceſſe they procured alſo the Pictes with the inhabitants of Galloway, Kyle, Carrike and Coningham to rebell.

The Scots of Annandale beate downe the Romains.

These newes being reported vnto Agricola, he made his prouiſiõ with al ſpeede to go againſt them. And firſt entring into the borders of Picte lande, he reduced ſuch as inhabited about the cõfines of Barwike to their former ſubiection, and after marching forth towardes the citie of Camelone, Karanach king of the Picts encountred him by the way, but being fiercely beaten off by the Romains, he fled backe into the citie, & within three daies after hauing reenforced his power, he eftſoones gaue battayle againe to his enimies, but then alſo being vanquiſhed, hee loſt the moſt parte of al his men, & ſo immediately thereupon was Camelone wonne by force, & a great number of the Citezens ſlaine.

Agricola prepareth to goe againſt the Scottes.

Karanath king of the Picts is diſcomfited by the Romains.

Camelone taken by force.

Agricola cauſed it to be newly fortified, and further through fame of this victorious beginning, he recouered the moſt parte of al the caſtels and fortreſſes of Picte lande.

The forenamed Karanath eſcaping out of that preſent daunger, got him beyonde the water of Firth, for the more ſuretie of his owne perſon.

Agricola hauing ſped thus in Pict lãd, marched forth againſt them of Annandall: who at the firſt, making reſiſtaunce for a time, at length were conſtreyned to giue backe, and ſo fledde to their owne houſes, where in the night following by their owne wiues they were murthered euen mothers ſonne: for ſo the women of that nation vſed to put away the ſhame of their huſbandes when they had at any time fled out of the fielde, from theyr enimies.

Agricola vnderſtanding that by winning him

ſame in the beginning, it ſhould be no ſmall furtherance vnto him for the atchieuing of other enterpriſes in time to come, determined to purſue his good fortune. And therupon prepared to ſubdue the Iſle of Man, but wanting veſſels to cõuey his armie ouer, he found meanes that ſuch as could ſwimme, and knew the ſhallow places of that coaſt, made ſhifte to paſſe the goulfe, and ſo got a land, to the great wonder and amazing of the inhabitants, who watched the ſea coaſtes, to reſiſt ſuche ſhippes as they loked for, to haue arriued vpon their ſhore: but nowe diſpayring to reſiſt ſuch kind of warriours as endaũgered theſelues to paſſe the ſeas in that maner of wiſe, they ſubmitted thẽſelues vnto Agricola.

Here is a manifeſt errour in the Scottiſh writers, taking Man for Angleſey.

Agricola aſſayleth the Iſle of Angleſey, and not Man as Hector Boetius miſtaketh it.

Who taking pledges of them, and appoynting certaine garriſons to keepe diuers holdes and places of defence within that Iſle, paſſed ouer with the reſidue of his people into Galloway, where he ſoiourned all the winter following: whiche being paſſed, and ſommer once come, he aſſembled his men of warre againe, and viſited a great parte of that countrey with Kyle, Carrike and Coninghame, the inhabitants wherof he put in ſuch feare with the onely ſhewe of his warlike armie, diſpoſed in ſuche politike order and wiſe conduicte, that there was none to be founde that durſt aduaunce themſelues to encounter him, ſo that he ſpẽt that ſommers ſeaſon in keeping ſuch of the Scottes as had bene afortetime ſubdued, from attempting any commotion, & when winter was come, he aſſembled the nobles of the coũtrey, exhorting them by gentle perſwaſions, to frame themſelues to a ciuill trade of liuing, aſwell in buylding of temples, houſes, and other edifices after the Romaine maner, as alſo in wearing of comely and decent apparell, and aboue all things to ſet their childrẽ to ſchole, to be brought vp in eloquence and good nurture.

The Iſle of Angleſey is ſubdued by Agricola.

Agricola wintereth in Galloway.

Agricola ſtudieth to bring the Scots vnto ciuilitie.

By this meanes he thought to traine them frõ their accuſtomed fiercenelle, & to winne them the ſoner to be cõtẽted with bõdage, though he colored it with neuer ſo fayre a gloſſe of humanitie.

The thirde winter being thus ſpent, and the next ſommer commen vpon, Agricola inuaded ſuche countreys as were yet vndiſcouered by the Romains, entring by the nether ſide of Calidone wood, euen vnto the dolorous mountaine, whiche afterwardes by the Scottes was cleped Sterling. It was called the dolorous mountain for that in the night ſeaſon, there was heard right lamentable noyſe and cries as though the ſame had bene of ſome creatures that had bewayled theyr miſerable caſes: whiche vndoubtedly was the craftie illuſions of wicked ſprytes, to keepe mens mindes ſtill oppreſſed in blinde errours and ſuperſtitious fantaſies.

Kalẽdar wood Agricola commeth vnto Sterling.

Illuſion of ſpirites.

Agricola conſidering the naturall ſtrength of this mountaine with the ſite of an olde ruinous caſtel that ſtood thereon, he cauſed the ſame with all diligence to be repaired, & a bridge to be made ouer the Forth there, by the which he paſſed with his whole armie ouer into Fyfe, and the day after hearing that the king of the Picts was withdrawen into a caſtell thereby, ſtanding vpon an high mountaine cleeped Beenart, he enuironned the ſame with a ſtrong ſiege, how be it his hoped pray was not as then within it, for Karanach king of the Picts, enformed of the Romains approche, gotte him forth abrode into the fieldes, and aſſembling his power purpoſed by night, to haue broke the bridge which Agricola had made ouer the Forth at Sterling, but being repulſed by ſuche as were ſet there to defende the ſame, in his returne from thence hee was encountred by Agricola himſelfe, who being certified of this attempt of his enimies, had leuied his ſiege & was comming towardes them, ſo that both the hoſtes meeting togither in the fieldes, there was fought a ſore battayle betwixt them, though in the ende the Picts were diſcomfited, and their king the forenamed Karanach chaſed vnto the riuer of Tay, where he got a boate, and eſcaped to the further ſide of that water.

Agricola diſcouereth the coaſtes of Scotland with the bridge.

Karanach diſcomfited.

By reaſon of this ouerthrowe, Agricola brought in ſubiection thoſe countreys, whiche lie betweene the waters of Forth and Tay, as Fyfe, Fothryke, and Ernedalle, and ſoiourning there all the winter following, he buylte ſundrie fortreſſes in places moſt conuenient for the keeping of the inhabitaunts in theyr couenaunted obedience, after his departure from amongeſt them.

Fyfe with other coũtreys brought ſubiection to the Romains.

In the meane while the king of the Picts kept him at Dundee, whyther reſorted vnto him a greate number of the Pictiſhe nobilitie, ſuche as had eſcaped the Romains handes. Theſe comforted theyr king in all that they might, willing him to be of good cheere, and to hope wel of the recouerie of his loſſes agayne, by ſome good fortune and meanes that might happe to come, ere ought long, promiſing to the furtherance therof al that in them lay, aſwell for counſell as ayde of hande: And herevppon they toke aduice, whiche way to worke, in ſomuche that at length it was by great deliberation thought good to ſeeke for ſuccour at the handes of theyr auncient confederates the Scottes, and ſo incontinently there were certayne meſſengers diſpatched with all ſpeede vnto Galde the Scottiſhe kyng, requiring him in that comunne ieopardie to ioyne in league with hys auncient friendes the Picts, againſt the ambitious and moſte cruell Romains, who ſought nothing els but ỹ vtter ſubuerſiõ of the whole land of Albion, as was manifeſtly apparãt by their proceeding, hauing hauing alreadie occupied and wrongfully surpised a great part not onely of the Pictish kingdome, but also of the Scottish dominions, minding stil to go forward in such vnrighteous cõquests, if by timely resistãce they were not staied.

Galde vpon this request and motions of the Picts gladly consented to ioyne his power with theirs, in common defence of bothe the realmes (against such common enimies as the Romains were esteemed) hauing hereunto the assent of all his peeres and chiefest counsellours.

Thus whilest the kings of the Scottes and Pictes were concluding a league togither for defence of themselues and theyr countreys, certaine Scottes entred into the confines of Kyle, Carrike and Coningham, & wanne diuers fortresses, wherin certaine garrisons of Romaine souldiers soiourned, whom they slewe downe right without al mercie, spoyling the whole countrey.

Agricola hauing knowledge hereof, wente streightwaies thither with a power, and pursuing them that had done those iniuries, some hee toke amongst the hilles and mountaynes, whither they were fledde, and the residue hee chased beyond the riuer of Clyde, but the castel of Dunbryton hee coulde not by any meanes obtayne, though he assayed to winne it euen to the vttermost of his power. It was called in those dayes Alcluth that is to meane: All stone.

The Scottish men being thus driuen backe, Agricola repaired suche castels and fortresses as they had ouerthrowen and beaten downe.

In the yeare following, being the fifth after the first comming of Agricola into Brytaine, he caused his shippes to be brought about from the Ile of Wight into the water of Lochfine in Argile, thereby to put his enimies in vtter dispayre of escaping his handes eyther by water or lande: And thereupon passing ouer the riuer of Clyde with his armie, and finding his nauie there, hee set vpon the countrey of Lennox, in purpose to subdue the same. But after he had made sundrie skyrmishes with the inhabitauntes, hee was certified by letters from the gouernour of Camelone, that the Pictes were ready to rebell, by reason whereof he left off this enterprice against the Scottes, and drew backe into Picte lande, leauing a parte of his armie to keepe possession of the water of Clyde till his returne againe into those parties.

At his comming into Picte lande, he appeased the rebelles with small a do, punishing the chiefe authours according to their demerites. This done, he returned vnto the water of Clyde, lying al that winter beyond the same, taking order for the gouernment of those parties, in due obedience of the Romaine Empyre.

The sommer following he appointed his nauie to search alongst by the coast all the hauens and creekes of Argyle, and of the Ilandes neare to the same. Whilest he by land passing ouer the water of Leuine, went about to cõquere townes and castels, though halfe discouraged at the first by reason of the rough wayes, strayte passages, high mountaynes, craggy rockes, thicke woodes, deepe marrishes, fennes and mosses, with the great riuers, whiche with his armie hee muste needes passe, if he minded to attayne his purpose: but the olde souldiers beyng enured with paynes and trauayle, ouercame all these difficulties by the wise conduct of theyr worthie Generall and other the Captaynes, and so inuading the countrey toke Townes and Castels, of the whiche some they beate downe and rased, and some they fortified, and stuffed with garrisons of men of warre.

Agricola pursueth his enterprise against the Scottes.

About the same time by commaundement of king Galde and other the gouernours of Scotland, all the able men of Cantyre, Lorne, Murrayland, Lugemarth, also those of the westerne Iles, and of all other parties belonging to the Scottish dominions, were appointed to assemble and come togither in Atholl, at a place not passing fiue miles distant from the castell of Calidone now cleped Dunkeld, there to abide the cõming of Karanach king of the Pictes, to the end that ioyning togither in one armie, they might worke some high exploit. But he hauing assembled .xv. thousand of his mẽ of warre, as he marched alongst by the mountaine of Granzbene, in times past cleped Mons Grampius, there chaunced a mutinie amongst his people, so that falling togither by the eares, Karanach himselfe comming amongst them vnarmed as hee was, to parte the fray, was slayne presently at vnwares, by one that knewe not what hee was. By reason of whiche mischaunce that iourney was broken, for the Pictes being vtterly amazed and discomforted herewith, skaled and departed in sunder.

All the Scottes assemble.

Karanach king of the Pictes slaine by misfortune of one of his owne subiectes.

Galde with his Scottes nowe being thus disappointed of the Pictes his chiefest ayde, durst not ieoparde to trie the chaunce of battayle with the enimies, but determined with lighte skirmishes, and by withdrawing of vitayles out of their walke, to stoppe them from further proceeding in conquest of the countrey, and in the meane tyme to prouide agaynst the nexte sommer newe ayde and succours to keepe the fielde, and so to encoũter with them, puissance against puissance, if they remayned so long in the countrey.

The Scots resting, vpõ this resolutiõ, thought good to send some honorable ambassade vnto the Pictes to moue thẽ vnto mutual agreemẽt & cõcord amõgst thẽselfs, wherby they might be able to reſiſt the common ruine of their countrie as then in preſent daunger to be oppreſſed by the Romaines.

The Pictes brought to agreement amongſt themſelues.

Thoſe that were ſente on this meſſage dyd ſo dilygently behaue them ſelues, in bringing their purpoſe to paſſe, that the Pictes in the ende agreed to ioyne in friendly amytie one with an other, and to chooſe one Garnard to their king to ſucceede in the roume of Karanach.

They alſo confirmed the former league with the Scots, and by theyr procurement ſent meſſangers vnto the Norwegians and Danes, requiring them of ayde againſt the Romains the common enimies of all ſuch nations as loued to liue in libertie, where ſo euer the ſame were inhabiting in any part on the whole face of the earth.

Ambaſſadours ſent vnto the Danes & Iriſh men for ayde.

There were alſo ſent ambaſſadours vnto the Iriſh men from the Scottes for the ſame intent, and from both thoſe places there was great ayde promiſed, as frō them that eſteemed themſelues halfe bounde by a naturall reſpect, to ſuccour ſuch as were diſcended of the ſame auncеſtours and countreys that they were of, and now lyke to be expulſed out of thoſe ſeates, whiche theyr forefathers had got poſſeſſion in by iuſte title of conqueſt, and lefte the ſame vnto their poſteritie to enioy for euer.

Whileſt theſe things were thus in doing, Galdus deuiding his armie into ſundrie partes did what was poſſible to reſiſt al the attempts of the Romains. Who ſtanding in doubte of his puiſſaunce rather through fame thereof, than for anye apparaunt ſight or other knowledge had, durſte not put themſelues in daunger to enter into Calidone woode of all that ſommer, and the winter following was ſo extreeme, by reaſon of froſt, ſnow, and coldneſſe of ayre, that they were not able to enterpriſe any exployte on neyther parte: howbeit the ſommer was no ſooner come (being the ſeuenth after the comming of Agricola into Brytaine) but that they prepared to inuade one an other againe with al their forces.

The fame of Galde his puiſſance, putteth the Romains in feare.

An ayde of Iriſh mē, come to the ſuccors of the Scottes.

Forth of Ireland there came (according as was promiſed) a greate power of men of warre and ioyned with an armie of Scottiſh men in Atholl, being there alreadie aſſembled in greate numbers out of all the quarters of the Scottiſhe dominions. Thither came alſo Garnard king of the Pictes with his power.

Galde choſen to be generall againſt the Romains.

All whiche forces being thus aſſembled togither by cōmon agreement amongſt them, Galde king of the Scots was choſen to be theyr generall, who hearing that Agricola with his hoſte was entred into Kalendar woodde, deuided the whole armie into three battailes, and ſo marched forth toward the enimies in purpoſe to encounter them. Agricola being of this aduertiſed by ſpialles, parted his people alſo into three wardes, doubting to be encloſed within ſome cōberſome place by reaſon of the great multitude of his enimies, that were eſteemed to be in number aboue fiftie thouſande of one and other.

Galde on the other ſide vnderſtanding by ſpials this order of the Romains, in the dead of the night ſetteth vppon one of thoſe legions whiche was lodged next vnto him, and finding meanes to ſlea the watche, was entred into the enimies lodgings before they had any knowledge of his comming, ſo that the fight was right fierce and cruell euen among the Romaines tentes and lodgings.

But Agricola being certified of this enterpriſe of the Scottes, ſent forth, with all ſpeede a certaine number of light horſemen and footemen to aſſayle them on the backes, and ſo to keepe them occupied till hee might come with all the reſidue of his people to the reſcue. They that were thus ſent, accompliſhing theyr enterpriſe according to the deuiſe in that behalfe appointed, gaue a right fierce and ſtoute charge vpon the Scottes and Pictes, greatly to the reliefe of thoſe that were by them aſſayled, and withall ſore amazed and diſordered by reaſon of the enimies ſudden inuaſion.

Agricola meth to ſuccour men.

By this meanes the fight cōtinued right fierce and cruell on al ſides, til at length the day beginning to appeare, ſhewed to the Scottes & Pictes the plaine vew of the whole Romaine armie, approching vnder the conduct of Agricola, to the ſuccour of his people, being thus in daunger to be diſtreſſed. Herewith were the Scots and Pictes put in ſuch feare, that immediatly they fel to rūning away towards the woodes and bogges, the accuſtomed places of theyr refuge.

Agricola comfiteth enimies

This ouerthrow did ſo abaſh both the Scots & Picts, that they durſt attempt nomore the fortune of battaile till they had come ayde out of Denmarke, but onely did what they could to defend their townes & countrey, by making ſundry treyſes vpon their enimies as occaſion and opportunitie ſerued. But the Romains ſuppoſing nothing to be to harde for their vndaunted valiancie, but that they were able to ouercome what ſo euer ſhould ſtand at defence againſt them, determined at length, to find an ende of the Iſle of Albion, and ſo paſſing through Kāleider wood, and ouer the riuer of Amound, they pitched their fielde neare to the riuer of Tay, not farre from the caſtell named Calidone or Kalendar.

The Scottiſh men in our time call the place Inchtuthill.

All theyr wiues and children they remoued vnto the mountaynes of Granzbene for theyr more ſuretie and ſafegarde.

About the ſame time the Romains were not a little diſquieted, by reaſon of a mutinie whiche chaunced amongſt ſuche Germaines as were appoynted to come ouer vnto Agricola, as a newe ſupplie to furniſhe vp ſuche numbers as were decayed in his armie. Theſe ſlaying theyr Captaine, and ſuche other Romains as were appoynted to haue the order of them for their trayning in warlike feates at the beginning, as the maner was, got certaine pinneſſes whiche they happened vpon in the riuer of Tamys, and ſayling aboute the Eaſt and North coaſtes of this Iſle, arriued in Tay water, offering themſelues to the Scottes and Pictes to ſerue againſt the Romains, whoſe malice they dread for theyr offence committed if they ſhoulde returne into theyr owne countreys, whiche lay aboute the mouth of the Rhine, and was as then ſubiect to the Romaine Empyre, the inhabitants in thoſe dayes, being cleped Uſipithes, the whiche as ſome ſuppoſe inhabited Cleueland and Gulick.

Theyr offer was accepted moſte thankefully, and in places appoynted for them to inhabite amongſt the Murrayes, bicauſe they were diſceded as it were of one nation.

Whileſt theſe things were thus a doing, there came alſo the long wiſhed ayde from the Danes and Norwegians, to the number of tenne thouſande men, vnder the leading of one Gildo.

This Gildo with his nauie firſte arriued in the Frithe betwixt Fyfe and Louthian, but for that the Romains kepte him off from landing there, hee calle aboute and came into the riuer of Tay, where he landed all his people, and prouiſion whereof he had gwd ſtore bothe victayle and armure.

Garnard king of the Pictes hearing of theyr arriuall there, forthwith vpon the newes departed from Dundee, accompanied with a greate number of his Nobles, and cõming to the place where Gildo with his armie was lodged, receyued him in moſte ioyfull wiſe, feaſted and banquetted him and his people, and ſhewed them all the tokens of moſte hartie loue and friendſhip that coulde be deuiſed.

Gildo himſelf was led by the king vnto Dundee, and lodged with him there in the caſtle, his people were prouided for abrode in the countrey in places moſte for theyr eaſe, to refreſhe themſelues the better after their painefull iourney by the ſeas.

Galde cõmeth vnto Dundee to welcome Gildo.

Shortly after there came vnto Dundee the Scottiſhe king Galde, who for his parte did all the honour that in him lay vnto Gildo, ſhewing himſelfe moſte ioyfull and gladde of his cõming, yeelding vnto him and his people ſuche thankes and congratulations as ſerued beſte to the purpoſe, and receyued no leſſe at his and their handes againe.

Gald, Garnard and Gildo, aſſemble a coũſel at Forfare, where they deuiſe how to proceede in theyr warre.

After they had remayned thus certaine dayes togither at Dundee, bothe the kings Galde and Garnarde togyther with this Gildo, wente vnto the Caſtle of Forfare, there to conſulte with the Captaines and gouernours of theyr menne of warre, how to maynteine themſelues in theyr enterpriſe againſt the enemie. At length they reſolued not to goe forth into the field til the winter ſeaſon were paſſe, for doubte of the inconuenience that might enſue by reaſon of the extreeme colde intemperancie of ayre, to the whiche that countrey is greatly ſubiect.

They determine to reſt al the winter, & make fronter warre onely.

In the meane time they toke order for the furniture of all things neceſſarie for the warres, to haue the ſame in a perfite readineſſe againſt the nexte ſpring, and till then they did appoynt onely to keepe fronter warre, that the Romains ſhoulde not ſtray abroade to fetche in victayles and other prouiſions, to theyr owne gaynes and the vndoing of the poore inhabitants.

Upon this determination when the counſell was broake vp, Galde withdrewe into Atholl, to defende thoſe parties, and Garnarde with the Daniſhe generall Gildo, furniſhed all the Caſtels and holdes in Angus, ouer againſt the riuer of Tay, to ſtoppe the paſſages of the ſame, that the enimies ſhoulde enter no further on that ſide. Thus paſſed the winter for that yeare, without any great exployte on either part atchieued.

Agricola ſendeth forth his nauie of ſhips, to diſcouer the furtheſt poynt of Brytaine northwarde.

In the beginning of the nexte ſommer, Agricola appointed his nauie of ſhips to ſayle aboute the coaſtes of the furtheſt partes of Albion, making diligent ſearch of euery creeke and hauen alongſt by the ſame. The Mariners executing his commaundement, ſayled rounde aboute the Northe coaſte, diſcouering many of the Weſterne Iſles, and likewiſe thoſe of Orkney, till at length they founde out Pictiſh lande Firth, being a ſtreyte of Sea, of twentie miles in breadth, whiche ſeparateth the Iſles of Orkney from the poynt of Cathneſſe, paſſing with ſo ſwifte a courſe, that without an expert pylote the ſhippes that ſhall paſſe the ſame are oftentimes in great daunger, by reaſon of the contrary courſe of the tydes.

The Romaine mariners therfore finding certaine huſband men in the next Iſles, conſtreined them to go a ſhipborde, and to guide them thorow that ſtreyte, promiſing them high rewardes for theyr labour: but they vpon a malicious intent not paſſing for their owne liues, ſo they might be reuenged of theyr enimies in caſting away ſuche a notable number of them togither with theyr veſſels, entred the ſtreyte at ſuche an inconuenient time, that the ſhippes were borne with violence of the ſtreame againſt the rockes and ſhelues, in ſuche wiſe that a number of the ſame were drowned and loſte without recouerie.

The Romaine ſhips through want of pylots are loſte in Pictland Firth.

Some of them that were not ouer haſtie to follow the firſte, ſeeing the preſent loſſe of theyr fellowes, returned by the ſame way they came vnto Agricola, who in this meane tyme had cauſed a bridge to be made ouer ȳ riuer of Tay, by the whiche hee paſſed with his whole armie, and encamped on the further ſide thereof neare to the rootes of the mountayne of Granzbene, leauing the bridge garniſed with a competent number of ſouldiers to defende it againſt the enimies.

Agricola making a bridge ouer Tay water, paſſeth by the ſame with his hoſte, and encampeth neare to the foote of the mountayne of Granzbene.

The Pictes being not a little troubled herewith, diſpatched forth a meſſenger with all haſte vnto Galde the Scottiſhe king, ſignifying vnto him the whole matter, and thereupon requyred him of ayde.

Galde hauing muſtered his people aſwell Scottiſhe as Iriſhe, aſſembled them togither to the number of .xl. thouſand perſons, what of one and other, and incontinently with al ſpeede marcheth forth to come vnto the ayde of the Pictes, and ſo within a fewe dayes paſſing ouer the mountaine of Granzbene, he arriueth in a valley beyonde the ſame mountayne, where he findeth the Pictes, Danes, and Norwegians, encamped togither not farre off from the hoſt of the Romains.

Galde king of the Scottiſh men commeth to the ayde of the Pictes.

Here taking aduiſe togither, and in the ende determining to giue battayle, king Galde (vnto whome as before is expreſſed, the gouernance of the whole was committed) aſſembling togither all the number of the confederates, made vnto them a long and pithie oration, exhorting them in defence of libertie, (the moſt precious iewel that mã might enioy) to ſhew theyr manly ſtomakes againſt them that ſought onely to depriue them of that ſo greate a benefite.

The Scottiſh Pictes determine to giue battayle to the Romains.

Galde exhorteth his people to fight manfully.

And ſithe they were driuen euen to the vttermoſte boundes of theyr countrey, he perſwaded them to make vertue of neceſſitie, and rather chooſe to die with honour, than to liue in perpetuall ſhame and ignominie, whiche muſt needes enſue to theyr whole nation, if they ſuffered themſelues to bee vanquiſhed in that inſtaunt. With theſe wordes, or other muche what of the ſemblable effect, Galde ſo moued the hartes of his people, that they deſired nothing but to ioyne with theyr enimies and to trie it with them by dinte of ſworde, which they vniuerſally ſignified according to theyr accuſtomed vſe with a great noyſe, ſhoute and clamour.

On the other parte Agricola, though he perceyued a greate deſire amongſt his ſouldiers to fight, yet hee was not negligent on his owne behalfe to encourage them with moſte cheerefull wordes and countenaunce, ſo that bothe the armies being thus bente to haue battayle, the generals on bothe partes beganne to ſette them in array.

Agricola to the ende his armie being the leſſer number ſhoulde not bee aſſayled both a front and on the ſides, prouided (by diſpoſing them in a certaine order) a remedie againſt that diſaduantage.

On the other ſide, king Galde, by reaſon of the aduauntage whiche hee had in his greate multitude and number, ordered his battayles thereafter, with a long and large fronte, placing the ſame vppon the higher grounde, of purpoſe to compaſſe in the enimies on eche ſide.

Galde by reaſon of his greate multitude, thinketh to encloſe his enimies.

At the firſte approche of the one armie towardes the other, the battayle was begonne righte fiercely with ſhotte of arrowes and hurling of dartes, whiche being once paſte, they ioyned togither to trie the matter by hande ſtrokes, wherein the Scottes and Pictes had one diſaduauntage, for thoſe that were archers (or as I may call them kernes) comming once to fight at hande blowes, had nothing but broade ſwordes and certaine ſorie light bucklers to defend themſelues with, ſuche as ſerue to better purpoſe for menne to ryde with abroade at home, than to bee caried forth into the warres, though the ſame haue bene ſo vſed amongſt the Scottiſh men, euen till theſe our dayes.

The armies approche ther to fight.

The Romains therefore being well appointed with armure and broade Tergettes, ſlewe downe right a greate number of theſe Scottes and Pictes thus ſlenderly furniſhed, without receiuing any great domage againe at their hãds, till king Galde appoynted his ſpeare menne to ſteppe forth before thoſe archers and kernes, to ſuccour them, and therewith alſo the bill menne came forewarde and ſtroke on ſo freſhly, that the Romains were beaten downe on heapes, in ſuch wiſe that they were neare at poynt to haue bene diſcomfited, had not a bande of Germains (whiche ſerued amongſt the Romains) ruſhed forth with greate violence vppon the Scottiſhe men where moſte daunger appeared, and ſo reſtored againe the fayntyng ſtomakes of the Romains, whereby the battayle renewed on bothe ſides againe right fierce and cruell, that greate ruthe it was to beholde that blouddie fight and moſte vnmercyfull murder betwixte them, whiche continued with more violence on the Scottiſhe ſide than any warlyke ſkill, till finally the night comming on toke the dayes light from them bothe, and ſo parted the fray.

The Romains withdrewe to theyr campe, and the Scottes and Pictes with theyr confederates the Danes, Norwegians and Iriſh men, ſuche as were left aliue got them into the nerte mountaynes, hauing loſte in this cruell conflict the moſte parte of theyr whole numbers.

Cornelius Tacitus agreeth not in al points with the Scottiſhe Chronicles in a booke which he wrote of the lyfe of Julius Agricola, where hee intreateth of this battayle. For hee ſpeaketh but of.xxx. thouſande men, (which he comprehendeth vnder the generall name of Brytains) to be aſſembled at that time agaynſt the Romains, making no mention of any Scottes, Pictes, Iriſh men, Norwegians or Danes, that ſhould be there in their ayde.

The number of them that were ſlayne of the Brytains ſide (as the ſame Tacitus recounteth) amounted to aboute.x.M. men, & of Romains not paſſing. iij.C. and.xl. Amongſt whom was one Iulus Atticus, a captaine of one of the cohortes. But as the Scottiſh writers affirme, there died that day of Scottes, Pictes and other their confederates at the poynt of.xx.M. and of the Romains and ſuche as ſerued on their ſide, as good as.xij.M. Moreouer the night following when Galdus with the reſidue of his people which were left aliue was withdrawen to the mountains, & that the huge loſſe was vnderſtoode by the wiues & kinneſwomen of the dead, there began a pitiful noyſe amongſt them, lamẽting and bewailing theyr miſerable caſe & loſſes.

The number of them that were ſlayne at this battayle.

But Galde doubting leaſt the ſame ſhoulde come to the eares of ſome eſpialles, that might lurke neare to the place where hee was withdrawen, cauſed an huge ſhoute and noyſe to be rayſed by his people, as though it had bene in token of ſome reioyſing, till the women bewayling thus the death of theyr friendes might be remoued out of the way. This done, they fell to take counſel what was beſt to do in this caſe: & in the end al things conſidered, it was determined that ſomewhat before the dawning of ỹ next morow euery man ſhould diſlodge & withdraw himſelfe into ſuche place as he thought moſte meeteſt for his ſafegard, ſaue only ſuch as were appointed to attend Galde & Earnard into Atholle whether they minded with al ſpeede to go. Thus leauing a great nũber of fires to diſſimule their departure, they diſlodged & made away with al ſpeede poſſible. In the morning when their departure was once diſcouered, a great nũber of ỹ Romains ſollowed as it had bene in the chase, but some of the vnaduisedly aduenturing to farre forward, were enclosed by theyr enimies and slayne. Those that wrought this feat gotte them to the nexte hilles and so escaped. At length when all the fieldes and countreys adioyning were discouered, and the same appearing to be quite deliuered of all ambushmentes of the enimies, Agricola caused the spoyle to be gathered, and after marched forth into Angus, where (for so muche as sommer was paste) he appointed to winter, and so comming thyther and subduing the countrey, he toke pledges of the best amongst the inhabitants, and lodged his people about him in places most conuenient.

Agricola is certified of the mischaunce of his naule.

Aboute the same time Agricola heard newes, from his naule (as the riding at ancre in Argile) what mishap had chaunced to the same in Pictland Frith. But herewith being not greatly discouraged, he gaue order that the shippes whiche had escaped should be newe rigged and furnished with all necessarie prouisiõs, & manned throughly, bothe with able mariners and men of warre. This done, he appoynted them eftsoones to attempt fortune, and to take theyr course agayne Domitian the Emperour enuieth the prosperous successe of Agricola.

After that the prosperous successe of Agricola was once notified to the Emperour Domitian, he toke suche enuie thereat, that shortly after, vnder a colour to sende him into Syria to be lieutenant there, he countermaunded him home vnto Rome, appoynting one Cneus Trebellius to succeede him in the gouernment of Brytaine, but ỹ armie bearing more fauour vnto one Agricola is sente for to Rome, one Cneus Trebellius appointed in his place whiche causeth the souldiers to make a mutinie.

Trebellianus being cousin to Agricola, caused no smal trouble amongst the souldiers, so that in the end after certaine bickerings betwixt them, Trebellianus toke a sort of ỹ best soldiers away with him, & went ouer with them into Fraunce.

The Scottes taking occasion hereof, ioyned with the Pictes, and entred into Angus. Whereof Cneus Trebellianus being informed assembled his people, who perceyuing no greate forewardnesse in theyr leader, created Caius Silinnius (brother to the forenamed Trebellianus) theyr Captayne, but hee woulde in no wise meddle with that charge, though they were very earnest in hande with him to take it vpon him. In the meane time came the enimies vnder the leading of Galde ready to giue the onset, wherwith the Romains being sore troubled, by reason of this discorde amongst themselues, set forewarde yet, right valiantly, to giue battaile to theyr enimies: howbeit in the ende, bycause that Silinnius receyued a mortall wounde, and so departed out of the fielde, they fell at length to running away, the Scottes and Pictes following in the chase right fiercely.

The Romaines are discomfited.

This atchieued victorie after so many vnluckie enterprises highly reioyced the appalled hartes of the Albions, hauing bene continually in maner now for the space of l. yeares through aduerse fortune, grieuously oppressed by the Romains, who being not a litle discouraged by this ouerthrow, withdrewe themselues wholly vnto Tulyne, and shortly after for theyr more safegard, they got them ouer the riuer of Tay, breaking the bridge whiche they had made there, to the ende that by the same the Scottes and Picts should haue no passage in that place.

The Romaines withdraw vnto Tulyne.

They retire backe ouer the water of Tay, and breake the bridge after them.

But Galde hauing got this notable victorie with the spoyle of the Romains campe, thought it best with the aduice of his nobles, to pursue the Romains without delay, not suffering them to haue time to prouide for resistance. And herupon cõming to the castle of Calidone otherwise Kalendar, they gotte ouer the riuer of Tay, by a bridge of wood layde ouer the same riuer, whiche in that place is but narrow, by reason of the rockes and cliues forcing the bankes on eyther side to a straytnesse.

The Scottes ouer the riuer of Tay, come to Calidone castel.

The Romaine Capitanes also not ignorant of the passage of the enimies, brought forth their armie, and made themselues ready to encounter them, but for that the forenamed Caius Silinnius was not able to stirre by reason of his woũdes receyued in the last battayle, they chose one Titus Celius, a valiant Gentleman of Rome to be theyr leader, and so vnder his conduite setting vpon their enimies they fought right fiercely for a time, but yet in the ende they were put to flight, and chased into Calidone.

The Scottes eftsoones giue battayle to the romains.

The rest are agayne discomfited.

There were slayne of the Romaine parte in this encounter to the number of. v. M. and of the Scottes and other the confederates. ij. M.

After

After this victorie thus obteyned by the Scottes, a great number of the Brytaynes reuolted from the Romain obedience, as thoſe that inhabited the coūtrey which we now cal Wales, with the marches, slaying and chaſing awaye ſuch Romaines as lay abrode in thoſe parties.

This done, they ſent vnto Galde king of the Scottes certaine meſſengers with rich iewelles and gyftes, in token of their reioycing and gladneſſe for his victories, promiſing him furthermore ſuch ayd as they were able to make againſt the Romaines the common enimies of all the whole Albion nation.

In this meane while, did the Romains within Calydone caſtel direct their meſſengers with letters vnto Marius king of the Brytaines, ſignifying vnto him the preſent daunger wherein things ſtood in thoſe parties by the cruel rage of ỹ Scottiſhmen and Pictes, whom fortune had aduaunced with the gaine of two foughten fieldes, inſomuch that if timely ſuccours were not the ſooner ſent, the loſſe woulde be irrecouerable. Hereunto Marius anſwered, that as thē a cōmō conſpiracie, appeared to be in hand amongſt his ſubiects ſo far forth ỹ he doubted greatly the ſurcetie of his owne eſtate: And as for hope of ayde to be ſent from Rome, he ſawe ſmal likelihood, conſidering the ſlender prouiſion there through the miſgouernemente of cruel Domitian, who by reaſon of the hatred whiche the people bare him, regarded nothing but howe to keepe them from riſing vp in armor againſt him, and therefore he thought it neceſſarie that leauing the north parts to the enimies, they ſhould all withdrawe towardes him into the ſouth partes, to keepe yet the more fruitfull portion of the Ile in due obedience, ſithe their puiſſance might not ſuffice to retaine and rule the whole.

Theſe newes greatly abaſhed the Romaine armie, and muche the more for that aboute the ſame time it was ſhewed them howe king Galde with an huge armie of Scottiſh men and Pictes, was come within tenne myles of them. Whereupon the Romaines not knowing at that inſtant what was beſt for them to doe, in the ende they concluded to withdrawe into Cantyr, where being arriued, and perceyuing themſelues as yet to be in no great ſurtie there, they went away from thence with ſpeede into Galloway.

In the meane time king Galde ſuppoſing it beſt eſtſoones to fight with them ere they mighte haue any ſpace to reenforce their power, followed them with all diligence, not forcing thoughe hee left behinde him diuerſe Caſtelles and forteſſes furniſhed with ſundrie garriſons of his enimies, ſo that he might diſcomfit and chaſe away their maine power whiche hee thought might as then eaſily be done, conſidering the great multitudes of people whiche came flocking in on eche ſyde, preſenting themſelues with offering their ſeruice vnto him, & ſhewing furthermore great tokens of ioy and gladneſſe, for that it had pleaſed the gods at length yet to declare themſelues fauourable in this their relieuing of the oppreſſed Brytayns. Hereunto Galdus on the other ſyde giuing them heartie thankes for their trauayle, hee receyued them very gently, myxing his talke wyth moſt comfortable wordes, therewith to put them in hope of ſuch good and proſperous ſucceſſe, as that ſhortly they ſhoulde thereby bee reſtored intyrely vnto theyr former liberties, and perpetually deliuered from all forrayne ſeruitude and bondage.

But to proceede, at length he did ſo muche by his iourneys, that hee came into Galloway, where the Romaines with al ſpeede (ſeeing none other remedie) reſolued themſelues to giue him battayle, and thereuppon exhorting one an other to playe the men, ſithe theyr onely refuge reſted in their weapons poyntes, they fiercelye gaue the onſette, and at the firſt, put the lefte wing of the Scottes and Pictes wholy vnto the worſt. In whiche wing accordyng to their maner in thoſe dayes bred, there were a greate number of women mingled amongeſt the men. Galde therefore perceyuing the daunger, ſuccoured them (with ſuch as were appoynted to giue the looking on till neede required, and then to go where they ſhoulde bee commaunded.) By whiche meanes the battayle on that ſyde was renued a freſhe, the women ſhewing no leſſe valiancie than the menne, and therewith muche more cruelties, for they ſpared none at all thoughe they offered neuer ſo muche to haue their lyues preſerued.

The romains determine againe to fight with the Scots

The romains fiercely aſſaile the Scottes.

Straunge dealing in womē and contrarie to their nature.

In fine, the Romaines beeing chaſed in the left wing, their ouerthrow gaue occaſion to al the reſidue to flee backe to their campe, being purſued ſo egrely by the Scottes and Pictes, that they had muche adoe to defende the entries of theyr trenches, where both partyes fought right egrely, tyll at length the night parted them both in ſunder.

The romains flie to their campe.

Being parted, the Scottes gaue not themſelues to reſt, but prouided them of all things neceſſarie againſt the next morning to aſſayle their enimies a freſh, and namely from the next wood they fetched great plentie of fagottes and bruſhe to fyll the trenches withall. But this theyr demeanor and purpoſe being vnderſtood of the Romaines, they requyred a communication, the whiche (though ſome perſwaded Galdus to the contrarie,) vppon deepe conſiderations of fortunes fraple fauour, was at length graunted vnto them, and foure auncient Romaines clad in right honourable and verie riche apparel came forth and were admitted to the preſence of the kings (Galde of the Scottes, and Garnard of the Pictes) vnto whome with humble ſubmiſſion they acknowledged themſelues as vanquiſhed, and that by the iuſt wrath and reuenge of the equall Goddes, which agaynſt them they had conceyued for the wrongfull inuaſion of that which in no wiſe of right appertained vnto them. Therefore if it might pleaſe thoſe kings to bridle and refrayne their diſpleaſure agaynſt them, in licenſing them vnder ſome reaſonable conditions of appoyntment to depart, it ſhoulde bee a thing reſounding ſo muche to theyr fame and glorie, as nothing coulde bee more, conſidering ſo humble ſute made to them by the Oratours of thoſe people who were reputed as vanquiſhers of the whole worlde.

Herewyth falling proſtrate at the feete of thoſe Kings, they beſought them of pardon, in ſuche pitifull wyſe, that the heartes of the hearers beganne ſomewhat to mollifye, and at length Galde toke vppon hym to anſwere in name of all the reſidue of the Scottiſh and Pictiſhe Nations, and in the ende concluded, that they were contented to graunt a peace on theſe conditions: That the Romaines ſhoulde ceaſſe from that daye forwarde in anye wyſe to infeſt or diſquiet by waye of any inuaſion the Scottiſhe and Pictiſhe borders, and alſo to departe wholye out of thoſe Countreyes, reſtoring all ſuch holdes and fortreſſes as they helde wythin the ſame. And further to deliuer all pryſoners, pledges, and fugetyues whatſoeuer as then remayning in theyr handes, togyther wyth ſuche goodes and ſpoyle as they had lately taken.

The conditions of peace preſcribed to the Romaines by the Scottes and Pictes.

These conditions beeing certified to the Romaynes by theyr Oratours, were gladly accepted, ſith they ſawe no better meane, howe to deliuer themſelues out of that preſent daunger. And ſo delyuering ſufficient Hoſtages for performaunce of all the Articles of agreement, they departed without protracting time, marching Southwardes to come into Kent, where Marius king of the ſouth Brytaynes ſoiourned as then.

The Romains depart out of Galleway.

Agricola as the Scottiſhe Chronicles report, left at his departure towardes Rome, to the number of. lx. thouſande men in the Romain armie what of one and other, but nowe at theyr departure out of Galloway, there remayned vneath. xx. thouſande, the reſidue being diſpatched by one meane or other.

By this concluſion of peace then, the Scottes and Pictes got againe the whole poſſeſſion of all ſuche Countreyes as the Romaines had before wonne and take away from them, as the Yers, Louthian, the Marches about Barwike, Fyffe, and Angus, wyth Kyle, Cantyr, Coningham, and Galloway: all the Romaine gariſons departing oute of the fortreſſes, and leauing the ſame vp vnto the former owners.

The Romains giue vp all their holdes and fortreſſes which they kept within the Scottiſhe or Pictiſh dominions.

Galdus hauing thus ended the warres with the Romaines, toke order to ſet good directions amongſt his people for the quiet and peaceable gouernment of the common wealth, viſiting dayly the countreys abrode, the better to vnderſtande the ſtate of them, and to reforme the ſame where it was needfull. Further conſidering that as warre breadeth good ſouldiers ſo peace by iuſtice rydeth them out of the way, if they bee not the better prouided for.

Galdus ſtudieth to preſerue his ſubiects in good quiet now after the warres were ended.

Suche as had ſerued long time in the laſte warres, and had not any trade nowe in tyme of peace whereby to get theyr lyuing, he placed in gariſons neare to the borders of the Brytaynes for for defence of the Countrey.

After this, hee came to an enteruewe wyth Garnarde king of Pictes at Calidone, or Kalendar, to redreſſe certain troubles rayſed betwirt their ſubiectes being borderers concerning the limittes of their Countrey: where perceyuing a ſort of euill diſpoſed perſons to bee wholy in the fault, vpon a naughtie intent to ſteale and trouble the peace whiche they had with ſuch trauaile and labour ſought to reſtore, they puniſhed the offenders, and ſet al things in good quiet, and ſo departed in ſunder with great loue & friendſhip.

Thus Galdus applying all his ſtudie and diligence to aduaunce the common wealth and quiet ſtate of his Countrey, lyued many yeares ſo highly in the fauour of all his ſubiects, that the like hath beene but ſeldome heard of: finally to their greate griefe and diſpleaſure hee ended hys lyfe, more deare to them than theyr owne at Epiake, in the .xxxv. yeare of his raigne, (whiche was about the .xv. yeare of the Empyre of Adrian, the 4098. yeare after the worldes creation, and from the byrth of our ſauiour. 131. and was buryed with greate lamentation in moſte pompous maner, and layde in a goodly Tumbe which was rayſed with mightie huge ſtones, hauing a great number of obeliſkes ſet vp round about it according to the maner. Furthermore to the ende his memorie ſhoulde euer endure, the Countrey where hee fought laſte with the Romains was called Galdia, after his name, which by addition of a fewe letters is nowe called Galloway, and before that tyme Brygantia, as the Scottes do holde: but howe that ſeemeth to agree with a truth, ye may reade in the Hiſtorie of Englande.

Galde departeth this life at Epiake.

After this famous Prince was thus departed hence, his ſon Lugthake ſucceeded in rule of the Scottiſhe kingdome, no leſſe abhorred of al men for his deteſtable and filthye vices ioyned with all kind of crueltie and couetouſneſſe, than his father was beloued for his noble and excellent vertues. This Lugthake went ſo farre paſte the bounds of all continencie in following his ſenſuall luſtes, that he forced and rauiſhed not onely aunt, neece, and ſiſter, but euen his owne daughters alſo. Such as were honourable perſonages and meete to gouerne in the common wealth he nothing regarded, but committed the adminiſtration of things vnto vile perſons, and ſuch as coulde beſt deuiſe howe to inuent quarels agaynſt the riche,, whereby they might be fleeced of all whatſoeuer they had: and oftentymes vpon ſome forged cauſe cruelly put to death. So little did he prouide to ſee offenders in any wiſe corrected, that contrarily hee mainteyned them in ſuche ſorte therein, that iuſtice was quite baniſhed, and nothing but ſpoyle and rauine exerciſed.

His ſmall regarde to the nobilitie.

Fauor ſhewed to men of baſe condition.

Offenders mainteyned.

Iuſtice is baniſhed.

Thus he continued aboue two yeares, to the greate ruyne of the common wealth. Finally, when he went about to put vnto death ſuche as in an aſſemble called at Dunſtafage ſpake againſt the miſordered gouernment of the realme, he was there murthered amongeſt the people, with a number of thoſe alſo, whome he vſed to haue attendaunt on his perſon for ſafegarde of the ſame.

Lugthake woulde haue put to death ſuch as ſpake agaynſt his miſgouernement.

His owne bodie was ſolemnly buryed by appoyntment of the Nobles, hauing reſpect to his fathers benefites, but the carkaſſes of hys Garde were caſt out into the fieldes, there to bee deuoured deuoured of beaſtes and byrdes of rauyn.

Mogall nephew to Galdus is admitted king, and ſtudieth to redreſſe abuſes.

AFter Lugthake was thus diſpatched, one Mogall the Nephewe of Galdus by his daughter was admitted king in his place. Hys chiefeſt ſtudie was to reſourme the decayed ſtate of his Countrey, and firſt he cauſed ſuch wicked Counſellours of his predeceſſours and Uncle Lugthake, as had eſcaped with life (when theyr maiſter was made away) to be put to death, according to their iuſt deſeruings.

He reſtored alſo the due worſhipping of the Goddes, in part as then neglected, by the wicked counſaile of the former rulers.

The Scottiſh men in like maner conceyuing an aſſured hope of a good redreſſe in all their griefes and oppreſſions, by the meanes of ſuch a wel diſpoſed Prince, began to beare him incredible loue and fauour, euen the lyke as they had done to his grandfather Galdus.

Mogal is beloued of his ſubiects.

The Picts deſire ayde of the Scots againſt the Romains

In the meane time came certaine Ambaſſadours from the Picts vnto this Mogall, requyring him of ayde agaynſt the Romaines and Brytayns, who by a ſodaine inuaſion had done much hurt in Pictlande, to the great diſtreſſe of the inhabitants.

The Romains inuade the Scottiſh borders.

The ſame time they of Galloway certified him alſo by letters, that the ſame Romains had made a rode into theyr Countrey, and ledde away a great bootie of goodes and priſoners.

Mogall requireth reſtitution of wrongs done by the Romaines.

Mogall hauing a mynde no leſſe gyuen to deedes of chiualrie, than to the ſtudie of ciuill gouernment and religious deuotion, reioyſed that he had iuſt occaſion giuen him to ſhewe ſome proufe of his valiant inclination, and ſo herevpon ſent an Herald at armes vnto the Romains, requyring to haue reſtitution and amendes for the iniuries thus by them committed.

Mogall prepareth to the warres.

The Heralde doing his meſſage, receyued nothing but ſcornefull wordes, and diſdainfull menaces, whereby Mogall beeing throughly kindled with deſpite, aſſembled his power togyther forth of all the parties of his dominions, and comming with the ſame into Galloway, viſited his grandfathers Sepulchre, honouring the ſame with great reuerence and ſolemne ſupplications, requyring as it were his ayde agaynſt thoſe enimies, which had violated the league made betwixt him and them, by ſolemne othes and other accuſtomed meanes of ratification.

Mogall viſiteth his grandfathers ſepulchre.

This done, he drewe into Annandale, where Unipanus as then king of the Pictes abode hys comming. There ioyning their powers togyther, they marched forth into Cumberland, and ſo forwarde into Weſtmerlande, with fire and ſworde, waſting and ſpoyling thoſe Countreys, as then belonging to the Romaines.

The Picts and Scots ioyne their powers togither and enter into the landes of their enimies.

Lucius Antenous the Romaine Lieutenant lying the ſame tyme at Yorke, beeing certified hereof by ſuch as fledde for feare out of thoſe parties thus inuaded by the Scottes, gathered a mightie armie out of all the Countreys of Bretayne, and haſted forth with the ſame towardes his enimies, of whoſe approche Mogal hauing notice, he made a long Oration vnto his people to encourage them to fight manfully againſt the Romaines, perſwading them effectually thereto by many familier examples brought in of the valiant enterpriſes atchieued by their elders, in defence of their Countrey and libertie of the ſame.

Lucius Antenous Lieutenant of Britaine

Mogall exhorteth his men to doe valiantly.

In like maner Lucius Antenous for his part exhorted the Romains and other his ſouldiours, to call to remembrance the victorious exployctes of their predeceſſours, and how that as then they ſhould fight but with a rude and barbarous people, running to battaile more vppon a furious rage and violent madneſſe, than with any diſcretion or aduiſed order, ſaying furthermore, that it lay nowe in their handes with no great adoe to recouer recouer that which through the negligent ſlouth of Cneus Trebellius was before loſt, whereby they ſhould attaine great honour and famous renoume for euermore.

Lucius Antenous likewiſe encourageth his ſoldiers.

By this meanes the armies on both ſides being kindled with deſire of battaile, in hope of victorie, they drew neare togither, and began the fight right fiercely at the firſt with throwing and ſhoting of dartes and arrowes ſo thicke that one might vnneth ſee another.

The place was more for the aduauntage of the Scots than of the Romaines, becauſe they were compelled to fight as it were by companies and partes, by reaſon of bogges and marſhes, with ſuch ſideling bankes on the ſydes that they could keepe none aray: yet all theſe impediments notwithſtanding, this battaile was fought ſo farre forth to the vtterance, that in the ende after a wonderful ſlaughter on both ſides made, when they⁊ ſwordes and other weapons were ſpent, they buckled togither with ſhort daggers. Finally the violent charge of the Scottes ⁊ Pictes, was ſuch, that the Romaines were conſtrayned to retyre, which their generall Antenous perceyuing, did what hee coulde to ſtay them, and to bring them forward againe, but as he was moſt buſie in the forefront to exhort them hereunto, he was wounded with an arrowe, and thereupon departed out of the battaile, which gaue occaſion to diuerſe other of his companie to followe him, by meanes whereof all the reſidue fell to running away, and made towarde the next wood, there to ſaue themſelues as well as they might, thoughe ſome companies perceyuing that they could not reache thither without manifeſt daunger, cloſed themſelues togither and departed by an other way, which they toke at aduenture, not knowing towardes what partes they drewe, ſo that they lay al the night following within two miles of the Scottes and Pictes, who for that the day was in maner ſpent (before the Romaines were put to flight,) encamped themſelues in the ſelfe ſame place where the battaile was fought, and in the morning hearing that parte of their enimies were lodged ſo neare them, and knew not which way to draw, they ſent a number forth of their campe to fight with them, and to kil them if they reſiſted, or to bring them captiue to the king if they ſhoulde ſeeme willing to yeelde.

Thoſe that were thus ſent, founde the Romaines in verie good order of battaile for ſo ſmal a bande, not minding to yeeld themſelues as priſoners. By reaſon of which their obſtinate wylfulneſſe, they were ſlaine in the ende euerie mothers ſonne.

Lucius Antenous hauing thus receyued the ouerthrow, diſpatched a poſt vnto Rome with all haſte, ſignifying vnto the Emperour Adrian the whole maner of the diſcomfiture, and howe that by reaſon therof things ſtood in great daunger here in Brytaine, if ſpeedie ſuccours were not the ſooner ſent, for the enimies were neuer more cruell and fierce, than at this preſent, not onely the men, but alſo the women (as in the laſt battaile he ſawe plaine proufe) who cared not for the loſſe of their owne lyues, ſo that they might die reuenged.

Women as readie to the battail as men.

When Adrian vnderſtood theſe newes, he purpoſed forthwith to goe himſelfe into Brytayne, cauſing therefore an armie to be leuied, he paſſed forth with the ſame into Fraunce, then called Gallia, and comming to Callice, he tranſported ouer into Brytayne, where hee learned howe the Scottes and Pictes were neuer more buſie than at this preſent, hauing of late waſted and ſpoyled the Countrey euen to the Riuer of Tine.

Adriã the Emperour prepareth to go into Brytayne.

Adrian tranſporteth into Brytayne.

Herewith Adrian being ſore offended, ioyned the power which he had brought with him from Rome, with the other which he had cauſed to be rayſed in Fraunce and Brytayne. This done, he remoued to Yorke, where ſoiourning certaine dayes to refreſh his people, he afterwardes drewe towardes the borders, and comming to the riuer of Tine, he paſſed ouer the ſame.

Adrian commeth to York.

The fourth day after, he came into a Countrey wherein was left no kinde of earthly thing ſeruing to mans vſe, and ſo paſſing forwarde a day or two, he found neither corn, nor other prouiſion of victaile, nor any kind of liuing creature, all the people being fled into the mountaines and marriſh grounds, where no man might come vnto them, as commonly in caſe of extreme daunger they were accuſtomed to lie abroade in the ſame without houſe or any couerture ouer their heades. Howbeit for all that he gaue not ouer to purſue them, but finding them out where they lucked in the hilles and woods, he grieuouſly afflicted them, and that in ſundrie maner. In the ende eſpying the barrennelle of the ſoyle, rudeneſſe of the people, and that there was no hope left to come by ſufficient prouiſion for the maintenance of his armie, he determined not to ſpend any longer time in ſuche a vaine and fruitleſſe trauaile, and therfore returned vnto Tine, where to reſtraine the Scottes and Pictes from inuading ſuch of the Brytaynes as were ſubiect to the Romaine Empyre, he cauſed a great trench to be caſt ouerthwart the lande, from the mouth of Tine to the ryuer of Eſke, and a wall to bee made on the inner ſyde of the ſame, of turfe and ſoddes.

He paſſeth ouer the riuer of Tine.

Adrian findeth nothing abrode in the countrey of his enimies.

What maner of people he had to doe with.

Adrian beginneth to make a wall for ſafegarde of the Britaynes againſt the Picts & Scots.

The Scottiſh Chronicles make mention that it was begonne by Adrian, but not finiſhed tyll the dayes of the Emperour Seuerus, who made an ende of it, and therefore the ſame Chronicles name it the wall of Septimius Seuerus.

The romaine wryters doe confirme the ſame.

Adrianus

Adrianus hauing thus diſpatched in the North partes of Brytayne, in hys returne viſited Wales with the Marches of the ſame, ſetting an order amongeſt ſuch as had moued a commotion agaynſt the Magiſtrates in thoſe partyes, the Authours whereof hee puniſhed according to their offences, and ſo then he came to London, whither at the ſame tyme a great number of the Brytayne Nobilitie reſorted to doe hym honour, according to theyr duties. And hee for hys parte ſhewed them ſuche friendlye entertaynment, that they coulde not wiſhe any better.

Adrian commeth to London.

After this he ſayled ouer into Fraunce, taking Lucius Antenous with him, bycauſe hee coulde not away with the ayre of Brytayne, in whoſe place he left one Aulus Victorinus Lieutenant there, who diſpoſed dyuerſe garniſons of Souldiours in places neare vnto the foreremembred Wall, for defence of the inhabitauntes agaynſt the violence of the Scottes and Pictes. Who ſeeing this demeanor of the Romaines, deuided thoſe landes and Countreys (whiche they had lately waſted on the further ſyde of Tine) in ſuche ſorte betwyxte them, that all whatſoeuer laye towardes the Iriſhe Sea, remayned to the Scottes, and the reſt coaſting vpon the Almayne Seas, fell vnto the Pictes for their portion.

Adrian returneth towarde Rome.

Aulus Victorinus Lieutenat of Brytaine.

The Scottiſhe men and Picts deuide the countreys beyonde Tine betwixt them.

After this Mogall liued many yeares in good quiet without any trouble of enimies. But being puffed vp in pryde by ſuche notable victories as he had thus got of the Romaines the conquerours of the worlde, hee coulde not in tyme of peace maiſter hys owne vnruly appetytes, but that drowned in the ſylthie luſtes of the bodye, hee ſpared neyther Mayde, Wydowe, nor wyfe.

Mogal through pride abuſeth himſelfe in ſundrie kindes of vices.

Againe hee was giuen to ſuche vnquenchable couetyſe, that nothing might ſuffice hym, fynding many forged matters agaynſt the riche, whereby to bereue them both of life and ſubſtaunce. Hee was the fyrſt whiche ordeyned that ſuche as were baniſhed or condemned for anye crime, ſhoulde forfeyte all theyr landes and goodes wythoute any conſideration had, eyther to wyfe or chylde, whiche is obſerued at the full euen vnto theſe oure dayes, where before it was otherwyſe in that Countrey.

A couetous and cruel diuiner.

But theſe ſo notable vices in the Prince coulde not long continue vnpuniſhed, for at length a conſpiracie was practiſed agaynſt him, whereof hee hauing knowledge (whether by witchcraft or otherwyſe by relation of friends, the certaintie is not knowne) in the deade of the night hee armed himſelfe, and with two of his ſeruauntes onely fledde to the next wood, not gyuing notice of his departure to any other of his houſeholde.

A conſpiracie attempted gaynſt Mogall.

Mogall fleeth out of his owne houſe.

The morning being come, and knowledge had how he was thus departed, the conſpiratours purſued after him, who perceyuing them to approche, ſought wayes how to haue eſcaped their handes: but ſuch was his happe that hee fell amongeſt other that were as readie as the fyrſt to wreake their malice vppon him, and ſo by them hee was immediately murthered in the. xxxbj. yeare of his raigne, beeing the. 4136. of the worlde, and after the byrth of our Sauiour 169. Antonius Pius then gouerning the Romaine Empyre, and Phiatus ſurnamed Albus, raigning amongeſt the Pictes. His heade beeing ſmitten off, was ſet vppon a poles ende, and caryed aboute in deriſion: but afterwardes in reſpect of his lynage it was buryed togither with the the bodie by appoyntment of the nobles, notwithſtanding the commons thought it moſte vnworthie of any ſuch honour.

MOgal being thus diſpatched, as ye haue heard, his ſonne Conarus was admitted King, who (as is reported) was priuie to the cõſpiracie deuiſed againſt his father, and as hee came to the gouernment by wicked meanes, ſo in the ende hee bled himſelfe muche what accordinglye in the ſame: for after hee had for a tyme diſſembled hys naughtie nature, he beganne at the laſt openly to ſhewe himſelfe in his right colours, committing firſte of all the adminiſtration of publike affayres vnto men of bale condition and vile nature.

His chiefe delyght was altogyther in banquetting and coſtly fare, not regarding the auncient temperancie in feeding vſed amongſt hys worthie anteceſſours.

Conarus giuen to exceſsiue gluttonie.

In waſting therefore hys kingly reuenewes vppon ſuch ryotous exceſſe, hee was nothing abaſhed to require in an open aſſemble of hys Nobles, a ſubſidie to bee graunted towardes the maintenaunce of ſuche royall cheere, as hee iudged to ſtand with his honour to haue dayly in his houſe: And therefore whereas the rentes that belonged to the crowne were not ſufficient to furniſhe the charges, he requeſted a generall contribution to bee leuied throughe the Realme, of euerie perſon according to theyr abilities, for the maintenaunce of ſuche ſuperfluous expences as hee dayly vſed in exceſſiue banketting.

The Lordes marueyling to heare hym moue any ſuch demaunde, and conſidering wythall the occaſion thereof, they aſked reſpite to make theyr aunſwere tyll the next day: whiche beeing graunted, in the night following they communed ſecretely togyther, and in the ende concluded, not onely to denie hys requeſt, but alſo to depoſe him of all kingly gouernment, ſithe hys naughtie life requyred no leſſe.

The Lordes conſpire againſt Conarus.

The next day therefore when they were againe ſet downe in the Counſell Chamber, one of them in name of the reſidue, toke vpon hym to ſpeake, declaring that the Lordes and Commons of the Realme, marueyled not a little how it ſhould come to paſſe, that the king hauing no warres wherewith to conſume his treaſure, ſhoulde yet bee enforced to demaunde a tallage for maintenaunce of his eſtate and charges of hys houſeholde, but the faulte was knowne well ynoughe to reſte in ſuche as hee moſte vnwoythylye had preferred to rule thinges

The anſwere of the Lordes to the demaũd of Conarus.

vnder him, who being come of naught, did nothing but deuise meanes howe to cause the king to spoyle his naturall subiectes of theyr goodes and possessions, therewyth to enriche themselues, but, (sayeth he) as they shall be prouided for well ynoughe ere long, and so aduaunced, as they shall not neede to thyrst for other mennes lyuings, that is to witte, euen to a faire payre of Gallowes, there to ende their liues with shame, as a number of suche other lolengers had often done before them: so it is conuenient that the King sithe his skill is so small in the administration of his office, shoulde bee shutte vp in some one Chamber or other, and suche a one to haue the gouernaunce of the Realme as may be thought by common assent of the Lords most mete to take it vpon him.

The King hearing this tale, started vp, and with a loude voyce beganne to call them traytours, adding that if they went about any hurte to his person, they shoulde deare abye the bargaine. But notwithstanding these woordes, such as were appoynted thereto, caught him betwixt them, and had him forth to a place assigned where they layde hym vppe maugre all hys resistaunce.

Conarus is taken and committed to close keeping.

In lyke maner, all suche as had borne offices vnder him, were attached and had to prison, where the most part of them vpon examination taken of their offences, suffered death according to their iust demerites.

Conarus his ministers are punished for their offences.

Then was the rule of the Realme committed vnto one Argadus, a man of noble byrth, and ruler of Argyle, who vnder the name of a Gouernour toke vpon him the publike regiment, till other aduise might be taken.

Argadus is chosen to ouerne the Realme.

His studie in the begynning was onely to clense the Countrey of all mysdoers, and to see the peace kept to the quiet of the people: and finally in all his doings shewed a perfite patrone of an vpright Iusticier. But within a few yeares after (as it often happeneth) prosperous successe chaunged his former mynde to an euill disposition, whereby he ordered things after his owne selfewill more than by reason, without the aduise of his peeres.

Argadus an vpright iusticier.

Prosperitie chaungeth conditions.

And further to the manifest ruyne of the common wealth, he nourished ciuill discorde and sedition amongst the nobles, supposing it to make for his welfare, so long as they were at oddes. He also maryed a Pictish Ladie, the better to strengthen himselfe by this his forraine aliaunce.

Hereupon the Peeres of the Realme vnderstanding what mischiefe might ensue by these manifolde and sundrie abuses of the gouernour, caused a Parliament to be called, where in presence of the whole assemblie, they layde vnto his charge, howe (that through his misgouernment and presumption, not onely in coupling himselfe in maryage with a wife of a straunge Nation, but also for attempting many other things preiudicial to the estate of the Realme, without consent of the Nobles or Commons of the same) he had deserued greeuous punishment, his trespasse being so much the greater, in y consideryng the meane howe he came to that dignitie, he answered not their expectation, nor performed the trust which was generally committed vnto him.

Argadus is rebuked.

Argadus hearing himselfe thus charged, and not able to lay any likely excuse, fell vppon hys knees, and partly as it were confessing his fault with teares gushing frō his eyes, besought them of pardon, wholy submitting himselfe to bee ordered at their discretion.

Argadus confesseth his fault.

The Lordes being moued with this humble submission of Argadus, vpon promise he shoulde redresse al his former misdemeanours, were contented that he should continue still in the administration niſtration of the Realme, but ſuche as had beene his chiefeſt Counſellours were committed to warde.

After this ſharpe admonition and warning thus giuen, Argadus did nothing touching the gouernment of the common wealth, without the aduice of his Peeres: and ſoone after amongeſt other things, he toke order for the limitting how farre the authoritie of inferiour officers, as Bayliffes, Boroughmaiſters, Conſtables, and ſuch other ſhoulde extende. But eſpecially he trauailed moſte diligently for the puniſhing of theeues and robbers, of whom none eſcaped with life that fell into his handes.

Moreouer hee ordeyned by ſtatute, that no man exerciſing any publike office, ſhould taſte of any drinke that might make him drunken. Hee alſo baniſhed all ſuche perſons as vſed with dreſſing of delicate meates, and as I may call them, deyntie diſhes, or banketting cheare, to allure mennes appetites from the olde rude fare accuſtomed amongſt their elders, who ſought not to follow theyr delicious appetites, but onely prouided to ſuſtayne nature, which is ſatisfied with a little, and that boyde of coſtly furniture.

Argadus thus beeing occupied in reforming the ſtate of the common wealth, brought many euill doers into good frame and order, and ſuch as were vpright liuers of themſelues, endeuored ſtill to proceede forward to better and better.

At length in the eight yeare of his gouernment Conarus beeing conſumed with long impriſonment, departed oute of this life, in the fourteenth yeare after the begynning of hys raigne.

After whoſe deceaſſe, the nobles and other eſtates of the realme aſſebling themſelues togither, choſe one Ethodius, Nephew to King Mogall by hys ſiſter, to raigne ouer them.

But Argadus being highly rewarded with landes and lyuings for his faythfull and diligent paynes taken in the aduauncement of the publike weale, during the time of his gouernment, was thereto ſoone after created as it were Lorde Preſident of the Counſell, thereby to bee chiefeſt in authoritie next to the king, in the ordering and rule of all publike affayres and cauſes. Argadus is create Lorde preſident of the counſell.

Shortly after Ethodius (as the cuſtome of newe kings in thoſe dayes was) went ouer into the weſterne Iles, there to take order for the adminiſtration of iuſtice, where immediately vpon his arriual, it was ſhewed him that not paſſing two or three dayes before, there had bene a great cõflict fought betwixt ẏ nobles or clannes of the countrey, by reaſon of a ſtrife that was ſtirred amongſt their ſeruants, being a cõpany of naughtie and vnruly fellowes, to the great diſquiet of the Inhabitants. Ciuil diſcords amongſt the Lordes of the Iles.

Herevpon was Argadus ſent forth incontinẽtly with a power to appeale that buſineſſe, and to bring in the offenders, that they might receyue rewarde according to their demerites. Argadus forthwith haſted towards the place, where he vnderſtood the rebelles to be remayning, and apprehending their whole nũber of thẽ, ſome by force, and ſome vpõ their humble ſubmiſſion, he returned back with them to the king, who cauſing the matter to be throughly heard, ſuch as were ẏ chiefeſt beginners, & moſt in fault, were puniſhed by death, and the other fined at the kings pleaſure. Argadus is ſent forth to apprehend the rebelles. The Iland rebelles are puniſhed.

The Romains inuade the Pictiſh & Scottiſh borders.

The Flande people beeing thus appeaſed, the king returned into Albion, where as then lying at Enuerlochthee, a towne (as is ſayde) in Louchquhaber, worde came vnto him, ỹ the Romaines had broken downe the Wall buylded by the Emperour Adrian, and made a greate rode into the Scottiſhe and Pictiſhe borders, where meeting with the Inhabitantes aſſembled togyther in defence of theyr Countrey (after a ſore conflict) the victorie remayned with the Romaines: by reaſon wherof they led a great bootie of cattel and other goodes away with them to the places where they ſoiourned.

Ethodius requyreth reſtitution of his ſubiects goods taken away by the Romains.

Ethodius beeing moued herewyth, ſente forthwyth an Heralde vnto Victorine the Romaine Lieutenant, requyring that his ſubiectes myghte haue reſtitution of theyr goodes wrongfully taken from them, or elſe to loke for warres within .xb. dayes after.

Victorines anſwere to Ethodius requeſt.

Victorine anſwered herevnto, that the Scottes and Pictes had fyrſt begonne to breake downe the foreſayde Wall, and to buylde a Tower vppon the ſame, fortifying it wyth a number of menne of warre, who running dayly into the Brytiſhe confines, fetched praye thence from amongeſt the Romaine ſubiectes, and thoughe hee had ſent dyuerſe tymes to the Scottiſhe and Pictiſhe Wardens for reſtitution, yet coulde hee neuer haue anye towardly anſwere, ſo that hee was conſtrayned to begynne the warre in maner and fourme as hee had done alreadie.

Ethodius exhorteth the king of the Picts to make warres againſt the Romains.

Ethodius not a little kyndled with this anſwere, wrote ſtreyght wayes vnto the King of the Pictes, exhorting him in reuenge of ſuche iniuries as his ſubiectes had lately receyued at the handes of the Romaines, to inuade the Wall on that ſyde where it deuided his Countrey from the Brytaynes, and to breake in vppon the enimies by the ſame, and for his parte hee promiſed ſhortly after to come, and to ioyne with him in ſuch a neceſſarie enterpriſe againſt the common enimies of both their Countreyes.

The Pictiſh king giuing thankes to the meſſenger for his paynes, promiſed with all ſpeede to ſette forwarde accordyng to the aduice of Ethodius.

The Romaines in like maner hauing knowledge of the whole intention of the two Kings, with all ſpeede made preparation alſo for the warres, but the Scottes and Pictes firſt breaking in vpon them, did muche hurt abrode in the Countreyes next adioyning. Which when the Romains perceyued, they paſſed by the enimies campe in the night ſeaſon, and entered into the Pictiſhe borders, waſting and ſpoyling all afore them.

The Scottiſhe men & Pictes inuade the Brytiſh borders.

When the two Kings vnderſtode this, they haſted forth towardes them, and were no ſoner come within ſight of them, but that they made eche towardes other, and ſo encountering togyther, there was fought a ſore battaile with doubtfull victorie, for the right wings on eyther ſyde vanquiſhed the lefte, the breaſtes of bothe the battayles keeping theyr grounde, the one not once ſhrinking backe from the other, tyll night ſeuered them in ſunder, but not without ſuche ſlaughter made on bothe ſydes, that beeing once parted, they made no greate haſte to ioyne agayne togyther: for as well the one parte as the other beeing thus diſſeuered, drew incontinently homewardes without abyding for the morning. Neither did they attempt any further exploite of all that yeare following.

In whiche meane tyme Victorine ſent letters vnto Rome to the Emperour Marcus Antonius Aurelius, who as then gouerned the Empyre, ſignifying vnto him in what ſtate things ſtode in Brytaine: Further declaring that if conuenient ſuccours were not ſente in tyme, it woulde bee harde to reſiſt the furious rage of the enimies, by reaſon of the ſmall truſt hee perceyued was to bee had in the Brytaines, beeing no leſſe readie vppon occaſion to make warres in recouerie of their libertie, than the Scottes or Pictes were too encroche vppon them.

Victorine deth lette to Rome

The Emperour vpon receyt of theſe letters, thought in his minde that Victorine was not ſo baliaunt a Captaine as the caſe requyred, and that therevppon the Scottes and Pictes became the more enboldened to reſiſt, therefore hee ſente for him home, appoynting one Agricola Calphurnius to ſucceede in hys rowme, who was (as ſome haue lefte in wryting) the Nephew of Julius Agricola, the moſte famous Captayne of the Romaines that euer came into Brytaine.

Victorine ſent for to turne vnto Rome, and Calphurni ſent into raine to ſu ceede in h roome.

This Calphurnius comming into Brytain with an armie, ioyned to the ſame the power which he founde there, as well of the Brytaynes as of other ſeruing vnder the Romaine enſignes. Which done, he repayred to Yorke, and after towardes the Riuer of Tine, where beeing aryued, he marched forth into the borders of his enimyes, finding all the Countrey rounde aboute him ſo clearly waſted and burned, that there was not a houſe left ſtanding, nor a graine of corne, or one heade of Cattell to be founde therein. Yet notwithſtanding al this, forth he paſſed through Northumberlande, and entering into Pictlande waſted al that was before him with fire & ſword. And for ſo muche as Winter came vpon, when hee had done his will in that behalfe, hee returned vnto Yorke, where hee ſoiourned vntill the Spring.

When

When Sommer was once come, hauing made his prouiſion to warre on the Scottes and Pictes, worde came vnto him, that the Welchmen were reuolted, and beganne to rayſe warre agaynſt the Romaines, ſo that taking order for the repayring of the Wall made by Adrian, which the enimies in diuerſe places had broken downe, and leauing a ſufficient number of men of warre for defence of the ſame agaynſt all inuaſions that might bee attempted, he turned the reſidue of his power agaynſt thoſe Welche Rebelles, whome in the ende, though not without much ado he reduced to obedience.

Immediately after this, he heard alſo howe the Brytaynes of the Iſle of Wight were vp in armor agaynſt ſuche Romaines as ruled there, ſundrie noble men of the maine Iſle taking their part, but they alſo were at length brought againe to their former ſubiection, and the authours of that rebellion puniſhed by death.

In the meane tyme the Scottes and Pictes determined not to attempt any further exployte agaynſt the Romaines, doubting the verie name and image of Agricola in the Lieutenaunt Calphurnius, by calling to remembrance the noble atchieued conqueſtes of his grandfather Julius Agricola, of whoſe victorious exployes, beſyde that which ye haue here before heard: the Engliſh hiſtorie alſo doth make a long rehearſall.

Calphurnius being thus at quiet on that ſide, intended wholy to reform al miſorders amongſt the Brytaynes, which being brought to indifferent good paſſe, he was ſent for home againe vnto Rome by the Emperour Antonius Commodus, the ſonne and ſucceſſour of the forenemembred Marcus Aurelius, ſending one Publius Trebellius into Brytayne there to ſupplie hys charge.

This Trebellius comming into Brytain, at the firſt vſed himſelfe very vprightly in his office, ſhewing all honor and loue towardes the Brytaynes, ſubiectes to the Romaine Empyre, and namely to Lucius, who raigned as king of the lande, vnder the name and authoritie of the Romaine Empyre.

But after that he had once wonne him a peece of credit amongſt them, he chaunged his maners, or rather diſcouered his naturall inclination, ſo wholy giuen to couetouſneſſe, that his only ſtudie was ſet whiche way to fill his bagges, not caring howe vntruly hee forged accuſations agaynſte the riche, ſo that eyther by death or baniſhment, their goodes might be confiſcate, and ſo come to his handes.

By this wicked gouernment, the Brytaines beganne ſo ſore to hate him, that had it not beene for the loue of their king, the forſayde Lucius, (who holpe to appeaſe them) there had beene ſome Rebellion practiſed agaynſte him in the South part.

Now the Scottes and Pictes hauing knowledge of this miſliking in the Brytayns towards the Romaine Lieutenant, thought it a time conuenient for them alſo to be doing, to the ende they might reuenge their former iniuries: and hereupon leuying an armie, they came to the oft remembred wall, & ouerthrowing the ſame in diuerſe places they entred into the Britiſh cõfines with great ſpoyle and crueltie.

The Scottes and Pictes renue the warre againſt the Romaines.

Trebellius being hereof informed, haſted forth with all the power he coulde make, to reſiſt their inuaſions: but finding the enimies readye in the field, and encountring them ſooner than he loked for, he was euen vpon the firſt ioyning abãdoned of the moſt part of his whole armie, whiche conſiſted of Britains & Frenchmẽ, thẽ called Gauls, ſo that the reſidue beeing beaten downe, he was glad to ſaue himſelfe as well as he might by ſetting the ſpurs to his horſe, and galloping away.

Trebellius fighteth with his enimies, is forſaken of his owne men, and chaſed out of the fielde.

After this, gathering togither his people again as they fled from the diſcomfiture, he retired back with them vnto Yorke, hauing loſt in this bickering a great number of his beſt ſoldiers, and men of warre: for the Scottes and Pictes miſſing no ſmall number of their frends in that battaile, wer not ſatisfied with thoſe whom they had likewyſe ſlain in the fight, but alſo fel vpon their priſoners which they had taken, and ſlue them alſo in reuenge of their fellowes whom they had loſt.

Weſtmerland and Kendall ſpoyled by the Scottiſh men and Pictes.

Afterwards they harried the coũtreys of Weſtmerland and Kendal in moſt cruel wiſe, Trebellius not being ſo hardy to fight with them again for doubt of ſome traine that might bee practiſed by the Brytaines. Neither was his ſuſpition grounded vpon the credite of any light information, as may appeare by that which followed: for immediately after, the Cõmons of the countrey roſe againſt the Romaines, in purpoſe to haue driuen them all out of the land.

The Brytiſhe Cõmons riſe againſt Trebellius, one Caldorus a Pict beeing their captaine.

Their captain was one Caldorus a Pict born. There were alſo diuerſe of the Britiſhe nobilitie amongeſt them not knowne, for they were diſguiſed in ſtrauuge apparel, counterfeiting themſelues to be of the vulgar ſort. The furie of theſe people was great, but yet in the ende the politike order of the Romains vanquiſhed them, howbeit not without great ſlaughter on both ſides.

The ſame commons are vanquiſhed.

Caldorus eſcaping the handes of his enimies, fled into his natiue countrey of Pictland, not a little reioyſing that he had procured ſuch ſlaughter amongſt the Romaines and Brytaines, both being enimies to him and his countrey.

Caldorus reioyceth at the ſlaughter as wel of the one part as of the other.

Suche priſoners alſo of the Brytaynes as fell into the hands of the Romains, were hanged vp, vpon ſundrie trees and gibets: whereat other of the Brytains being offended, in ỹ night ſeaſon toke downe thoſe deade bodies, and hanged vp as many of the Romaines in theyr places, the truth being neuer knowne who were the doers of that act.

Trebellius writeth to the Emperor Cõmodus for ayde.

The Lieutenant Trebellius perceyuing thus what daunger he ſtoode in on euerie part, wrote vnto the Emperour Commodus, that without ſome reformation were had, the Romaines were not like to keepe foote any long ſeaſon in Brytayne, and therefore requyred to haue ſome ayde ſent ouer vnto him in time. But the Emperour doubting leaſt the fault reſted moſt in the Lieutenant himſelfe, appoynted that one Pertinax an auncient gentleman, ſone for his high and notable vertues greatly eſteemed both amongſt the men of warre, and alſo in the Senate, ſhould go into Brytaine, to bee Legate there in place of Trebellius.

Pertinax ſent as Lieuetenant into Brytaine.

This Pertinax comming into Brytain, according to the Emperours appoyntment, toke vpon him the office. And firſt ſetting a ſtaye amongſt the Brytaines, by right prudent and wel aduiſed gouernmẽt, he afterwards made a iourney agaynſt the Scottes and Pictes, dryuing them by great ſlaughter beyonde Adrians wall, and ſo conſtreyned them to remaine within their owne confines, purſuing them no further, for that hee was ſente for home vnto Rome, where the Emperour Commodus beeing murthered amongſt his owne men, he was agaynſt his will preferred to his place.

Pertinax driueth back both the Scots and Pictes.

Pertinax is choſen Emperour.

About the ſame time the ſtate of the Scottiſh common wealth was brought into great daunger through an other incident, as by reaſon of a rebellion ſtirred by them of the weſterne Iſles, who not quieted in their ſtomackes for the death of their friendes executed by Argadus (as before ye haue heard) aſſembled theſelues togither, and comming ouer into Argyle, ſpoyled and harryed the countrey in piteous wiſe. For redreſſe whereof, Argadus was ſent thither againe with an armie, and in the meane time Ethodius the king with a great hoſt of Scottiſhe men and Pictes lay in campe neare vnto Adrians wall, to reſiſt the inuaſion of the enimies on that ſyde, if happely they ſhould attempt any new exployt againſt him in thoſe partes.

Argyle infeſted by the Iland men.

The Iſlande men hearing of Argadus hys approche, drewe themſelues togither to receyue him by battaile, if he minded to offer it. In which meane time two thouſand Iriſhe men were landed in that Countrey, in hope of ſpoyle, and hearing that Argadus was comming that wayes forth to fight with his enimies, they layde themſelues ſecretely in ambuſhe by the way where hee ſhoulde paſſe, and when he was paſſed by them, they brake forth vppon his rereward ſodainly, putting his people in ſuche diſorder by their violent impreſſion at the firſt brunt, that though he did what in him laye to bring them againe into aray of battayle, yet in the ende hee was there ſlaine with two thouſande of his armie, the reſidue eſcaping by flight out of the handes of their wilde and cruel enimies.

The Iriſhe lay an ambuſh to entrappe Argadus.

Argadus ſlaine.

Ethodius hauing knowledge hereof, with an armie of .xx. thouſand men haſted forth towards Argyle to reuenge the death of his valiant Captaine Argadus vpon the rebelles. Who hearing of his comming, made towardes the Sea, and woulde gladly haue bene gone, but by reaſon of a contrary winde they were forced to ſtay agaynſt their willes, ſo that hee finding them ſtill in the Countrey, wrought ſo warely by cloſing them vp among the Hilles and Mountaynes, that finally conſtrayned through famine, they ſubmitted themſelues vpon theſe conditions, that their heade Captaine with two hundred others of the chiefeſt, ſhoulde yeeld themſelues ſimplie to the ſentence of the Nobles and Peeres of the realme. Whereat the other taking indignation, thoughe they had alreadie yeelded vppe theyr weapons, yet beganne they to fall vppon the Scottes with hurling of ſtones, and other ſuche things as came to hande, tyll finallye they were beaten downe by the armed Souldiers, and a greate number of them ſlayne: the reſidue eſcaping as well as they myght, fledde into the Mountaynes.

The Iſlande menne beeing thus vanquiſhed, and the Romaines attempting nothing againſt the Scottiſhe men or Pictes, Ethodius viſited all the partes of his Realme, taking order for the due execution of Juſtice amongeſt hys ſubiects.

And for that hee woulde not ſpende his time in idleneſſe, beeing nowe at reſt from warres, hee beganne to exercile himſelfe in hunting, and for the better nouriſhing of game, hee toke order that all ſuche ordinances as had beene deuiſed by his elders, ſhoulde ſtraytely bee obſerued and kept: as that no man ſhoulde bee ſo hardie to goe aboute to deſtroy any Hares with nettes, grennes, or Harepypes: Neither to kill them in theyr formes by anye meanes: nor after that they had beene once courſed and eſcaped, to follow the ſute, to the entente to ſtarte them againe. Alſo that none ſhoulde goe aboute to kyll anye Harte or Hynde, during all the Winter ſeaſon, at what tyme they were accuſtomed for hunger to leaue the Mountaynes, Forreſtes, and Wooddes, and to come downe into the fieldes and courtes, neare vnto the townes and houſes.

He ordeyned moreouer therunto, that no man ſhoulde preſume to kill any Hinde Calues, deſtroying nothing more than to haue ſuche game deſtroyed, as ſerued for the exercile and ſolace of him and his Nobles.

The other vacant tyme, whileſt hee reſted from hunting, hee ſpent for the moſte parte in hearing of Muſick, hauing diuerſe cunning players of ſundrie kindes of Inſtruments attending in his court.

It length ſetting all his pleaſure in hearing of a Muſition beeing borne in one of the weſt Iſles, hee was murthered by him in the night time within his owne chamber. The murtherer beeing apprehended, and examined vpon what occaſion hee did that heynous fact, for the which he had deſerued the moſt extreme kinde of puniſhment that might be deuiſed, he anſwered: that in reuenge of the death of ſuche his kinſmen and friendes as the King hadde cauſed to bee executed in Argyle, hee purpoſed long before to doe that deede, and nowe that hee had accompliſhed hys purpoſe, hee was readie to receyue what kynde of death they woulde adiudge him to. For ſure I am of this, ſayeth he, that howe terrible ſo euer my execution ſhall be, yet can it not be ſo painefull, but that I ſhall reioyce euen in the verie inſtaunt of my death, for that I haue in ſuche notable ſorte reuenged the deathes of all my kynſmen and friendes. Finally by commaundement of the Magiſtrates he was drawne in peeces with wilde horſes in moſte violent wiſe.

Ethodius raigned .xxviij. yeares, vntyll the latter dayes of Caracalla the Emperour. Hee was buryed at Dunſtafage with all ſuche pompous ceremonies as was accuſtomed about the enterement of kings in that age.

Satrahel.

After the death of Ethodius, his brother Satrahel or Serrahell (as ſome write hym,) was choſen to ſucceed by the common conſent and voyces of al the eſtates of the Realme. For although Ethodius left a ſonne behinde him, yet byeauſe hee was very yong in yeares, hee was thought inſufficient to haue ſo great a charge (as the rule of a kingdome) committed vnto his handes.

Thys Satrahell was ſubtile of nature, and a greate diſſembler, whoſe purpoſe was to defraude the iſſue of hys brother Ethodius from attayning at any tyme vnto the rule of the kingdome, and therefore to bring hys purpoſe the better to paſſe, hee founde forged matter againſt all ſuch as were familier friends vnto Ethodius, thereby to put them vnto death. Neyther dealt hee any thing more ſincerely with a great number of other of his wealthie ſubiectes, whoſe landes and goodes hee onely ſought to enioye at his owne will.

Satrahel ſeeketh to deſtroy ſuch as were in fauor with his predeceſſor.

By meanes whereof ſuche miſcheefe enſued throughe the Realme, and ſuch ciuil ſedition dayly roſe amongſt the people, that pitie it was to beholde it: the king being not ſo bolde all the while, as once to ſhewe his face abroade for redreſſe thereof, by reaſon hee vnderſtoode well ynoughe what hatred the people bare towardes hym, neyther did his keeping within doores ſaue his lyfe any long tyme, for in the ende his owne ſeruauntes founde meanes to ſtrangle him, and that before hee had raigned fully foure yeares.

Diſcord among the people through the kings gouernaunce.

Serrahell ſtrangled to death by his owne ſeruaunts. 197.

In his place ſucceeded his brother Donald, a Prince of far cõtrary nature and conditions, for he was free, curteous, and without al deceyte, more righteous than rigorous, & afore all things deſyrous that peace and concorde might proſper among his ſubiects. Neither bare he with offenders, but ſuche as were diſobedient againſt the lawes & wholſome ordinances of the realme, he cauſed to be duely puniſhed: finally he toke ſuch order for reformation of things, that hee reduced his ſubiects as it had beene from a wylde and ſauage rudeneſſe, vnto a perfect ciuill trade of humanitie.

Aboute the ſame time Lucius king of the Brytaynes beeing deade, the Romaynes perceyuing that a Kings authorite amongeſt the Brytaynes, did nothing elſe but diminiſhe the maieſtie of the Imperiall iuriſdiction amongeſt them, determined not to ſuffer any more of the Brytiſhe Nation to enioy that title.

This thing moued the Brytaynes to ſuche indignation, that by procurement of one Fulgentius, dyuerſe of them rebelled, and chooſing the ſame Fulgentius to theyr generall, they dyrected a Meſſenger with letters vnto Donalde King of the Scottes, requyring him to ioyne wyth them in league againſte theyr auncient enimyes the Romaines, whoſe endeuour (as hee knewe) had euer beene from tyme to tyme, howe to bring the whole Iſlande vnder theyr ſubiection, and to extinguiſhe all the Nobilitie and auncient inhabitours of the ſame. Adding furthermore, that if he woulde nowe put to hys helping hande, the time neuer ſerued better for the diſpatching of them wholly out of the Iſle, conſidering the ſundrie rebellions attempted as well by the people of Germanye and Fraunce, as alſo of the eaſterly Nations and Countreys.

Donald receyued the Meſſenger moſt friendly, and being glad to vnderſtande of theſe newes, hee promiſed to ayde Fulgentius with all the power he was able to make, and to meete hym at ſuche day and place as hee ſhoulde afterwarde appoynt. The lyke anſwere was made alſo by the king of Pictes, vnto whom in ſemblable wiſe Fulgentius had directed his letters.

Thus the Brytaynes, being confirmed with hope of great ayde from the Scottes and Pictes, aſſembling their hoſte togyther, reſorted vnto the wall of Adrian, which they ouerthrew in diuerſe places, that their friendes might haue the more free acceſſe and entrie vnto them by the ſame. Neither were the Scottes and Pictes ſlowe for theyr part to make forwarde: ſo that they likewyſe comming thither, holpe to throwe downe that Wall, and to fyll vp the trench or ditch that went alongſt the ſame.

The Brytaynes come to Adrians wall, and pull it downe to let in the Scottes.

The Scottiſhe men & Pictes come to the ayde of the Brytaynes.

Thys done, ioyning theyr powers togither, they paſſed forth towardes Yorke, in hope to haue founde the Romaine Lieutenaunt Trebellius within that Citie, and to haue beſieged him therein: But hauing knowledge howe hee was withdrawne into Kent, there to gather a power, they lefte theyr purpoſe of beſieging that Citie, and fell to ſpoyling and harrying of the Countrey abroade on euerie ſyde, conſtrayning the moſte parte of the people to come in and yeelde themſelues vnder theyr obeyſance.

The Scots and Pictes inuade the Brytaynes.

The Scottes helpe the Brytayns to ſpoile their owne countrey.

Thus they continued in paſſing from one quarter of the Countrey to another, till Winter enforced them to breake vppe their campe, and to lycence the Souldiours to departe home into theyr Countreys, tyll they had newe ſummonance to aſſemble and meete againe.

In this meane tyme Trebellius certifyed the Emperour Seuerus of all thys trouble and rebellion in Brytayne, whereuppon Seuerus with all ſpeede lenyed an armie, and ſette forwarde with the ſame himſelfe in perſon towarde Brytayne, as in the Engliſhe Hiſtorie more plainly it may appeare.

Trebellius certifieth the Emperour of the ſtate of Brytaine.

At his comming into Brytaine, hee ſlacked no time, but aſſembling his power, prepared to go againſt the enimies.

Fulgentius doubting the force of his enimies ſent Imbaſſadours vnto him to treate for peace, but Seuerus woulde not graunt to any, whereupon Fulgentius confirmed the myndes of the Brytaynes with all comfortable wordes, in the beſt wiſe hee coulde, exhorting them to ſticke to theyr neceſſarilye begonne enterpryſe, for recouerie of theyr long wyſhed libertie, whiche he doubted not, but by vanquiſhing the Emperour at that preſent, they ſhoulde aſſuredlye attayne: And as for victorie, hee was in no doubt, ſo that they woulde plucke their heartes vnto them, and trie it forth manfully by dynte of Swoorde lyke fellowes and brethren knitte in one faythfull bande of truſtye concorde, conſydering the enimyes armie beeyng gathered of ſo many ſundrie nations and languages, that conſent in one opinion, the chiefeſt meane for the atteyning of victorie, muſt needes bee wanting amongſt them.

Fulgentius encouraged the Brytaynes to ſticke vnto their begun enterpriſe.

The Brytaynes moued herewith, promiſed hym to liue and dye in the quarell. Whereupon he toke aduice with them, whiche way to mainteyne themſelues agaynſte Seuerus, of whoſe comming they were alreadie certifyed.

Seuerus ſetteth forth towardes his enimies.

For Seuerus hauing diſpatched the Brytiſhe Ambaſſadours from him, ſet incontinently forwarde towards Yorke, leauing his yonger ſonne named Geta in the South partes to haue the gouernaunce of the ſame in hys abſence. Hys eldeſt ſonne Antoninus he toke with him in this iourney agaynſt his enimies.

Seuerus commeth to York.

At his comming to Yorke, hee did ſacrifice to the Goddes, according to his Ethniſhe cuſtome, and alſo toke aduice with his Captaines howe to proceede in his enterpriſe agaynſt hys enimies.

This done, he marcheth forth with hys armie towardes them, who beeing alreadie ioyned with the Scottes and Pictes, were determined to abyde him, in ſo muche that thoſe of the one ſide came no ſooner in ſight of the other, but that they haſted forth to ioyne togyther in battayle, whereof enſued great ſlaughter betwixt them, though the Brytiſhe part (notwithſtanding their ayde of Scottes and Pictes) were not able long to endure agaynſt the great multitude and practyſed ſkil of the Romaine Souldiours, ſo that in the ende they were opened perforce and put to flight with the loſſe of xxx. thouſande, what of Brytaynes, Scottiſhmen and Pictes.

Seuerus is encountered by his enimies.

Fulgentius is put to flight, and his armie diſcomfited.

Fulgentius himſelfe ſeeing the diſcomfiture and huge ſlaughter made of his people, had run in amongſt the thickeſt preaſe of his enimyes, had not thoſe that were aboute him ledde him away by force, and ſo at length he got him among the troupes of the Scottiſhe men and Pictes, and togyther with them paſſed ouer Tine, and ſo into the borders of his friendes, where he got togyther ſuche Souldiers as he couldc, that had eſcaped from the battail, and retayned them with wages ſo well as hee myght, in hope vpon occaſion to employ them eftſoones agaynſte his enimyes. The Scottes alſo ſent into Irelande for ayde, and the Pictes into Denmarke and Norway.

Fulgentius withdraweth into Pictland.

Suche of the Brytiſhe Nobilitie as fell into the handes of the Romaines, Seuerus puniſhed moſte grieuouſly, but the Commons he vſed more gentlye, as it were making excuſe for them beeing procured thereto by theyr Captaines.

After this, when Winter was come, hee appoynted hys menne of warre to drawe vnto places conuenient for them to lodge in, tyll the next Spring. Hee himſelfe wintered at Yorke.

Seuerus wintereth at York.

In the next Sommer there was little done worthie to be ſpoken of, but that there were certayne ſkirmiſhes betwixt the Romaines lying on the borders, and the Scottes and Pictes, euer as occaſion ſerued, eyther of the partyes to worke any exployte for theyr aduauntage. But forſomuche as the Scottes had no ayde ſente them forth of Irelande, they were not mynded to iooparde againe in a foughten fielde, ſuppoſing it ſufficient if they might defend their owne, thoughe they gayned nothing as then, conſidering the puyſſaunce that was readie bent againſt them.

At length Seuerus fell ſicke at Yorke, and his ſonne Antoninus lying on the borders beyonde Tine, cauſed the wall afore mentioned, deuyding the Brytayns from the Scottes and Pictes to be repayred.

Seuerus ſickneth.

The wall is repayred.

This wall was buylt (as is before recyted) firſt by Adrian the Emperour, to ſtay the Scottiſhe men from inuading the lands appertayning to the ſubiectes of the Romaine Empyre, and after ouerthrowne in dyuerſe places as well by Scottes and Pictes, as by the Brytaynes, in ſort as before is partly mentioned. Antoninus cauſed it to be fortified with Baſtilyons, one being placed ſo neare to another, as trumpettes being appoynted in eche of them, the ſounde might be heard betwixt to warne one another vpon the firſt diſcrying of the enimies approche.

Finally Seuerus dyeth, though not ſo ſoone as his ſon Antoninus wiſhed, in hope after him to attaine the Emperiall dignitie. Concluding therefore a league with the Scottiſhe men and Pictes, and graunting peace to Fulgentius, and other ſuch Brytiſhe rebelles as were fledde wyth him into Pictlande, hee receyued ſufficient pledges, and then returned towardes London, where his mother with his brother Geta as then lay.

Seuerus dieth.

Antonious hope to be Emperour concludeth peace with the enimies.

Shortly after, both the brethren departed forth of the Ile, and went to Rome, as in the Hyſtorie of Englande it appeareth.

But now to returne vnto Donald the Scottiſhe king, ye ſhall vnderſtande, that being deliuered of forrayne trouble, he ſtudied chiefely how to preſerue his people in good peace and perfecte tranquilitie. Which minde our Sauiour Chriſt the authour of all peace and concorde had gyuen vnto him, being lately afore conuerted vnto the true faith from his wicked paganiſme and heathniſhe Idolatrie.

Donald the ſeuous to mainteyne his ſubiects in peace and concorde.

For as we finde in Hector Boetius, in the dayes of the abone mentioned Emperour Seuerus, he ſent a meſſenger with letters vnto Pope Victor (Zephirinus ſayeth Harison) beeing the xb. in number, as they ſay, after Saint Peter, declaring vnto him that hee was fully mynded to receyue the Chriſtian Religion, and vtterly to forſake the ſuperſtitious ſeruice of the Heathniſh Goddes, and therefore inſtantly requyred him to ſende ſende ouer into Scotlande ſome godly learned men, to inſtruct him in the right beliefe.

Donald conuerted vnto Chriſtian liefe in the dayes of the Emperour Seuerus.

The Pope hearing this, and being glad to increaſe the faith of Chriſt through all parties of the worlde, ſent with all ſpeede into Scotlande ſuch well diſpoſed perſons as he thought moſte meete for that purpoſe, who at their arriuall there, did their endeuour in ſuch diligẽt ſort, that not only the king, but alſo through his enſample a great number of the nobilitie were baptiſed, & clearely forſoke their former errours & idolatrie.

This was in the yeare after the byrth of our Sauiour. 202. from the creation of the worlde 4170. and after the firſte erection of the Scottiſhe kingdome. 330. as Harriſon in his chronologie dothe manifeſtly confirme.

Moreouer this Donald was the firſte as the Scottiſhe chronicles alledge, that cauſed ſiluer and golde to be coyned in his realme. The ſtamp whiche he deuiſed for the ſame, was a croſſe on the one ſide, and his face on the other. Before that time the Scottes vſed no coyne, but eyther exchãged and bartered ware for ware, either elſe occupied with Britiſhe and Romaine money, as diuers marble cheſtes full of the ſame whiche haue bene founde of late yeares in ſundry partes of Scotland, do very well witneſſe.

Finally king Donald in the .xxj. yeare of his raigne departed out of this life, and was buried accoyding to the maner of our Chriſtian religiõ, without any heathenyſh ceremonies.

After him ſucceeded Ethodius the ſeconde, and ſonne of the former Ethodius, whiche prince proued ſo very a fole, that the regiment of the realme was quite taken from him, and committed vnto certaine Noble men, who being deuided into ſundry quarters of the realme, toke very good order for the due gouernment of the parties ſo to them limitted, and vſed themſelues very vprightly in all their doings. As for cauſe of warres they had none, for Seuerus before his death had giuen ſuche order for the gouernment of the Britains, that they durſt not once ſtirre by reaſon of ſuch pledges as were deliuered and conueighed to Rome, whiche were the chiefeſt of all the Britiſh nobilitie. At length Ethodius being apt for nothing but to fil his coffers, as one though doltiſh, yet naturally giuẽ to vnquenchable couetouſneſſe, was ſlaine by thoſe that were appointed to the garde of his perſon, in the .xvj. yeare of his raigne.

Ethodius being giuen to couetouſneſſe, is ſlaine by his owne ſeruants that wayted vpon him. Anno chriſti. 231. H.B.

Then was his ſon Athirco elected by the generall voyces of all the eſtates, who in the beginning of his raygne ſhewed himſelf very ſober, gẽtle, courteys, and friendly of behauiour, exerciſing himſelfe in all laudable paſtimes conuenient for his eſtate, and herewith he was ſo free & liberall towardes all men, that hee wanne him wonderfull muche prayſe and loue amongſt his people. Athirco.

But theſe his noble vertues encreaſed not in him togither with age, but contrarily decayed, in ſuche ſorte, that after he had raigned .viij. yeares, he was quite altered: in place of liberalitie, embracing auarice: for courteſie and amiable countenaunce, he vſed ſterne and loftie lookes: for cõmendable exerciſes, he gaue himſelfe wholly to filthie pleaſures and ſenſuall luſtes of the bodie: & ſuch as could further his purpoſe moſt in theſe his beaſtlie affections, hee cheriſhed & had them moſt in eſtimation, not regarding at all the nobilitie of his realme, but was as ready to wrong them by villanous iniurie, as hee was any other of the loweſt and meaneſt degrees.

It chaunced that a noble man in Argile (being one of no ſmall authoritie amongſt the people of that countrey) named Natholocus, had two fayre yong Gentlewomen to his daughters: now the king being very deſirous to ſatiſfie his luſt vpon them, forced them both the one after the other, and not ſo content, deliuered them afterwardes to be abuſed in the ſemblable ſorte by his pages and ſeruaunts. The father vnderſtanding this villanie done to his daughters by theyr owne lamentable complaint, ſente for his friendes, and opening vnto them the whole matter, he requyred theyr aſſiſtaunce.

The villanous acte of Athirco, in abuſing a Noble mans daughters.

They being in a wonderfull furie to heare of ſuche an iniurie done to their bloud, promiſed in reuenge thereof to ſpende bothe life, landes and goodes, and forthwith departing in ſunder, they prepared themſelues to aſſemble theyr powers, procuring a greate number of other Noble men to ioyne with them in ſo neceſſarie an enterpriſe, as to rid the countrey of ſuche a caytife wretch, reſpecting nothing but the ſatiſfying of his filthie carnal luſtes, and the accompliſhment of his moſt beaſtly appetites.

The kinſmen and friends of the gentlewomen conſpire againſt Athirco.

When they were once got togither in a companie, they marched forth towards Dunſtafage, where they vnderſtode that the king as then did ſoiourne, a great multitude of people ſtill reſorting vnto them by the way, after it was once knowen whereabout they went. Athirco hearing of theyr approche, called togither his power ſuppoſing at the firſt to haue beaten downe his enimies, but when hee had throughly wayed the matter, and conſidered of what force and power they were, and how feeble his part was through want of good willes in his people, hee priuily ſtale away from them, and would haue paſſed ouer into Ila, one of the weſterne Iles, to haue procured ſome ſuccour there, but being embarqued and ſet from the ſhore, he was by contrarie windes driuē backe againe to land, where doubting to come into his enimies handes, hee choſe rather to ſlea himſelfe, and ſo ended his wretched life in ſuche miſerable extremitie after hee had raigned the ſpace of .xij. yeares. His raigne continued till the dayes of the Emperour Gordian the third, or as other ſay, till the time of the Emperour Valerian. But as Maiſter Harriſon hath gathered, hee raigned in the dayes of the Emperour Aurelius Claudius. Doorus the brother of Athirco vnderſtāding of the death of his brother, diſguiſed himſelfe in beggers weede for doubte of death, and went into Pictlande with .iij. of his Nephewes, ſonnes to the ſame Athirco, whoſe names were Sindock, Carance, and Donald.

Athirco doubting to be forſaken of his owne mē, if it came to the triall of battaile, cōueyed himſelfe from amōgſt them.

Athirco ſlayeth himſelfe.

242. H.B.

Doorus the brother of Athirco commeth himſelfe out of the way.

Howbeit Natholocus hauing knowledge whither he was fled, ſent forth certaine of his ſeruants with cōmaundement to ſearche him out, commaunding furthermore very ſtraightly, that if they founde him, they ſhould diſpatch him out of life, for feare of further miſchiefe. But they that were ſent, finding one in all features & proportiō of body reſembling Doorus, ſlew the one in ſtede of the other, & ſo returning home to their Maſter, they made him very ioyfull of ẏ newes, although in deede they came not neare to Doorus. Then Natholocus cauſing the eſtates of the Realme to aſſemble, he handled the mater in ſuch wiſe, by diſſwading thē to chooſe any of Athircos bloud to raigne ouer thē, (for doubt leaſt they ſhould ſeeke any meanes how to reuēge his death,) that in the ende, this Natholocus was elected himſelf, more for force, than by any cōmon cōſent of the nobles: for diuers of them doubting ẏ craftie nature (whiche they knew to be in him) wiſhed rather that the iſſue of Athirco (hauing deſerued nothing why to be defrauded of ẏ kingdome, ſaue only in reſpect of the fathers offences) might haue enioyed that whiche of right they ought to haue had, that is, either one of thē to be king, or els ſome neare kinſman of theyrs to raigne as king, til the eldeſt of them might come to ſufficient yeares, to beare the rule himſelfe.

Natholocus ſeeketh the life of Doorus.

Natholocus is choſen to be king.

BVt Natholocus beyng once proclaymed king by the multitude, and Athircos bloud attaynted of treaſon, and ſo publiſhed, according to the cuſtome, he tooke the othes of thoſe that were preſent, and then repayred vnto Dunſtafage, there to be inueſted according to the manner.

Natholocus

Natholocus goeth vnto Dunſtafage be inthroniſed.

This done, hee called ſuche aſide as he ſuſpected, and talking with them alone, hee exhorted them to be faithfull, promiſing to be theyr aſſured good Lorde and Maiſter, and for an earneſt thereof, he gaue vnto diuers of them very great rewardes.

Natholocus ſeeketh to cure loue of the nobili through briberie.

Generally vnto all men he ſhewed himſelfe very gentle and tractable, thereby to winne their loues, for the better eſtabliſhment of his newe atchieued atchieued eſtate: And hereto he employed ſuche riches as the former kings had heaped togither amongſt the Nobles, ſtudying by all meanes to auoyde all ſeditious quarels and ſecrete diſcordes amongſt them.

Thus ruling the realme at his will for certaine yeares, at length fortune began to ſhewe a chaunge of countenance after her olde accuſtomed guiſe. For Doorus the brother of Athirco (whom as ye haue heard Natholocus ſuppoſed to haue bene dead) wrote certaine letters ſignifying his owne eſtate with the welfare of his Nephewes the children of Athirco vnto certaine Scottiſhe Lordes, whome hee knewe to fauour his cauſe.

Whiche letters hee deliuered vnto a Pictiſhe woman, appointing hyr how and to whome ſhe ſhoulde deliuer the ſame, but the woman apprehended by the way, and brought vnto Natholocus, hee cauſed hyr ſecretely to be ſacked and throwen into a riuer.

Afterwardes ſending for ſuche of the Nobles as the direction of the foreſayde letters had giuen him occaſion to haue in ſome ſuſpicion, he committed them firſt to prylon, and at length cauſed them to be ſecretely ſtrangled.

Natholocus putteth ſuch to death, as he ſuſpecteth to fauour Doorus.

Whiche wicked deede being once notified abroade, moued ſo the hartes of theyr friends and alies, that they procured the people to rebell: and ſo gathering them togither, they rayſed open and cruell warres againſt him.

Natholocus enformed of their determinations, withdrewe himſelfe priuily into Murray lande, there to get togither an armie to reſiſt his enimies, and for that he was deſirous alſo to vnderſtande ſomewhat of the iſſue of this trouble, he ſent one of his truſtie ſeruaunts being a gentleman of that countrey, vnto a woman that dwelt in the Iſle of Colmkil (otherwiſe called Iona) eſteemed very ſkilfull in foreſhewing of things to come, to learne of hyr what fortune ſhould happe of this warre, whiche was already begunne.

The Witche conſulting with hyr ſpyrytes, declared in the ende howe it ſhoulde come ſhortly to paſſe, that the king ſhoulde bee murthered not by his open enimies, but by the handes of one of his moſte familiar friendes, in whom hee had repoſed an eſpeciall truſte. The meſſenger demaunding by whoſe handes that ſhoulde be, euen by thine faith ſhe, as it ſhal be well knowen within theſe fewe dayes. The Gentleman hearing theſe wordes, rayled againſt hyr very bitterly, bidding hyr go lyke an olde Witche: for he truſted to ſee hyr brent before he ſhoulde committe ſo villanous a deede. And departing from hyr, hee wente by and by to ſignifie what anſweare hee had receyued: but before hee came where the King lay, his minde was altered, ſo that what for doubte on the one ſide that if hee ſhoulde declare the truthe, as it was tolde him, the king mighte happily conceyue ſome greate ſuſpition ſuſpition, that it ſhould follow by his meanes as ſhee had declared, & therupon put him to death firſt: and for feare on the other ſide that if he kept it ſecrete, it might happen to be reuealed by ſome other, and then he to runne in aſmuche daunger of life as before: he determined vō himſelfe to worke the ſureſt way, and ſo comming to the king, hee was ledde aſide by him into his priuie chamber, where al other being commaūded to auoide, he declared how he had ſped: & then falling forthwith vpō Matholocus, with his dagger he ſlew him outright, & threwe his body into a priuie: Matholocus murthered.

The witches anſwere.

What happened by giuing credite to the woordes of a Witche.

and afterwardes getting out by a backe doore, and taking his horſe whiche he had there readie, he fledde with all ſpeede vnto the campe of the conſpiratours, and was the firſte that brought newes vnto them of this acte thus by him atchieued.

252. H.B. This chaunced in the yeare of our Lord. 180. and in the .xj. yeare after the firſt entring of Matholocus into the eſtate.

The Lordes of the realme aſſemble togither to chooſe a new king. After Matholocus was thus diſpatched, the peeres aſſebled togither to ordeyne for ỹ gouernment of the realme, where in the ende it was amongſt them concluded, that the ſonnes of Athirco ſhould be ſent for into Pictland, and Findock receiued for king. The Morauian that ſlew Matholocus was appointed to fetch them, who according to his commiſſion, comming into Pict lande, conueyed them right honorably into Argile, where Findocke beyng already choſen king, was placed on the ſtone of marble with all the ceremonies in that caſe appertayning.

The ſonnes of Athirco are ſent for, & the eldeſt of them named Findock choſen to raygne.

Findocke.

Findocke his noble qualities, and vertuous diſpoſition. This Findock was in ỹ flower of his age, of perſon moſt beutyfull, cleane made, and of a goodly ſtature: wherevnto were ioyned moſte excellent gifts of the minde, not ſo much deſirous to ſeeme, as to be vertuous in deede. He was curteous, meeke, and full of affabilitie, ſtudying alwayes to winne friendſhip and loue, rather by gentleneſſe, than by feare and menacing wordes.

Findock obſerueth the leagues confirmed of former tymes with his neighbours. The leagues with the Brytaines, Pictes and Romains hee firmely obſerued. But as peace with forrayne enimies, breedeth ofttimes ciuill diſcorde at home, ſo came it then to paſſe with him at this preſent: for one Donald of the Iſles, a noble man borne, came ouer with an armie into Roſſe and Murray land, fetching from thence a great ſpoile & bootie, not without great ſlaughter of ſuche as enforced themſelues for to reſiſt him. The occaſion as he pretended was to reuenge the death of Matholocus. But Findock vnderſtanding his doings, prepared an armie with ſhippes, and ſayled ouer with the ſame into the Iſle of Ila, where encountring with Donald and other his enimies, he vanquiſhed & chaſed them egerly without returning once backe, till eyther the ſworde or the ſea had made an end of them all.

Findocke maketh a iourney into the Iſles to ſubdue the rebelles.

Donald himſelfe taking a boate in hope to haue eſcaped, the preaſſe was ſuch at his entring into the ſame, that before they could get it off frō the ſhore, it ſunke by meanes of the ouerlading, and ſo he and all they that were on borde were drowned therewithall.

Donald is drowned.

The Iſlande with ayde of the Iriſhe kernes, make ofte inuaſion into Argile & other of the Scottiſh countreys.

The king hauing atchieued this victory, returned into Albanie: but the Iſland men not fully quieted with this ſlaughter of theyr fellowes, ſent ouer into Ireland, and got from thence certaine taine Kernes, who vnder the leading of an other Donald, the ſonne of the former Donald, made ſtertes now and then into Argile and Cantyre, doing many ſhrewde turnes in the ſame, ere they could be ſuppreſſed.

But Findock being ſone enformed of theſe tidings, went ouer againe into the Iſles, & ſuche of his enimies as he founde, he cauſed to be hanged, to giue other enſample, what to looke for when they ſhould rebel, but Donald eſcaped, and got ouer into Ireland, where he remayned till he heard that the king was returned backe into Albanie, and then he came againe. But perceyuing himſelfe not able to worke ſuche feates as he hoped to haue done, he ſente a meſſenger vnto the king, offering to yeelde himſelfe & to become his true ſubiect if he might get his pardon, and be at his owne libertie. But being anſweared that hee ſhould not be receyued, vnleſſe hee would come vnto Dunſtafage with other of his chiefeſt complices, and to ſtande fully at the kings mercie: he refuſed thus to do, deuiſing an other meane how to be reuenged.

Therefore to beginne withal, he procured two naughtie perſons to go ouer into Albanie, and to fayne themſelues to haue fled from him, where alſo he willed them to offer theyr ſeruice vnto the king, and to diſcloſe vnto him certaine light ſecretes of the ſayde Donalds, thereby to winne credite if it might be, and in the ende to eſpie a time to ridde him out of the way.

Theſe craftie mates, working according to Donaldes wicked inſtructions, at length with much a do they gate credite, & after credite they got place ſo neare the king by the furtherance of Caraunce the kings brother (whome they made priuie alſo vnto theyr intent) that finding all things correſpondent to theyr purpoſe (one day as the king hunted) the one began to feede him with a tale of ỹ hatred whiche the Flanders bare towardes him, whereto he gaue very good eare, whileſt the other ſmote him to the harte with a

Iaueline, and ſo leauing the iron ſticking in his bodie, he fled away in haſte, with his traiterous companion and fellow.

Thoſe that were neare, ſeing what had happned, ſome of them ran to him to ſee if they might relieue him, as then ſtrugling with the pangs of death, other followed the murtherers, and ouertaking them, brought them backe to receyue theyr meede, according to that whiche they had iuſtly deſerued: being alſo examined, they confeſſed how they were procured vnto it, not only by Donald of the Iſles, but alſo by Carantius the kings owne brother, who of ſet purpoſe being out of the way at that preſent, & hauing knowledge that he was accuſed of the kings death, fled out of the countrey as a baniſhed man, firſt into Bryttaine, from whence (after he had remayned there for a time) hee went vnto Rome, and ſeruing in the warres vnder the Emperours Aurelius Probus, Carus, & Diocletianus, he became right famous and a very ſkilfull captayne. But if this report be true that Carauſius of whome Eutropius maketh mention were diſcended of ſo high parentage, mervaile it is, that neyther the ſame Eutropius, nor any other of the Romaine writers, could at no time come to the knowledge thereof, whiche if they had done, no doubte they woulde haue ſpoken ſomewhat of the ſame: for although he might happely vpon the conſideration aforeſayd counterfaite himſelf to be borne of ſome baſe kinred, & ſo for a time to diſſeble what he was, yet afterwards that he attayned vnto ſo high degree of honour, as to vſurpe the imperiall robes of purpure, and to poſſeſſe the dominion of Bryttaine, it is not like but that to aduaunce his credite and authoritie royall he would haue ſet forth to the vttermoſt the nobilitie of his birthe, if he had bene come of any, and that ſo apparantly to the worlde, that aſwell his enimies as friendes ſhoulde bothe haue knowen and ſpoken of it.

The murtherers confeſſe by whoſe procurement they did the deede.

A pretie induction (if not forged) to the hiſtorie that afterwardes followeth of Carauſius or Carantius as the Scottes wryte him.

Donald

IF Indocus beyng thus ſlayne in the x. yeare of his raygne, and buried with great lamentation of the people at Dunſtafage, his brother Donald, thirde ſonne to Athirco, was admitted to the kingdome, who immediatly vpon his entring into the eſtate, prepared to go into the Iſles againſt Donald that common enimie of Scotland.

But this Donald himſelfe, deliuered the king of a great peece of that trauayle. For ſo ſone as he hearde that the murther by him cõtriued was executed, he aſſembled a mightie power of the Donald of the Iſles inuadeth Scotland.

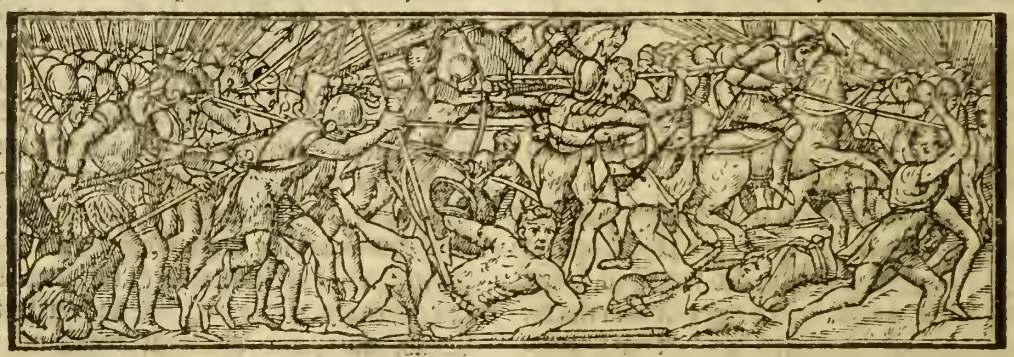
Iland

Iland men, and tranſporting with them ouer into Roſſe, proclaymed himſelf king, perſecuting with fire and ſworde all ſuche as denied him obedience.

King Donald being aduertiſed of that attẽpt of his aduerſarie, ſpeedily marcheth forth with ſuch power as he had already aſſembled, ſending proclamations abroade, that all other appointed to ſerue, ſhould follow him with ſpeede.



Thus cõming into Murray land, he pitched downe his tents, purpoſing there to abide the cõming of the reſidue of his armie: But Donalde of the Iſles vnderſtanding all his demeanour & whole intention, thought it beſt to aſſayle him within his campe, before all his power ſhoulde come vnto him, and being thus reſolued, hee ſet forewarde in the night time, and was vpon his enimies before that his cõming towardes them was once ſignified in their campe.

Donald of the Iſles ſodenly ſetteth vpõ the enimies.

The king then vnderſtanding his aduerſarie to be at hand, bringeth forth his men, ſetteth thẽ in array, and exhorteth them with many pithie wordes, to receyue their enimies with manly ſtomackes.

But the Iland men encouraged alſo by theyr Captaine, gaue the onſet ſo roundly, that the Scottiſh men had not leyſure to occupie theyr ſhotte, but were enforced euen at the firſte to ioygne at hand blowes, which were beſtowed in ſuche furious ſorte, that in the ende the Scottes being oppreſſed with multitude, were cõſtreyned to giue backe, ſome ſauing themſelues by flight, and ſome ſtanding at defence till they were beaten downe and killed in the place.

The Scots ouerthrow

There were ſlayne on the kings parte three thouſand men, and .ij. thouſand taken priſoners: amongſt whom were .xxx. perſonages of honorable eſtate togither with the king himſelf being wounded ſo ſore, that he died within .iij. dayes after the battell, rather through anguiſh of minde than of his hurtes, as ſome haue written, in the ſame yeare that he began his raigne.

Donald departeth this worlde.

Donalde of the Iſles taketh vpon him as king.

Donald of the Iſles hauing thus got the victory, toke vpon him as king, accordingly as he had cauſed himſelf at the firſt to be proclaymed.

Donald

BVt, becauſe hee became to the eſtate thus by bloud, he continued ſtill in doubte and feare of newe conſpiracies, being giltie in conſcience of his wrongful vſurpation.

A giltie conſcience.

Thoſe priſoners alſo whiche he had taken in the battell, he kept in perpetuall captiuitie, menacing them preſent death if any of their friendes and alies attempted any ſturre againſt him.

Moreouer hee nouriſhed priuie factions amongſt the nobilitie, ſuppoſing therby that their powers would be the more feeble in any publike exployte that was to be moued againſt him: finally if any miſchiefe happened among them, he cauſed the matter throughly to be loked vpon, but with ſuch regarde that he alwayes enriched his owne cofers with the forfaytures and penalties which he toke vp amongſt them.

He ſeldome times went abroade, and when he ſtirred forth any whither, he had his garde about him appoynted with weapon in warlike ſorte, for doubte of treaſon. He aduaunced diuers of baſe condition to great wealth & honour, and behaued himſelf ſo in ſundry ſortes with his miſtruſtful crueltie, that many there were which dradde him, & but a fewe that loued him, ſo that in the ende being in a maner runne into the deadly hatred of al men, he was murthered one night at Enuerlochthee, whither he was come to haue paſſed ouer into the Iſles) by certayne that had conſpired his death in the .xij. yeare of his reigne.

Donald of Iſles is murthered. Anno ch 273. H

The chiefe of the conſpiratours was one Crathlynt the ſonne of king Findock, who immediatly after the deede done, conueyed himſelf ſecretely out of the chamber, and repayring vnto certaine nobles and gentlemen inhabiting neere hand in the countrey, he declared vnto them the whole matter, exhorting them to ayde him in reuenging the iniuries done not only to them priuatly as he knew very well, but alſo to ỹ whole ſtate of ỹ Scottiſh cõmõ wealth, by the naughtie ſuggeſtion of diuers of the kings complices, who as yet vnderſtood nothing of theyr Maiſters death, but were all quiet in theyr beddes, as men ſuſpecting nothing leſſe than that which was now happened.

The Gentlemen hearing the newes, and reioyſing greatly thereat, got them to theyr weapons, and early in the very dawning of the day, comming vpon the kings houſhold meagny, they ſlew aboue.ij.C. of them in the place where they lodged, the reſidue eſcaping forth of the houſe, and thinking to ſaue themſelues, were beaten downe in the countrey as they paſſed, by the people, who bare ſo deadly and mortall hatred vnto the late king, that they not onely reioyced muche at his death, but thought themſelues ſufficiently reuenged, when they could kill any that did belong vnto him.

After this Crathlynt, being certainly knowen to bee the ſonne of king Findock, by ſuche euident tokens as were ſhewed by him that brought him vp, was (partely in reſpect of his iuſt title, & partly for conſideration of his good ſeruice in deliuering his countrey of ſo deteſtable a tyrannt) aduaunced to the gouernment of the kingdome, by conſent of all the eſtates, and ſo being confirmed king, he perſwaded with the people that all the linage of the late tyrant Donald might be plucked vp, euen as it were a tree by the rootes, leaſt any of them haply remayning aliue, ſhould find meanes afterwards to diſturbe ỹ cõmon wealth.

The people cõſented lightly hereunto, as they that beſide the mortall hate whiche they bare towards Donald, were now ſodenly in loue with Crathlynt, not only for his witte and other qualities of the mind, but alſo by reaſon of his comely perſonage and paſſing beautie, ſetting forth all his doings greatly to his high prayſe & commendation.

The iſſue therfore with other the kinſmen and alies of Donald were ſought for, and thoſe that were found, without any difference or reſpect of age or ſexe, were cruelly put vnto death. The kinſmen and friends of Donald of the Iſles are perſecuted.

Whiche done Crathlynt appoynted forth iudges and other adminiſtratours of iuſtice to ſee the lawes executed, and the countreys gouerned in good and quiet order, euery man being aſſigned to his owne proper circuite. Theſe hee choſe out of the moſt ancient peares and barons of his realme. The yonger ſorte he reſerued to attend vpon his perſon. When he had taken direction in this wiſe for the rule of his kingdome, he went vp into the mountains of Granzebene, there to paſſe the time for a whyle in hunting the harte, and other wilde beaſtes, whether came vnto him ambaſſadours from Thelargus king of the Pictes, declaring the ioye whiche theyr maiſter had conceyued for the ſlaughter of Donald, and the reſtoring of the right bloud againe vnto the eſtate, requiring that the ancient league betwixt the Pictes and Scottiſhmen might be once againe renewed. The politike gouernment of Crathlynt. Crathlynt goeth to hunt in the mountains of Granzbene, anciently called Grampeus mons. An ambaſſade frõ the Pictes. The Pictes require the league to be renewed.

Crathlynt receiued theſe ambaſſadours moſt ioyfully, giuing them hartie thankes on the behalf of theyr Maſter for this ſignification of his good will ſhewed by theyr comming, and herewith promiſed, that during his life he woulde gladly obſerue the olde auncient amitie eſtabliſhed betwixt the two nations: according to the tenure of the old league. Crathlynt promiſeth to obſerue the auncient amitie betwixt the Scottiſhmen and Pictes.

Moreouer when the ſayde Ambaſſadours ſhould departe, he toke vnto them to deliuer frõ him as a preſent vnto theyr Maiſter certayne horſes, with Houndes and Greyhoundes, ſuche as he thought that kyng Thelargus wanted. The preſent ſent by Crathlynt vnto the king of the Pictes.

And

Diuers Pictiſh Lordes come vnto Crathlint to hunt and make merie with him.

And ſhortly after ỹ returne of theſe ambaſſadours into theyr countrey, diuers yong Gentlemen of the Pictiſhe nobilitie repayred vnto king Crathlynth, to hunte and make merry with him, but when they ſhould depart homewardes, perceyuing that the Scottiſh dogges did far excelle theyrs, both in fayrenesſe, ſwiftneſſe, hardineſſe, and alſo in long ſtanding vp and holding out, they got diuers bothe dogges and bitches of the beſte kindes for breede to be giuen them by the Scottiſh Lordes, and yet not ſo contented, they ſtale one belonging to the king from his keeper, being more eſteemed of him than all the other whiche he had aboute him. The Maſter of the leaſhe being enformed hereof, purſued after them which had ſtolē that dogge, thinking in deede to haue taken him from them, but they not willing to departe with him, fell at altercation, and in the end chaunced to ſtrike the Maſter of the leaſh through with theyr bowe ſpeares that hee died preſently, whereupon a noiſe and crie being rayſed in the countrey by his ſeruants, diuers of the Scottes, as they were goyng home from Hunting, returned, and falling vpon the Pictes to reuenge the death of theyr fellowe, there enſued a ſhrewde bickering betwixte them, ſo that of the Scots there died.lx. The kinſmen and friends of the Scottes that were thus ſlaine, were wonderfully moued with the iniurie committed, in ſo much that without commaundement of king or captayne, they aſſembled in greate number togither, and entring into the Pictiſhe confines, they began to robbe, ſpoyle and kill after the maner of warre, wherewith the Pictes being ſet in a rage, came forth togither into the field, and encountring with the Scottes, there was fought a ſore battell betwixt them without Capitaine, order, or ſtandard, till at length the victorie remayned with the Picts, of whome were ſlaine notwithſtanding the day went on their ſides, about .ij.M. men, but of the Scots there died aboue .iij.M. or more, as was ſuppoſed.

Thus vpon a light occaſion was the league broken betwixt theſe two nations, who had continued as friends, the one ſtill readie to ayde the other, euer ſithe the dayes of king Reutha, being the .bij. in number that raigned after Fergus.

Of what continuance the league was betwixt the Scots and Pictes, and now broken about a ſmall matter, as begonne about a dogge.

These two nations beyng thus fallen at debate, it was wonder to vnderſtand with what crueltie the one ſought to deſtroy the other. No pitie might moue their cruell hartes to ſpare eyther man, woman or childe that fell into theyr handes: Suche was theyr inordinate and lyke deſire which they had to ſhedde eche others bloud.

Cruell warres.

At length Thelargus king of the Pictes being a very aged mā, & perceyuing what miſchief was happened through the follie of a few wilful perſons, appoynted certaine of his counſell to go as Ambaſſadours vnto king Crathlynt, to finde ſome meanes to haue the matter taken vp, for the auoyding of the imminent daunger that was like to enſue to both nations.

They according to theyr inſtructions comming to the place where Crathlynt as then ſoiourned, had much ado to get licence to come vnto his preſence: but at length being admitted, they vſed ſuche humble perſwaſions grounded vpon reaſonable conſiderations, that although no peace could be fully cōcluded, yet a truce was graunted them for three moneths ſpace, whiche was but ſtrayly obſerued, for deadly hatred and inward deſire of reuenge was entred ſo farre into the breſtes of the commons on bothe ſides, that neyther commaundement nor puniſhment might ſtay them from the inuading of one an others confines, maugre theyr Princes and all theyr ſore reſtraints.

In this meane time was the eſtate of the Romaine Empyre in Bryteine brought into trouble by Carantius, of whome a little before mention hath bene made. Eutropius nameth him Cauraſius: he woulde not be acknowen at his comming to Rome of what linage hee was diſcēded, and ſo he was reputed to be but of ſome baſe ſtocke, but yet through his worthie ſeruice in the warres, he attayned vnto great honour, and was appointed by Diocletian to haue the ſouerayne regarde ouer the coaſtes of the french Ocean, to defende the ſame from Pyrates of the Saxons and other Germains, that ſore moleſted the ſame in thoſe dayes. But for that he vſed to ſuffer thoſe rouers to take ſpoyles and preyſes, to the ende hee might in theyr returne take the ſame from them againe, and conuert the gayne wholly to his owne vſe, without reſtoring that whiche was due to the owners, or ſending any portion thereof to the Romaine Emperour, hee was complayned vpon, and ſent for, but for that he doubted to come to his anſwere, as one which knew himſelfe giltie, he furniſhed his nauy with men, bittayles and ordinaunce, & with the ſame toke his courſe aboute the weſt partes of Bryteine, and landed in Weſtmerlande, where he eaſily procured the people there to ſubmit themſelues to be vnder his rule and obeyſance, & promiſed to deliuer them from the grieuous yoke and bondage of the Romaines.

Thus hauing begonne the fundation of that whiche hee purpoſed to atchieue, for his further aduauncement therein, hee ſent ambaſſadours vnto his Nephewe kyng Crathlynt, bothe declaring claring what he was, & alſo excuſing the treſpas furniſed againſt him, for being of counſell touching the murder of his brother Findock, father to the ſame Crathlynt: & therefore if in putting away al miſtruſt of his innocēcie in that behalf, he would ayde him againſt the Romains: hee doubted not but that he ſhould in ſhort time vterly expel them out of all Brytaine, & enioy all thoſe prouinces within the ſame, (which as then they poſſeſſed) vnto his owne vſe & this, he ſayd, ſhould be more honor & gaine both to the Scottiſh men & Picts, if they could be cotented to renew frendſhip, & ioyne with him in ayde againſt their cōmon enimies, than to ſeeke to deſtroy one an other, as he lately vnderſtode they had done for a dogge. Crathlynt hearing the wordes of theſe ambaſſadours, reioyced not a little, that his vncle Carātius was not only aliue, but alſo had through his valiācie atchieued ſo high renowme as to be accounted one of the worthieſt warriours amongſt al the Romaine Captaines. And herewith vpō good aduice he determined to ayde him in that his enterpriſe for the conqueſt of Brytaine to the vttermoſt of his power. Adding further that if it were not for the warres whiche he doubted to haue with the Picts, he would not onely ſende him ayde of men, but alſo come with them himſelf: and hereof he aſſured the ambaſſadours both by worde of mouth & letters. Who returning with ſuch anſweare vnto their Maiſter Carantius, he reioyced not a little, to vnderſtand how well they had ſpedde, and ſo much the more for that he receyued aboute the ſame time the like anſweare from the king of Picts.

Shortly after he came to an enterueiw with the king of Scottes at the water of Eſke, where after he had purged himſelfe with many wordes of excuſe, touching the murder of his brother Findock, there was an aſſured frendſhip cōcluded betwixt them. And at the motion of Carantius, Crathlynt was contented to come to a cōmunication with the king of Picts, for concluſiō of a peace, to the intent, that both of them might ioyne their powers togither, in ayde of Carātius againſt the Romains. At this communication both the kings mette, & Carantius likewiſe was there, as a man indifferent betwixt them bothe, to do what he could, to linke thē both in amitie. And verily his preſence thereunto ſtode ſo much in ſtede, that chiefly through his perſwaſion groūded vpon great reaſons & weightie cōſiderations, they agreed to cōclude a peace, & to renew the old league in ſuch maner & forme, and with ſuch cōditions, as ſhould be thought requiſite by the aduiſe & diſcrete order of. viij. auncient perſons: iiij. to be choſen on the one parte, & iiij. on the other. Which. viij. perſons taking the matter in hand, did ſo aduiſedly giue order for the anoyding of all cauſes of grudge & hatred, that bothe partes held them ſatiſfied with their arbitrement and direction, ſo that a ioyfull peace was confirmed, and all variance vtterly quenched.

Peace confirmed againe betwixte the Scottiſh men and Picts.

In this meane time Quintus Baſſianus the Romaine lieutenant in Brytaine, vnderſtāding how Carantius was thus reuolted, and had not only cauſed them of Weſtmerland to rebell, but alſo ſlayne and chaſed the Romains out of that countrey, he was not a little diſquieted, & determined with all ſpeede to go againſt him, & to reuenge theſe iniuries. Within a fewe dayes after hauing his armie readie, hee entred into Weſtmerland: but hearing that his enimies were already come to Yorke, & had won the citie by ſurrender, he turned his force thitherwarde, in purpoſe to fight with them, though hee vnderſtood they were in. iij. great battels, as the Scottes in one, the Picts in an other, & thoſe of Carantius his retinew in the third. He lodged that night within a ſtrong place fenſed aboute with marriſſes. But Carantius vnderſtanding all the manner of his enimies by his eſpials, & being in cāpe within. x. miles of them or therabout, in the ſame night he raiſed his field without any great bruite, and by the leading of certaine guides hee marched ſtraight towards the place where Baſſianus was encāped, ſo that anone after ỳ ſpring of the day he came thither: whereof Baſſianus being aduertiſed, and perceyuing he ſhould haue battell, maketh readie for ỳ ſame, giuing the beſt exhortation he could vnto his people to play the men: but for ſo much as the moſt parte of his armie were Brytains, all his wordes nothing auayled: for they deſirous to ſee the vtter ruine of all the Romaine power, euen at the very poynt when the battels ſhould haue ioyned, withdrew thēſelues aparte without any ſtroke ſtriken, and got thē vp into the next mountayns, to ſee what would inſue. The reſidue of the Romain armie, ſeing thēſelues thus forſaken of their fellowes, & their ſides left bare & open for the enimie to enter vpon them, fell to plaine running away, but by reaſon of the mariſſe ground cōpaſſing them in on each ſide, ſerued wel to purpoſe for ỳ Scots, & other the confederates, a great nūber of the Romains, & other of their parte were ouertaken and ſlaine. Amongſt whom Baſſianus himſelf was one, & Hircius themperours procurator an other.

Quintus Baſſianus entreth into Weſtmerland, but hearing that his enimies were at Yorke he turneth thitherwardes.

The ſlaughter of the Romains.

The Brytains (who as is ſayd refuſed to fight in the beginning of the battell) yeelded thēſelues vnto Carantius, & ſware to be his true liege mē & ſubiects. In like manner Carantius appointed al ſuch of the nobilitie as were betwixt. xx. yeres and. lx. to remaine with him in hoſtage: but the ſpoyle of the field he deuided amongſt his people equally, ſo that aſwel the Scottiſh men & Picts, as alſo his owne ſouldiers held thē well content and ſatiſfied therewith. After this victory Carantius cauſed himſelf to be proclaymed king of Brytaine, vſurping the gouernment therof wholy to himſelf, and retayning. 2000. of the Scots and Pictes, to attend vpon the ſauegard of his perſon, ſent the reſidue home laden with riches of the enimies ſpoyle. Hee ſent alſo with them his ambaſſadours, to render thankes vnto bothe the kings for theyr ayd in this ſo proſperous a victorie, aſſigning vnto them as a portion of the conqueſt, the countreys of Weſtmerland and Cumberland, with all that region whiche lay betwixt Adrians walle, and the citie of Yorke, to enioy as their owne proper patrimonie for euermore. Finally the ſayde Carantius was ſlayne by his companion Alectus, as in the Engliſh hiſtorie ye may finde more at large.

After this Crathlynt king of the Scots deliuered frõ troubles againſt the Romains, deuiſed ſundry good ordinaũces for the quiet ſtate of the Scottiſh cõmon wealth, cauſing the peace to be diligently obſerued betwixt him and the Pictes.

Alſo in his dayes the perſecutiou of the Chriſtians chaũced, which the Emperour Diocletian cõmaũded to be executed in moſt furious wiſe, ſo that there were fewe partes of the world (where any Chriſtians were knowẽ to inhabite) that taſted not of that his cruell ordinaunce and ſcourge in that behalf. In Brytaine alſo, as wel as in other places, there was no ſmall quantitie of innocent bloud ſhed, with moſte vnmercifull murder committed, to the greate triumphe of Chriſtes croſſe, that glorious enſigne of our religion.

The perſecutiõ of the Chriſtians by Diocletian.

In whiche time Conſtantius Chlorus father to Conſtantine the great, was reſident in Brytaine, who adiudging the Scottes to be a people wholly giuen to pillage and ſlaughter, as they were in deede, determined with himſelfe to haue brought them to ſubiection. But ere he could atchieue any notable enterpriſe he died, leauing behind him the fame of a right gentle and worthy Prince, ſauing that in one poynt he fore ſtayned his honor, for that hee was one of the chiefe that perſecuted the Chriſtian flocke vnder Diocletian, forcing no ſmall number of the faithfull amongſt the Brytains, to flee vnto the Scottes & Pictes to auoyde his perſecutiõ. Whom Crathlynt receyued for his part moſt louingly, and aſſigned vnto them (as the Scots ſay) the Ile of Man for a place of habitation, deſtroying al ſuch temples of the heathen religion belonging to the Druides, which had cõtinued there ſith the beginning. And vtterly aboliſhed all the ſuperſtitious rites & cuſtomes of the ſame Druides, with their whole order and brotherhod. He erected a temple there, which he dedicated vnto Jeſus Chriſt our Sauiour, wherin the Chriſtiãs might celebrate their deuine ſeruice, according to their profeſſiõ. This Church being richly endowed was the firſt Biſhops ſea amõgſt the Scots, & therupon was taken for the mother Church of the realme. It is now called the church of Saint Sauiour.

There

There liued in king Crathlynts dayes, a noble Chriſtian called Amphibalus a Brytaine borne, who fleeing fro the perſecutiō then rayſed in his countrey, came vnto the ſame Crathlynt, & by him was created the firſt biſhop of S. Sauiours church in Man, this Amphibalus did very much good amongſt the Scots & Brytains in ſetting forth the word of life, & rooting out of their harts all ſuperſticious errours, of blinde gentilitie.

There were other alſo of right famous memorie aboute the ſame time, that ceaſſed not in preaching, and inſtructing the people in the right belieue, as Modocus, Piſcus, Calanus, Ferranus, Imbianus, and Carnocus, called by an old auncient name in the Scottiſh tongue Culdei, that is, to vnderſtande Cultores dei, or as you woulde ſay in Engliſh the worſhippers of God.

But nowe to the purpoſe touching Fincomark, ye ſhal vnderſtād, that he began his raigne in the yere, (as W. Harriſon ſaith) after the birth of our Sauiour. 325. after the creation of the world. 4262. and from the firſt eſtabliſhing of the Scottiſhe kingdome. 652. and in the. 20. yeare of Conſtantine the Emperour.

It chaunced that Octauius king of the Brytains was banquiſhed by Traherus a Romaine capitaine, & forced for his refuge to flee vnto this Fincomark then king of Scottes, who receyued him as a friēd. And furthermore though he were required by Traherus to deliuer him vnto his hands, as a traytour & a rebell vnto the Romain Empyre, yet Fincomark refuſed ſo to do, chooſing rather to ſuſtayne all Traherus his malice, and to haue warres with the Romaine Emperour thā to betray his friend, who had put his life into his hands vpō an eſpeciall truſt of ſafegard.

Herewith Traherus being not a litle moued, aſſembled his power, & entred into weſtmerlād, the which countrey had remayned in the Scottiſh mens hands euer ſith Carantius deliuered it ouer vnto thē. Fincomark hearing that the Romains would thus make him warres, had likewiſe rayſed a puiſſant armie, to reſiſt thē, ſo that he had at the leaſt. lx. M. perſons togither in one armie, as. xxx. M. of his owne countrey men, xx. M. Picts, & x. M. of ſuch Brytains as followed after Octauius. Fincomark being thus furniſhed, haſted forth to encounter with his enimies before they ſhoulde haue time to do any notable domage vnto his ſubiects, & ſo comming within ſight of them, ſent an Heralde vnto Traherus, to vnderſtand the cauſe why he thus inuaded his coūtrey, but receiuing frō him an vntoward anſwere, he brought forth his people into the fielde in order ready to giue battell, & ſo ioyning with the enimie, there was fought a right ſore & cruell conflict, which cōtinued for a time with vnmercifull murder and ſlaughter on bothe partes.

Finally whan the Romains were at point to haue got the vpper hand, they were ſodenly put in ſuche feare with the ſight of a number of huſbande men, who had got togither theyr cattell & were driuing the ſame away, that ſuppoſing they had bene ſome newe ſuccours comming to ayde theyr enimies, they immediatly fled vpon the ſame, leauing the victorie to their aduerſaries: howbeit of the Scottes ſide were ſlayne (as theyr chronicles report. xv. M. men, and on the Romaine parte about. xvj. thouſand.

The Romains flee.

The numbers ſlayne.

Traherus himſelfe eſcaped vnto Yorke, but hearing that Fincomark, and Octauius purſued after him, he forſooke that Citie & got him into places of more ſuretie, ſo that when the enimies came thither, the Citezins yeelded themſelues, & receyued Octauius as their Prince, offering frō thence forth to be vnder his rule & gouernment.

Yorke is yeelded vnto Octauius.

The newes of theſe atchieued victories being bruted throughout the realme, cauſed a greate number of the nobles to come in vnto Octauius, who receyued them moſte thankfully, and to cōclude wrought ſo by theyr ſupport, that he was ſhortly after reſtored to the gouernaunce of the whole realme, & eſtabliſhed therein according to his owne wiſhe. This done, Fincomark returned into his countrey, aſwell himſelfe as other of his nobles & mē of warre, being highly rewarded for their paines & trauaile ſuſteyned in that iourney. There was alſo promiſe made and confirmed by ſolemne othe, that the countrey of weſtmerlād with ſuch other parties as were aſſigned vnto his predeceſſor king Crathlynt, by order of Carantius at the time of theyr ioyning togither in league againſt the Romains, ſhould for euer remayne vnto Fincomark, and to his ſucceſſors the Scottiſh kings without any clayme or title to be made to the ſame by any of the Brytains: but this promiſe was not long kept, for ſhortly after that Octauius had once chaſed all the Romaines forth of the Brittiſh confines, and that Traherus was fled ouer into Fraūce, there was a councell called at Yorke, where it was not only ordeyned, that from thence forth there ſhould neuer any ſtraunger be ſuffred to raigne ouer the Brytaines, but alſo that the boundes of the realme ſhould be extended forth beyond the wall made (as before is recited) by the Emperour Adrian, euen vnto the old auncient bounds, and limites, expulſing forth the inhabitants of forraine nations.

warre sent into Westmerlande, to the intent to conquere the same out of the Scottishe mens handes: but beyng encountred with a power of Scottish men & Pictes, they were sharply repulsed and quickly put to flight. About the same time also, Traherus returned out of Fraunce with .ij. legiõs of Romains, and .xx. M. of other aydes. And giuing battel vnto Octauius, he vãquished his armie, & constrayned him for his refuge to flee vnto the mouth of Humber, where he got certaine vessels & sayled into Norway, there to saue his life, bicause that Scotland was now no sure refuge for him: And thus was Traherus againe in possession of Brytaine, as lieutenant to Constantine the Emperour: but shortly after he was by certaine conspiratours in fauour of Octauius murthered, and then Octauius returned againe: as in the English chronicle is mencioned more at large.

Octauius is reconciled with Fincomark.

Immediatly vpon his returne, he reconciled himself with Fincomark the Scottish king, and was contented that he should quietly enioy the countreys of Westmerland & Cumberland, with such other territories as Carantius had graũted in former time vnto Crathlynt. He likewise sent vnto the king of the Pictes, & concluded a friendship with him, to the intent he might haue ayde frõ him also, if it chaũced the Romains eftsones to inuade his countrey, as shortly after they did, not ceasing til they had so awearied him with cõtinual warres, that in the end to be at rest (as his age & other necessities then required) he deliuered into theyr handes, certaine castels & forteresses, & also became tributarie to the Emperour on condition he might vse the office and name of a king all the residue of his dayes. These things being thus quieted in Albion, ẏ Romains, Brytains, Scottish men and Pictes, continued in friendly peace without any notable trouble, till the .ix. yeare of the raigne of Valentinian Emperour of Rome: & first of Damasus the Pope. In ẏ which yeare Fincomark king of Scottes departed this life, after he had gouerned the estate aboue .xlvij. yeares. This was in ẏ yeare of our redẽptiõ .372.

Fincomark deceassed.

358. H. B.

This Fincomark, left behind him .ij. sonnes, the one named Eugenius, being as then aboute .xviij. yeares of age, the other hight Ethodius, & was yonger thã his brother by one yeare, so that neyther of them might succeede theyr father by reason they were not of yeares sufficient to rule, accoyding to the auncient ordinance.

Eugenius & Ethodius sonnes to Fincomark.

Herevpon a councell was called in Argile, where there was hard holde betwixt the .iij. Nephewes to king Crathlynt, that were begotten by .iij. of his brethren, which of them should gouerne the lande: their names were Romacus, Fethelmacus, & Angusianus. Romacus had a Pictish lady of the bloud royall of that nation to his mother, & for that his father was eldest brother next vnto Crathlynt, he loked to be preferred, though he himself was yonger in yeares thã eyther Fethelmacus or Angusianus. Fethelmacus gaue his consent with suche voyces as he had vnto Angusianus, wherwith Romacus being not a little offended, sought meanes to haue destroied them both: but his practise being discouered, caused many to withdrawe theyr good willes frõ him, whereby his aduersaries were the more encouraged: & thereupon the councell brake vp, either parte deuising how to strengthen thẽselues against the others practises. But for so much as Angusianus vsed plaine meanes without any fraudulẽt dealing, he got the more frẽds, so that Romacus was constreyned in the end to require ayd of the king of Picts, who being neare of kinne to him, might not denie his request.

Romacus, Fethelmacus and Angusianus, sonnes to three seuerall brethren, pretende a right to the estate.

Romacus seeketh meanes to destroy his cousins.

Angusianus with vpright dealing purchaseth the more friendshippe.

Angusianus therefore vnderstanding what daunger he was in, if he fell into his aduersaries hands, got togither an armie of such as fauoured his cause, & encountring with him in battel was put to flight, & forced to flee into the Westerne Iles with his cousin Fethelmacus, where remaining for a while, at length he was aduertised that the inhabitants had conspired against him, for doubt whereof he got him ouer into Ireland.

Romacus vanquisheth Angusianus.

Romacus.

ANgusianus beyng thus chased out of the realme, Romacus was receyued by the most part of the nobles and cõmons for theyr king: But as the accustomed manner of tyrants cõming thus to the gouernement of a realme throughe euill meanes is to rule with cruelties, so did he behaue himself, accoyding to that semblable rate, so soone as hee thought himselfe to be sure of the estate. Wherefore suche as had borne any euill will to Fincomark, & were out of fauour in his dayes, those did Romacus call vnto him, & afterwarde vsed their counsel aboue al other mens, aduauncing them also to moste high rule & riche offices. Againe those whiche had bene in fauour with Fincomark, or bare any affection towardes his issue, he sought couertly to bereaue them both of life, landes, and goodes, so that by suche his doings, there was gathered no light suspitiõ, that he would likewise ere long find meanes to dispatch Ethodius and Eugenius the sonnes of the same Fincomarke, therby to be the more assured of the crowne & kingdome it self. The two childrẽ also fearing asmuch on their owne behalfe, by the aduise & help of their trustie friendes, conueyed thẽselues into westmerlãd, & after ouer into the Isle of Romacus gouerneth tyrannically.

Ethodius & Eugenius sonnes of Fincomark, are conueyed into the Isle of of Man, where they remayned lokīg for a day.

Then began banyſhments, confiſcations of goodes, & ſlaughter of ſuch as were thought to be fauourers of Angusians cauſe, without reſpecte either of ſexe or age, til the nobles of the Realme being not a little moued with ſuch his cruell doings, & tirannicall gouernment, conſpired togither by ſecrete meanes how to deliuer their cōtrey of ſo pernicious a tyrant: And to bring this their purpoſe the more ſpeedily to paſſe, they wrought ſo cloſely, that they had aſſembled a great armie, & were come with the ſame within x. miles of the place where he then lay, ere he had any vnderſtanding of their enterpryſe, ſo that whereas he (being vnprouided of reſiſtance) aſſayed by flight towardes Pict land to haue eſcaped their hands, it preuayled him nothing, for he was taken by the way, and receyued ſuch end as his former paſſed life had very well deſerued, in the .iiij. yeare of his raigne: his head was ſet vpō the end of a pole, & caried about to be ſhewed vnto the people to their great reioyſing. There were ſlaine alſo at the ſame time beſides him, diuers Scots & Pictes, who had bene of councell with him in al his cruel practiſes. After which execution done, they ſente for Angusianus, who returned into Scotland, & was proclaimed king, aſwel by of certaine Scottiſh men, which had borne good will to Romacus, he preaſſed ſo ſore vpō Angusianus, that he had no remedie but to trie the hazard of battell in a pitched fielde: for no friendly perſwaſiōs to haue peace or any agreemēt could be hard, though Angusianus made hūble ſuite to haue purchaſed the ſame. Wherefore perceiuing no hope of attonement, he prepared an army, & met his enimie in the field, where after ſore fight and much ſlaughter, the victorie remayned with Angusianus, & Nectanus with his Pictes were chaſed and forced to ſaue themſelues by flight.

conſent of the Lordes, as fauour of the cōmons. Aboute the ſame time becauſe the Brytons had ſlaine the Romaine lieutenant, the Emperour Conſtantius ſent one Maximus thither to chaſtiſe the rebels, with whom the ſame Maximus encountring in battell gaue them a great ouerthrow. And within three dayes after Octauius king of the Brytons, through griefe, age & long ſickneſſe, being conſumed to the laſt point, departed this life. He left a ſonne behinde him named alſo Octauius, who doubting to fall into ỹ hāds of the Romains, fled into the Iſle of Man, & remayned there certaine yeares vnknowen with Eugenius and Ethodius, the ſonnes of Fincomack. The Brytons alſo perſiſting in their rebellion, were eftſones diſcomfited in battel by Maximus, and ſore by him perſecuted til he had brought them againe to their full ſubiection.

Whileſt theſe troubles cōtinued in Brytain, Angusianus king of Scots was ſore diſquieted by Nectanus king of Picts, who enforced himſelf to reuenge the death of his couſin Romacus, making ſundrie rodes & forrayes into the Scottiſh confines, & greatly endamaged the countrey, by ſpoyling of goodes, murthering of the inhabitants, & brenning of townes with the villages, & in the end hauing his power increaſed by the ayd Nectanus king of the Pictes maketh ſore warres vpon the Scottes.

Nectanus himſelfe neuer reſted till he came vnto Camelone, where he called a counſell of his nobles to haue their aduiſe by what meanes he might be reuēged of the iniuries receyued by the Scots, wherof he was moſt deſirous, not regarding into what daunger he brought his owne realme, ſo he might ſomewhat eaſe his rancour and diſpleaſure, whiche he had thus conceyued againſt his enimies the Scottes.

Nectanus deſirous of reuenge.

Neither wāted there diuers great perſonages in that aſſemble which (to content his minde and to winne fauour of him) ſet forward the matter in ſuch earneſt wiſe (that notwithſtanding what other could ſay to the contrarie) it was ordeyned that with al ſpeede an army ſhould be lewied, and ledde forth into the Scottiſh borders.

Nectanus hauing thus the conſent of his nobles to inuade the Scottes a new, cauſed men of warre to be take vp through all the parties of his dominion, & that of the choyſeſt men that might be gotte: the whiche being once aſſembled, hee ſtayed not long but ſet forewarde with them, and entred into Kalendar wood, ſpoyling & deſtroying all afore him at his owne will and pleaſure.

Nectanus inuadeth the Scottiſh confines.

Anguſianus vnderſtãding his furie, & doubting leſt the Brytains through ſetting on of the Romains ſhould ſeeke to ioyne with the Pictes to the deſtruction of the Scots, thought good to aſſay if by any friendly meanes hee might bring Nectanus to fal vnto ſome reaſonable point, rather than by the warres to endaunger bothe the Pictiſh & Scottiſh eſtates, in putting the ſame in aduenture to fall into the hands of theyr ancient enimies the Romains & the Brytons. Herevpõ therfore he wrote vnto Nectanus a gẽtle letter, declaring therin al ſuch daungers & incõueniẽces as might enſue by this warre thus by him attempted. And againe how neceſſary it were for both nations to haue peace togither as then, cõſidering howe it was not to be thought that the Romaine legate Maximus (hauing now all the Brytons at his cõmaundement) would reſt (if occaſiõ were offered) til that he had fully ſubdued both the Scottes & Pictes: For the auoyding of which peril he offered for his parte, to accept any reaſonable cõditions of peace, that ſhould by him be preſcribed. But Nectanus in no wiſe would giue eare to any treatie of peace, ſo that Anguſianus being forced to giue battell for defence of his ſubiects, brought his people into the field, and exhorting thẽ to play the men with ſundrie cõforteable wordes, he placed thẽ in order of battel.

Anguſianus ſueth for peace.

Nectanus refuſeth al offers of peace.

On the other part Nectanus likewiſe encouraged his folkes to do valiantly, ſo that the Archers on bothe ſides ſtepped forewarde, letting their arrowes flie freely one at an other, till at length comming to hand blowes they ſtroke on freſhly, beating downe and killing without ſparing on either ſide, ſo that a good ſpace the victory was doubtful. At length Anguſianus perceiuing his people to be put to the worſe, ruſhed forth into the thickeſt of the preaſſe amõgſt his enimies, where hee was quickly eſpied, oppreſſed with preſſe and ſlaine out of hand, the moſt part of his people miſſing him, and not vnderſtãding what was become of him, ſuppoſed ẏ he had bene fled, & therefore fell alſo to running away, but the reſidue that ſtoode ſtill at their defence were ſlaine downe right.

Anguſianus & Nectanus ioyne in battel with their armies.

Anguſianus is ſlayne.

The Scots are diſcomfited.

Thus the victory remayned with the Pictes, but neither part had any cauſe to reioyce, for the chiefetains on both ſides were ſlayne, beſides many thouſands of other, ſo that aſwell the one natiõ as the other departed frõ the place right penſife & ſorowfull, giuing many a ſore curſe vnto ſuche as had bene the procurers & nurriſhers of ſuch deteſtable hatred betwixt thoſe two natiõs, which had ſo long a time bene conioyned in the faithfull bande of amitie, to the great quiet and wealth of both the countreys. After this bloudy battell, aſwell the Scots as Pictes ſat ſtill for a ſeaſon, not attempting any enterpriſe of importance the one againſt the other.

Nectanus alſo ſlayn.

Fethelmacus.

ANguſianus raigned not paſte .ij. yeares before he was ſlaine thus in the field, as ye before haue herd, in whoſe place ſucceeded his couſin Fethelmacus with little better ſucceſſe, for in ẏ .ij. yeare of his raigne, deſirous to be reuẽged of the Pictes, he aſſembled an armie, & entring into Angus, began to ſpoyle & ſlea downe right all ẏ was before him, without regard to impotent, aged, tender infants, or other. The Picts alſo being kindled herewith, gathered their power togither, & encountring with the Scots, there was a ſore battell fought betwixt them, but the Scots firſt putting the wings of their enimies hoſte to flight, at length diſcõfited their mayne battell alſo, being left naked on bothe ſides of all ayde or ſuccour, great ſlaughter was made in the chaſe of the Pictes as they fled hither & thither to ſaue themſelues. So that among other their king named Nectanus brother to the aboue remembred Nectanus, being wounded with an arrow died within three dayes after that this cruell conflict was ended. The courage of the Scottes nowe being aduaunced with this their proſperous ſucceſſe, they paſſed forthwith ouer ẏ riuer of Tay, to robbe, harrie, and ſpoyle the countrey of Fyfe.

The Scots diſcomfite pictes.

An other Nectanus in the pictiſh hoſt receyued the fight of the Scottes.

The Pictes perceyuing themſelues not to be ſtrong inough to matche with theyr enimies in playne field at hãds ſtrokes, determined yet with ſkirmiſhes and light encountrings if it were poſſible to keepe them off from the winning of any of theyr fenſed townes, caſtels or ſtrong holdes. And to be the more able to maintaine thẽſelues in this theyr purpoſed intention, they choſe one Hierguſt to theyr king, a man of ſubtill nature, and craftie imaginatiõ. This Hierguſt deuiſing how to deliuer his countrey of ſuch an intollerable enimie as Fethelmacus was, procured two ſlie fellowes Picts by nation, to counterfeyte thẽſelues for Scots, & for that they were cunnyng throwers of the darte, in which kinde of exerciſe the ſame Fethelmacus toke great pleaſure, they were apointed to make ſute to be in ſeruice with him, to the intent that when they might eſpie theyr time, they ſhould ſlea him, by one kind of meane or other.

They

They (according as they were inſtructed cõming into Scotland) found meanes not only to haue place in the kings houſe, but alſo to corrupt one of his Muſitians an harper, & to bring him to be of counſell with them, in this their wicked purpoſe. By reaſon whereof, in one night as hee lay at Carpk, where he was buſie to make his proviſion there for the warres againſt the Picts, the ſame Muſitian (hauing playde in the kings bed chamber, till he had brought him a ſleepe) did let in thoſe .ij. Pictiſh traytours, who forthwith ſlew him euen as he lay ſo ſleeping: but the king groning grieuouſly at the deadly ſtroke, ſome of them that watched before the chamber doore, perceyuing what was happened, followed after the murtherers, who fledde with all ſpeede vnto the next mountaines, where they ſought to defende themſelues with hurling downe ſtones vpõ thẽ that came vp towardes them: but in the end, being taken, & confeſſing the deede, with the whole manner of the ſame, they were drawen in peeces with wilde horſes, the Muſitian being alſo apprehended & conuict of the treaſon, ſuffered ſemblably the like kinde of death. Fethelmacus came to his end in the .iij. yeare of his raigne being the ſecond yeare after the death of the Emperour Valentinian. In this ſeaſon (as in times paſte hath bene beleeued) certaine bones of the Apoſtle S. Andrew, were brought forth of Achaia, a prouince in Grecia into Scotland, by a Grekiſhe Monke named Regulus Albatus, cõmonly called S. Reule, a man in thoſe dayes highly eſteemed, for the opiniõ which the world had cõceiued of him for his holy & vertuous life, to whõ king Hierguſt gaue his palaice that ſtoode in ẏ part of Fife, where ẏ ſame Regulus firſt lãded: at whoſe contẽplation alſo, he creãted a church in old time called Kirkruil, ẏ is, the Church of S. Reule, afterwards named ẏ old church of S. Andrewes, ſtãding in the abbey churchyarde, where ẏ Chanons were wont to be buried. But to leaue this matter to ẏ further report & credite of ẏ Scottiſh Chronicles, wee will proceede with our purpoſe.

After the death of Fethelmacus the nobles & cõmons of the Scottiſh natiõ ſent into the Ile of Man for Eugenius the ſonne of king Fincomarke, where he wᵗʰ his brother Ethodius had remained during the dayes of the .iij. laſt remẽbred kings, Romacus, Auguſianus, & Fethelmacus.

THis Eugenius at his cõming into Albanie was inueſted king of the Scots by cõmon conſent of all the nation. About the ſame ſeaſon Maximus the Romaine lieutenãt in Bytain, vnderſtanding of the late diſſention betwixt the Scottiſh men & Picts, deuiſed which the waies he might beſt ſubdue both thoſe nations, thereby not onely to enlarge the bounds of the Romaine Empyre, & to deliuer the Bytains from inuaſions of thoſe ſo cruell enimies, but alſo to haue the ſouth part of the Ile more obedient & loyall vnto the ſame Empyre than heretofore it had bene. He thought good therefore in ẏ beginning to aſſay if he might ioyne in friendſhip with the one of the natiõs, til he had deſtroyed the other: for he cõſidered it would be an harde peece of worke to haue to do with them both at one inſtant time.

The practiſe of Maximus to deſtroy the Scottes.

Wherupõ directing his letters vnto Hierguſt king of the Pictes, he required to renewe the old league with him & his people, promiſing to ayde him againſt the Scots, cõmon enimies not only to the Pictiſh natiõ, but alſo to all ſuch people as loued reſt & quietneſſe, as might eaſily be perceiued by their continuall practiſe & vſage, euer ſeeking to diſturbe their neighbours with rodes and forrayes, ſo that it ſtood with a general common wealth to haue thẽ vtterly diſtroyed & extirped.

He ſendeth vnto Hierguſt king of the Pictes.

Hierguſt right ioyful of theſe newes, gaue harty thanks vnto almightie God, that had moued the Romaine lieutenant to make ſuch offer vnto him, wherby the furious rage of ẏ Scots might be once repreſſed, & put away frõ his people, and therfore willing to cõfirme a friendſhip with the ſame lieutenãt, he promiſed to renew the auncient league betwixt the Romains & Picts, vpon any reaſonable cõditiõs, which he ſhould deuiſe, not only requiring his ayde at this time againſt the ſayd Scots, but alſo at all other as occaſion ſhould demaund. Maximus hauing receyued this anſweare, he found meanes alſo to come to a cõmunication with Hierguſt neare vnto Yorke, where the league was cõfirmed betwixt them, & therein ẏ Scots not only adiudged for cõmon enimies, both to ẏ Romains & Bytains, but alſo to the Picts. And further therwith were certaine orders appoynted how the warre ſhould be purſued with al expeditiõ againſt thẽ. Theſe things thus finiſhed, & both the Princes returned to their homes, Maximus ſente an Heralde vnto Eugenius the Scottiſh king, cõmaunding him on the behalf of the Romaine Empire, to make reſtitutiõ for al wrõgs & iniuries done vnto the Pictiſh nation. And further to deliuer into the handes of Hierguſt the king of the Picts the authors of the ſame wrõgs & iniuries, to be puniſhed at his diſcretiõ, or if he would refuſe thus to do, that thẽ he ſhould looke to haue the Emperour and the Romaine people enimies vnto him & all his nation.

Hierguſt his anſweare vnto Maximus his meſſage.

Maximus and Hierguſt ioyne in friendſhip, and the Scottes proclaymed enimies to the both.

An Herald ſent frõ Maximus vnto Eugenius

Eugenius for anſwere herevnto, declared that ſith his entring into the gouernmẽt of the Scottiſh eſtate, hee had done nothing that might be thought preiudiciall either to the Romains or to the Bytains their ſubiects: And as for the Picts he would be gladde to haue a peace with them if there might bee amends made for all diſpleaſures done on either parte, according as ſhoulde be thought to ſtande with equitie and reaſon.

The anſweare of Eugenius vnto the Herald.

Neyther did hee ſee what cauſe the Romains ſhoulde haue to make warres for the Pictes, agaynſt thoſe that had done them no diſpleaſure: but if it were ſo, that hee muſte needes haue warres, he would do what in him lay to defende the libertie of the Scottiſh natiō, truſting chiefly in the ſuccours of almightie God, who vſed to fauour the cauſe of the iuſt and innocent, againſt ſuche as ſought to wrong them vpon fayned quarrels without occaſion giuen.

Maximus rayſeth a mightie armie.

He inuadeth the Scottiſh regions.

Maximus receyuing this anſwere from Eugenius, aſſembled with all ſpeede a ſtrong and mighty armie of Romains, Brytains, & French men, with the which entring into Weſtmerlād, he ſpoyled that countrey moſt miſerably, taking diuers caſtels & ſtrong holdes by force, the which he furniſhed with garriſons of his people, and then paſſing into Annandale, brenned and haried the ſame: from thence he entred into Galloway, omitting no kinde of tyrannie that might be ſhewed againſt the inhabitantes, ſo that the feare was greate throughout all the countrey: for of many yeares before, ſo great an armie had not bene ſeene in thoſe parties.

Eugenius gathereth his power, fighteth with his enimies, and is diſcomfited.

Eugenius notwithſtanding, gathering his power togither, determined to trie the fortune of battell, & ſo ioyning with his enimies neare vnto the water of Cree, his people were quickly put to flight, & chaſed, by reaſon that they were muche inferiour in number: but the Romains purſuyng

Herevpō the Romains doubting what their enimies intēded to do, they fortified their campe that night very ſtrōgly: but Eugenius vnderſtanding what a multitude of his folkes were ſlaine in the battell, ſo that the very ſtreame of the water of Cree was ſtopped vp with dead carcaſes, he thought beſt with the aduice of his peares, to licence his people to departe to their homes, and not to fight any more with his enimies for that time.

Whiche being done, he himſelfe repayred the ſame night vnto Carricke, where he remayned for a ſeaſon, making proviſion for defence of his realme the beſt he could deuiſe. Maximus hauing knowledge in the morning how the Scots were quite gone their wayes, he determined to haue followed thē, but being aſcertayned of a rebellion amongſt the Brytains in Kent, he chaūged his purpoſe, & returned thitherwardes, to ap-who laboured not onely to deliuer their owne countrey out of the handes of all forrainers, but alſo to inuade & deſtroy Pictlande, ſo that they harried the countrey of Fyfe, with part of Menteth, and Sterling ſhyre, brenning and waſting townes, caſtels and houſes moſt cruelly.

Maximus hearing that the Scots were thus encāped in Kyle, marched towards thē, & lodged the ſame night not far off frō the riuer of Myūda, where knowledge was giuen vnto Eugenius, ỳ Maximus was come within. v. miles of him, with a greater armie, than he had at his laſt encoūtring wᵗ him in Galloway. Theſe aduertiſements cauſed no ſmall ſturre to be rayſed in the cāpe, ſome being ſtrikē with preſent feare, where other cōtrarywiſe moued with high indignatiō, deſired nothing ſo much as to ioyne in battell wᵗ the Romains, whoſe cruell tirannie they very much deteſted. Eugenius himſelfe ſhewed no countenance of feare at all, but encouraging his people with comfortable wordes, he brought thē ſtreight in order of battell, deuided into three wardes, cōmitting one of them to the leading of his brother Ethodius, & the ſecōd to Doalus the gouernour of Argile, reſeruing the. iij. to himſelf.

This

This done, he made vnto them a pithie oration, declaring how neceſſarie it was for them to play the men, conſidering that in victorie conſiſted the onely hope of libertie, and in beeing vanquiſhed, their Countrey was endaungered to be brought into perpetuall bondage for euer, for the onelye marke which the Romains ſhotte at, was to oppreſſe the libertie of the whole Iſlande, and to reduce the ſame into the forme of a Prouince, to be gouerned at the wil of the victorers, to the breach of all their olde auncient lawes, and long continued cuſtomes.

With theſe and many other like reaſons hee went about to encourage the myndes of his ſubiects, in ſuch wiſe, that in maner the moſt part of them determined rather to die with honour, than to liue in ſuch miſerie, as they feared woulde enſue if the victorie ſhoulde reſt vpon the Romains ſide. And as they were in ſuch talke togither, ſodainly commeth in one of their ſcoutes wyth newes, that Maximus with his armie was euen at hande.

This was in the morning anone after the Sunne was vp, whereas he was not looked for till the euening following, inſomuche that the ſame his ſodaine arriuall chaunced ſo farre contrarie to their former expectations, troubled all their heads, and brought them into a great maze, for that hereby they were conſtrained to chaunge the order of their battailes to haue the Sunne on their backes, as they had prouided at the firſt it ſhould haue bene, if the enimies had not come vntill the after noone.

Yet notwithſtanding, they had no ſoner chaunged their place, and gotten themſelues into array of battaile againe, but that with great violence they prealled forwarde to giue the onſet vpon the Romaines. Which Maximus perceyuing, made all the ſpeede he coulde, to ſet his men in order of battaile, that he might receyue his enimies comming thus to encounter him.

So both ſides beeing fully bent to battayle, and approched within daunger of ſhot, they lette flie the ſame moſt egerly, albeit that through haſting forth to ioyne at hande ſtrokes, there was little hurt done with bowes or dartes.

The battailes ioyne.

The Scottes crying vpon the name of their worthie and moſt famous auncetter king Gald, layde aboute them moſte fiercely after they came once to the ioyning: and lykewiſe the Romains being encouraged with the chearefull wordes of the Lieutenant Maximus, boldely encountered them, ſo that it was doubtfull at the firſt whether part ſhould haue the worſe ende of the ſtaffe: but ſhortly there followed variable ſucceſſe, for on the one part, they of Roſſe and Mar, being appointed vnder Ethodius to encounter that wing of the enimies where the Pictes were, fought ſo egerly and with ſuch fierce willes, that they eaſily put the Pictes vnto flight, beating downe a great number of them as they woulde haue paſſed the water of Dune, but ſtreight wayes after failying to the ſpoyle, they were ſlayn downright by a legion of ſuche Romaines as were ſente by Maximus vnto the ſuccours of the Pictes.

The Scots hauing vanquiſhed the Picts, are ſlaine by the Romains.

On the other ſide in the left wing thoſe of Argile, Cantyre, Kyle, and Coningham, who were matched with the Brytaines, French men, and Germains, after long and cruell fight were there ſlaine in the place, greatly to their fame and glorie for euer, ſo that by this meanes the maine battaile of the Scottiſh men wherein Eugenius himſelfe ſtoode amongſt his people, was left bare and naked on both the ſydes. Which Maximus perceyuing, he cauſed the ſame to bee aſſayled on eche part with ſuch violence, that in the end longer reſiſtaunce preuayled not, but that their mayne battaile muſt needes be opened perforce, by meanes whereof Eugenius chooſing rather to die in the place, than eyther to ſaue his life by flight, or by rendering himselfe into his enimies handes to liue in miserie. &c. was there slaine togither with a great number of his nobles and gentlemen, hauing determined by the example of their maister to die rather speedily with honour, than longer to liue with shame and reproch.

Eugenius is slaine.

Thus Eugenius lost his life with his kingdome in the thirde yeare after his first entring vnto the rule, hauing enioyed few good dayes in rest during the sayde tyme.

Such of the Scots also as were appoynted to kepe the cariage and trusse of the field, seeing their Lordes and maisters thus slaine, rushed forth with such weapos as they had at hād, in purpose to slea some number of their enimies, not passing though it should cost them also their owne liues, so that they might die reuenged. The slaughter was great whiche at the first was made, more through an obstinate desire of reuenge, than by any valiant actiuitie: but this companie being anon broken in sunder, and driuen backe, they were finally slaine and beaten downe.

The furious rage of the Scottish Carters.

Moreouer the Romains that pursued in chase after their enimies, when the battaile was done, encountered with great numbers of such women and aged persons as followed a farre off, to vnderstand the successe of the fielde, doubting what happe might fall to their children and kinsfolkes, whose slaughter when they perceyued, like people enraged they flew vpon such Romaines as they met with, but being easily vanquished, and refusing to flee, they were also slain and cut in peeces in a most miserable maner.

The Romaines hauing thus rid the fieldes of all kind of enimies, lodged that night abrode, here and there at their pleasure, where they might hear the dolefull gronings, and lamentable cōplaints of them that lay wounded, and as yet not deade, curling most bitterly the cruel tyrannie and couetous ambition of the Romans, with that most detestable disloyaltie of the Picts, procuring this murther and destruction of those people that had deserued farre otherwise at their handes.

When the morning was come, Maximus the Lieutenaunt caused the spoyle of the deade bodyes to be gathered, and equally deuided amongst his men of warre. And such as were founde sore wounded and not dead, to shewe some token of clemencie, according to the olde accustomed maner of the auncient Romaines, hee commaunded surgeons to see to the cure of them. The other being deade, he suffered to be buryed, causing the corps of Eugenius himselfe to bee enterred in most solemne and pompous sort, after the vsage of the Romaine Princes.

The spoyle deuided amongst the souldiers.

The buriall of the dead bodies by appointment of Maximus.

His brother Ethodius beeing found mangled in moste pitifull wise, and in manner halfe deade, was also taken vp by commaundement of the same Maximus, and Surgeons charged to haue the ordering of hym, and to shewe theyr diligence for the cure of his hurtes in moste speedie and gentle wise.

Ethodius wounded, committed the cure of Surgeons.

The victorie thus atchieued, Maximus surueyeth the Countreyes of Kyle, Carricke, and Conningham, with that also of Caldone, and seazeth the same into hys handes, suffering the Inhabitauntes to enioye both goodes and landes in peace and quietnesse vppon theyr othes of allegeaunce, wythoute anye further molestation.

Hiergusts desireth the vtter destruction the Scottes.

Hiergust King of the Picts with other the Nobles of that Nation, were nothing contented therewith, desirous to see the vtter destruction of all the Scottishe race. Whereunto Maximus at the first would not agree, alledging the ancient custom of the Romains, who sought rather to vanquish by benefites, than by the sword, euer vsing to spare suche as submitted themselues, and in no wise to spot their honour nor maiestie of their Empyre with crueltie.

The earnest sute of the Picts to haue the Scottishmen banished and expulsed out of the Country.

But the Picts not satisfied herewith, went about earnestly to perswade him in no condition to suffer the Scottes to haue any abyding within the confines of Bytayne, if hee wished anye quietnesse in the estate thereof, for theyr delyght (sayde the Picts) was onely set to seeke occasions howe to disturbe the peace, to liue by the pyllage and spoyle of theyr neighbours, and namely of the Picts, vnto whose confusion (as the Prophecies spake) they were begotten and borne. Finally when all theyr earnest sute myssed the wished effect, they fell to, and assayed if they might bring that to passe by wicked meede and through corrupting bribes, whiche they coulde not do by other meanes.

Where wordes faile, giftes preuaile.

And euen as it oftentymes chaunceth in suche cases, where wordes are but spent in waste, giftes yet preuayle: so also came it to passe euen here, for at length a Proclaymation came forth by procurement of the Picts, that al such as were naturall Scottishe men, shoulde by a certayne day auoyde oute of those Countreyes that they possessed in Bytayne, vppon paine of losing life and goodes, and to delyuer vp theyr houses and landes vnto suche Bytaynes and Picts as were appoynted by the Romaines for to enioy the same.

The proclamation for auoyding all Scottishmen forthe the whole Iland of Britaine.

The Scottes perceyuing themselues not able to make any resistaunce, obeyed thys commaundement, some of them passing ouer into Ireland, some into the westerne Iles, and some of them got ouer also into Norway, and Denmarke, and manye there were that got intertaynment amongest the Romaine Souldiers, and went ouer with them into Fraunce, as yet called Gallia, to serue in the warres there, and and in other places vnder ỹ Emperors enſignes.

The Pictes were ſo cruel and diligent to ſee all the Scottiſh linage conſumed, that they would not conſent that a certaine number of gentlewomen ſhould remaine behinde, who had their huſbandes ſlaine in the laſt warres, and made interceſſion in moſte lamentable wiſe vnto Maximus, that they might bee permitted to abide in their natiue Countrey all the reſidue of their lyues, though in ſeruile eſtate, to the ende that they might bee buryed after the ſame were once ended in graues with their ſlaine huſbandes.

Moreouer where Cartandis Queene of the Scottes, late wife vnto Eugenius, was brought vnto Maximus, with two gentlewomen and a groome from the tumbe of hir husband, where ſhe had remayned euer ſithe his buriall in continuall mourning, forſomuche as ſhe was a Brytayne, and diſcended by lynage from the Princes of Wales, Maximus lamenting hir miſerable caſe, aſſigned the Citie of Carricke vnto hir, with certaine other reuenues for the maintenance of hir eſtate. But after ſhe had taken leaue of ſuche as had the cõduction of hir, and was come into a village not farre from Carricke aforeſayd, it chaunced that a ſort of Pictiſhe ryders, (or as I maye call them robbers) met with hir, ſmall to hir profite, & leſſe to their own eaſe, for they did not only ſlea hir groome, but alſo beate hir gentlewomen, and ſtripped both them and hir of all that they had, whereof Maximus being enformed, cauſed them that had done ſo vile a deede to bee apprehended and executed by death, according as they had deſerued. The Queene hirſelfe being brought backe vnto Maximus, and honourably entreated, had all hir ſubſtance reſtored vnto hir againe ſo neare as it was poſſible.

But the Pictes being offended herewith, and ſpecially for the putting to death of their men, ſundrie of their Nobilitie came vnto Maximus, and began to make a ſore complaint in that behalfe, declaring that the deſertes of their Nation had not beene ſuche towarde the Romaine Empyre, as to haue their people put to execution for a womans ſake, being both an enimie and a priſoner: therefore they requyred that ſhe might be confined into Brytayne, and according to the tenor of the proſcription, ſpoyled of all hir goodes.

Here Cartandis being preſent hirſelfe, began to make pitifull lamentation, bewayling hir moſt vnhappie eſtate, in that contrarie to the order of hir wretched caſe and preſent miſerable fortune, ſhe ſhoulde nowe be forced to returne againe into hir Countrey: wiſhing rather than ſhe ſhould be inforced ſo to doe, that ſhe might offer vp hir life, as a ſacrifice in the place of hir huſbandes burial: and therefore holding vp hir handes vnto Maximus in moſt pitifull wiſe, ſhe beſought hym inſtantly, that it might pleaſe him, either to ſuffer hir to paſſe the reſidue of hir life after ſuch ſort as ſhee thought beſte agreed wyth hir widowlike eſtate, or elſe to take the ſame from hir preſently by ſome violent meanes of execution.

There was not a man other than the Pictes, that ſawe and heard hir at that inſtant, but lamented hir woefull diſtreſſe, ſo that in the end the requeſt of the Pictes was diſallowed, and Cartandis hauing liuing aſſigned hir for the maintenance of hir degree, was licenced to depart into what place ſhee thought expedient, there to liue as ſhee thought beſt withoute lette or diſturbaunce.

The ſame tyme the Scottiſhe Biſhops and Prieſts being baniſhed as well as the other ſort of the Scottiſh people, a number of their Monkes got them into the Ile of Iona, now called Colmkill, where they erected a Monaſterie for theyr owne habitation, the worthineſſe whereof hath beene right famous, euen vnto theſe our dayes, as that whiche was afterwarde endowed wyth many fayre reuenues by diuerſe of the Scottiſhe kings, who had their burials there after the returne of the Scottes into Albanie as ſhal be hereafter expreſſed.

The Monaſterie of Iona buylded by baniſhed Scottiſh Monkes.

The yeare in the whiche the Scottiſhmen were thus banquiſhed by the Romaines and Pictes, and finally confined out of theyr ſeates, was from the creation of the worlde 4319, after the byrth of our Sauiour 352. from the beginning of the Scottiſhe kingdome 679. and the thirde yeare of Magnentius.

There were ſeene alſo a number of ſmall byrdes fall out of the ayre ſo thicke, that it ſeemed it had rayned byrdes, and incontinently came a great number of Rauens that deuoured vp the ſame.

Certaine Witches and Southſayers declaring that theſe things betokened the deſtruction of the Scottiſhe kingdome, were commaunded by the Prieſtes to holde their peace on payne of death, as they that tolde nothing but lyes and fables, though afterwardes their tales proued moſt true.

commaundement of Maximus, was yet baniſhed amongſt the reſidue, and conſtrained to take an othe, that he ſhoulde immediately repayre into Denmarke, and hereafter not to approch nearer vnto the coaſtes of Albion, for doubt of ſome newe attempt that might be made by the Scots throughe his meanes, thereby to returne into their Countrey agayne, and to recouer theyr former eſtate.

But this ſtayed not them of the weſterne Iles, but that aſſembling themſelues togyther, and choſing one Gillo to their capitain they paſſed ouer into Argyle, where in the ende they were encountered by ſuch Pictes as were ſet there to defende that Countrey, and ſlaine eche mothers ſonne. Their veſſelles were alſo taken and brought into ſundrie Hauens of the Countrey to ſerue for defence of the coaſtes vppon any newe enterpriſe which the Scottes ſhoulde chaunce to make: but the other Scottes perceyuing they were not able to furniſhe forth a newe armie in the Iles by any ayde they might purchaſe there, ſayled ouer into Irelande, where preſenting themſelues vnto the King of that Region, they declared vnto him from poynt to poynt all their infortunate chaunces, and lamentable calamities which were happened vnto them of late throughe the tyrannicall puiſſance of the Romaines, and malicious enuie of the Pictes, in ſuche ſort as nothing coulde be more miſerable than their preſent eſtate, conſidering the ruine of ſo mightie a kingdome, and the final baniſhment of the inhabitants from their houſes and lands, which had beene in poſſeſſion of them and theyr elders, by the ſpace almoſte of ſeuen hundred yeares.

Gillo choſen captaine of the baniſhed Scots in the weſtern Iles comming into Argile, is vanquiſhed by the Pictes.

The Scottes repayre into Irelande.

The Iriſhe king with his Nobles moued with pitie to heare and vnderſtande ſo dolefull calamities to haue chaunced vnto that Nation, whoſe good or bad happe coulde not but touche them verie neare, conſidering they were diſcended both of one progenie, comforted theſe Scottiſhe men to the beſt of their powers, and in the ende concluded to ayde them with tenne thouſande men, and to furniſh them forth with ſhips, victayles, and munitions to paſſe into Albanie for recouerie of their Countrey.

The king of Irelande with his nobles lament the Scottiſh mens caſe.

The Iriſh men conclude to ayde the Scottiſhmen.

This ayde being put in a readineſſe, and the ſhippes rigged and decked as was requiſite for ſuch an enterpriſe, they toke the ſeas, and landing in Cantyre, chaunced to meete with Heirdozſtane brother to Heirguſt king of the Pictes, accompanied with a great number of Picts and Brytaynes aſſembled to defende the Countrey, but being ſharpely aſſayled of the Scottes and Iriſh men they were quickely put to flight, and ſuch as were ouertaken dyed on the ſworde, to the great terrour of all the newe inhabitants that were planted in thoſe parties.

The Scottes and Iriſhmen lande in Cantyre.

The Pictes encounter with the Scots and Iriſh men, and are diſcõfited.

This victorie thus atchieued, there were that gaue counſell not to attempt fortune ouer farre, but to take ſuche bootes of goodes and priſoners as they had got in the Countrey, and to returne therewith into Irelande. Other were of a contrarie opinion, ſuppoſing it beſt to followe the victorie, and eyther to recouer againe theyr auncient ſeates, or elſe to die in the valiaunt attempt thereof. Which aduice was followed, as the beſt, though it proued otherwiſe: for before they could come to any concluſion of that enterpriſe, the Romaines, Pictes, and Brytaynes gathered themſelues togither, & gaue battail again to that Scottiſhe and Iriſhe companie, wherein they ouerthrewe them, to theyr vtter ruyne and deſtruction.

The Scottiſh me ouerthre

The newes of this infortunate encounter being brought into Irelande, put the king and his Nobles there in ſuch feare of the Romaines, that they thought it beſt vñ al ſpeed to ſend Ambaſſadors vnto Maximus to ſew vnto him for peace. They that were ſent at the firſt were ſore blamed and checked by Maximus, for that they had ayded the Scottiſhe men in the laſt inuaſion made into Albion: but at length accepting their excuſe, hee graunted a peace vpon certaine conditions, wherof the moſt principall article was, that in no wyſe they ſhould receyue, ayd, or ſuccour any enimie to the Romain empire. This Maximus hauing got a quiet peace on eche ſide, vſed al meanes poſſible howe to procure the loue of his ſouldiers and men of warre, ſhewing hym ſelfe not only gentle, curteous and meeke towardes them, but alſo ſo liberall and free, that his bountrous giftes paſſed all vnderſtanding: in ſo muche that as is reported by writers, he beſtowed in one day neare hande as much in rewardes, as the reuenue of Brytayne yeelded to the Empyre in a whole yeare.

The king of Irelande keth for

This franke liberalitie and curteous behauiour he vſed not onely towardes the Romaines, and his other men of warre, but alſo towardes the Brytaynes and Pictes, conforming hymſelfe ſo neare vnto theyr manners and faſhions, that at his comming into Pictlande, he layde away his Romaine apparell, and arayed himſelfe in garments after the Pictiſh guiſe.

By this maner of meanes therefore hee wan him ſuch loue and fauour, as well amongeſt his ſouldiers, as alſo amongſt the Pictes and Brytaynes, that in the ende by common conſente they choſe him for Emperour, in the 383. yeare after Chriſte, proteſting generally, that they would owe onely theyr obeyſance vnto him as to their ſupreme gouernour.

Maxim choſen rour in tayne.

Here the Scottiſh Chronicles ſomewhat varie from other writers, who affyrme that Maximus mus was thus aduaunced to the Imperiall dignitie, rather by conſtraint of his men of warre, than by any meanes whiche he of himſelfe vſed to attaine vnto the ſame. Where the ſaide Chronicles neuertheleſſe ſhewe, that it came chiefly to paſſe by his owne ſeeking, procuring certain perſons to worke for him as inſtruments to frame other to this his purpoſed intent.

He helde the dominion of the Empyre being thus preferred to the Imperial eſtate, the ſpace of fiue yeares. All the countreyes and people of Albion beeing at his commaundement without contradiction: whiche had not chanced vnto any one mã before his time, ſith ẏ Ile was firſt inhabited.

At length deſirous of more Empire, he paſſed ouer into France with a mightye armie, in purpoſe to ſubdue al France and Italie, with ſuch other countries as were obedient vnto Gratian as then Emperor of Rome. But how proſperouſly he ſpedde in the beginning, and how at length he was ſlain at Aquileia in Italy, ye ſhal find in ẏ hiſtorie of England a great deale more at large.

By reaſon of ſuch trouble in the eſtate of the Romaine Empyre, Octauius the ſonne of Octauius late king of the Brytaynes, the which (as before is ſayde) fledde into the Ile of Man, and after departing from thence, got ouer into Fraunce, returned nowe into Brytayne, and did ſo much there, that the Brytains receyued him to theyr king: but ſhortly after he was conſtrayned to agree with the Romaine Emperour Theodoſius, ſo that the Brytaynes ſhoulde pay theyr wonted tribute, and liue vnder ſuche lawes as by the Emperor ſhould be to them preſcribed. In al other reſpects Octauius ſhoulde be reputed during his life for king. Immediately hereupon two Lieutenãts were ſent from Theodoſius, of whõ the one named Martius ſoiourned at London, and the other called Victorine, at Yorke. And with al expedition they began to put the Romain lawes in practiſe, aboliſhing the olde Britiſhe lawes, to the greate offence of many that coulde not well brooke ſtraunge ordinances. Namely the Pictes repyned ſore thereat, and vſed moſt an ende their owne lawes and conſtitutions, greatly to the contempt of the Romaine eſtate.

Whereof Victorine the one of the Romaine Lieutenants hauing knowledge, gaue ſtrayte commaundement vnto Hierguſt the Pictiſhe king, that in no wiſe hee ſhoulde ſuffer the olde lawes and rude ordinaunces of his Countrey, to be vſed any longer amongſt his ſubiects, vppon payne that might enſue for diſobedience ſhewed towards the Maieſtie of the Romaine Empyre.

Hierguſt nowe perceyuing into what thraldome and miſerie his Countrey was brought, by meanes of the warres which he had procured againſt his neighbours the Scottiſhe men, as a man ſore repenting his paſſed follie, and ſeeing no readie meane preſente howe to reforme the ſame, being aged and ſore broken with continuall ſickneſſe, he got himſelfe ſecretly into his priuie Chamber, where immediately hee ſlue hymſelfe, to be ridde of the ſight of that preſent ſeruile eſtate, into the whiche he ſawe both him and his whole Countrey reduced. Hierguſt ſlayeth himſelfe.

Whoſe death being once knowne, Victorine commaunded that the Pictes ſhould not chooſe any other from thenceforth, to raigne as King ouer them, nor to obey any other Magiſtrates, but onely ſuch as ſhoulde bee appoynted to haue the gouernment of them, by commaundement and commiſſion of the Romaine Emperour. For it was agreed, as he alledged, by the tenour of the league, concluded betwixt Hierguſt and Maximus, that after the deceaſſe of the ſame Hierguſt, all his dominions ſhoulde bee gouerned by Romaine officers in fourme of a Prouince. Howbeit the Pictes nothing regarded the wordes of Victorine, but by common agreement choſe one Durſtus the ſeconde ſonne of Hierguſt to bee their king. The Pictes are forbidden to create a king. Durſtus is choſen king of the Pictes.

Whereupon Victorine beeing enformed of theyr doings, rayſed a power, and made ſuche ſpeede towardes them, that hee was gotten ſo neare vnto the Citie of Camelon, ere they had any knowledge of his approch, that Durſtus with other of the Nobles, beeing as then within the ſame, could not haue ſpace to eſcape their wayes, but being forthwith beſieged within it, at length they were taken by force of aſſault, and the citie ſacked, to the great enryching of the Romaine armie, and vtter vndoing of the poore Inhabitauntes. Durſtus is beſieged of the Romaines.

Durſtus with other the chiefeſt priſoners were firſte had vnto London, and from thence conueyed to Rome, there to haue iudgement by deeree of the Senate. The reſidue of the nobles that were taken there, ſuffered in the markette place at Camelon. Durſtus is brought priſoner to London.

Thus was that tumult appeaſed, and the Picts commaunded to pay yearly vnto the Emperours procurator the fourth parte of all theyr reuenues growing of theyr corne and cattell. Beſide this trybute hee charged them alſo wyth diuerſe baſe ſeruices, as to labor in metſal mines, to digge ſtones forth of the quarreys, and to make bricke to bee ſent into Brytaine, or into other places whyther it pleaſed hym to commaunde it. The Picts become tributaries. They are put to their baſe ſeruices.

The cauſe why hee burdened them in ſuche ſort was (as hee ſayde) to teache them to knowe themſelues. For they were become ſo loſtie ſithe the departure of the Scottiſhmen out of the Ile, that if they were not reſtrayned in time by authoritie of the Romaine puiſſaunce, the whole

Britishe nation were like to be shortly disquieted, by theyr wilfull meanes and insolent presumptions.

Neither was it thought sufficient vnto Victorine to charge the Pictes in manner as is before specified, but to theyr further greeuaunce hee deuised an other way, whereby to bring them in the ende vnto vtter destruction, whiche was this: he constrayned them togither with theyr wyues, children, and whole familyes, to remoue beyonde the water of Forth, and to leaue all the Countreys on this syde the same water as well those whiche they auncientlye had inhabited, as the other which of late apperteyned vnto the Scottes, and were assigned vnto them by Maximus to possesse, after that the Scottes were expelled.

The Pictes are commaunded to dwell beyonde the water of Forth.

All whiche Countreys thus by the Pictes nowe left voyde, were appoynted by Victorine vnto the Brytaynes, as subiectes to the Empyre, to be inhabited. And for a perfite diuision betwixte the Pictes, and the same Brytaynes, hee commaunded a Wall to bee made, and a trench to be cast alongst by the same, from Abyrcorne, throughe the territorie of Glaskow vnto Alcluthe, or Auldcluch, now clalled Dunbreton, so running from the East Sea vnto the West. Hereto proclamation was made, that if any of the Pictishe nation did enterprise to passe this Wall, and to enter into the Brytishe confines without licence of the Magistrates, hee should die for it.

A wall made to diuide the Brytains from the Pictes.

The Pictes forbidde to passe ouer beyonde that wall.

Whylest the Pictes through theyr owne fault, are thus brought into moste miserable subiection of the Romaines, the Scottishe men as is sayde) beeing banished the lande, lyue in other Countreyes by shyfting oute the tyme so well as they myght, some continuing wyth theyr wyues and children, gotte a poore lyuing wyth theyr hande, as exercysing some Science or occupation. Other there were that followed the warres, and serued vnder sundrye worthie Captaynes here and there as occasion serued.

The Scottes liue in other Countreys.

But Ethodius the brother of Eugenius commaunded (as is sayde) to goe into Denmarke, was ioyfully receyued of the King there. Who also gaue hym an office, therewyth to mainteyne hys degree, so that hee lyued there certayne yeares in ryght honourable estate, and begatte of his wyfe whom he brought thyther wyth hym forth of Albanie, a sonne named Erthus, who after his fathers decease hadde issue by hys wyfe called Rocha (a Ladie of highe Parentage amongest the Nobles of Denmarke, as daughter to one Rorichus second person of the Realme) a sonne named Ferguse, whose chaunce was afterwardes to restore the Scottish nation againe to their former estate and Kingdome.

Eith the sonne of Ethodius, begot Ferguse

In his yong yeares, hee was appoynted to serue vnder Alaryke the Gottishe King in that famous voyage which he toke in hande agaynst the Romaine Empyre. For suche was the hate as then of all the Northerne Regions and Kingdomes towardes the Romaine name, that by generall agreement they conspyred togyto the vtter ruyne and finall destruction thereof. And so eche of them sente forth a power in ayde of the sayde Alaryke chosen by common consent as Generall of the whole enterpryse.

Ferguse being set forth by the King of Denmarke with a power of Danes, and with a chosen number of suche Scottish men as were withdrawne into those parties went with the better will, for that besyde the common quarell, he bare a priuate grudge towardes the Romanes for the vsing of his auncetters so cruelly in expulsing them oute of theyr owne homes and natiue Countrey.

Fergusc sent to the Got

This Fergus was present with the Gothes at the wynning of Rome, in the sacking whereof, amongest other spoyles, hee gotte (as is reported) a certaine Chest full of bookes, the whiche some holde opinion hee brought afterwardes into the westerne Iles, and caused them to bee kept in Iona, nowe Colmekill, within a library there buylded for the same intent. Which bookes (as is to bee supposed) were certaine hystories or monumentes of olde antiquities. But the same were so defaced in the dayes of Hector Boetius (who as hee himselfe writeth, caused them to be brought ouer vnto him to Aberdyne) that it coulde not be vnderstoode of what matter they intreated.

It is written moreouer of Ferguse that hee continued wyth Alaryke in all hys enterpryses, so long as hee lyued, and afterwardes serued vnder hys successour Athaulfus, to hys greate fame, and in suche honourable estimation, as fewe were founde comparable vnto him in those dayes.

At length requyring a safeconduyte to returne into Denmarke, he was licenced to depart with highe and right bountifull rewardes, as in part of recompence of his good and faythfull seruice shewed, during the tyme of the warres, as wel in the life time of the sayd Athaulfus, as also in the dayes of his predecessour the foresayde Alaryke.

But nowe to returne where wee left touching the Pictes, and to ſhewe the maner howe the Scottes returned againe into Albanie: Wee ſhall vnderſtande, that the Pictes beeing brought into ſeruile bondage (as before wee haue partlye declared) and doubting daylye of worſe to enſue, they ſent ſecrete meſſengers vnto ſuche Scottes as remayned in exyle in the Weſterne Iles, in Norway, and in other partes of the worlde, promiſing them, if they woulde giue the attempt for recouerie of theyr auncient dwelling places in Albanie, they ſhoulde bee ſure of all the ayde that in them lay, being readie to ſpende their lyues to reuenge the iniuryes whiche they daylye ſuſteyned at the Romaines handes, whoſe continuall practiſe euer was howe to oppreſſe the auncient libertyes of all ſuch Nations as came vnder theyr ſubiection. The experience whereof they nowe felte, to theyr vnſufferable greeuaunce, looking for nothing elſe but ſhortlye to bee expulſed oute of theyr Countrey, and dryuen to goe ſeeke them other places to inhabite in ſtraunge Countreys, after the manner of Outlawes, as it had chaunced alreadie to the Scottes by commaundement of Maximus, as before is expreſſed.

Fergus vnto whom amongſt other this meſſage was chiefly directed, reioyced greatly of the newes. And firſte conferring with the king of Denmark, of whoſe ayde he knew himſelfe aſſured, by his aduiſe he ſent letters abrode forthwith into Norwaye, Orkney, the Weſterne Iles, and into Ireland, vnto ſuch of the Scottiſh men as dwelt in thoſe places to vnderſtande theyr minde herein.

And beeing certifyed that they were vniuerſally agreed, not onely to trye theyr chaunce for recouerie of theyr former eſtate and Kingdome, but alſo had choſen him to be gouernour & generall Capitaine in that enterpryſe: he prepared partly at his owne coſtes, and partly at the charges of the king of Denmarke, and other of his friendes and alyes there, a greate multitude both of men of warre and Shippes, in purpoſe to paſſe ouer into Albanie to recouer hys Grandfathers eſtate, whiche as it was thought myght nowe bee the more eaſily brought to paſſe, ſithe the Pictes woulde ayde him thereto, vppon an earneſt deſire whiche they had to reuenge theyr owne iniuries receyued at the Romaines hands, and to delyuer themſelues from ſuch thraldome as they dayly felte themſelues oppreſſed wyth, doubting withall ſhortly to bee quite expelled out of theyr whole Countrey, as they had bene forced to forgoe a great and the better part therof alreadie.

In this meane tyme, one Gratian diſcended of the Brytiſhe bloud, by conſent of the Romain Legate Martius, (both of them going agaynſte theyr allegiaunce) vſurped the gouernaunce of Brytayne by his owne priuate authoritie: but ſhortly after, they two falling at variance togither, the one of them ſlue the other. And then the Souldiers not ſtaying till they vnderſtoode the pleaſure of Honorius the Emperour, choſe one Conſtantine to ſucceed in the place of Martius, who paſſing ouer into Fraunce, was ſlaine there by Conſtantius, one of the Captaynes of the ſayd Honorius.

Gratian vſurped the gouernance of Brytaine.

Martius ſlain.

Conſtantine ſucceedeth Martius.

Conſtantine is ſlaine.

Vlkorine the other of the Romaine Legates hearing of the deathe both of Martius and Conſtantine, remoued from Yorke vnto London, the better to prouide for the ſafe keeping of the lande to the Emperour Honorius hys vſe: for that hee doubted ſundrie daungers whiche might chaunce, by reaſon the Countrey was as then vnprouided of men of warre, the moſte part of them beyng tranſported ouer into Fraunce, with the forenamed Conſtantine, and not agayne returned.

The Lieutenãt of the north commeth to London.

The Pictes enfourmed of theſe things, ſente worde with all ſpeede vnto Fergus, requiryng him to make haſte, ſith if he ſhould haue wiſhed for a conuenient tyme, a better coulde not bee deuiſed: conſidering the preſent ſtate of things as well in Brytayne, as in other partes of the Romain Empyre, the people euerie where being readie to moue rebellion.

The Pictes ſend ſpeedily vnto Fergus.

Fergus vnderſtanding the whole, by ſuche meſſengers as ſtyll came one after another vnto hym from the Pictes, hee haſted to departe wyth all diligence: and when all things were readie, hee toke the Sea with hys armie, and within eight dayes after, he arryued in ſafetie wythin the Fyrth of Murray lande with all his veſſelles and people, where taking lande, and worde thereof beeing brought into Irelande, into Orkeney, and into the Weſterne Iles, all ſuche of the Scottiſhe lynage as lyued in thoſe parties in exyle, came wyth theyr wyues, children, and whole families in moſte ſpeedie wiſe vnto hym, as thoughe the Countrey had beene alreadie recouered out of the enimies handes, withoute all doubtes of further perill or buſineſſe.

Fergus arryued with his ſhips in Murrey Fyrth.

The Pictes alſo reioyſing greatly at the newes of his comming, repayred vnto hym, and ſhewed him all the honour that might be deuiſed, beſeeching him to pardon and forget all iniuryes and diſpleaſures by them wrought and contryued in tymes paſte againſte the Scottish nation, sithe now they were readie for the aduauncement thereof to spende theyr lyues agaynst such as were enimies to the same. Neither was the fault theyrs, in that Hiergust had consented with the Romaines to banishe the Scottish people, but in their auncetters, who being blinded through the fayre wordes and sweet promises of the Romaines, sawe not the mischiefe which they brought vpon their own heads, and their posterities. Therefore they desired him to renue againe the league betwixt the Pictish and Scottish Nations, with such conditions of appoyntment as it shoulde please him to prescribe.

The Pictes craue pardon excusing them selues.

Fergus.

Fergus by consent of his Nobles answerd, that he was contented to stablish the league with them, euen according to the tenour of the auncient agreement, and to ioyne his power wyth theyrs to helpe to restore them vnto their former estate and liberties, so that they woulde bee contented to surrender vp into the Scottishe mens handes, all such townes and Countreys, from the which they had beene expulsed by great fraud and iniurie. And as for the displeasures done to the Scottishe men in tymes past by ayding the Romaines agaynst them, (as he thought) the Pictes had felt punishment ynough for the same alreadie, being reduced into most seruile and miserable bondage, as iustly rewarded by almightie God for their great vntrouthes, shed and shewed towardes theyr auncient neighbours, faythfull friendes and allies.

The Picts punished for their vntruthes

The Pictes were throughly pleased and satisfied with Fergus his wordes, so that within few dayes after, theyr king (whome they had lately chosen sith the time that the Scottish men were thus returned) came vnto Fergus, and ratifyed the league with him, according to the articles of that other whiche in tyme past had beene obserued on the behalfe of the Scottishe and Pictish nations, with such solemne othes and assurance, as betwixt princes in semblable cases, of custome is requisite and necessarie.

The auncient league renued again betwixt the Scottes and Pictes.

Then were those Countreys restored to the Scottish men againe, out of the which they had beene expelled by the Romaines power.

Fergus

Fergus is cōueyed into Argyle, and there inuested king.

AND Fergus then being cōueyed with a right honorable cōpanie of lords, gentlemen, & commons into Argyle, was there placed on the Chayre of Marble, and proclaymed king wyth all such accustomed pompe and ceremonies as to him appertayned.

This was in the. xlv. yeare after the Scots had beene dryuen forth of Albanie, and after the byrth of our Sauiour 424. in the yeare after the death of Honorius the Emperour, and from the first erection of the Scottish kingdome 750. yeares complete.

All suche Castelles also and Fortresses as the Pictes helde within any of those Countreys, which belonged vnto the Scottes, were surrendred into theyr handes in peaceable wise: but the residue whiche the Romains kepte were earnestly defended for a whyle, though at legth through want of victuals & other necessaries, they lykewyse were deliuered.

If I should here say what I thinke, and that mine opinion might passe for currant coyne, I would not sticke to affyrme that either now first (or not long before their late supposed expulsion from hence) the Scottes settled themselues to inhabite here within this Ile, and that they had no certain seates in the same til then. But that comming either forth of Irelande, or frō the westerne iles wher they before inhabited, they vsed to make often inuasions into this land, greatly molesting as well the Brytaynes, the auncient inhabitants thereof, as the Romaines that then helde the Ile vnder their subiection. For I can neyther perswade my selfe, nor wishe other to beleeue, that there was any suche continuaunce in succession of kings, as their histories doe mention, and as we haue here before set downe in following the same histories, bycause wee will not willingly seeme to offer iniurie to their nation, which peraduenture are otherwise perswaded, & thinke the same succession to be most true, where other perchance may cōiecture (& not moued therto without good reason) that suche kings as in their hystories are auouched to raigne one after another here in this Ile, eyther raigned in Irelande, or in the oute Iles, and that verily not successiuely, but diuerse of them at one season, and in diuerse places. Which mistaking of the course of hystories hath bredde errours, not onely among the Scottish wryters, but euen among some of the Brytishe and Englishe writers also, as to the learned and well aduised readers it may plainly appeare. And as for Galde, and some other happely, which they take to be kings of Scottes, although they raigned in that parte of this Ile which afterwardes was possessed by Scots, and after them named Scotland, yet were they mere Brytaynes, and had little to do with Scottes, except perchaunce we may thinke that they helde the out Iles in subiection, where the Scots were then inhabiting, farre longer time perhaps (before their settling in Brytayne) than theyr hystories

But nowe to returne where wee left. After that Victorine the Romain legate was aduertiſed of all the forerememb̄red doings of the Scottiſhmen and Pictes, he cauſed an armie to be leuied with all ſpeede, and haſted forth with the ſame vnto Yorke, where beeing arriued, hee attempted by an Heralde at armes to perſwade the Pictes to forſake their confederacie lately concluded with the Scots: but perceyuing he could not bring it to paſſe, he determined to purſue both thoſe nations with open warre: and ſo therevpon ſetting forward, he paſſed forth till he came neare vnto Camelon, wher he encāped with his whole armie, hauing therein (as the report went) about fiftie thouſand perſons at the leaſt.

Athole aſsigned to the Pictes.

Fergus being aduertiſed hereof, hauing in like maner alreadie aſſembled a mightie huge hoſte, both of Scottiſhmen and Pictes, came therwith ouer the Forth, and marched forth with all ſpeed in the night ſeaſon, in purpoſe to haue ſet on hys enimies verye early in the dawning of the next morning: but Victorine hauing knowledge therof, commaunded his men to be arraunged and ſet in order of battaile by the third watch of the ſame night, ſo that being readie to receyue the Scottes vpon their firſt approch, there was fought a right ſore and cruell battaile, with ſuch ſlaughter on both partes, that the ryuer of Carron (neare vnto which their battailes ioyned) was well neare filled with dead bodies, and the water thereof ſo chaunged into a ruddie hewe, that it ſeemed as though it had runne altogither with bloud. In the ende (whileſt as yet it was doubtfull to whether ſide the victorie would encline) there came ſuch a ſodaine ſhower of raine, mixed with ſuche great abundance of hayleſtones, that neyther part was able to haue ſight of other, ſo that by reaſon of the violent rage of that huge ſtorme and tempeſt, eyther ſide was fayne to withdraw from the other.

The Brytaines by the appoint ment of Victorine make a Wall.

There were ſlaine in this battaile ſuch great numbers of men, aſwell on the one ſide as the other, that they had ſmall luſt to ioyne in battaile againe for certaine yeares after.

For the Romain Lieutenant vnderſtanding what loſſe of people he had ſuſteyned without attempting any further exployte, appoynted certaine of his companies to lie in garriſon wythin ſundrie fortreſſes in Pictlande, and wyth the reſidue hee returned into Kent. In like ſort the Scottes with their confederates the Pictes, perceyuing themſelues not able as then to make any further attempt againſt theyr enimies, brake vp theyr armye, and deuiſed onely howe they might defende that, which they had alreadie in poſſeſſion.

The Scottiſhe men and Picts interrupt the making of that Wall.

And forſomuch as the Pictiſhe Nation was encreaſed to a greater multitude of people, than thoſe Countreys which they then held, were able to finde with ſufficient ſuſtenance (conſidering what a great portion of their auncient ſeates the Brytaynes and Romaines kept from them) it was agreed by the Scottes, that they ſhoulde enioy the Countrey of Athole, with other landes bordering neare vnto the ſame, lying wythoute the compaſſe of the Mountayne of Granzebene.

The Pictes then beeing placed in Athole, encreaſed there wonderfully, and buylt many fayre Caſtels and towers in thoſe parties, to the great beautifying of that Countrey,

In which meane while, Victorine the Romaine Lieutenant commaunded the Brytayns to make haſt with the wal, wherof ye haue heard made of turfe, and ſuſteyned with certaine poſtes of tymber paſſing overthwart the borders betwixt them and their enimies, beginning as yee haue heard, at Abircorne, and ſo ſtretching forth by Glaſcow, and Kyrkpatryk, euen vnto Aldecluch, nowe Dunbryton. lxxx. myles more Northward, than the other wal, which the Emperor Adrian cauſed (as is ſayd) to be made.

Graim, otherwiſe called Graham, and his lynage.

Whereof the Scottes and Pictes being informed, they aſſembled themſelues togither, and vnder the leading of a noble man called Graym, they ſet vpon the Brytaynes, as they were buſie in working about the ſame, and ſlue not onely a great number of labourers and ſouldiours, which were ſet to labour and defende the worke, but alſo entring into the Britiſh borders, fetched from thence a great bootie of Cattaile and other riches, which they foūd diſperſed abrode in the coūtrey.

This Graym (who as I ſayde was chiefe of this enterpryſe) was brother vnto the Scottiſh Queene, the wife of king Fergus. He was borne in Denmarke (as ſome holde opinion) in the time of the Scottiſh mens baniſhment, and had a Scottiſh man to his father deſcended of a noble houſe, and a Daniſh Ladie to his mother. He himſelfe alſo maried a noble woman of that nation, and had by hir a daughter, whome Fergus by the perſwaſion of the king of Denmarke tooke to wife, and had iſſue by hir (afore his coming into Scotlande) three ſonnes, Eugenius, Dongarus, & Conſtantius, of whom hereafter in their place mention ſhall bee made, as occaſion ſerueth.

Fergus maried a daughter of Graym.

Other there be, that affyrme how this Graym was a Brytayne borne, and that through hate which he bare towardes the Romaines for their cruell gouernment, he fledde forth of his native Countrey, and continued euer after amongſt the Scottes, as firſt in Denmarke, and afterwardes in Albion, euer readie to doe what diſpleaſures hee coulde deuiſe againſt the Romaines maynes and other theyr friendes or ſubiectes. Of thys Graym thoſe Scottes which vnto this day beare that ſurname, are ſayde to bee diſcended.

But now to the purpoſe, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that after that it was knowne in forraine countreys, howe the Scottes had gotte ſote agayne within thoſe Regions in Albion, which theyr elders of auncient tyme had poſſeſſed, there came dayly dyuerſe companyes of that Nation out of Spaine, Fraunce, Germanie, and Italye, (where during the tyme of theyr baniſhment they had ſerued vnder ſundrye Captaynes) vnto Fergus to ayde hym, in recouerie of theyr Countrey and auncient ſeates, oute of the whiche they had beene moſte cruelly expulſed. So that Fergus nowe ſeeing hys power thus not a little augmented by theyr comming, entereth into the borders of Kyle, Carrik, and Cunningham, ſpoyling and harrying thoſe Countreys on euery ſide: but ſhortly therevpon commeth the armie of the Romains, with whom the Scottes encountering in battaile, receyued no leſſe domage than they minded to haue done vnto theyr aduerſaries. Wherevpon being forced to leaue that Countrey, they drewe backe into Argyle, where Fergus wyntered for that part of the yeare which yet remayned.

The Scottiſh men returne into theyr Countrey.

Fergus inuadeth the confines of the Brycaynes.

The Scots put to the worſe.

When Sommer was come, he was counſayled to haue eſtſoones offered battayle vnto Victorine, who as then was entered Galloway, rather to trie the vttermoſt poynt of Fortunes chaunce againſt him, than to ſuſtaine ſuch diſpleaſures and iniuries at the Romaines handes, as by them were dayly done vnto him and hys people, but there were other that gaue other aduice, alledging howe the daunger was great to ieopard againe in battaile with the Romaines, being mē of ſuch ſkill and practiſe in the feates of warres, conſidering what loſſe had chaunced in the two former battayles. Againe, there was great likelyhoode, that if he coulde be contented to forbeare for a tyme, and ſeeke to defende the borders of his Countrey, ſo well as he might without giuing battayle, it muſt needes come to paſſe that ſhortly the Romaine Empyre ſhoulde bee brought vnto ſuch ruynous decay, by reaſon of the multitude of enimies, whiche as then inuaded the ſame on eche ſide, that in the ende Victorine doubting his owne ſuretie, woulde conuey himſelfe wyth his men of warre out of the Countrey, and then ſhoulde it bee an eaſie matter for the Scottes and Pictes, to recouer again all ſuche Countreys, as auncienly belonged to theyr elders, and wholly to reſtore the eſtates of theyr common wealthes vnto theyr former dignities.

Victorine inuadeth Galloway.

Fergus is diſſwaded to fight with the Romanes.

The Romaine Empyre inuaded by barbarous nations.

This aduiſe was followed as the beſt and moſt likely, ſo that making ſundry rodes into the borders of their enimies Countreys ſo to keepe them ſtill occupied, Fergus and the Scottes refuſed vtterly to come to any foughten field with them. Shortly after alſo it chaunced that Victorine was accuſed vnto the Emperour Honorius of ſome ſecrete practiſe againſt his Maieſtie, as to bee about to vſurpe the crowne of Brytayne, wherevnto hee was compelled in deede, by the ſouldiers (whoſe hearttes hee had wonne thorough his bounteous liberalitie ſundrie wayes declared towardes them) and vnderſtanding at this preſent, that he was mynded to haue fled his wayes for doubt of the ſayde information made againſt him, they moued him with ſuch earneſt perſwaſions to take vppon him the Imperiall dignitie, promiſing euen to liue and die with him in defence thereof, aſwell againſt Honorius, as all other, that in the ende he conſented vnto their deſires, and ſo was proclaymed Emperor, and clothed in purpure, vſing thereto all the other Imperial ornaments, as if he had bene Emperour in deede. But afterwardes when one Heraclianus was ſent with an army by Honorius into Brytayne againſt this Victorine, the moſt part of the ſouldiers, with thoſe Brytaynes which had acknowledged him for their ſupreme gouernour, beganne to feare the ſequele of the matter, and afterward requiring pardon for their offences, they toke Victorine, and deliuered him priſoner vnto the ſame Heraclianus, with dyuerſe other of hys confederates, and ſo by this meanes was the eſtate of Brytayne recouered vnto the behoofe of Honorius, who ſhortly after ſent for Heraclianus, mynding to ſende him into Affrike againſt one Athalus, who vſurped there againſt the Romaine Empyre.

At his departure forth of Brytayne, he left one Placidus as Lieutenant and generall of the Romaine armye in thoſe parties: a man of no greate courage, and leſſe ſkill, which being perceyued of the Scottes, gaue occaſion vnto Fergus theyr king to renue the warre. And firſt hee procured Durſtus king of the Picts, being the third of that name to ioyne with him in that enterpriſe, according to the articles of the league. Who conſenting therevnto, whē their powers were once aſſembled, they entred into ꝧ marches of their enimies ouerrūning the moſt of part Kile, Carrik, & Cōningham, and after they had taken their pleaſure there they long fight, his horſemen chaunced to be put to flight, ſo that the legions of his footemen being left naked on the ſides, were ſo ſore beaten with the ſhot of arrowes, and hurling of dartes, that in the ende they were forced to breake their array, and ſo being chaſed, left to the Scottes and Pictes a great and ioyfull victorie. Placidus himſelfe eſcapeth vnto Yorke, whither the Scottes were minded to haue purſued him, had not the want of ſuch numbers as they had loſt at the battaile, ſomewhat abated their couragious intents.

In the meane time Placidus not onely mooued with this ouerthrowe, but alſo waying with himſelfe after what ſorte the Romaine Empyre was afflicted, with inuaſion of the barbarous Nations in Germanie, Fraunce, Spaine, Italie, and Affrike, thought it good to conclude ſome peace with the Scots and Pictes, for doubt of further miſhappes that might enſue. And ſo by ſuche meanes as he made ſhortly after, a league was concluded betwixte the Scottes, Pictes, and Romaines, with theſe conditions, that the Scottes and Pictes ſhoulde enioy and keepe their auncient ſeates and Regions, whiche they had nowe recouered, and hereafter not to make anye rodes or forrayes into the Prouince belonging to the Romaines, and that the ſame Romaines contenting themſelues with the Britiſhe confines, ſhoulde not moue any warre or hoſtilitie towards the Scots or Pictes.

This league being thus concluded and ratified, the Scottiſhe men and Pictes endeuoured themſelues to reduce the ſtate of their common wealth into the auncient fourme and order. Fergus made partition of landes and groundes throughout all his kingdome, and aſſigned the ſame forth vnto his ſubiectes the Scottiſhmen, and to ſuch other ſtraungers as were come into Albion to ſerue him in the warres againſt hys enimies, and were mynded now to remain there. The other that were deſirous to depart againe into their Countreys, he gaue them honourable rewards, with ſafeconduits to paſſe their wayes at their owne pleaſures.

Placidus the Lieutenant of Britaine dieth.

In this meane tyme, Honorius the Emperour being dead, and the eſtate of the Romaine Empyre daily falling into decay, it chaunced alſo that Placidus the Lieutenant of Brytaine departed out of this life, by reaſon whereof the Scottiſh men and Pictes toke occaſion to renue the warres, making as it were a clayme vnto the Countreys of Weſtmerlande, and Cumberlande, which theyr elders in tymes paſt had held and poſſeſſed.

The Scots and Pictes renue the warre.

Entering therefore into thoſe Countreys, they take, ſpoyle, and deſtroy all ſuch of the Brytiſh nation as went about to deſtroy them. But hereunto was anſwere made with great indignation, that as for the league thus alledged, ceaſſed by the death of Placidus, ſo as for peace, there was no cauſe why he ſhould looke for any, till the whole prouinces both of Weſtmerlande and Cumberland were reſtored againe vnto the hands of the Scottiſh men and Picts, according as of reaſon they ought to be. The like anſwere alſo was made by Durſtus king of the Pictes vnto whom Caſtius had ſent a like meſſage.

Wherewithall the ſayde Caſtius beyng not a little moued, aſſembleth an armie, and with all ſpeed marcheth forth towardes his enimies: but before his entring into Weſtmerland, wher they were as then lodged in campe, hee had perfect knowledge how Dionethus with his Welchmẽ (for his landes lay in Wales) was alreadie ioyned with the Scottes.

Dionethus ioyneth with the Scottes againſt the Romaines.

Whiche newes ſore appalled the hearts of the Brytaynes, but yet being encouraged with comfortable wordes of their Captaines to proceede, forwarde they goe togither with the Romaines, and within three dayes after they came within ſight of their enimies, being raunged in battaile readie to receyue them, ſo that ſtreight wayes buckling togither, there was a right fierce and cruel battaile fought betwixt them, til finally the multitude of the Scottiſhe archers & Kerues ſo compaſſed in the battailes of the Romains on eche ſide, and ſpecially on the backes, that in the ende, and by reaſon of the loſſe of their generall Caſtius (who was ſlaine there amongſt them,) thoſe of the middle ward being diſcomfited, brake theyr array, and fledde. Whereupon the reſidue likewiſe followed: the Scots, Picts, and Welchmen purſuing them ſo egerly without all order, that there was no ſmall nũber of them diſtreſſed by the Romains, the which in their giuing back, kept the cloſe togither, readie to defend thẽſelues, & to beat down ſuch of their enimies as followed more raſhly than warily in the chaſe, not once regarding to keepe any order of battaile: but yet by other companyes that purſued more orderly togyther for theyr moſt aduauntage, there was great ſlaughter made both of the Romains and Brytaynes.

The armies ioyne in battaile.

The Romains giue backe.

The Scottes follow in the chaſe to raſhly.

After

After this victorie thus atchieued, Dionethus was proclaymed King of Brytaine, and ſore warres continued in the lande by the purſute of the Welchmen, Scottes, and Pictes, to the great hazard of the Prouince, and likely expulſing of al the Romains quite out of the ſame.

About this time alſo there remayned in France, one Etius Lieutenant to the Emperour Valentinianus, who vnderſtanding all theſe things by letters and meſſengers ſent from the captains which yet remayned aliue in Brytaine, appoynted one Maximianus being a kinne to the Emperour, to paſſe with an armie in all haſte ouer into Britaine, to ayde and ſuccor the Romains and ſuche Brytaynes there, as ſtill continued in theyr allegeance whiche they had promiſed vnto the Romaine Empyre.

This Maximianus at his arriuall in the Iſlande was moſt ioyfully receyued by the ſouldiers and ſubiectes of the foreſayde Empyre. All the Lordes and nobles of the Countrey reſorted alſo vnto him, ſhewing themſelues moſt glad of his comming, and promiſing with what ayde ſo euer they were able to make, to goe with him againſt their enimies. Wherevpon procuring them to aſſemble their powers, and to ioyne the ſame with his, which he had brought ouer with him, he paſſed through the countrey vnto Yorke, and ſo from thence marched forth towards the Scottes being alreadie aſſembled in campe to defende the countrey of Weſtmerland againſt him.

There were both the kings of Scots & Picts, Fergus and Durſtus, with Dionethus naming himſelfe king of the Britaines, who had brought with him beſide the Welchmen a great number of thoſe Brytaynes that inhabited in the Countreys now accounted the marches of Wales, the which onely amongſt al other the Brytaines acknowledged him for king.

The Scottes and Pictes aſſembled gaynſt the Romaines.

When both the armies were come neare togither, they camped for that night the one in ſight of the other, and in the morning following they prepared themſelues to battail. Fergus firſt making an earneſt oration vnto his people to encourage them the more boldly to giue the onſet, declared amongſt other things how the right was on theyr ſide, which alwayes ought to miniſter hope of good ſucceſſe in them, that enterpriſe any thing in defence thereof, where contrarily all ſuch as attempted to diſquiet other by iniury & wrong doing, could not but looke for an euill concluſion of their malicious intentes and purpoſes. Neyther were other of his captaines negligent in their duties, but that both in exhorting theyr bandes, they vſed moſt comfortable wordes, and in diſpoſing them in good order of battaile, they ſhewed moſt readie and earneſt diligence.

The armies prepare to battaile.

Right miniſtreth hope of good ſucceſſe.

On the other ſide, Maximianus with hys Captaines and officers of bandes were as buſſe on their ſide to array their battailes moſt for their aduauntage, as they ſaw cauſe and occaſion, ſo that both the armies being readie to fight, the onſet was giuen, and that in moſte furious wyſe, the Romaines beeing at the firſt ſore annoyed with arrowes and dartes, which flew ſo thicke from eche ſyde, that theyr ſight was in manner taken from them, the Skie ſeeming as it had beene couered ouer with a Pentiſe. So that Maximianus perceyuing this diſaduauntage, he cauſed a freſhe Legion of his Souldiers to aduaunce forwarde to the ſuccour of their fellowes, by reaſon whereof, the battayle was forthwyth moſt cruelly renued, the hyndermoſt wings of the Romaines ſore preaſſing vpon their enimies: ſo that in the ende paſſing quite through theyr battayles, they cauſed a great diſorder and feare amongeſt thoſe Scottes and other theyr confederates, whiche were placed in the hyndermoſt rankes, but yet calling themſelues in a ring, they made great and ſtout reſiſtance for a ſpace, and at length a great number euen of the moſt valiant perſonages of the whole hoſt cloſed themſelues togither, and with a maine force aſſayed to haue broken through the thickeſt preaſſe of theyr enimies, but being enuironed about on eche part, they were there ſlaine eche mothers ſonne. Whileſt the Romaines drew togither to reſiſt on that ſide, other of the Scottiſhe men, Pictes, Brytaynes and Welchmen, founde a way to gette forth through their enimies on the other ſyde, and ſo being gotten paſt them, made away as faſt as their feete might beare them: But a great number being notwithſtanding ouertaken, were ſlain and beaten downe right pitifully.

The two kings Ferguſe and Durſtus are ſlaine.

Ferguſe the Scottiſhe king, and Durſtus king of the Pictes were ſlaine in this mortall battaile togither, with the moſt part of all theyr nobilitie. Dionethus being ſore wounded eſcaped to the ſea ſide, and there getting a ſhippe, paſſed ouer into Wales.

Dionethus eſcapeth.

This ouerthrow ſore diſmayed both the Scottiſh and Pictiſhe nations, who loked for nothing more than preſent expulſion out of their Countreys, for Maximianus purſuing the victorie, burſt into Galloway, moſt cruelly waſting and ſpoyling the ſame. And whē he had made an end there, he entred into Annandal, and into the Pictiſh confines, deſtroying all before him with fire and ſworde. Camelon was beſieged, taken by force, and miſerably put to ſack and ſpoyle, with diuerſe other notable townes and places, as well belonging to the Pictes as Scottes. Neyther was there any ende of theſe cruel doings, till both the Scottes and Pictes for their refuge were generally conſtrayned to withdraw themſelues beyonde the wall of Abircorne, which (as before is ſaid) a few yeares paſſed was begon by the Brytayns, and ſtretched from Abircorne aforeſaid, ouerthwart the lād vnto Alcluth now Dūbreton.

Maximianus purſueth the victorie.

Camelon taken by force.

The Scots and Pictes withdraw beyonde the wall of Abircorne.

Maximianus hauing thus driuen his enimies beyond this wall, cauſed them to make aſſurance by theyr othe of couenant neuer to paſſe the ſame againe by way of hoſtilitie, eyther againſt the Brytaynes, or Romaines.

There were that counſelled Maximianus either vtterly to haue deſtroyed both the Scottes and Pictes, either elſe to haue dryuen them out of the whole Ile. But he being ſatisfied with that whiche was alreadie done, thought good to returne vnto Yorke, and there to winter, that in the beginning of the next ſpring hee might go into Wales to chaſtiſe Dionethus and other of that Countrey for theyr rebellion, in ayding the enimies of the Empyre.

But when the time came that he ſhould haue ſet forward on that iourney, he heard ſuch newes from the parties of beyonde the Seas, into what ruinous decay the Empyre was fallen, without any likelyhoode of recouerie, that chaunging his purpoſe, he determined to vſurpe the crowne of Brytayne as abſolute king thereof himſelfe, and to haue the more fauour of the Brytiſhe Nation without any impeachment in the beginning of his raigne, he tok to wife one of the daughters of Dionethus, being the elder of thoſe two, which he only had without iſſue male, by the ſlaughter of king Ferguſe.

Maximianus taketh vpon him the abſolute gouernāce of Brytayne, with the Imperial tytle.

He marieth Othilia, the daughter of Dionethus.

She that was thus coupled in mariage with Maximianus hight Othilia, & the other daughter named Vrſula, was profeſſed a Nunne in an houſe of religion, to the intent that ỹ whole right which Dionethus pretended to the realme, might remaine to the wife of Maximianus. Then was Dionethus made ſecōd perſon of the realm, aſwel in degree of honor, as in publike gouernment.

Dionethus puted for ſecond perſon the realme.

Eugenius.

And whyleſt theſe thinges were thus a doing in Brytayne, the Scottiſh lords had created Eugenius the ſon of Ferguſe, king of theyr realme, as due to him by rightful ſucceſſion from his father, who had gouerned the ſame by the ſpace of .xij. yeares ere he was ſlaine (as before is ſpecified) in the laſt mentioned battaile.

Eugenius created king of Scotes.

This Eugenius began his raigne as we find in the yeare of our Lorde. 440. after the firſt beginning of the Scottiſh kingdome. 767. His fathers corps which at the firſt was ſecretely buried as occaſion ſuffered, whiles the Romaines were yet in the Countrey, hee cauſed to be taken vp, and conueyed ouer into the Ile of Iona, otherwiſe called Colmekil, where with al ſolemne pomp and ceremonies it was intumulate, according to the ordinance which he himſelfe had deuiſed in his life time, within the Abbey there.

In like maner Maximianus to the intent to eſtabliſh himſelfe the more quietly in the eſtate of Brytayne, and to deliuer his ſubiects the Brytaynes, which bordered vpon the Scottiſh dominions, from all trouble of warres, was contented to make peace with the Scottes vpon lyght ſute made vnto him for the ſame.

Maximus graunteth peace to Scotiſhe.

After this alſo, he being once fully eſtabliſhed in the eſtate of Britaine, coueted alſo to attaine to the tipe in gouernment of the whole Empyre, & therfore aſſembling al the forces of the Brytiſh youth, ſayled into Gallia, cauſing himſelfe to be proclaimed emperor, & ſo vſurped ỹ title as in the

Engliſh

Engliſh and Italian hyſtorie, you maye finde more largely expreſſed. He left behinde him in Brytayne his father in lawe Dionethus as chief gouernor there, with one legion of Romain ſouldiours.

After this did Etius the Emperors Lieutenãt in France, ſend for ſuch Romains as Maximianus had left in Brytaine, who reuolting frõ their othes of allegiãce giuẽ vnto the ſame Maximianus, obeyed Etius as one that ſupplyed the rowmth of their rightfull Lorde and maiſter the Emperour Valentinian. So that in this wiſe was Brytaine diſpurueyed of all maner of able men meete for defence, whereof the Scottes and Pictes tooke good occaſion to inuade the Brytiſh borders, not ſparing to purſue with fire & ſworde all ſuch of the Brytaines as did yet continue in obeyſance to Maximianus.

The Scots and Pictes inuade the Brytaynes.

They firſt droue thoſe Brytaines out of all the Countreys, which had bene taken from them by the ſame Maximianus, & by other of the Romains and Britains, as Pictland, Kyle, Carrik, and Cunningham, Galloway, the Marches and Northumberland. This done, they entered into Cũberland, Weſtmerland, & Kendal, not ceaſing til they had ſpoyled & defaced all thoſe countreys with the moſt part of all Yorkſhire, in ſuch cruell wiſe that they made al thoſe quarters barren both of corne & cattaile which way ſoeuer they paſſed.

The Brytains perceyuing into what daunger they were brought, if ſome good redreſſe were not found in time, ſent ouer with all ſpeed vnto Rome for ſuccor to be had at the Emperor Valentinians handes, for Maximianus was otherwiſe occupied. Valentinian deſirous to deliuer the Brytaynes from ſuche cruell enimies as the Scottes and Pictes ſhewed themſelues to be, leaſt through their meanes al the whole Ile ſhould reuolt from the obedience of the Romains, appointed one Gallio born in Rauenna, and as then ſoiourning about Paris in Fraunce, with a legion of ſouldiers, to paſſe ouer into Brytain, to driue back the Scots and Picts from further moleſting the ſubiects of the Empyre.

The Scots and Pictes vpon knowledge had of this Gallios arriual, drew back into their coũtryes, not minding to fight with the Romains, whoſe force they doubted and not without cauſe, hauing had in times paſt ſo many notable ouerthrowes & ſlaughters at their handes. But Gallio purſued thẽ euen vnto the water of Forth, where in ſundrie ſkirmiſhes he ſlue no ſmall number of them, and for that he knewe he ſhould be ſent for ſhortly to returne againe into France, to helpe to reſiſt ſuche barbarous nations as warred in the ſame, for the better defence of the Brytaynes againſt their enimies the Scots and Picts (whom he knew would not be any while in quiet after he was once gone,) he cauſed the wall to bee newly made by betwixt Abircorne and the mouth of Clude water, thereby to defend the Romain prouince from all ſoden inuaſions of the enimies.

Gallio purſueth the Scottes and Pictes.

Gallio cauſeth the wall of Abircorne to be repayred.

This wall was earſt made of turfe, but now repayred with ſtone, and ſtregthened with great poſtes or pyles of wood, driuen in betwixt in places moſt needfull. It was alſo. viij. foote in breadth, and. xij. foot in height, and in certain turrets, caſt forth vpon this wall, Gallio appoynted watche and warde to be kept, that vpon the enimies approche towardes the ſame, warning might be giuen by fire in the night, and by ſmoke in the daye, vnto ſuche of the Brytaynes as dwelled neare vppon thoſe borders (commaundement being giuen vppon paine of death for being found in the contrary) that euery man vpon ſuch knowledge had, ſhoulde reſort immediatly to the place appointed, with ſuche armour and weapon, as for him was requiſite.

The maner of the buylding of that wall.

The ordinance of Gallio for watch to be kept on the wall.

When Gallio had thus giuen order for the suretie of the Brytaynes, and deliuered them at that present from the cruell handes of theyr enimies, he returned into Fraunce with the armie that he brought with him, according to the commaundement which he had from Etius the Emperours Lieutenant there.

Gallio returneth into Fraunce.

His departure out of Brytaine was no sooner knowne of the Scottish men and Pictes, but that with all their maine force they determine to set vpon the Brytains againe. So that assembling their powers togither, the kings of both those nations exhort their men to doe valiantly: Eugenius the king of the Scottish men encorageth them throughe hope of high rewardes and spoyle: the Pictish king likewise for his part promiseth the Lieutenantship of Camelon (an office of most honour amongest them) vnto him that first should passe the wall of Abircorne.

The Scots and Pictes determin to inuade the Brytaynes againe.

Whervpon the Brytains being aduertised of their enimies intentions, according to the ordinance before appointed, drewe in defensible wise vnto that part of the wall, where they vnderstood the Scottes and Pictes were minded to assault. At length when the Scottish and Pictish kings were come to the wall, and had theyr people readie to giue the approch, they themselues stode apart somewhat out of daunger of shot: and suche bandes as were appointed to assayle, aduaunced forth of the maine battailes vnder the leading of that Graym, the which as ye haue heard, was chiefe in repulsing the Brytaynes when they had first made the same wall by commaundement of Victorine the Romaine Lieutenant. Neyther shewed he lesse proofe of his valiancie at this time than hee had done before. For though the Brytaynes made earnest resistaunce, so farre as their power woulde extende, yet at the lengthy by syne force the Wall was vndermined and throwne downe in sundrie places, so that the whole numbers of the Scottes and Pictes entered by the same into Pictlande, beating downe the Brytaynes on eche syde that went about to make resistaunce, for none escaped theyr handes, but such as saued themselues by flight.

The Brytaines resort to the Wall of Abircorne to defende it.

The Scots and Pictes approch the wall to assault it.

Graym assaulteth the wall.

The wall is ouerthrowne.

There came also an other power of Scottes and Pictes by water out of Fyfe, and landing in Pictland, pursued the Brytayns with more crueltie than the kings did themselues. Both houses and people passed by fire and sworde, insomuche that all such of the Brytaynes as coulde get away, withdrewe forth of the Countrey, not staying tyll they came beyonde the Ryuer of Tyne: by reason whereof, all that Countrey which lyeth betwyxt Tweede and Tyne was deliuered by appointment of the Kings vnto the Souldiers, to spoyle and vse at theyr pleasure, whereyppon followed many notorious ensamples of crueltie, enuie, couetousnesse, wrath, and malice.

The Brytaines leaue Pictland and get themselues ouer the riuer of Tine.

In the meane tyme, whilest the Scottishe and Pictishe menne of warre applyed theyr Market, the Brytaines with all diligence repayred and newly fortified the other wall begon (as is sayd) by the Emperour Adrian shooting ouerthwart the countrey, from the riuer of Tine, vnto the riuer of Eske.

The Wall of Adrian is repayred by the Brytaynes.

Howbeit the Scottes and Picts, bicause winter approched, made no further attempt agaynst the Brytaines at that time, but diuiding those Countreys which lie by north from the foresayd wall of Adrian, among themselues, according to the order in that behalfe appointed by theyr kings, they fortified certaine Castels and holdes for defence of the same Countreys, as it were to countergarison suche Brytaynes as continually kept watch and warde vpon the foresaide wall. The Brytaynes therefore mistrusting least so soone as the spring were come, the Scots would inuade their Countreys, which lay on the south part of the same wal, breaking in by force throgh it, as they had done the yeare before throughe the other wall of Abircorne, they sent Ambassadors vnto Etius the Romain Lieutenant gouerning Gallia, nowe called Fraunce vnder the Emperour Valentinian, requyring to haue some ayde and succour at his handes, whereby to resist suche fierce and cruel enimies, as sought to destroy and expulse out of their landes and houses, all such of the Brytaynes as acknowledged themselues in any maner of wise subiectes vnto the Empyre. But Etius, whether bicause he would not, or rather bycause he conueniently coulde not (for that he was otherwise occupied in defence of Gallia agaynste the Frenche men) made a direct answere, that hee had no men of warre in store to sende ouer into Brytaine, and therefore willed thē to do what they could for their own defence, for ayde of him they might none haue.

The Brytaines require helpe and ayde at the handes of Etius.

Etius refuseth to ayde the Brytaines.

The messengers returned home with this answere, and made report therof in a publike assemble of all the Brytish nobilitie, being as then gathered togither at London to consult there for the estate and order of their countrey. Where after long deliberation (notwithstāding that they perceyued they shoulde haue no more ayde from the Romaines) it was yet determined, that to resist the enimies, the whole puissance of the Brytishe nation shoulde be mustred, as well men as women being able to do any feate or seruice available in defence of their Countrey, and rather to trie the vttermost poynt of Fortunes chaunce, than to suffer themselues to be ouerrunne without resistance.

The Brytaines forsaken of Romaines determine to make resistaunce.

But Conanus Camber, a prince of great authoritie amongest them, as one that was discen-

ded of the bloud of Octauius ſometime king of Brytain, went about with earneſt perſwaſions to remoue the reſidue of the nobilitie from this determination, aduiſing them to ſeeke for peace at the Scottiſh mens handes, rather than to trie the doubtfull chaunce of Mars his iudgement, conſidering the feebleneſſe of their whole force now, euer ſithence that the tyrant Maximianus had in manner emptied and diſpeopled the land of all ſuche able men as were apt for ſeruice in the warres.

But this aduiſe of Conanus was very euill taken, and moued the multitude that heard him, to be greatly offended with his wordes, not ſparing to ſay that hee ſpake like no true man nor louer of his countrey: ſo that the former ordinance, (that is to ſay, to ſeeke an end of the wars by dint of ſworde) was allowed for the beſt.

And hereupon there were muſters taken, armure and weapon prouided, and bothe place and day appointed, where they ſhould aſſemble togither to marche forth toward the enimie. Conanus ſore lamenting their doings, called almightie God to record, that that which he had ſayd, was ſpoken onely for the loue and zeale whiche he bare to his countrey, and ſithence his aduiſe might not be followed, he doubted greatly leaſt the ruine of the Brytiſh eſtate by ſome fatall appointment drew faſt vpon them.

The people hearing him ſpeake ſuch wordes, ſome wilfull wicked perſons fell vpon him, and ſlew him there preſently amongſt them: wherwith other being ſore moued to indignation, ſet vpon the murtherers there to haue reuenged his death immediatly. Whereupon began taking of partes, & togither they went by the eares in ſuch furious wiſe, that ſundry amongſt them being ſlayne, the magiſtrates had much a do to appeare the fray.

In this meane time, whileſt the Brytons were thus buſied in ſending of their Ambaſſadours to the Romayns, and conſulting togither for defence of their countrey, the Scottes firſte razed downe the wall of Abircorne, not leauing one piece therof whole, ſo that a fewe tokens excepted, nothing remayneth to be ſeene at this day of all that huge and wonderfull worke, it is called now in theſe dayes, Gramſdike, becauſe that Grayme was not onely (as ye haue heard) chiefe in repulſing the Brytains from the ſame, but alſo at this time in the raſing of it to the ground, he was the greateſt doer.

Which being accompliſhed, the Scottiſh and Pictiſh kings aſſembled their powers, and ouerthrew al ſuch fortreſſes as had not bene deſtroyed the yeare before, ſtanding on the North ſide of Adrians wall, the whiche wall the Brytons had newly fortified, but yet were not able to defend the ſame from the power of the enimie, who now ſet vpon the Brytons with a mayne force, in ſo much that vndermining the fundations of that walle in diuers places: at length ſundry partes therof were reuerſed into the ditch, ſo that the ſouldiers breaking in by the ſame, cruelly beate downe the Brytons which ſtode at defence. Adrians walle vndermined & ouerthrowen.

The entrie being thus wonne, both the kings with their powers marched forth into the ſouth countreys, commaundement being giuen, that no man vpon payne of death ſhould kil any woman or childe, aged perſon or otherwiſe impotent and not able to beare armure. But this commaundement in ſome places was but ſlenderly obeyed. Suche deſire of reuenge was planted in the Scottiſhemens hartes by reaſon of the remembraunce of old iniuries, that vnneath made they any difference eyther of age or ſexe. To be ſhort, all thoſe countreys whiche lie betwixt the riuers of Tyne and Humber, were waſted and ſpoyled, the whole number of the inhabitãts (ſuch as could make ſhift to eſcape the enimies hands) got them ouer the foreſaid riuer of Humber, there to remayne as further out of daunger. Crueltie of Scottes.

The report of which miſchiefe being brought to London to the Lordes there (who as ye haue heard were not all of one accorde togither) they toke new aduiſe, to redreſſe the preſent miſchief in this mãner. Firſt they thought it beſt to ſende forth .ij. ambaſſades, one to the Scots & Pictes to require a peace: And an other with letters vnto Etius the Romaine lieutenant in Fraunce, for freſhe ayde and ſuccour. The tenour of which letters as then ſent vnto Etius here enſueth. The Lordes of Brytaine take new aduiſe.

See more hereof in England.

The lamentable complaints of the Brytons vnto Etius thrice Conſull. At what time our elders became ſubiectes vnto the Romains, they vnderſtood by worthie proues and notable enſamples, that the Senate was a moſte ſafe refuge and hauen, to be wiſhed of all ſuch as fledde to the ſame for ſuppoſt. But we their poſteritie by the pernicious working of the legate Maximianus, tending wholy to our diſtruction, being ſpoyled both of force and ſubſtance, and therfore remayning in greate daunger of loſing bothe kingdome and liues, through the ſore and terrible iuuaſion of our moſt cruel enimies the Scots and Pictes, making humble ſuyte for ſuccours vnto the Romaine Empyre, according to the loyall truſt & moſt aſſured confidence, the which euer like true and faithfull ſubiectes we haue repoſed in the ſame, are yet neglected, and nothing regarded, but deliuered as a pray vnto the Barbarous nations to be ſpoyled, deſtroyed & ſlaine in moſt piteous wiſe, which can not but be an euident ſigne, that eyther the Romains haue chaunged their moſt commendable maners into The tenour of the letters ſent vnto Etius frõ the Brytons, as is written by Hect. Boetius.

the worſt that may be deuiſed, either els theyr moſt large Empyre, through the wrath & highe diſpleaſure of almightie God, is now giuen for a pray vnto other forraine nations. But if it be ſo, that the fatall force of the time preſent, doth require that without all remedie, the lande of the Brytons being take away from the Romains, muſt needes be brought vnder ſubiection of ſome barbarous nation. Wee neither abhorre nor refuſe the gouernment of any people or nation, the Scots & Pictes (the moſt cruell of all other) onely excepted, whoſe crueltie wee hauing long ſithence to muche taſted, are at this preſent brought vnto that point, by theyr late increaſed puyſſance, that we know not now after the loſſe of our goodes and cattell, which way to ſafegard our liues; for the Turfe walles being pulled downe, & the ditches filled vp with earth, whiche afore time did ſomewhat ſtay them, now breaking in vpon vs without letting paſſe any one kinde of crueltie, they haue diſtroyed our fieldes, burned vp our houſes, townes and villages, and beaten downe and raſed to the grounde our caſtels & towers, with ſuch other places of defence, not ſparing to put to the ſworde as well the poore innocent children, women, and impotent age, as ſuch other innumerable numbers of men, whiche they haue ſlayne ſtanding at defence with weapon in hande. And as for vs, whiche are the reſidue of our decayed nation, they haue driuen vs vnto the ſea ſide, and from thence (becauſe wee can not paſſe ouer) wee are put backe vpon our enimies againe. And hereof proceede two kindes of our deſtruction, for eyther are wee drowned in the raging flouddes, eyther els ſlayne moſte vnmercyfully by our cruell enimies. Therefore if the honour of the Romaine people, if our aſſured loyaltie & loue, whiche we beare to the Empyre of Rome, nowe continued for the ſpace of theſe. 500. yeares or there aboute, may moue you to rewe on our miſeries, wee humbly pray & beſeeche you, not to ſuffer vs longer to be trodde vnder foote of theſe our moſt beaſtly & cruell enimies, but ſende vnto vs ſome conuenable ſuccors & that with all ſpeede, leaſt we ſeeme to be more cruelly betrayed of the Romains, than brought to diſtruction by theſe barbarous people, & that wee be not ſet forth as a notable enſample for al other to be ware, how they put confidence hereafter either in the rule or friendſhip of the Romains.

But not ſo largely as here is expreſſed.

Paulus Diaconus, Beede, Erſkray of Dunmouth, Uerermound, and other, make mention of theſe forſayde letters. Whereunto Etius aunſwearing, declared that thoſe calamities, infortunes & loſſes ſuſtayned by the Brytains were right diſpleaſant vnto him, & ſo muche the more for that through the ſundry inuaſions made, aswell into Fraunce as alſo into Italy it ſelfe, and into other parties of the Romaine Empyre by people of ſundry nations, he could not as then ſpare any men of warre to ſend ouer vnto them, and therfore he willed the Brytons to make the beſt ſhifte they could, to defend themſelues for a time, till things were better quieted in other parties, & then ſhould they ſee ſuche redreſſe of their iniuries prouided, as they ſhould thinke themſelues to be very well reuenged.

The anſweare of Etius.

About the ſame time that the ambaſſadours returned with this anſwere vnto London from Etius, the other alſo came backe forth of the north without hope to ſpeede of that about the which they had bene ſent: for the Scots & Pictes would enclyne to no reaſonable conditions of peace, onleſſe the Brytains would wholly ſubmit themſelues as ſubiectes vnto them.

The Scottes & Pictes would agree vpon no reſonable conditions of peace.

The Brytons hereat, toke ſuch indignatiõ, that by a generall conſent they agreed to trie it out with the enimies by mayne force: and hereupon made theyr proniſion with all diligence.

The Scottes and Pictes hearing of the Brytons intents, gathered their people togither with more ſpeede than was thought poſſible for them to haue done, and forthwith ruſhed into the borders of theyr enimies countreys in right prayſaunt wiſe and moſt warrlike order.

The Scottiſh Pictes preſſe againſt the Brytons.

In the forewarde went ſuche as came forth of Galloway and Lunandale with thoſe Pictes whiche inhabited about the coaſtes of Barwike. Then followed there a mightie battell of thoſe whiche came forth of Argyle, Athole, and other Pictes inhabiting neare vnto the parties of Kalendar and Camelone with them of Fyfe, and Angus. In the middes of this battell bothe the kings kept theyr place with their choyſeſt ſouldiers, and ſtandards borne afore them. Then came the cariage and truſſe of the armie, nexte whereunto a great number of noble men of both the nations followed in fayre order of battell, with theyr ſeruaunts and men of warre the beſt they coulde chooſe forth. And laſt of all (as the maner of thoſe nations hath bene euen from the beginning) there came a great multitude of the commons cloſing vp the backe of the whole aforeſayd armie.

The order of the Scots and Pictes comming into the lande of the Brytons.

The Brytons alſo comming forth into the field with theyr whole puiſſaunce to encounter theyr enimies, when they vnderſtood by eſpials the order and mayne force of the Scottes and Pictes, they were halfe diſcouraged in theyr mindes, and thought good therefore once againe to aſſay if any peace might be purchaſed. But ſending forth theyr Ambaſſadours vnto the confederate kings to that end, theyr anſweare was, that except the Brytons would yeeld themſelues, their wiues and children with all theyr goodes and ſubſtaunce into the handes of their enimies, ſimple ſimply without all conditions, there would bee no peace graunted.

When this was knowen abrode in the hoſte of the Brytains, what through kindeled yre on the one parte, and diſpayre on the other, prouoking theyr mindes to diſpleaſure, they generally vpon chaunge of purpoſe required battell, euen al the whole number of them. Whereof enſued a moſt cruell and mortall fight: For the Brytains (as it were) reſolued to die in defence of theyr countrey, and to reuenge theyr owne deaths vpō the enimies, with more fiercenelle thā is credible to be thought, gaue ẏ onſet, & ouerthrew a great number of their enunies, in ſomuch that thoſe of Galloway and the Pictes fighting in the forewarde with them of Argyle, Athole & ſuch other as were in the battell with the kings, were in great daunger to bee put to the worſe: whiche Grayme perceyuing (by whom the moſt part of the army was ruled, and that by cōmaundement of both the Kings) called forth a number of the Iland men, who were appoynted to attend the cariage, and ſent them with all diligence vnto the forewarde to the ſuccors of thē of Galloway, being then at the point to haue ſought refuge by flight. But by the comming of theſe Iland men to their ſuccors, they toke courage afreſh, ſo that the battell was againe moſte fiercely renewed, & ſo cōtinued a ſpace with great ſlaughter on both partes, till finally the Brytons being oppreſſed with the multitude of theyr enimies, & not able longer to endure, fell to running away, thinking to ſaue themſelues in certaine bogges, moſſes, & mariſſe grounds neare vnto the place of the battell: but ſuche coyſterels, and other as remayned with the Scottiſh cariage, ſeing the diſcomfiture of theyr aduerſaries, ranne forth and purſued them into thoſe mariſhes, killyng and taking no ſmall number of them.

There were ſlaine in this battell of the Brytons, aboue. xb. thouſand, and of the Scots and Pictes neare hande foure thouſande.

The Brytains hauing receyued this ouerthrowe, ſaw no helpe which way to recouer their loſſes, but onely to ſue for peace at the victorers handes. They ſent therefore an oratour vnto the Scottiſhe and Pictiſhe kings, beſeechyng them humbly to graunt them a peace euen with what condicions it ſhoulde pleaſe them to preſcribe. The kings not moued onely with the preſent fortune of the Brytains, but alſo partely with theyr owne, hauing loſt no ſmall number of right worthie perſonages in the battell, were contented to graunt a peace vpon theſe conditions: That the Brytains ſhoulde in no wiſe receyue any lieutenant or armie hereafter from Rome, nor ſuffer any enimie of the Scottiſh and Pictiſh eſtates of what nation ſo euer hee were to paſſe through theyr countrey. They ſhould enter into no league with any citie or nation, nor be about to make any warres without conſent of the Scottiſh and Pictiſh kings, and further ſhoulde bee ready to ſerue them againſt all maner of enimies when ſo euer they ſhoulde be ſent for. Moreouer they ſhoulde remoue with theyr wiues, children, and whole families out of all thoſe countreys, lying betwixte Tyne and Humber, reſigning the poſſeſſion of the ſame vnto the Scottiſhmen and Pictes. Alſo they ſhoulde gyue threeſcore thouſande peeces of gold then currant to the Scottiſhe and Pictiſhe kings towardes the diſpatche of theyr ſouldiers wages, and farther ſhoulde yeelde as a trybute twentie thouſande peeces of golde, to be payde yearely vnto the ſeuerall vſes of the victorers. They ſhoulde likewiſe deliuer one hundred hoſtages of ſuche as the two kings ſhoulde appoynt, betwixte the age of eightene and thirtie yeares.

Peace graſted by the Scottes with the conditions of the ſame.

20000. pound, ſayth the ſame Balantine, ſo that he eſteemeth thoſe peeces of gold to be of the valew of Frēch crownes.

These conditions of peace though they ſeemed very ſtreight and grieuous to the Brytiſhe nobilitie, yet for that they vnderſtode not how to make a better bargayne, they perſwaded the multitude to accept them, and ſo a league thereupon vpon was concluded amongſt thoſe people, and the publike ſtate of the lande brought to a more quiet rule than it had bene before. Thus were the Brytains made tributarie to the Scottiſhmen and Pictes, about. 500. yeares after Julius Cæſar had brought them in ſubiection to the Romains, being in the yere after the birth of our Sauiour. 446. and of Eugenius his raygne ouer the Scottiſh men the. vij.

The hereſie of the Pelagians.

In this ſeaſon was this Iſle of Albion ſore infected with ỹ hereſie of ỹ Pelagians, & therfore Pope Celeſtine ſent one Paladius a lerned man vnto the Scottes, to preſerue thẽ frõ that infection, and ordeyned him Biſhop the firſt in Scotland that had his inueſture from Rome, for all the other before him, were ordeyned by the voyces or ſuffrages of the people, chooſing them forth amongſt the Monkes and Prieſts called Culdeis, as the Scottiſhe Chronicles do report.

Paladius ſente into Scotland.

Of this Paladius, looke more in Ireland.

Paladius with right good & wholeſome exhortations purged the Scottes and Pictes of ſundrie ſuperſtitious rites of theyr olde Gentilliſh idolatrie, till thoſe dayes vſed amongſt them, wherupõ he is named and reputed for the Scottiſhmens apoſtle. Hee lieth at Fordune, a towne in Mernes, where his relikes remained, and were long after had in great eſtimation.

Paladius accompted the apoſtle of Scotlande.

Seruan biſhop of Orkeney, & Teruan archebiſhop of pictland.

Moreouer he inſtituted one Seruan Biſhoppe of the Orkeneys, ỹ hee might inſtruct the inhabitãts there in the fayth of Chriſte, which as yet they had not receyued, and one Teruan, whõ he himſelf had baptyſed, hee made Archbiſhop of Picte lande.

In theſe dayes alſo many ſtraunge ſightes were ſeene in ſundrie partes of Brytaine before the laſt mentioned ouerthrow: the Moone being in playne oppoſition to the Sunne when it ſhould be moſt round appeared in a quadrant figure.

Vnkyth fights and ſtraunge wounders appeared.

At Yorke it rayned bloud: and trees in ſundrie places being blaſted, wythered and died. The market place or rather if ye will ſo terme it Cheapeſide in London opened, ſo that a great hole apeared & many houſes were ſwallowed vp.

About the ſame ſeaſon alſo (as is ſuppoſed) liued that huge perſonage Fyn makcool, a Scottiſh man borne, of. viij. cubites in heyght. He was a great hunter, and ſore feared of all men by reaſon of his mightie ſtature, and large limmes: many fables goe abroade of him, not ſo agreeable to the likelihoode of a truth, as ought to be regiſtred in an hiſtorie, and therefore here paſſed ouer with ſilence.

Fynmak the greater.

The Romaine Empyre being brought into irrecouerable ruyne by the Vandalles, Gothes, Hunnes, Frenchmen, and other barbarous nations, occupying ſundry partes and poſcions thereof, put the Brytains out of all hope to haue any aſſiſtance from the Emperours, which cauſed them to remayne in quiet certaine yeares without attempting any exployte againſt the Scots or Picts, and ſo duely payde theyr couenãted tribute, though ſore againſt theyr willes, if they might otherwiſe haue remedied it.

At the laſt aboute. x. yeares after the concluſion of this laſt peace, it chaunced that one Conanus the ſonne of the aboue mencioned Conanus deſcended of the bloud of the Octauij ſometime kings of the Brytains, ſore maligned to ſee his countrey thus brought into thraldome of the Scottiſh nation, and deuiſing how to find ſome redreſſe, called togither the moſte parte of the Brytiſh nobilitie, by ſecrete meſſages home to a manour place whiche hee had within a thicke woode in the countrey of Kent, and there opening vnto them a great peece of his minde, perſwaded them with the weightieſt reaſons hee could imagine, to leuie warre againſt the Scots and Pictes, hauing at that preſent, meane to maintaine it aſwell by reaſon of theyr increaſe now ſithence the laſt warres, bothe of able men, as alſo of ſubſtaunce to furniſh them with.

Here the nobles were of ſundrie opinions: for ſome aweried with the note of bondage, would gladly haue had warres: other hauing regarde to theyr ſonnes lying in hoſtage with the enimies, would in no wiſe conſent thereto: by reaſon whereof this counſell brake vp without concluſion of any effect.

When eche man was returned to his home, there had bene ſome amongſt them, that gaue knowledge to the confederate kings what mocion had bene made, and what was intended againſt them. Wherevpon they immediatly determined not onely to cauſe the hoſtages to be executed, but alſo to purſue the rebelles with fierce and cruell warres. Yet before they practiſed any violence, they ſent theyr ambaſſadours vnto the Brytains, to vnderſtande theyr full meaning, and to declare vnto them further certaine articles whiche the ſayde kings required to haue performed without all delayes, or els to looke for open warre out of hande.

The chiefeſt pointes of which articles were theſe. Firſt that the Brytons ſhould not aſſemble togither in councell without licence of the Scottiſh and Pictiſh kings, notwithſtanding that their auncient lawes they might vſe at their pleaſure, but they ſhould receiue no ſtraunger into their countrey being a Romaine or a Frenchman, neither merchaunt nor other. Their olde hoſtages they ſhould receyue home againe, and deliuer in exchaunge of them twice ſo many in number of the like age and degree, as was couenaunted by the former league.

The commons of the lande, vnderſtanding what was demaunded by theſe ambaſſadours, were in a wonderful rage, and would haue made a great ſturre if they had not bene quieted by the Lordes, who for theyr paines taken herein, got them an euill report amongſt the inferiour ſorte of people, as though through theyr wante of ſtomake only, the common wealth was brought into ſuche a miſerable eſtate, that looke what pleaſed the enimie to charge the Brytiſh nation with, no man durſt once ſpeake againſt it.

This grudge of the commons encreaſed ſo farre forth againſt their ſuperiours, that after the Scottiſh and Pictiſh ambaſſadours were returned home, with anſweare agreeable to theyr demaundes, there aroſe incontinently a great commotion of the people, conſpiring togither to the vtter deſtruction of the whole nobilitie. But their furie was repreſſed, ſo that they were ouerthrowen in battell at two ſeuerall times with great ſlaughter and bloudſhed, whereupon they withdrew into the mountaynes, and there kepte themſelues, making reyſes vpon the nobilitie, and fetching booties away from the heardes & flockes of cattell belonging to the Lordes and Gentlemen: but finally through famine which beganne to oppreſſe bothe partes, they perceyued what neede the one had of the others helpe, and ſo they agreed. This ciuill warre ſore decayed the force of the Brytons, for beſide the greate ſlaughter that was made betwixt them, by the auoyding of the commons out of their houſes, the ground lay vntilled, whereof enſued a marueylous great ſcarcetie & dearth of all things, by reaſon wherof an innumerable ſorte of people died. Yet ſhortly after followed ſuch plentie, that thoſe that were left aliue forgetting the paſſed miſeries, gaue themſelues to all kinde of vice, whiche toke ſuch rote in the harts of the more parte of them, that for any man to vſe any maner of vertue amongſt them, was a readie meane to procure great enuie and hatred.

One eſtate of men can not liue without helpe of another.

Superfluous wealth occaſio of vice.

In the meane time liued the Scottiſh and Pictiſh kings in good quiet and reſte, applying their ſtudies onely howe to inſtruct theyr people now after the warres were once ended, in laudable exerciſes and neceſſarie occupations, conuenient for the time of peace, wherby their realmes might floriſh in wealth and proſperitie without dreade of any forraine power. For they ſaw ſuch tokens of ruyne in the Brytiſh eſtate, as ſmall likelyhod appeared, that the ſame ſhould at any time be able to recouer againe the former force and dignitie.

The Scots apply theſelues to peace.

Finally the Scottiſh king Eugenius hauing aduaunced the eſtate of his countrey vnto more felicitie & wealth than any of his predeceſſours had euer done before him, after hee had raigned xxx. yeares, he ended his life about the .iiij. yeare of Leo, that vſurped the Empyre of Conſtantinople.

Dongard.

But for ſomuch as Eugenius left no iſſue behind him, his brother named Dongarde ſucceeded in the eſtate. Hee began his reigne in the yeare. 470. and his chiefeſt ſtudie was, according to his brothers enſample, to prouide for the maintenance of good orders and iuſtice, appointing in euery quarter men of good fame and report to haue the adminiſtration vnder him, with with cõmaundement that they ſhould diligently ſeeke, that euery man might enioy his owne.

The repairing of caſtels by king Dũgard.

He himſelfe toke vpon him alſo to ſee to the repayring of ſuch caſtels as were decayed, and to the building vp of newe in places where hee thought moſte expedient, ſpecially neare to the Britiſh borders, for he well cõſidered that peace encreaſſed riches, riches pride and preſumption with other ſinnes, whiche could not long endure without the plague of warres. Therfore he douting the chaunges of ſcornefull fortune, thought good in time of peace to prouide for the daungers of warres, whẽ the ſame ſhould happẽ vnto him.

These ciuill policies and princely prouiſions for defence of his cõtrey & ſubiects, increaſed the fame of Dõgard mightily, but that which he did towards the aduauncement of religion did moſt exceedingly ſet forth his commendation.

First, all ſuche religious men as followed the trade of life taught by Paladius and other, whiche came with him from Rome, hee cauſed them to be highly reuerenced: and for the maintenaunce of their liuing, he aſſigned forth lands, houſes, and other kindes of reuenewes in diuers places of his realme, and graunted not only vnto them, but alſo vnto all other being within any orders of Clergie, ſundry priuiledges, appointing that the Churches and Abbeys with other holy places ſhould be enfraunchiſed and taken for Sanctuaries, that all ſuche as fled to the ſame for ſafegard of their liues, ſhould be ſuffred to reſt in peace, ſo long as they kept them within the ſame.

The bouteous liberalitie of Dongard towards churche men.

Sanctuaries.

Aboute the ſame time alſo and whileſt theſe things were thus a doing in Scotlãd, the Britains being awaried of their ſeruile eſtate, thorow the ſetting on of Conanus conſpired togither, & toke aduiſe by what meanes they might beſt ſeeke to deliuer themſelues frõ the thraldome of Scots & Pictes, and vpon aduice taken they concluded to ſend ouer into Britaine Armorike ſome honorable Ambaſſade vnto Indrocnus the king of that countrey for ayde. Herewith was the Archbiſhop of London, appointed as chiefe Ambaſſadour to go on that meſſage, whiche Archbiſhop vſed ſuche diligence in the mater, that Cõſtantine the ſonne of the ſaid Indrocnus was appointed by his father with a competent power of men to go ouer into great Britaine to the ayde of the Britiſh inhabitants there. Herevpon when the men and ſhippes with all neceſſarie prouiſion were once readie, he embarqued at Saint Malo, where the aſſemble was made, and taking the ſea, ſayled forth with proſperous winde and weather, whiche brought him ſafely into greate Britaine, where hee landed at Totnes in Deuonſhire, as you ſhall finde in the chronicles of England. He was receyued with no ſmall ioye, and forthwith proclaymed king of Britaine, whereupon he promiſed to aſſay to the vttermoſte of his power to recouer agayne their whole landes and liberties, and to maintaine them in the ſame according to their wiſhed deſires.

Conſtantine proclaymed king of Britaine.

For the more ſpeedy accompliſhment hereof, commaundement was firſt giuen, that all able men ſhould be in a readineſſe, and come togither at a place appointed neare to the riuer of Humber within fortie dayes after. Whiche order being taken by the aduice of the Lordes and Nobles of the realme, the ſame was put in execution with ſuche diligence, that fewe or none being apt to beare armure withdrew themſelues, euery man in maner comming to the appointed place of the aſſemble, and offering to go againſt the enimies, ſo that it was a wonder to conſider the cõſent of the people now ioyned in one minde and will to recouer theyr former libertie.

When Conſtantine beheld ſuche notable numbers of men, hee ſuppoſed the ſame would haue ſuffiſed not onely to vanquiſh the Scottes and Pictes, but alſo vtterly to deſtroy and race them out of all the confines of Albion.

When the newes of all this preparation for warres whiche the Britains made, was once ſignified to the Scottes and Pictes, they likewiſe made theyr appreſtes to meete with them in the field, and thereupon rayſing theyr powers, came forth with the ſame into Yorkeſhyre, and pitched theyr tentes within .iij. myles where Conſtantine with his people was lodged, and the next day after, vnderſtanding how neare vnto the enimie they were, they reyſed and marched forwardes till they came within ſight of him, as then encamped with his people alofte vpon certaine hilles, neare to the aforeſayde riuer ſide.

Here bothe the kings of Scottes and Pictes lodging with theyr armies for that night, made readie for battell againſt the nexte day, and in the morning Dongard the Scottiſhe king getting him to a little hill, called his men togither, and there exhorted them by ſundrie comfortable meanes of perſwaſion to put away all feare, and to fight valiantly, aſſuring them of victorie if they would keepe the order of battell by him appointed, and not raſhly breake forth of the ſame in following vpon the enimies when they fell to retyring backe.

Don hort peof man

He had vnneath made an end of his wordes, but that diuers of the ſtanding watche came in, and declared how the Britains began to auale the hilles where they had lodged, and that the Pictes were got forth already in order of battell, and were marching forwards to encounter them. Dongard ſhewing himſelfe to bee right ioyfull of theſe newes, commaunded incontinently uently, that the ſtanderds ſhould aduance forth, and euery man to attende the ſame according to his appoynted order. Alſo that no man ſhoulde preſume to take any pryſoner before the ende of the battell, nor to yeelde himſelfe ſo long as lyfe lasted. So that ioyning with his enimies there followed a right fierce & cruell battaile. At length both the wings of the Brytains gaue backe frō the Scottiſh men and Pictes, the middle warde abiding the brunte very ſtoutly. Where Conſtantine himſelfe ſtode like a valiant chieftaine doyng hys endeuour to the vttermoſte of his power, vpon whom Dongard earneſtly preaſſing and entring into the thickeſt throng of his enimies, was there beaten downe amongſt the Armorike Brytains, and being aboute to get vp againe by helpe of his weapon, was againe felled to the earth, and ſlayne with many a ſore wounde.

Diuers of the Scottes diſcomfited with this great miſhap, fell to running away: other kindled with more wrath layde aboute them more egerly. The Picts alſo, for their part fought moſt conſtantly, ſo that the battell continuyng till none dayes with doubtful ſucceſſe, at lengthe the Brytains were conſtreyned ſomething to giue backe, and after taking themſelues to fearefull flight, declared that the victorie remayned with theyr enimies.

There died in this mortall battell neare to the point of .xxj. thouſande of the Brytains, and of the Scottes and Pictes aboue .xiiij. thouſand with Dongard the Scottiſh king.

Conſtantine the daye nexte after the battaile, withdrew ſouthwardes. The Scots carryed away with them the corps of their dead king, and conueying it into the Ile of Iona, nowe called Colmkill, there buried it in kingly wiſe. Dongarde was thus ſlayne, in the fyfth yeare of hys reigne after the byrth of our Sauior .475. yeares and about the ſeconde yeare of Zeno the Emperour.

After him ſucceeded in gouernment of the Scottiſhe kingdome Conſtantine the brother of the aboue rehearſed Eugenius, a Prince vnlike in noble vertues vnto his brother the ſayd Eugenius. For though in him there appeared ſome good tokens of commendable towardelyneſſe, as hee ſeemed outwardly to ſhew, yet was he giuen more vnto wanton pleaſure and luſt, than to the regard of the good rule & gouernment of his ſubiectes, a deflourer of byrgins, a raiſher of honeſt Matrones, and aboue all, a fauourer of backbiters and ſlaunderers. Neuer ſhewing any ioyfull countenaunce amongſt his nobles, but amongſt ſcoffing ieſtours and other vile perſons, he was as pleaſant and merie as the iocundeſt man aliue.

Conſtantine the Scottiſhe king nothing like in noble conditiōs vnto Conſtantine king of the Brytains.

Thus though hee repreſented the Brytiſhe king Conſtantine in name, yet in manners hee farre differed from him: for the Brytiſh Conſtantine ſtudying to aduaunce the common wealth of his ſubiects, trayned them in laudable exerciſes, and reduced them from theyr former euill vſages vnto ciuill order and good cuſtomes. Contrarywiſe, the Scottiſhe Conſtantine did nothing worthie prayſe at all after he was once inſtituted king, but followed ſtill his owne inordinate luſt and ſenſuall appetite.

Peace graunted vnto the Brytains, and diuers caſtels deliuered into their handes.

Hee graunted peace vnto the Brytains they vnneth requyring the ſame, releaſing not onely the tribute, but alſo deliuering vp into theyr handes by ſecrete meanes diuers caſtels ſtanding vpon the riuer of Humber.

Many other things hee was aboute to haue done to the great preiudice and hinderaunce of the Scottiſhe eſtate, had not the Nobles of the realme the ſoner withſtode his raſhe and vnaduiſed attempts. Suche malice alſo was ingendred in the hartes of the moſte parte of the Nobilitie towardes him, that had it not bene through the wholeſome admonition and perſwaſion of Dongall of Galloway, a noble man of righte reuerende authoritie amongſt them, they had leuied ciuill warres againſt him, but the foreſayde Dongall declaring to them the daunger and greate inconuenience that might thereof enſue, reſtrayned their wrathfull mindes from enterpriſing any thing againſt him by force, ſo that for certayne yeares they ſuffered and bare with this his miſordered gouernment.

The good counſel of Dongal.

In the meane whyle the Pictes noting the wante of all vertuous qualities thus in the king of Scottes, and againe what tokens of valiaunt courage appeared in the king of the Brytains, doubted leaſt if hee ſhoulde ſeeke to reuenge olde iniuries againſt them, they ſhoulde be little able to matche him without ayde of the Scottes, (whereof they had ſmall truſte nowe, by reaſon of the inſufficiencie of the Scottiſhe king) they deuiſed a meane howe to ridde the Brytiſhe kyng out of the way, and ſo appoynting certain ſlie felowes to go into Britain for ỹ accōpliſhment of their deuiſed purpoſe, at length the ſame was brought to paſſe, as in the engliſh

The death of this Conſtantine king of Bry- tons, happened in the .xb. yeare of Conſtantine king of Scottes, neyther liued he long after, for hauing rauiſhed a noble mans daughter, borne in the weſterne Iſles, he was ſlayne by hyr fa- ther in the night ſeaſon, after hee had reigned in great infamie for his reprochfull life, the ſpace of xbij. yeares.

Don- gall.

Dongall the ſonne of Don- gard is made king of Scot- land.

He was Dongall his nephew, as ſon to his brother Don- gard, proclaymed king, a prince of diſpoſition indifferēt either to peace or warre, though in the beginning of his reigne, he ſhewed himſelf more deſirous of peace than of warres, by reaſon the ſtate of the common wealth ſo required, conſide- ring how things ſtoode not all in the beſt order, through his predeceſſours negligence.

The poletike rule of Don- gall.

Dongall therefore deſirous of a reformation, appointed men of great wiſedome & good fame to be iudges and officers vnder him, who in re- dreſſing miſorders, in puniſhing tranſgreſſions, and in deciding of al ſtrifes and contentions be- twixt partie and partie, did ſo well their ende- uour, that peace and concorde therevpon enſu- ing, the people recouered peaceable reſt and qui- etneſſe, to theyr no ſmall comfort and conten- tation.

In this meane while that things paſſed thus among the Scottes, by the procurement of one Vortigerne, Conſtantius the eldeſt ſonne of the late deceaſed Cōſtantine king of Brytons, was taken out of an Abbey, where he was ſhorne a Monke, and aduaunced to the kingdome: but be- ing not meete of himſelf to gouerne, Vortigerne had the whole rule committed to his handes, wherevpon he firſt cauſed the league to be re- newed betwixte the Brytons, the Scottes and Picts, and appointed a garde of the ſame Scots and Pictes to be attendant on the kings perſon: in the end alſo he procured ſome of them to mur- ther the king, and after put all the ſayd Scottes and Pictes to death, as well the giltie as the vn- giltie, and finally made himſelfe king, as in the hiſtorie of England you ſhall finde more at large

The Scottes and Picts (for diſplea- ſure that theyr countrey men whiche had bene appointed to garde the perſon of Conſtantius king of the Brytons, were maliciouſly circum- uented, and the more parte of them wrongfully executed) made ſundry roades and forrayes into the Brytiſh borders, neyther ſparing fire nor ſworde where they came. So that the ſayde Vortigerne by a grieuous reporte informed hereof, cauſed an army with all ſpeede to be le- uied, and appointed Guytellus the prince of Wales to haue the leading thereof againſt the enimies. Whileſt he (doubting leaſt the people woulde not bee ruled by him, for that it was knowen how he would haue made away Con- ſtantines children kept him about London, and durſt not committe himſelf ſo much to the ſight of a multitude, as to go forth in that iourney in his owne perſon.

Guytellus, in reſpect of the loue which he bare to his countrey, purpoſing to ſerue truely in de- fence thereof, chaunced vpon his approche to the borders to take the number of. b.C. of the ene- mies, being aduaunced from the reſidue to fetche a bootie. Guytell nerall c Britiſh cauſeth hundre the ſonh behang

The confederate kings, being in a great chafe herewith, gather togither theyr people, and haſte forwarde with all ſpeede towarde the enimies, who at the firſt ſhewed manifeſt tokēs that they were ſore afrayed of the Scottiſh and Pictiſhe power: wherevpon Guitellus their generall with comfortable wordes willed them to be of good courage, and not to doubte of victory, ha- uing ſo iuſt a cauſe to fight with truce breakers, and ſuche as were giuen more vnto pillage and ſpoyle, than to any other commendable exerciſe or practiſe of warre. With whiche and ſundry other the like wordes the Brytains being enbol- dened, as might well appeare by their chaunge of countenances, Guytellus therevpon remoued his campe more neare vnto his enimies, ſo that at the firſt and for certaine dayes togither, there chaunced onely diuers ſkirmiſhes betwixt the parties, as occaſion ſerued. But at length, the one being ſore moued againſt the other, they ioyne in a pight field. The beginning of whiche battell was right fierce and doubtfull, for on that ſide where Dongall the Scottiſhe king fought, the Brytains ſhortly began to preuaile, through the layne fighting of his people: which daunger Galanus the Pictiſhe king quickly perceyuing, forthwith prouided remedie, for taking with him certaine certaine bandes out of his owne battell, willing the reſidue to ſtande to it manfully, and in no wiſe to giue grounde to the enimie, he himſelfe with the ſayde bandes fetched a compaſſe about, and ſet vpon the backes of them that ſo had ouermatched the Scottes.

This ſodein chaunce ſore diſordered the Brytains, and immediatly the Scottes encouraged a freſh, aſſayled theyr enimies with more egre mindes than they had done at the firſte, ſo that mayntenantly bothe the winges of the Brytiſhe armie were vtterly diſcomfited. And herewith a certaine number of the Pictes were commaunded by their king to make haſte to winne the campe of the Brytains, that ſuche as ſought to eſcape by flight, ſhoulde finde no refuge in the ſame.

Thus the Brytains being chaſed & ſlayne on euery ſide, they knew not whither to flee: ſo that in the end a great number of them throwyng away their weapons, yeelded themſelues, moſte humbly crauing mercie at their enimies hands.

There were ſlayne in this battell aboue. xx. thouſande of the Brytains togither with theyr generall Guitellus, and a great number of other of the nobilitie. There died alſo of the Scottes and Pictes neare hande foure thouſand. The priſoners with the ſpoyle of the fielde was deuided by appointment of the kings amongſt the ſouldiers. Whiche done, they marched forth into the countrey to conquere caſtels and townes, ſuche as ſtood in their way.

In the meane time the Brytains being ſore diſcofoyted with the ouerthrow, aſſembly a coũcell at London, there to deuiſe by what meanes they might beſt defend their countrey frõ the imminent daunger in the which it now ſtood.

Uortigerne as one giltie in conſcience, doubted leaſt through wante of good willes in his commons, he ſhould not be able to withſtande the mightie inuaſion of his enimies, wherevpon he was minded to haue auoyded the realme, but there were of his councell that aduiſed him to the contrarie, holding that better it was for him to trie the vttermoſt pointe of fortunes happe, than with diſhonour ſo to yeelde at the firſt blow of hys frowarde hande, conſidering the abundance of treaſure whiche he had in ſtore, wherewith hee might wage ſouldiers and menne of warre out of Germanie and other places, in number ſufficient to matche with his enimies.

This counſell as the beſte, was followed, and meſſengers with commiſſion and ſufficient inſtructions ſente with all ſpeede into Germanie, to retayne a number of Saxons, and to bring them ouer into Brytaine, to ſerue againſt the Scottes and Pictes in wages with Uortigerne.

At the ſame time there were amongſt thoſe Saxons, two bretherne diſcended by rightfull lignage of the Princes of that nation, who being reputed for valiant Captaines, appointed with the Brytiſhe commiſſaries for a certaine ſumme of money to take vp theyr preſcribed number of men, and to receyue charge of them as Colonels, aſwell for theyr conuoy ouer into Brytaine, as alſo for their ſeruice there, after theyr arriuall. The one of theſe two bretherne hight Hengiſt or Engiſt, and the other Horſus. Who hauing their appointed numbers once filled, conteyning aboute ten thouſand ſouldiers in the whole, they beſtowed them aboorde in. xxx. hulkes, boyes, and playtes, and in the ſame tranſported them ouer into Brytaine, in the. 449. yeare after Chriſte, as our hiſtories do affirme. Where they were receyued with greate ioye and gladneſſe of Uortigerne, who truſted by theyr ayde to ouercome his fierce and dreadfull enimies.

Hengiſt and Horſus, retayned in ſeruice with Uortigerne.

Therefore when they had refreſſhed themſelues ſomewhat after theyr trauayle by ſea, they were ſent forth with an other army which Uortigerne had aſſembled of his owne ſubiectes the Brytains, to the frounters of the enemies countrey, where at theyr firſte comming they paſſed ouer the riuer of Humber, before the Scottes or Pictes had knowledge, that any ſuch people were come in ſuppoyt of the Brytõs to bidde them battell. They beyng therfore amazed with the ſtrangeneſſe of the thing, ſome of them fledde into the inner partes of theyr countrey, and other that made but ſory ſhifte, fell into the handes of the Saxons, who to beginne theyr enterpriſe with bloude, ſlewe all ſuche as they coulde lay handes vpon, without any reſpect of perſon.

The Saxons togither with a power of Brytains, are ſent to the borders of the enimies countreys.

The Saxons in hope of good ſucceſſe, begin the warres againſt the Scottes with bloud.

Great was the ſlaughter by them committed in all thoſe parties where they paſſed, namely aboute the riuer of Tyne. And when they had made an ende there, they entred into Northumberlande, and ſo into the Dales aboue Barwike, next adioyning vnto Pightland, diſtroying all before them with fire and ſworde.

The Pictiſhe king in the meane time had ſent vnto Congall the king of Scottes to come with all ſpeede to ſuppoyte him againſt the dreadfull inuaſion of the enimies, whoſe force being nowe increaſed with a power of Saxons, would worke muche miſchiefe if the ſame were not the more ſpeedily in the beginning repreſſed: but hearing that the Saxons and Brytains dayly approched, he thought not good to tarie for the comming of the Scottes, but haſted forth with his owne power to encounter his aduerſaries, & raſhly giuing battel, he was ouercome, and thereby loſt no ſmall number of his people.

The king of Picts, ſendeth for ayde vnto the Scottiſh king.

The king of the Picts vanquiſhed.

The Saxons wonne prayse, and the Brytõs noted of cowardize.

In this conflict the Saxons wanne them a greate name for theyr highe valiauncie, where contrarily the Brytaines gotte them no small note of guiltie cowardize, fighting so fayntly, that theyr Captaines had muche a dw to cause them to keepe theyr grounde, being ready still to haue runne away, whiche their fayntnesse of stomacke being noted of Hengist, euen then put him in no small confidence that it shoulde bee an easie mater for him to conquere them at his pleasure, when tyme and occasion might serue thereto.

The Pictishe nation hauing receyued this grieuous ouerthrow at the handes of theyr cruell enimies, sent agayne an other Imbassade vnto the Scottish king Congall, to signifie to him by way of lamentation, what losse had happened to them by that moste cruell people the Saxons voyde of all religion and mercie, and what mischiefe by the same people was intended, aswell against Scottes as Pictes, to the great daunger of the vtter ruine of bothe the nations, if the enimies in time were not resisted. They ꝑ were sent declared all this mater vnto king Cõgall, ꝛ as they had in cõmission, besought him of speedie succors. Congall not only moued for the harmes and losses of the Pictes his frendes and alies, but also muche more for the lykelyhode of the imminent daunger and perill towardes him selfe and his owne people, determined speedily to goe with all his power, and to ioyne with the Picts, as fully resolued to preuent that mischiefe which was lyke to follow, if the violent rage of the enimies were not the sooner resisted.

The Picts eftsoones solicite the Scottes for ayde.

Congall promised to ayde the Pictes.

Hee sente worde therefore to the Pictishe king, that if hee might keepe off the enimies by lighte skyrmishes and incursions for a small tyme, hee woulde come to his ayde shortly, with all the whole puyssance of his realme.

Prouisiõ made by Scottes, to ayde the Picts.

And herewith hee commaunded by open proclamation, that all those within his dominions whiche were able to beare armure, shoulde by the twentith day after, assemble togither at the South side of Calidone wode, all and euery of them bryngyng then and there with them vitayles sufficient to serue them for two moneths. Accordyng to the whiche proclamation, there came togither at the day and place assigned, aboute the number of. xl. M. able men, fitte and meete for the warres.

On the morrowe after, when Congall had taken the musters and vewe of his whole numbers, hee sette forwarde towardes the place where hee vnderstoode that the king of the Pictes as then lodged, who had lykewise assembled his people, and in campe taried for the comming of this Scottishe armie.

The fifth day after, bothe the kings met togither, and shewed greate tokens of entire loue and frendshippe the one towardes the other. After this they go to heare diuine seruice, where they make theyr deuoute prayers vnto almightie God for theyr good speede and luckie successe in that iourney: which beyng done, they marche forth towardes the enimies, as then lying in campe not paste tenne myles from them.

The Scott and pictis kings, assi ble togith with the powers.

Here at the firste sight of the enimies, diuers of the Scottes and Pictes beyng stryken with feare to beholde so greate a multitude, as the lyke had not bene seene in those parties many a day before, they stale away and secretely hidde themselues in the nexte woodes: but the kings to giue ensample to other, caused them that were thus stolne away to be sought out, and brought agayne into the campe, where they were hanged in the open sight of all the armie.

The Saxons and Brytains also vppon the approche of theyr enimies gathered their companies togyther, and mayntenantly herewith the Saxons encouraged with suche comfortable speache as Hengist vttered amongst them, required to haue battayle without delay: whose ensample the Brytains following, shewed themselues also right willing thereunto.

After this, the batayles on bothe sides comming forewarde to ioyne, the arrowes and dartes flewe freshly betwixte them, but neyther parte minding to giue place for all the shotte: at length they ioyned at hande blowes, firste the Brytains in the right wing, with the Scottes in the left wing: but the Brytaines not able long to endure agaynst the force of the Scottes, gaue backe and fledde. In the meane while came a great shower of rayne, mixte with suche a tempest of hayle, that the hardiest there wished himselfe thence, the storme beating so fast vpon them, that one might vnneath see an other, so that the Scottish menne and Pictes wiste not whether were better to pursue the Brytains that fledde, or to keepe their places.

On the other parte the Saxons accordyng to theyr maner in time of any present daunger, closed themselues togither and drewe neare vnto theyr chiefetayns standerd. Finally the tempest no sooner beganne to ceasse, but the Scottes and Pictes leauyng their order of battayle, fell to followe the chase of the Brytaines, supposing the victorie had bin wholly theirs. playnely perceyuing, by commaundement of theyr generall Hengiſt, aſſayled the Scottes and Pictes here and there diſperſed aboute the ſpoyle and ſlaughter of the Brytains, and made ſuche murder of them on euery ſide where they found them, that pytie it was to beholde. Thoſe that eſcaped by flight, neuer ſtayed till they were gotten into places farre ynough out of daunger.

This was a blacke day with the Scots and Pictes. Neyther was it very ioyfull to the Brytains, of whom no ſmal number died in the place by the enimies ſworde.

Hengiſt hauing thus gotten the victorie, withdrew to Yorke, leauing thoſe countreys betwixt Tyne and Twede in the enimies handes, of purpoſe reſalling from further endomaging them, that the Brytains might haue neighbours whome to feare: For that as he thought ſhould make much for his purpoſe, alreadie hauing determined to make a conqueſt of this Iſle.

When Sommer then was well neare paſſed, he placed his ſouldiers in herbrough to lodge for the winter ſeaſon, and went himſelf to London, where he counſelled Uortigerne to ſende of his owne people to the borders of his enimies, to keepe the ſame from theyr inuaſions till the next ſpryng, againſt whiche time hee promiſed to cauſe ſuche notable numbers of his countreymen to come to his ayde, as ſhoulde ſuffice not onely to banquiſhe the Scottiſh men and Picts, but alſo vtterly to deſtroy bothe the nations, or at leaſt wiſe to driue them forth of the whole countrey.

This offer vnto ſome of the nobilitie was not greatly lyked, as euer ſuſpecting that whiche followed, leaſt in tyme to come Hengiſt ſhould ſeeke the dominion of the realme in placing his owne people, and expulſing the former inhabitants. But Uortigerne did not onely giue him moſte hartie thankes for thoſe his offers, but alſo ſhewed by the maner of the intertaynement whiche hee bſed towardes him, that he thought he coulde not do vnto him too muche honour for ſuche notable ſeruice, as he had done already, and truſted hee ſhoulde do hereafter.

According to Hengiſtes aduiſe alſo, there was a crewe of men of warre of Brytains ſent vnto the borders to the number of fiue thouſande, who ſhortely after theyr comming thither were quickly diſpatched and made away in ſundry ſkyrmiſhes and encounters with the Scottes and Pictes, that aſſayled thoſe places whiche they were appointed to defend.

Shortly after was ſente thyther alſo an other companie, double in number to the firſte, to reuenge the deathes of theyr fellowes: but they finding fortune as frowarde vnto them as the former had done before, ſpedde muchewhat a like, for in ſundry conflictes diuers of them being ſlayne, and diuers other by treaſon of the borderers themſelues deliuered captyue into the aduerſaries handes, the reſidue that were left, perceyuing in what daunger they ſtoode, ſithence they might not truſte their owne countreymen, returned backe into the inner partes of the lande, and ſo left the borders altogither vnfurniſhed.

In this meane while a newe ſupplie of fiue thouſande Saxons, with theyr wiues and children, came ouer into this lande, in eyghtene hoyes, and amongſt other came Hengiſts wyfe and his doughter the Ladie Roxena. Shortly after alſo king Uortigerne gaue vnto Hengiſt and his Saxons a greate parte of the countrey called Lyndſey, with a caſtell of greate ſtrength called Twhancaſtre. Some haue written that Hengiſt requyred of Uortigerne ſo muche grounde, as hee might compaſſe with an Oxe hide, and hauing that graunted, he toke a mightie Oxe hyde, and cut it into ſmall thonges, and ſo cõpaſſing about a right ſtrong plot of ground with thoſe thonges line wiſe, beganne there the fundation of a Caſtell, whiche toke name of thoſe thonges, wherewith the plotte thereof was firſte meaſured, and ſo was it called Twhang caſtell.

A new power of Saxons cometh ouer into Brytaine.

Twhang caſtel, or Thong caſtel.

But vpon what conſideration ſo euer it toke that name, certaine it is by record of al the Scottiſhe hiſtories, that there the Saxons firſt inhabited after their entring into Brytaine.

The Saxons firſt inhabited in Lyndſey.

When Hengiſt had ſette things in order for the placing of his people there in dwellings, (appoynted them by Uortigerne) according as ſeemed beſte vnto his poletike head and craftie forecaſt, hee toke forth the ſouldiers and menne of warre, ordered vnder certayne Captaynes and officers of bands, and led them forward by ſlow iourneys as it were ſtaying for the comming of the Brytains.

Uortigerne had gathered as then an huge hoſte of his ſubiectes, and appointed his generall Lieutenant ouer them his ſonne Uortymere, a yong man of greate force and valiauncie, but ſo that he ſhould be ordered in all things by the aduice and diſcretion of Hengiſt, whoſe auctoritie for the warres he commaunded to bee chiefly followed.

Vortymer generall of the Brytons.

When bothe the armies of Saxons and Brytaines were mette togither, Hengiſt ledde them ouer the riuers of Humber & Tyne, marching directly towardes the place, where hee thought the enimies lay. The Scottiſhe and Pictiſh kings, hauing knowledge of ſuch preparation made by the Brytons, they gathered their powers togither, to the number of. lx. M. men, furniſhed with prouiſion of vitayles for a long time. But before theyr comming to the riuer of Tyne, vpon knowledge had that the Saxons and Brytains were paſſed the ſame, they made ſtreight towardes them, in purpoſe to haue giuen batayle without longer protracting of time: howbeit comming to the place where they were lodged, they founde them ſo ſtrongly encamped, that no aduauntage coulde be perceyued whiche way they might be conſtrayned to rayſe & come forth of theyr ſtrength to receyue battayle vpon ſome euen grounde, whiche Hengiſt of purpoſe for a time ſeemed to deferre.

Hengiſt prolongeth time to giue battel.

Betwixt the alſo and the armies of the two kings there was a valley, in the botome full of myres and mariſhe grounde, whiche the Scottiſh men and Pictes muſte needes paſſe, ere they coulde finde meanes to do any notable diſpleaſure to the enimies. Wherefore at length they determined with turfe and fagottes to make paſſage ouer thoſe myres. Which being accompliſhed in the night following, the nexte morning they paſſed ouer and got them vnto certaine hilles lying right ouer againſt the Saxon and Brytiſhe campes, ſome of them taking their lodgings vpon the browe or fronte of an hill ſo neare to the lodgings of theyr enimies, that they might throwe a darte into theyr campe: and hereof they toke no ſmall occaſion to worke a feate againſt their aduerſaries, to their great annoyance and vexation.

There was growing in that place where they were thus encamped, very muche of that kinde of Heath or lynge, whiche the Scottiſhmen call hadder. Of whiche Heathe, or hadder, they gathered a great quantitie togither, and binding it in bundels lyke vnto faggots, in the night ſeaſon they ſet the ſame on fire, tumbling it downe the hill, on that ſide where the Saxons lay. The wind in that inſtant being ſomewhat aloft, cauſed theſe bundels of lynge to blaſe and brenne vehemently, and hereto ſtanding that wayes forth, droue the flambe ſo ſtreynably amongſt the tentes and cabanes of the Saxons, that the fire catching in the ſtrawe and twigges whiche they had couched togither vnder them in ſteede of beddes, encreaſed the feare amongſt the ſouldiers wonderfully, by reaſon that the blaſing bundels of the lynge or hadder, ſtill comming downe the hill vpon them, ſeemed as though the ſame had fallen from aboue, and euen forth of the heauen it ſelfe.

A policie of the Scottes.

The tumult & feare rayſed in the campe of the Saxons.

Great was the tumulte and noyſe through out the whole cãpe, with ſuch roring of beaſts, and running vp and downe bothe of them and of the horſes whiche were there in the campe, that if heauen and earth had gone togither there coulde not haue bene a more terrible noyſe nor clamour. At length when the Souldiers had done what they coulde to quenche the fire, and to appeaſe the trouble, not without ſome vprore and diſorder rayſed on eache ſide, they got them with their armour and weapons forth into the next fielde, whiche Hengiſt himſelfe perceyuing (hauing firſt done what he coulde to ſtay them) enuironed with a companie of his choyſeſt men of warre, he got him vp vnto a little hill next adioyning, and there gaue knowledge by the ſound of a trũpet that all his people ſhould drawe thither vnto him. After this, when they were come togither, he diſpoſed them in order of battel with all diligence, abiding for the ſpring of the day, to vnderſtand more certainely the meaning of his enimies.

Heng leth plet

The Scottes and Pictes ſuppoſing the enimies to be farre diſordred by reaſon of the fire diſcended downe from the hilles, fully determined to aſſayle them in their campes: but vpon their approche to the ſame, perceyuing howe the Saxons were gotten forth, and ſtoode ready in good order of bataple, minding to defende theyr grounde, bothe the kings thought it beſte to tarie the morning ere they made any exployte, for doubt of perils that might befall thereof.

Cong horta the S

In the breake of the day Congall came amongſt his people, exhorting them to remember theyr worthie elders, and by their example to chooſe rather to die in defence of theyr countrey and auncient liberties, than by cowardize to ſaue a diſhoneſted lyfe, whiche (if theyr chaunce was to be vanquiſhed) they ſhould paſſe in great thraldome and miſerie. The Pictiſhe king alſo, with lyke wordes encouraged his menne to do valiantly. Neyther was Hengiſt ſlowe in perſwading his Saxons to play the men, that obtayning the victorie they might deliuer themſelues from terrour of all enimies from thenceforth in Brytaine.

Heng teth t to fg fully.

Whileſt he was thus exhorting his people, the Scottes and Pictes with greate force and violence beganne to giue the charge vpon him, whiche whyleſt the Saxons and Brytains went about to defende, they were beaten downe by heapes ſo fiercely on eache ſide, that the diſcomfiture had light vppon them forthwith, had not Hengiſt by ſounde of trumpet called forth aboute three thouſand freſhe menne to their ſuccours, whiche hee had placed in an ambuſhe a little before the ſpring of the day within a thicke groue of wood, faſte by his campe, appoynting them to remayne there in a readineſſe, to come at his call vpon what daunger ſo euer happened. Theſe moſte fiercely ſetting vpon the backes of the Scottes, brought them ſtreyght out of all order, for they beyng occupied with the other Saxons before, & now aſſayled of theſe behinde, they they had vnneath rouneth to any aduantage to turne theyr weapons. In the meane time the Picts being matched with the Brytains, did put them to flight, & chaſed them out of the field, not ceaſſing to purſue thē in the chaſe, till they came to a riuer in the whiche a great number of them were drowned, as they ieoperded to paſſe ouer the ſame, & to ſaue thēſelues by ſwimming. On the other ſide the Scottes being ſore handled by the Saxons, both before and behind, were at the length conſtreined to giue ground & breake forth by flight, ſo to eſcape the cruell handes of the enimies. Many were ſlayne in the chaſe and ſome taken priſoners. The reſidue getting away, fledde ſtreyght to the Pictes, but Congall himſelfe through helpe of his houſeholde ſeruaunts eſcaped to the toppe of an highe hill, and ſaued himſelfe all wounded as he was.

The Picts returning from the chaſe, and vnderſtanding howe the Saxons had giuen the Scottes the ouerthrow, and that they were now marching forewarde to encounter alſo with thē, determined not to abide theyr comming at that time. And ſo night approching ere the Saxons had got ſight of them, order was giuen by commaundement of theyr king, that all their cariage and a greate quantitie of logges and faggottes, ſhould be placed and pyled togither before them, and in the darke of the night to be ſet on fire, whiche beyng executed according to the appointment, when the fire was once kindeled, the Pictes with the Scottes whiche were gotte vnto them, departed as ſecretely as they might, & ſtayed not to make away, till they were farre enough out of the daunger of the Saxons.

Hengiſt thus hauing got the victory, and perceyuing no enimie abrode to bid him battayle, muſtered his men, and found that he had loſt in this iourney as good as .iiij. M. of one and other. After this, he withdraweth to Yorke, and leauing his army there, went himſelf vnto Londō, where he was receyued with ioy inough by king Vortigerne. And ſhortly after, vpon knowledge that Aurelius Ambroſe and Uther the ſonnes of king Conſtantine prepared to come ouer with a mightie army of Armorike Brytons and other French men, to clayme the crowne of Brytaine as lawfully diſcended to them frō theyr father, the Saxons were ſent for out of the north partes, & had dwellings appointed vnto them in Kent, to be at hand if neede were to reſiſt any ſuch attēpted inuaſion. But ſhortly after, for a policie Hengiſt cauſed it to be bruited abrode, that the Scots & Pictes meant eftſoones to inuade the Brittiſh confines, & therfore was there an other power of Saxōs called into the land, & placed in the north parts, to defend the ſame againſt the Scots and Picts. Decca the ſonne of Hengiſt had ỹ leading of theſe Saxons, who brought them ouer (being x. M. mē of warre, in .l. playtes & .l. hoyes. They brought with them alſo theyr wiues & children, & ſetled thēſelues in the north partes betwixt the riuer of Humber, & the borders of the Pictiſh dominiōs. And euen thē it began to take the name of Northumberland, which is as you would ſay the land by north the riuer of Hūber, & ſo it doth continue. Shortly after, Uortigerne forſaking his lawfull wife, married the ladie Roxena or Rowen, Hengiſts doughter, to the high offence of God, & great diſpleaſure of his ſubiects. And in the meane time Decca not attempting any exployt againſt the Scots & Pictes, rather ſought to get into his handes all the fortreſſes betwixt Tyne & Humber, euen from the eaſt ſea to the weſt: whiche his purpoſed intent he greatly aduaunced, winning caſtels and fortreſſes there in thoſe parties, ſome by force, & ſome by ſurrēder: & amongſt other places of importance, he firſt got poſſeſſion of Yorke, and fayning accuſations againſt many of the nobles & gentlemē, ſurmiſing that they would betray the countrey vnto the Scots & Pictes, he put diuers of them to death, ſome ſecretly & others openly, as cōuict of ſuch offēces as were forged & layd againſt thē. Here vpō the Brytons for the ſtay of ſuch miſchief as they ſaw at hand, depoſed Uortigerne frō his kingly ſeat, & placed his ſonne Uortimer in his rowme, whiche being done, ambaſſadors were ſent bothe vnto the Scottes and Picts, to require their aide and ſuppoyte againſt the cruell oppreſſion of the Saxōs, who ſought not only by craftie meanes & fraudulent waies to attaine the dominiō of the whole Iſle, but alſo to extinguiſh & vtterly ſubuert the faith of Chriſte, & the vſe of his religion throughout the ſame. Therfore they entirely deſired the Scottiſh & Pictiſh kings, to aſſiſt them againſt ſuch cōmon enimies as had bene called into the realme not by publike conſent of the nobles, but only by the priuate cōmaundement and ordinance of Uortigerne, to help aſwell towards the ſubduyng of the Scots and Picts, as alſo to repreſſe all commotions of the Brytains, which they might happely rayſe againſt him for his wicked tyrannie vſed amongſt them, as his guiltie conſcience might put hym ſtyll in feare of.

The anſwere of Congall king of Scots vnto the Brytiſh meſſengers.

the rites and ceremonies of their falſe religion, and that openly among the Chriſtians, with doing ſacrifice in the honour and worſhip of theyr helliſh goddes, to the great horror and terrible offence of the beholders cõſciences, but alſo ſought by all meanes they could deuiſe, how to deſtroy and quenche vtterly the faith of oure Sauioure Chriſte in all places where they myght get the vpper hande. He promiſed therefore to employe his whole puiſſance to recouer out of the enimies handes all ſuche countreys as lay betwixt the frontiers of his dominion, and the ryuer of Humber, and further to ayde the Brytains to dryue them quite out of the Ile, if the Brytains would aſſure him, frõ thence forth neuer to make clayme, title nor intereſt, to any the countreys aforeſayde, lying betwixt the ſaide riuer of Humber, and the confins of his realme, but to leaue the ſame in the handes of the Scottiſhmen and Pictes, to haue holde and enioy for euermore in quiet, whiche to performe, the Ambaſſadours had (amongſt other things) alreadie promiſed in name of all the Brytiſhe nation, as a recompence or meede to haue the ſuppoſte and ſuccours of the Scottes. The like anſwere the ſame Ambaſſadours receyued of the Pictiſh king, and returning therewith vnto Morpincre declared afore him and his counſell howe they had ſpedde.

Vpon what conditions Congall couenaunted to ſupport the Brytons.

Shortly after for the more and better aſſuraunce of all promiſes, couenaunts and articles paſſed betwixte the Scottiſhmen, Pictes and Brytaines, there was an amitie and bonde of peace nowe renewed ratified and eſtabliſhed according to the tenour of the auncient league whiche had bene concluded in times paſte betwixte them, with ſome newe conditions of agreement included in the ſame: all olde iniuries being ended and quieted clearely betwixt them, ſo that no cauſe of grudge or diſpleaſure, might be thought to remayne in remembrance.

A league concluded be Scots, Pic Brytons.

The firſte enterpryſe put in execution after the concluding of this league, was made by the Scottes againſt Occa and his Saxons, whiche (as partly ye haue heard) had ſtabliſhed themſelues betwixt the ryuers of Tyne and Humber.

The Sco inuade borderes Northum land.

Againſt thoſe Scottes as they were very earneſtly occupied in ouerthrowing Caſtels and Towers, with ſlaughter of ſuche Saxons as ſtoode at defence, Occa commeth into the fielde with an army ready to encounter with them, but perceyuing the multitude of his enimies to be ſuche as he doubted leaſt hee ſhoulde not be well able to matche with them, he ſtayed a while from giuing the onſet: but in the end perceyuing he could not retyre backe but to his great diſhonnour, hee boldly gaue ſigne to his people to ſet vpon theyr enimies: whiche they fiercely executing, it was harde to tell for a whyle to whether parte the victorie woulde encline. But at length the Saxons not able to ſuſtayne the force of the Scottes ouerpreſſing them with multitude, began to giue backe, whiche Occa perceyuing did what hee coulde to hemme them in from running away, but yet notwithſtanding all that he coulde do, feare at length ouercomming regarde to theyr Captaines commaundement, ſhame of rebuke was quite ſet aparte, and ſo they toke them to their feete, and fled away ſo faſt as they might, the Scottes purſuyng after them a mayne.

The Saxons vanquiſhed by the Scottes.

Occa yet eſcaped with diuers of his nobles, and comming to the mouth of Humber, got a ſhip, & ſayled forth in the ſame with great daunger, till at length he arriued within the Thames.

The ſlaughter of the Saxons vpon the diſcomfiture was greate, ſpecially in the chaſe, for the Scottiſhmen calling to remembraunce that they had to do with infidels, and with the enimies of the chriſtian fayth, were ſo eger vpon them, that they ſaued fewe or none that fell into theyr handes.

they

About the ſame time was Uortymere entred into Kent againſt Hengiſt & his Saxons there, and encountring with them in battel ſlew tenne thouſand of them, and chaſed the reſidue forth of that countrey.

Thus Kent returned vnto the Brytains, and the countreys beyond Humber northwards vnto the Scottes and Pictes, according to the tenour of the league before mencioned.

Hengiſt and his ſonne Occa (who a little before this battaile in Kent was come vnto his father) with the reſidue of them that eſcaped, haſted with all ſpeede towardes Northumberlande, in purpoſe to remaine in that countrey till they had recouered theyr ſtrength by ſome power to be ſent ouer vnto them out of their owne countrey, but being repulſed with no ſmall ſlaughter from thence by the Scots and Pictes, they withdrew vnto the mouth of Humber, where getting certaine veſſels they paſſed ouer into Saxonie, leauing a great ſorte of theyr nation behind them, diſperſed abroade here and there in this Iſle, as fortune then beſt ſerued.

Uortymere hauing got the victory as before is mencioned, vſed not the ſame very cruelly, for taking onely from the Saxons whiche were taken priſoners theyr armure and weapon, hee ſuffred them to depart into theyr countrey: other of the ſame nation being but huſbandmen, and as it were poore labourers of the grounde he permitted to tarie in the countrey with theyr wiues and children as ſeruauntes vnto the Brytons.

After this Uortymere gaue order for the repayring of Churches and reſtoring of the chriſtian religion into the ſtate of the former puritie therof, as then ſore decayed, partly through the euill example taken by dayly converſation amongſt the Saxons, and partly alſo by the infectiue hereſie of the Pelagians, as then mightily ſpred ouer the moſt parte of Brytaine. At length the ſayde Uortymer through treaſon of his ſtepmother Roxena was poyſoned and died. Then was Uortigerne agayne reſtored to the rule of the kingdome, firſt forced by othe to promiſe neuer to ayd the Saxons, nor to receiue by way of ayde any forrein people into the realme.

Uortigerne then reſtored thus vnto the crowne, ſhewed ſuche diligence in cauſing due adminiſtration of iuſtice without rigour to be executed, and proviſion made for the reſiſting of all inuaſions that might be attempted by any forraine power, that his prayſe was greate amongſt all his ſubiectes, who to ſhewe theyr good willes likewiſe towardes him as to theyr naturall prince, were not ſlacke in honoring him aſwell by giftes and preſentes, as by all other maner of wayes.

He founde meanes alſo to renew the league with the Scottes and Pictes with like conditions and articles, as it was concluded laſtly betwixt them and his ſonne Uortimere. The league renewed betwixt Brytons Scots & Picts.

But notwithſtanding his politike proceeding thus to anoyde all inconuenience that might happen: ſhortely after Hengiſt returned, & what by force and ſubtill ſhiftes, at length got poſſeſſion of the more parte of Brytaine, ſo that the Brytons were conſtreyned to flee into Wales, whither alſo Uortigerne fledde and remayned there a certaine time, til at length Aurelius Ambroſius and Uter the ſonnes of king Conſtantine came ouer out of little Brytaine, and beſieging Uortigerne in a caſtell, brente him with the houſe and all, when they could not otherwiſe come by him, according to that which Merlyne the Brytiſh ſothſayer had prophecied before. It is fooliſhly ſuppoſed that this Merlyne was got by a ſpyte of that kinde whiche are called Incubi, that is to underſtand, ſuch as couеying mans ſeede from him, and therewith by illuſion (taking vpon them the ſhape and figure of man) do lie with women, and vſe them after the manner of carnal copulation. In this place Hector Boetius by the way recyteth a like tale or two, of ſuche illuſions of ſpyrites wrought not long before his time in Scotland, whiche ſomewhat abridging the ſame we haue here inſerted. Hengiſt returneth. Uortigerne brent.

In the yeare. 1480. ſayth he, it chaunced as a Scottiſh ſhippe departed out of the Forth towardes Flaunders, there roſe a wonderful great tempeſt of winde & weather, ſo outragious, that the Maſter of the ſhip with other the Mariners wondered not a litle what the matter ment, to ſee ſuche weather that tyme of the yeare, for it was about the middeſt of Sommer. loked for preſent death, there was a woman vnderneath the hatches, called vnto them aboue, and willed them to throwe hyr into the ſea, that all the reſidue by goddes grace might yet be ſaued: and thereupon tolde them, howe ſhee had bene haunted a long tyme with a ſpryte, dayely comming vnto hir, in mans lykenes, and that euen as then, hee was with hir vſing his filthye pleaſure after the maner of carnall copulation. In the ſhippe there chaunced alſo to bee a prieſt, who by the maiſters appointment going downe to this woman, & fynding hir lyke a moſt wretched and deſperate perſon, lamenting hir greate miſfortune and myſerable eſtate, vſed ſuche holſome admonitions and comfortable aduertiſements, willing hir to repent and hope for mercy at the handes of almightie God, that at lengthe ſhe ſeeming right penitent for hir greuous offences committed, and fetching ſundry ſighes euen from the bottome of hir heart, being witneſſe (as ſhould appeare) of the ſame, there iſſued forthe of the pumpe of the ſhippe, a foule and euill fauored black cloude, with a mightie terrible noiſe, flame, ſmoake and ſtinke, which preſently fel into the ſea. And ſodeinly therevpon the tempeſte ceaſſed, and the ſhip paſſyng in quiet the reſidue of hir iourney, arriued in ſafetie at the place whether ſhe was bounde.

Not long before the hap hereof, there was in lyke maner a yong man dwelling in Gareoth, within a village there, not paſſing. xiiij. myles from Aberdyne, right faire and comely of ſhape, who declared by way of complaint vnto the Biſhop of that dioceſſe, howe there was a ſpryte which haunted him in ſhape of a woman, ſo fair and beautifull a thing, that he neuer ſaw ỹ lyke, the which would come into his chāber a nights, & with pleaſant enticementes allure him to haue to doe with hir, and that by no maner of meanes he could be rid of hir. The biſhop like a wiſe mā aduiſed him to remoue into ſome other countrey and to giue himſelfe to faſtyng and prayer, ſo to auoyde his handes of that wicked ſpryte. The yong man folowing the Biſhops counſel, within few days was deliuered frō further tentation.

Aboute the ſame tyme alſo, there was in the countrey of Mar, a yong Gentlewoman of excellent beautie, and daughter vnto a noble man there, refuſing ſundry wealthy mariages offred to hir by hir father, and other frendes. At lengthe ſhe proued with chyld, and being rigorouſly cōpelled by hir parentes to tel who was the father, ſhe confeſſed that a certain yong mā vſed nightly to come vnto hir, and keepe hir companie, and ſometimes in the daye alſo, but howe or from whence he came, or by what meanes he went away, ſhe was not able to declare. Hir parentes not greatly crediting hir wordes, layde diligent watche to vnderſtand what he was that had defyled their houſe: And within. iij. days after, vpon ſignification giuen by one of the maydens, that the forniicatour was at that verie inſtante with their daughter, incontinently therevppon, making faſte the dores, they enter the chamber with a great meignie of torches & lights, where they find in their daughters armes, a foule monſtrous thing, right horrible to beholde. Heere a number comming haſtily in, to beholde this euil fauoured ſight, amongſt other, there was a prieſt of right honeſt lyfe, not ignorant (as was thought) in knowledge of holie ſcripture. This prieſt (all other being afrayde) and ſome of them running their wayes, began to recite the beginning of Saint Johns Goſpell, and comming to theſe wordes, Verbum caro factum eſt, ſodeynely the wicked ſpryte making a right fore and terrible roaring noyſe, flew his wayes, taking the roofe of the chamber away with him, the hangings & couerings of the bed being alſo brent therewith. The Gentlewoman was yet preſerued, & within. iij. or. iiij. dayes after, was deliuered of ſuche a miſhapen thing, as the lyke before had not ben ſeene, whiche the midwiues and women ſuche as were preſent at hir labour, to auoyd the diſhonour of hir houſe, immediatly brente in a greate fyre, made in the chamber for the ſame intent.

Thus muche out of Hector Boetius, which, with more, he hath written to proue that all is not fayned whiche is written of the illuſions of deuils and euill ſpirites, the credite whereof I leaue with the Author.

Now to returne where I left touching Aurelius Ambroſe: ye ſhall vnderſtande, that he hauing once ſubdewed and diſpatched hys aduerſarie Voretigerne, he determyned to make warres againſt Engiſt and his Saxons, to proue if his chance myght be to recouer the realm out of their handes, and ſo to reſtore again the chriſtiā religion. But firſt ere he attempted any exploit againſt ỹ ennmies, he ſent ambaſſadors both vnto

Congall

Congall the Scottiſh king, and alſo vnto one Loth a towardly yong gentleman, and of right comely perſonage, as then raigning among the Pictes, requiring them both to ayde him in ſo neceſſarie an enterpriſe as he had in hande againſt the enimies of Chriſt and his religion. Whereupon both theſe kings weying with themſelues the duetie of all Chriſtian Princes, in reſpect of the aduauncement of the cauſe of fayth, and ſuppreſſing of ethnike Idolatrie, promiſed their help to the vttermoſte of their powers againſte the Saxons, who had in ſuch tyrannyke ſort ſubuerted and aboliſhed the Chriſtian profeſſion within the Britiſhe confines. And therefore the olde league according to the articles and couenantes afore time concluded betwixte the three Nations, was once againe renued, and an army prepared by euery of them, to meet at a place and day appoynted, for the better expedition of thys their attempted voyage.

First Aurelius Ambroſe, with ſuch power as he brought with him forth of Fraunce, and ioyning thereunto a great multitude of thoſe Brytaynes which had eſcaped the Saxons handes, eyther by withdrawing themſelues into Wales, or elſe by conueying themſelues into the Countreys of the Scottes and Pictes, ſetteth forward towarde the Scottiſhe armie. But firſt calling togither thoſe Brytaines that he had about him, and going vp to a little hill, where he might bee hearde of them all, he made a long Oration by way of complaynt, of the great iniuries and cruell practiſes vſed by Hengiſt, againſt the lynage of king Conſtantine, and the whole eſtate of the Brytiſh comon wealth. Alſo of the horrible perſecution made by him and his people the Saxons againſt the profeſſors of the Chriſtian religion. All which matter he handled in wordes ſo pithily, his talke yet ſauouring of the Romaine eloquence, that the mindes of the Souldiers beeing kindled therwith, required nothing but battayle, as men not doubting but by his wiſe and politike conduyt to atchieue ſome glorious victorie. And to the ende all things might be done in better order, according to his appoyntment, immediately they proclaymed him king. Which was by accompt of the Scottiſhe Chronicles, in the yeare. 498. after that Uortigerne with his ſonne Uortimer had raigned ſeuentene yeares in the whole.

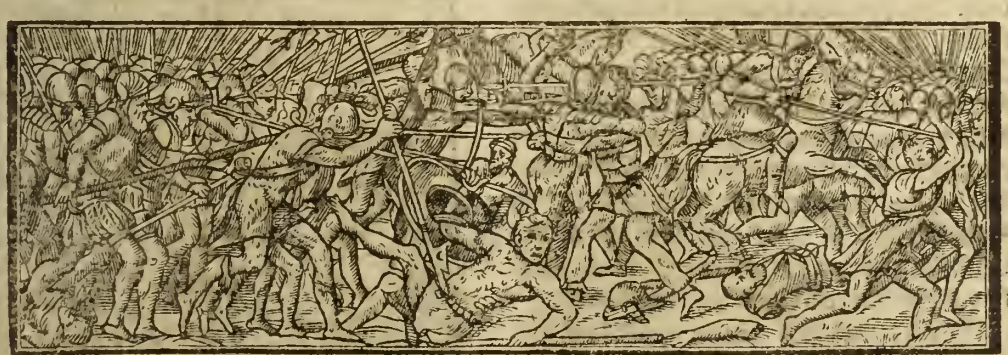
Aurelius Ambroſe proclaymed king of Brytayne.

Aurelius in this wiſe being eſtabliſhed King of Brytayne paſſeth forth with his people, and within ſixe dayes after, met with the armies of the Scottes and Pictes. Generall of the Scots at that time, was one Conranus brother to king Congall, who was troubled with the Goute, ſo that he could not come himſelfe in perſon.

Conranus generall of the Scottes.

Loth the Pictiſhe king was there himſelfe amongſt his people, verie deſirous to ſhew ſome proufe of his manly prowes and manhood. Aurelius Ambroſe ſhewed al the honour that might be deuiſed, as wel to ỹ one as to the other of thoſe two Nations, promiſing to requite them wyth as muche friendſhippe when time and occaſion ſhould craue the like aſſiſtance.

Loth king of the Pictes.



Theſe three mighty armies therefore beeing thus aſſembled, marched forth towardes a place called Mahelbell, where they vnderſtoode that Hengiſt with his power as then did ſoiourne. Where when both the campes were pitched, and one lying not farre from the other: at the firſt certaine light ſkirmiſhes were procured by both partes betwixt the light horſemen, wherewith at length being the more prouoked to diſpleaſure, they come into the fielde with their whole maine battailes, right fiercely encountering eche other, ſo that as it appeared, their force was not ſo great but their mortall hate was euen as much, or rather more, if the hyſtories ſay right.

Aurelius haſteth forth to London.

Aurelius Ambroſe hauing thus got the vpper hande of his enimies, haſteth forth with all ſpeede vnto London, where hauing both the Citie and tower deliuered into his handes, hee recouered the whole Ilande from the poſſeſſion of the Saxons: and ſuch of them as were apt men, able to beare armor, and to ſerue in the warres, he cōmaunded to depart forth of the land. The other that were minded to tarie behinde their fellowes that were thus forced to depart, became ſubiectes to the Britains, and couenanted to become chriſtians. Thus much haue I written touching Aurelius Ambroſe, according to the report of the Scottiſh writers, but more hereof ye may reade in the hyſtorie of Englande, where ye ſhall finde this matter ſet forth more at large. For ỳ which wee write here, is but to ſhewe in what ſort the Scottiſhe writers make relation of the warres which their nation had with the Saxons, when they began firſt to ſet foote here in this lande.

To our purpoſe then: In the meane time Aurelius hauing thus recouered the lande out of the Saxons hands, and now remaining at London, did all the honor he coulde ymagine, both vnto Loth the Pictiſh king, and alſo vnto Conranus generall of the Scottiſhe men, acknowledging howe that by their ayde chiefly hee had got the vpper hande of his enimyes, and ſo hee willed to haue it notified amongſt his ſubiectes.

Hereto hee cauſed the league to be renued betwixt the Scottes, Pictes, and Brytaynes, the auncient ordinaunce for the Countreyes beyond Humber, beeing appointed to remayne vnto the Scottiſhe men and Pictes: alſo that the Saxons ſhoulde bee reputed common enimyes to all the three Nations, and that vpon inuaſion made by any forraine power, the Scottes, Pictes, and Brytanes, ſhould ayde one another as occaſion ſerued.

This league beeing concluded with theſe articles of couenauntes was the more ſtrongly confyrmed, by reaſon of ſuch affinitie and allyaunce as then alſo enſued. For whereas Aurelius had two ſiſters, the one named Anne, and the other Ida, virgins both. Anne beeing the elder, was gyuen in maryage vnto King Loth, by whome certaine yeares after hee had iſſue two ſonnes, Mordred, and Walwan, or Galwan, with a daughter named Thametes: Ida beeing the yonger ſyſter, was maryed vnto Conranus, generall (as is ſayde) of the Scottiſhe armye. Howbeit ſhe lyued not paſt two yeares after, but dyed in trauayle of childe, which alſo dyed wyth the mother. And ſo ended the alyance of Aurelius and Conranus.

Whileſt

Whilest these things were thus in hande, Congall king of the Scottes being wone with long sickenesse, departed this life, and was buried in the Ile of Iona, otherwise called Colmekill, with all kingly pompe and accustomed ceremonies. He raigned ouer the Scottishmen about xx. yeares in great fame and glorie.

After hys decease, his brother Conranus, with great reioysing of al the Scottishe Nation, was admitted King, in the yeare after the byrth of our Sauiour, 512. and the xxij. of the raigne of the Emperor Anastasius.

This Conranus (otherwise also called by some Gozanus) being established king, first toke order that the sonnes of his brother Congall being within age, shoulde be brought vp in the Ile of Man, vnder the gouernance of certaine wyse instructors and scholemaisters, to be trayned in learning and vertuous discipline, according to an auncient ordenance thereof made and enacted.

Also doubting least peace and quietnesse nowe after long warres, should minister matter to his people of raysing some commotion, to the disturbance of all ciuill order and politike gouernment within his realme, hee rode as it had bene in circuite rounde about the same, making inquirie of all maner offenders, on whom he caused due punishment to be executed, without respect eyther of kyth or kinne.

And amongst other enormities, which he vnderstoode to be vsed in maner through al his countreys, this (as hee thought) was most greeuous, that the husbandmen, and other commons of the Countrey, being euil intreated and misused at the gentlemens handes, durst not complaine, nor procure any redresse: by reason whereof, when they were oppressed or suffered any manner of wrong or iniurie, they were without remedie to haue the same reformed, he ordeyned therefore, that the names of al such offenders, with the maner of their offences shoulde bee secretly registred in a booke euerie yeare, by certaine Inquisitours thereto chosen and appointed, and if it chaunced that those which were thus accused, might afterwardes be founde guiltie before the kings Justices by matter plainly proued against them, they shoulde then be sure to bee punished according to the measure of their offences.

This custome of accusations, commonlye called inditements, continueth euen vnto these our dayes.

Conranus himself (as is reported) vsed much to be present at Assyses and Sessions, to see the lawes duly ministred, either else to passe the time in hunting within some Forrest or chase, nere to the place where his Justices sate. The king present at Assises.

Nowe whilest Conranus king of Scottes thus studieth for the good gouernment of his people, Aurelius Ambrose the king of Brytaine fell sicke of a consumption, whiche brought him to such weaknesse, that all recouerie of health in him was dispayred, whereof Occa and Pascentius sonnes to Hengist beeing aduertised, returned with a mightie power of Saxons into Brytain, which (as Hector Boetius sayth) they named at that present Engelsland. Aurelius Ambrose fell sicke of a consumption. Occa and Pascentius return into Britaine.

Uter the brother of Aurelius, lay also the same time sore sicke of a flixe in the parties of Wales, so that to auoyde dissention that was rayled among the Brytaynes about the appointing of a generall to go agaynst the enimies, Aurelius our sicke as he was, caused himself to be carried forth in a litter, with whose presence his people were so encouraged, that encountering with the Saxons, they wanne the victorie, although with such losse on their side, that Aurelius was glad to take truce for the space of foure monethes, and therewith breaking vp his campe, went vnto Wynchester, and sent Ambassadors vnto the Scottish and Pictish kings for ayde against the time when the truce should expyre, which was graunted, and so hee prouided for all things readie for the warres against the appointed time of theyr assemble. Occa also sent his brother Pascentius into Germanie for more ayd, but as some write, hee was driuen by contrarie windes into Irelande, and getting a greate power of men togyther there, he came backe to his brother with the same. But whether he had those men out of Irelande, or Germanie, sure it is that the power of the Saxons was greatly encreased therewith. In the meane time died Aurelius Ambrose, who was poysoned by a mischieuous Monke a Saxon borne, named Eopa, or Copa as some bookes haue, that toke vpon him to be skilfull in phisick, and a Monke by profession, his death was sore lamented of the Brytaynes: but contrarywise, the Saxons reioyced greatly thereof, so that immediatly after, Occa with his power inuadeth the Brytons, vsing greate cruelties in all places wheresoeuer he came. Aurelius Ambrose departeth this life.

In the meane time the Scottish and Pictish armies were come forwarde towardes Aurelius, according to promise made vnto his Ambassadors: but whē his death was certainly knowne amongest them, the Captaynes and leaders of both those armyes, resolued to returne home againe; The Scottish armie returns home againe.

gaine, and ſo they did, for that they doubted in what ſtate and order things ſhoulde ſtande amongſt the Brytaynes now after the deceaſſe of their late king.

After the death of Aurelius Ambroſe, hys brother Uter was made king of Brytaine, and falling in loue with the wife of Gothlois Duke of Cornwall, hee did not onely force hir to lye with him, but alſo to the ende hee might enioye hir the more freely, he ceaſſed not to purſue hir husbande to ridde him out of the way, whome at length he toke within a Caſtle into the which he was fledde, and forthwyth cauſed him to bee executed, ſurmyſing matter againſt him for that he had forſaken one of his Captaines cleped Nathaliod, in battaile againſt the Saxons. By the wife of this Gothlois, Uter had iſſue the greate Arthure, and becauſe he had no legitimate ſonne, he appoynted that Arthure ſhoulde ſucceede him in gouernment of the realme.

Uter begat Arthure.

Herewith Loth the Pictiſh king was not a little moued, diſdeyning that Arthure beeing a baſtarde, and begot of another mans wife in adulterie, ſhoulde be preferred before his ſonnes the rightfull heyres of the Brytiſhe kingdome: and therefore by Ambaſſadours he did what he could to diſſwade Uter from making any ſuch ordinance. But when he ſawe that he coulde not remoue him from his opinion, he thought beſt to content himſelfe with ſilence, till the time ſerued better for his purpoſe.

At length when the warres were agayne renued betwixt Uter and Occa the Saxon king, Loth in reuenge of the iniurie done to him and his children, ioyned himſelf with the Saxons, and was with them at the battaile, in which the Brytaynes got the victorie by the preſence of Saint Germaine that holy Biſhop of Auxer as the Scottiſh writers make mention. Whiche battail as the ſame is ſet forth by Hector Boetius, bycauſe it toucheth the ſtate of the Pictes, we haue thought good here to expreſſe.

It was therefore about the feaſt of Eaſter, when the armies came into the fielde, the Saxons with the Picts on the one ſide, and the Brytaynes on the other, of whome no ſmall number (being eyther growen to be Idolaters through conuerſation with the Saxons, either elſe infected with the Hereſie of the Pelagians) euen there in campe, by hearing ſuch godly Sermons as Saint Germain preached amongſt them, were conuerted to the true beliefe, receyuing at the ſame tyme the Sacrament of the Lordes bodie, togyther in companie with other of the faythfull Chriſtians.

S. Germain preacherh vnto the campe.

Finally when both parties were readie to giue battaile, Saint Germain toke vpon him to haue the leading of the forewarde, wherein he had all the Prieſtes and eccleſiaſticall Miniſters giuing commaundement, that when he ſhould crie Alleluya, they ſhould all anſwere him with one entier voyce.

S. Germaine leadeth the forewarde.

Their cr Alleluy

Thus proceede they forth towardes the battaile, Saint Germain bearing the kings Standarde in the forefront, and vpon the approche to the enimies, he with the Prieſtes crying with a lowde voyce thrice togither Alleluya, was anſwered by all the whole hoſt, uttering and crying the ſame crie ſo wholly togither, that the verie ſounde thereof cauſed ſuch an eccho on eche ſyde, by reaſon of the hollow mountaynes and cliues hard by them, that the Saxons amazed at thys doubled noyſe, and doubting not onely another power of their enimies, to be hidde priuily among the hilles, which they ſawe on eche ſide of them, but alſo leaſt the verie rockes and mountaynes would haue fallen downe vpon theyr heades togither with the frame of the Element, readie (as it ſeemed to them) to breake in ſunder, they toke them to their feete, in ſuche dreadfull haſte, that their breath was not able to ſuffice halfe the deſire they had to continue theyr courſe. Many of them made ſuch haſte, that running to the next ryuer in hope to paſſe the ſame, were drowned therein. To conclude, all of them generally threw awaye both weapon and armure, the more lightly to make away.

Saint Germaine beareth kings ſt

The Sa miracul diſcomf

Thus through the pollicie of that bleſſed man Saint Germaine, the victorie remayned wyth King Uter and his Brytaynes, wythout any bloudſhed.

Saint Bede making mention of this battayle, aſſigneth the tyme to be at the firſt comming of Saint Germain into this lande, where Hector Boetius, following Ueremond, ſuppoſeth it to be at the ſeconde time of his comming hither, which was in the dayes of king Uter.

Bede di teth fro tor Boe his auth Verem

But at what time ſoeuer this victorie thus chaunced, certaine it is, the Brytaynes waxing prowde thereof, nothing regarded the power of the Saxons, nor toke any heede for prouiſion of further defence: but after that thoſe holy Biſhops Germain and Seuerus were returned into theyr Countrey, they fell to all kyndes of gluttonie and exceſſe, in following onely their ſenſuall luſts and fleſhly concupiſcence: which abuſes, the Biſhops and other godly men lamenting, ceaſſed not moſt earneſtly to reproue, menacing deſtruction vnto the whole Countrey, if the people leauing their wicked liuing and moſt heynous offences towards God, did not amende and repent in due time and ſpace.

The Br giue th ues vnt kindes and abh nations

The thr ning of geance ceede vi liuing.

Neither were they deceyued herein: for within fewe yeares after, Occa eftſoones beganne to make warres vpon the Brytaynes agayne, and gaue them a notable ouerthrow, ſleaing of them them to the number of .xv. thouſande, with theyr generall Mathaliod, but yet this victorie was not greatly pleaſant vnto the Saxons, for in the chaſe they loſt their king the forelayde Occa, being aduaunced a good way of from the reſidue of his armie with fiue hundred horſemen, and a few footmen, in purſute of his enimyes, whiche was the only cauſe, that as then the Saxons attempted no further exployte agaynſt the Brytaynes.

And yet for that they woulde not be without a gouernour, they created an other Occa to their king, the nephew of the former Occa by his brother Oiſcus. And then turned all their force to make warres agaynſt the Pictes, for that Loth king of the Picts, contrarie to his othe of credence had ayded the Brytaynes in the laſt battaile, as by certaine priſoners taken in the ſame, they had perfite vnderſtanding.

Occa therefore being fierce of nature, to the ende to endomage his enimies the more, ſent into Germany for one Colgerne, or Colgern, a man of great eſtimation and byrth amongſt the Saxons, to come ouer with a power vnto him into England, promiſing for recompence of his trauayle and ayde agaynſt the Pictes, to deliuer vnto him all ſuch landes as lay beyonde the water of Humber, which might be recouered out of the handes of the Pictes, to enioy vnto him and his for euer.

Colgerne, or Colgerme a Saxon, is ſent for by Occa.

Colgerne accepting the offer, landed ſhortly after in Northumberlande, putting the whole Countrey vnto fire and ſworde. Which cruell dealing, cauſed a great number of Scottes and Pictes, which held diuerſe Caſtels in that quarter, to come forth into the fielde to defende the countrey, and ioyning battail with their enimies were diſcomfited, their ſlaughter being muche encreaſed by the comming of Occa at vnwares vpon them. For he firſt taking truce with Vter king of the Brytaynes, haſteth with all ſpeede to ioyne his power with Colgerne, after he heard once that he was come a lande.

These newes being brought by ſuch as fled away into Galloway and Pictland, cauſed both the kings, Loth and Conranus, in moſt ſpeedie wiſe to aſſemble their forces, and with the ſame to march forthwith towardes the Saxons: but being come within ſight of them, readie to gyue battaile, great was the feare and terror in both their hoſtes to ioyne in fight with ſuch a number of fierce people, as they ſawe there before theyr faces. Which feare roſe firſt through the Brytaynes, of whom no ſmall number was there, in ayde of the Scottes and Picts, agaynſt the Saxons, declaring many things of the great valure, ſtrength of bodie, and huge forme of lymmes of the ſame Saxons, being ſo fierce and cruell in fight, as they alledged, that they were able to put their enimies to flight, euen with their grymme lookes and terrible countenances. Whereof ſuch feare and terror was ſpredde through both the whole armies, that if ſhame had not partlye wrought amongſt the men of warre, many of them woulde haue fledde their wayes before any battail had bene attempted at all.

The kings perceyuing ſuche diſcomfiture amongſt their men, cauſed them to aſſemble togither, and appoynted one ſuch as was thought meete for the purpoſe, to declare vnto them on theyr behalfes, how they could not but maruel to vnderſtand ſuch feare and lack of courage, as appeared generally through both the armies, conſidering there was no cauſe thereof, they being ſuche a number of able warriours prefectly appoynted, and there with led by ſuch gouernours and Captaines, as there was no reaſon why to be doubtful of victorie, before they had ſeene ſome tryall and iuſt occaſion of diſaduauntage. For as touching the Saxons, they were no ſuch men but that they might be ouercome well ynough, as it might ſufficiently appeare, both by proufe of ſuch victories as Vortimere the Brytiſhe king had obteyned agaynſt them, and alſo Aurelius Ambroſe, who had vanquiſhed them in ſuch ſort, that that when they durst not eftsones encoũter with him in battaile, they founde meanes by trayterous practise to make him away through poyson. Then sith the Brytaynes (whom the Scottish men and Pictes so often had subdued) had at sundrie tymes vanquished the Saxons, why should they feare in such wise to fight with them in common defence of theyr Countrey, and reuenge of such iniuries as they had lately receyued at theyr handes, sith the righteous God (as all good men ought to trust) is euer readie to aduance a righteous quarell. And where it was bruted amongest them, that the Saxons were so huge of stature, and mightie of lymmes, that no force was able to withstande them, it was certainly knowne, that the Scottes and Pictes were indewed with no lesse nightinesse & strẽgth of bodie than the Saxons: so that if they were not of lyke stomackes, that rested in their owne slouthfull cowardise, and not in natures worke, hauing done hir part in bestowing hir gyftes vpon them touching bodily force, in such plenteous maner, as no other nation did lightly any wayes surmount them.

Many other arguments were alledged & layd forth to remoue feare out of their hartes, and to incourage them to fight, insomuch that in the end it appeared the same wrought the wished effect, in such wise, that they generally requyred battaile, offering to liue and die at theyr Captaynes feete, and to follow them whither soeuer it should please theyr kings & liege lords to appoynt them.

The Scottes through comfortable words of an oration recouer newe courages.

Herewith the kings being satisfied, forth they march towardes their enimies, whome they found readie to receyue them, and that with such rigorous violence, that in the ende after greate slaughter made on both partes, the Scottes and Pictes were put to flight, the Saxons pursuing in the chase till the darke night caused them to withdraw and returne into their campe.

The Scots and Pictes are put to flight.

The day next following, the Scottish king with the residue of his army, hasted away with al speede towardes Galloway, and the Pictish king withdrewe into Pictlande.

The Saxons vsing the victorie most cruelly, slue all such of the Pictish and Scottish nations, as they met with, in all places betwixt Tine and Tweede.

Then did Octa create the forenamed Colgerne duke of Northumberland, who repayring all such Castels and strong houses, as he thought expedient to haue kept, placed in the same garrisons of souldiers, to defend the countrey agaynst all maner of enimies.

Colgern created Duke of Northumberlande.

After this, Octa turned his power agaynst the Brytaynes, whiche in the last battayle had ayded the Scottes and Pictes, as before is partly touched. The Brytaynes receyuing a great ouerthrowe in battaile, Uter the Brytishe king was glad with suche as mighte escape the enimies handes, to withdraw into Wales, leauing the residue of his Countreys vnto the Saxons, who thereupon recouered not onely the Citie of London, yeelding it selfe vnto them for doubt of some long siege, but also all those countreys and prouinces, whiche Hengist the first of the Saxons that raigned as king within the bounds of Albion at any time, had holden or enioyed, & ceassed not after recouerie of the same, to vexe and disquiet the Scottes, Brytaynes and Pictes, with continuall incursions, hoping by such meanes to keepe them still occupied.

In the middes of this trouble Uter king of the Brytaynes departed this worlde, poysoned (as some haue written) by drinking water taken out of a fountain, which the Saxons had enuenomed. He died in the yeare after the byrth of our sauiour 521. and in the xbiij. of his owne raigne.

After his decease, Loth king of the Pictes sent his Ambassadours vnto the Lordes, and other the estates of the Brytish dominions, requyring thẽ according to the accustomed lawes, and auncient ordenances of the Realme, to receyue him as king, sith he had maryed the sister and heyre of the two brethren Aurelius Ambrose, and Uter, their two last kings, being as then both deceased without leauing behinde them any lawfull issue, by reason whereof, their estate was fallen vnto him, to enioy the same during his life, hauing maryed (as is sayde) theyr owne naturall and lawfull borne sister, and after the decease of him and his wife the sayde sister, then it ought by course of the lawes of all Realmes and Countreys to discende vnto such issue as hee had begot of hir, whiche was two sonnes, the one named Mordred, and the other Ualuane, or Gawane, as some doe call him.

Loth requireth the kingdome of Brytayne.

Mordred.

Gáwane.

The Brytaynes disdainfully vsing the Pictish Ambassadours that came with this message, refused not onelye to come vnder subiection of Loth, but also denyed that his sonnes begot of his lawfull wife, the sister of Aurelius and Uter, shoulde haue any rule or gouernment amongest them, as those that were no Brytaynes borne, but straungers vnto them, being both borne and vpbred in a forraine countrey.

The Brytaynes refuse to receyue either Loth or any of his sonnes to raigne ouer them.

Those Ambassadours then hauing theyr answere, and beeing sent home with reproche, the Brytaynes contrarie to the lawes of all nations, proclaymed Arthure, beeing a bastarde borne, king of their Realme, and forthwith assembling theyr powers vnder his leading, marched on agaynst the Saxons, in purpose to abate some part of their strength, before the Pictes (whiche was doubted woulde shortly come to passe) shoulde ioyne with them.

Arthur proclaymed king of Brytaynes.

Therefore

Therefore hauing procured ayde of the Armorike Brytaynes forth of Fraunce, they fought with theyr enimies within ten myles of London at the firſt, where the Saxons beeing at two ſeuerall tymes banquiſhed, were conſtrayned not onely to pay tribute, but alſo to receyue magiſtrates to gouerne them by the ſaid Arthures appoyntment, with other grieuous articles of agreement, to the great reioyſing of the Brytains, for theſe ſo luckie beginnings in the firſt exploits of their late elected king.

Afterwardes was London eaſily wonne by the Brytains, wherein Arthure remayning for a ſeaſon, toke aduiſe with his nobles howe to proceede in his warres againſt the reſt of the Saxons. Finally hauing prepared a mightie army, he determineth to go againſt thoſe which inhabited beyond Humber northwards, with whom (as he had certaine knowledge) the Picts were ioyned: for Loth cõming to agreement with Colgerne, concluded a league with him, wherby they were bound to ayd one another againſt the Brytains, as cõmon enimies and aduerſaries to them both.

The Brytaynes at theyr comming into Yorkſhire pitched their campe not farre off from theyr enimes, who were alreadie ioyned togither and encamped abrode in the field. The next day after, knowledge beeing had that they ſhoulde haue battail, Arthure appoynted Howel leader of the Armorike Brytains to encounter with the battaile of the Picts, and he himſelfe to matche with the Saxons. Thus they mette togither on both partes very fiercely, and a ſore battaile was fought ther betwixt them, ſo that for a good ſpace it was doubtful whether part ſhould haue the auauntage of the day, but at length the Picts were put to flight, which aduaunced the Brytaynes to the gayne of the whole field. For the Saxons after they perceyued howe the Picts were diſcomfited, dreading to abyde the whole brunte by themſelues, betoke them alſo to theyr heeles, and made theyr race towardes Yorke, as faſte as theyr feete myght beare them.

Arthure purſuing them thither, beſieged the Citie almoſt three Monethes togyther, but the Saxons defended the Walles ſo ſtoutly making often iſſues forth vpon the Brytaynes, that till hunger began to conſtrayne them, they cared little for the ſiege. In the end when they were determined to haue yeelded vp the Citie, they had knowledge, howe there was an huge armie of Picts and Saxons newly aſſembled, and readie to come forwarde to their ſuccors, alſo that king Occa (eſcaping from the battayle wherein he had receiued the ouerthrow at Arthurs hands, and fleing afterwarde into Germanie) was now returned with a newe power, and arryued within the mouth of Humber. Which newes cauſed them to deferre all communication, in hope that if they might abyde the ſiege but for a ſmall tyme, the Brytaynes ſhoulde ſhortly bee compaſſed in on eche ſyde, and oppreſſed on the ſodaine. Occa returneth of out Germanie with a new power.

Arthur heard of the comming of theyr ſuccours in like maner, and iudging it no wiſedom to tarie the comming of his ſo puiſſant enimies, conſidering what a number of diſeaſed and ſicke perſons he had alreadie in his hoſt, by reaſon of their long lying abrode in the fielde) rayſed hys ſiege, and withdrewe himſelfe ſo ſpeedily as was poſſible with his whole army into Wales, where he appoynted the Armorike Brytaynes to ſoiourne for that Winter, with other of the meaner ſort of his own ſouldiers. Whileſt he toke the reſidue of his choſen bands, and went to London, there to prouide that no rebellion ſhoulde be rayſed amongſt the Saxons of Kent, or other of the countreys neare about. Arthure rayſeth his ſiege. Arthure returneth to Lõdon

In the beginning of the next ſpring, he gathered his hoſt togither again, and with the ſame went forth againſt Colgerne and Occa, who being iſſued forth of Northumberland, were entred into the Britiſh confines, ſpoyling and waſting the countrey with their accuſtomed cruelty. Wherevpon encountering them twice in battail, he obteined the victorie, and then beſieging Yorke, at length he entred into that Citie, by meanes of a Brytayn, who dwelling amongſt the Saxons there, in the night ſeaſon cõueyed a ſort of Brytains into the citie, the which breaking open the gates in ẏ dead of ẏ night, did let in al the whole hoſt. Where Arthur would not ſuffer his men to make any great murther of the enimies, whiche were content to yeeld themſelues, but bled them very gently, therby to win more praiſe amongſt all thoſe that heard of his worthie victories. Arthure diſcomfiteth the Saxons twiſe in battaile, & then againe lieth ſiege to Yorke and winneth it. Arthure vſeth the victorie with gentleneſſe.

The Brytaines hauing thus conquered the Citie of Yorke, many feates of armes were dayly practiſed betwixt them and the Saxons, which held poſſeſſion ſtill of the countrey there aboutes. But the Britaines lying in that citie al the ſommer and winter following, at length beganne to take their eaſe, namely in the depth of the winter, and therewith gaue themſelues to banketting, drinking, play, and other kindes of voluptuous pleſures, ſo ẏ it ſeemed they truſted more to their paſſed victories than to their preſent force, not fearing ſuche danger as was like to follow. The Brytaines ſoiourning for the winter time within Yorke, giue themſelues vnto banketting and voluptuouſneſſe.

It is thought of ſome, that aboute the ſame tyme, Arthur firſte inſtituted, that the feaſte of Chriſtmaſſe ſhoulde be kept with ſuch exceſſe of meates and drinkes, in all kyndes of inordinate banquetting and reuell for the ſpace of thirtene dayes togyther, according to the cuſtome vſed ſtill throughe both the Realmes

But whence ſoeuer, or by whom ſoeuer this inſatiable gourmandiſe came vp amongſt vs, ſurely a great abuſe it is, to ſee the people at ſuche a ſolemne feaſt (where they ought to bee occupied in thankes giuing to almightie God, for the ſending downe of his onely begotten ſonne amongſt vs) to giue themſelues in maner wholy to gluttonie and exceſſiue filling of their bellies, with ſuch maner of lewde and wanton paſtimes, as though they ſhoulde rather celebrate the ſame feaſtes of Bacchanalia, and thoſe other which the Gentiles alſo kept, called Floralia, and Priapalia, than the remembrance of Chriſtes natiuitie, who abhorreth all maner of ſuch exceſſe.

But nowe to my purpoſe. When the next Sommer was once come, Arthure led forth hys Brytaynes againſt their enimies, but by reaſon of ſuch eaſe and pleaſure as they had taken whyleſt they ſoiourned in Yorke, being nowe come into the field, they were able to abide no paynes, ſo that no good was done of certaine yeares after, till finally Arthure ioyned in league wyth Loth king of the Picts. The conditions of which league were theſe. That Arthure during his naturall life ſhould raigne as king of the Brytains, and after his deceaſſe, the kingdome to remaine vnto Mordred and his iſſue, if he chaunced to haue any. That the Pictes ſhould ayde the Brytaynes againſt the Saxons, and haue all ſuche landes as might bee recouered of them beyonde Humber. Alſo the league whiche was betwixt them and the Scottes, they ſhould duely obſerue. Mordred ſhould marrie the daughter of Gawolan a noble man amongſt the Brytaynes, and of higheſt authoritie next vnto Arthure himſelfe: the children of this maryage to bee brought vp with their grandfather in Brytain, till they came to yeares of diſcretion. Gawan the brother of the foreſayde Mordred, ſhoulde ſerue king Arthure, and receyue at his handes large entertainment, and great poſſeſſions to maintayne therewith his eſtate.

The Brytaines through reſt and eaſe became vnapt to ſuſteyne the paynes of warres.

A league concluded betwixt Arthure king of Brytaynes, and Loth king of Pictes.

Other articles there were compyled in this league, according as was thought requiſite for the maintenance of ſtable friendſhip betwixt theſe kings and their nations. So that Arthur hauing concluded this league, and ſtill being deſirous to purge the whole Ile of all miſcreantes and enimies of the Chriſtian fayth, hee ſente vnto the Scottiſh and Pictiſh kings, requiring them on the behalfe of that dutie which they ought vnto the aduauncement of Chriſtes religion, to aſſemble their powers, and to meete him at Tynmouth, whither he woulde repayre to ioyne with them, at ſuch day as they would appoynt, from thence to march forth againſt the Saxons.

Arthure ſendeth Ambaſſadours vnto the kings of Scots and Pictes.

Loth king of the Pictes, and Conanus king of the Scottiſhmen, fayled not in this ſo neceſſarie an enterpriſe, but agreeable to Arthures requeſt, within fewe dayes after they came forwarde, and ioyning with the Brytaynes, forth they went againſt the Saxons, whom they vnderſtode to be alreadie in campe, vnder the conduite of their king Octa, in purpoſe to ſtop their paſſage.

Scots and Britons ioyne againſt the Saxons.

When both the armies were approched neare togither, they prepared to the battaile, and firſt Colgerme Duke of Northumberlande mounted vpon a light gelding, rode almoſte euen harde to the faces of the Pictes, where they ſtoode in theyr order of battaile right ſtoutly, and there vttering many reprochfull wordes vnto Loth and other of his nobles, for breach of their promiſed friendſhip to him and his Saxons, declared that he truſted ſhortly to ſee iuſt puniſhment light vppon them for this falſhood and vntruthes ſake, in thus ioyning with theyr former enimies againſt their moſt truſtie friendes and ſtedfaſt allies.

Colgerme proueth.

The Pictiſhe king not greatly moued herewith, commaunded his Standards to aduaunce forwarde, and the Saxons likewiſe haſted apace towardes them, ſo that the one being come within daunger of ſhot of the other, the Pictes let flie their Arrowes right freſhly. Arthur in the meane time hauing ſet his people in aray, exhorted thē to fight manfully: and ſo ſone as he perceyued that the fray was begon by the Pictes, he in ſemblable wiſe commaundeth the Brytaines to giue the onſet, ſo that immediately there enſued a ſore conflict: the Scottes beeing in the right wing, ſleaing Cheldricke one of the chiefeſt Captaines amongeſt the Saxons, quickly diſcomfited that Wing with the which they were firſt matched.

Colgerme with his Saxons encountring as is ſayde with the Pictes, placed in the left wing, ruſhed in amongſt his enimies (vpon an earneſt deſire to be reuenged of his aduerſarie king Loth) with ſuch violence, that at their firſt encounter he ouerthrew the ſame Loth: but immediately therevppon two Pictiſhe horſemen running at Colgerme ſideling wiſe, bare him quite through. In the meane time, Loth by meane of his ſtrong haberioyne eſcaping without hurt, was relieued by ſuch as ſtood about him, and reſtored againe to his companie: but Colgerme being deade before he could be recouered from amongeſt the throng of his enimies, his mē were ſo diſcomforted therwith, that ſtreight wayes thereupon they fell to running away. The maine battaile of the Saxons being thus left bare on both ſides, began to

At length being brought vnto the ſea ſide, he got veſſels, and eſcaped ouer into Germanie. This victorie being thus atchieued, conſtrayned the Saxons to yeeld vnto king Arthur, ſimply cōmitting themſelues vnto his mercie, who of his clemencie was contented to pardon them of life and goodes, vpon condition they woulde become chriſtians, and from thenceforth neuer after to make any warres vpō their neighbors the Brytains, Scots, or Pictes. But if they woulde not agree hereunto, then leauing their goods, armor, and weapon behinde them, they ſhould auoyd the land, and that within .xiij. days next enſuing.

Many of the Saxons that could get paſſage, ſayled ouer into Germanie. Other feigning themſelues to become Chriſtians, remayned in the lande, loking one day for better happe and fortune. Diuerſe that were not able by meanes of pouertie to get away within the tyme appoynted, and yet refuſing to be chriſtened, were put to death, according to the Proclamation ſet forth for the ſame purpoſe, ſo that in compariſon verie few amongſt them receyued the Chriſtian fayth ſincerely, and with a true meaning minde.

Things beeing thus quieted in Northumberland, Arthure toke order for the repayring of Churches abrode in the coūtrey, which the Saxons had ouerthrowne or defaced, namely in the Citie of Yorke he beſtowed great coſt, where the cruell infidels had done muche hurt vpon Churches, and other religious houſes.

In the yeare following, Arthure had newes how the Saxons which helde the Ile of Wight, ioining with the Kentiſh Saxons, had don great diſpleaſures vnto the Brytaynes, on that ſyde of the Thames, killing and ſleaing an huge number of them with great cruelties, wherewyth being ſore moued, hee drewe towardes London with his armie, purpoſing vtterly to deſtroy all the Eaſt and South Saxons, ſith otherwyſe hee could not prouide for the ſurtie of his ſubiects, being ſtil in daunger to be murthered and robbed, ſo long as anye of that wicked generation of the Saxons remained here amongſt them.

By meanes alſo of the league, he had wyth him in this iourney ten thouſand Pictes, and as many Scottes: Eugenius nephew to king Conran by his brother Congall being generall ouer the Scottes, and Mordred the ſonne of King Loth by his wife Anne, gouerned the Pictes, a luſty yong gentleman, very wittie and towardly in al his doings. Furthermore Arthur vnderſtanding what hurt reſt and eaſe had done amongeſt his men of warre, cauſed them to keepe the fielde in al this iourney, and paſſing by London, lodged them a little beſide the riuer of Thames. But he himſelfe with ſome of his nobles, entred into the citie, cauſing ſupplications to be made vnto almightie God three days togither, for good ſucceſſe to folow againſt the Saxons. On the fourth day hearing diuine ſeruice celebrated by the Biſhop of London, and cauſing a ſermon to be made in the Market place, he committed himſelfe & his whole armie vnto the tuition of Chriſt, and his mother the virgin, whoſe Image in ſtreede of a badge, he bare in his ſhield continually from that day forward, as diuerſe heretofore haue written.

Arthures exhortation to his people.

After this, iſſuing forth of the citie, he willed al his men to be of good comfort, as they that fought in a iuſt quarell againſt Pagans, and enimies of the fayth. Mordred and his father in law Gawolane paſſed on before the battayles with fiue thouſande horſemen, and being come within fiue myles of the Saxons, who likewiſe were aſſembled in campe, there came from them vnto Arthur Ambaſſadors, requiring him to ſtay his iorney, for they were readie if they might haue libertie ſo to do, to depart out of the lande, with their goods and ſubſtance, without further moleſting the Brytains, either by one meanes or other.

An offer made by the Saxons vnto king Arthure.

Arthur would neither conſent hereunto, nor yet graunt a truce for three dayes, for the which they made earneſt ſute, but bad them depart for that time, only aſſuring thē that he woulde not come paſſing two miles forward for that day, ſo that if they thought good, they might returne to him in the morning, and haue anſwere what the chiefeſt gouernors of his hoſt thought touching their requeſt, by whom he woulde haue the matter more throughly debated. In the meane time whyleſt the Brytaines were buſied with hearing of theſe Ambaſſadors, & taking aduiſe what was beſt to do touching their demaund, the Saxons marched forth with all ſpeed, and cōming vpon Mordred and Gawolan at vnwares, they gaue the onſet freſhly vpon them, & that very muche to the diſaduauntage of the Brytains & Pictes, who notwithſtanding through the earneſt exhortation of their captains, receyued their enimies right fiercely, in doing that which was poſſible for ſo ſmall a nūber to do, howbeit in the ende oppreſſed with multitude, they were forced to flie and ſo did, not reſting till they came in ſight of the whole armie. In which flight, Mordred and Gawolan by help of their ſoldiers, being mounted vpon their horſes, eſcaped without hurt, though they loſt no ſmall number of their cōpanie, as wel in the fight as in the chaſe. The Saxons Ambaſſadors being not yet departed out of the Britiſh campe, were hereupon ſtayed till the next morning, and then had

But Arthure iudging that there was ſome newe ſubtill practiſe in hande vnder pretence of this newe Embaſſage, commaunded as wel theſe that came laſt, as the other which came firſt, to be kept in the Marſhalles tent, that in no wiſe they ſhoulde eſcape, whileſt he himſelfe in the ſeconde watch of the night departed out of his camp, with all his puiſſance, which he deuided into thꝛee battailes, & hauing marched thꝛee miles foꝛwarde, he was vpon his enimies ere they vnderſtode any thing of his cõming, inſomuch that the Bꝛitains had ſlain and chaſed the watche of the Saxons campe, befoꝛe it was certainly knowne what the matter ment. their cartes and cariages, and ſo reſiſted the Bꝛytains on that ſide foꝛ a ſeaſon: other of the Saxons hauing no leyſure to arme themſelues, noꝛ to dꝛaw into any oꝛder of battaile, by reaſon of the ſodaine inuaſion of the Bꝛytaynes, bꝛake foꝛth of the campe on the contrary ſide, and fled ſo faſt as theyꝛ feete myght beare them. But being purſued by the Bꝛytiſhe Hoꝛſemen, and beaten doꝛwne, a great number of them ranne into the next Ryuer, and there were dꝛowned, chooſing rather that kinde of death, than ſo cruellye to be murthered by the aduerſaryes handes: verily the Bꝛytaines ſhewed no mercie that day, foꝛ ſo manye as came within theyꝛ daunger, dyed without redemption. And this bloudie battaile made an ende of ſuch an huge number of Saxons, that it was thought they ſhoulde neuer haue recouered againe any puiſſaunce able to haue endomaged the Bꝛytaynes in any maner of wiſe.

The Saxons are put to the flight.

The cruelties of the Brytains in ſleaing the Saxons.

Arthure hauing thus banquiſhed his enimies, gaue licenſe vnto thoſe nobles which hee had deteyned (as is ſayde) in his campe, being ſent vnto him as Embaſſadoꝛs, to depart ouer into Germanie, appointing the reſidue of ſuch Saxõs as were men of no defence, to remain ſtil in the land, yeelding a yearly tribute vnto the Bꝛytains, and alſo with cõdition that they ſhuld become chꝛiſtians.

The Scottiſhmen and Pictes which had ayded the Bꝛytaynes in this iourney, ſoiourned awhile after at London, where Arthure feaſted and banketted them in moſt royall wiſe, ſhewing them al the honoꝛ that might be deuiſed, and afterwardes ſent them home right pꝛincely rewarded with many great giftes and rich preſents.

Arthu nifice

Whileſt ſuch buſineſſe as ye haue heard was thus in hand betwixt the Saxons & Bꝛitains, the eſtate eſtate of the Scottiſh common wealth, was gouerned by great wiſedome and policie, without any notable trouble or diſorder.

But finally when king Conrane beganne to waxe aged, and that ſuch as had the chief doings vnder him, ſought not the execution of iuſtice, but their owne commodities, to the hinderance of a multitude, the people began to repine thereat, and to practiſe a conſpiracie with diuerſe of the Nobles againſt Conrane, and thoſe which ruled by his appoyntment.

It chaunced that there was one Toncet, a mã of baſe byrth, aſſigned by the kings commiſſion to be chiefe iuſtice, or as it were Chauncelor for the adminiſtration of the lawes in Murrey land, a perſõ paſſing full of rygorous crueltie, eſpecially in iudgements of life & death, and in gathering vp of all maner of forfeytures of penall lawes which he did onely to purchaſe fauor of the king, by the enriching of his coffers, in reſpect whereof he had ſmal regard either of right or wrong, ſo that there were hope of ſomwhat to be gotten.

Amongſt other the violent doings of this Toncet, he cauſed diuerſe marchant men of the towne of Fozes in Murreyland (as thẽ the chiefeſt town of all that countrey) to be accuſed of treaſon by a light information, and in the end executed without any apparant matter, onely vpon a couetous deſire to haue their goods and riches, by cauſe they were men of great wealth and ſubſtance. Diuerſe noble men of the countrey there aboutes, & namely of the towne of Fozes, being partly of kin vnto thoſe marchants, were ſore offended with this act, and hereupon they firſt came vnto Toncet, & reuiled him with many high reprochful wordes, & afterwards fell vpõ him in the place of opẽ iudgement where he ſat as then in his iudgement ſeat, and there murthered him, getting them forthwith vp into the moũtains to auoyd the danger, which they knewe vnpoſſible for them to eſcape, if they ſhould happen to be taken whileſt Conran ſhould be liuing. After this, they deuiſed how they might encreaſe their heynous deed and bolde enterpriſe with an other far more horrible & notable, which was to ſlea the king himſelf, as the originall cauſe of all ſuch miſchief that then raigned in ỹ realme through the vnworthie gouernment of his vniuſt miniſters & couetous magiſtrates, hoping withall to obtain the fauor of ſome of the noble men, whom they knew to maligne the king & his coũſell moſt extreemly, & thereby in ſhort time to be aſſured of their pardon. Shortly after it chaunced that one Donald alſo gouernor of Athol, a mã in great fauour and truſt with the king, had vnderſtanding what theſe outlawes intended, & thereupon practiſed with them by priuie meſſengers, that they ſhould come in ſecret maner vnto Enuerlochtee, where the king ſoiourned, promiſing them by moſt aſſured meanes of othes & vowes, that they ſhuld haue al ỹ furtherance he could deuiſe towards the atchieuing of their enterpriſe.

Hereupon theſe outlawes according to their inſtructions, came in ſecret wiſe vnto Enuerlochtee and were cloſely conueyd into Conrans bed chãber by Donalds meanes, who as though he had knowne nothing of the matter, got himſelf quickly out of the way when he ſawe them once entred within the doore of the chamber. Conran the king perceiuing how he was betrayed, and that his enimies were got into his chamber ready to murther him, ſtept forth of his bed, & falling down vpõ his knees beſought them to take pitie of his age, & not to defile their handes in the bloud of their naturall lord and king, conſidering the fault was not his, if they had beene any wayes wronged. Howbeit they doubting nothing but leaſt he ſhould eſcape their hands, ſtraightwayes diſpatched him out of life, and withal made haſt away. This was the ende of king Conranus, in the. xx. yeare of his raigne, being the. xvj. of Arthurs dominion ouer the Brytains, the fifth of the Emperor Juſtinianus, and in the yeare after the byrth of our Sauior 531. But his corps was buried in ỹ Abbey of Iona, otherwiſe called Colmkil, wt ſuch funerall pompe & exequies, as in thoſe dayes were vſed.

Eugenius.

After him ſucceeded his nephewe Eugenius, the ſon of his brother Congall, the which Eugenius as aboue is ſayde, was with Arthure in the laſte mentioned iourney againſte the Saxons.

Eugenius is inueſted king of Scotland.

There were that counſayled him in the begynning of his raigne (which he beganne in Argile being placed there vpon the chaire of marble) that he ſhoulde ſee in any wiſe the auctours of his Vncles death duely puniſhed, to giue enſample to other, that they ſhoulde not attempt the lyke hereafter againſte theyr liege Lorde and crowned King: but he contrarywiſe did not onlye forgiue the offence, but alſo receyued the forenamed Donalde wyth other the murtherers into his ſeruice, and made them of his priuie Counſell, which cauſed many men to ſuſpect, leaſt he himſelfe had beene of counſell with them in committing that murther. The talke wherof, was ſo common in all mens mouthes, namely amongſt the common people, that the Queene Dowager late wife to king Conran, doubting not only the ſuretie of hir owne life, but alſo of hir two ſonnes (which ſhe had by the ſaid Cõran, the one named Reginan, and the other Aidan) fled with them ouer into Irelande, where within fewe yeares after, ſhe dyed with the one of hir ſonnes, that is to wit Reginan: the other Aidane was honourably brought vp by the king of that Countrey, according to his byrth and degree.

Eugenius in the beginning of his raigne, to win thereby the peoples fauor, demeaned himſelf moſt gently in al his proceedings, doing nothing that tasted in any part of crueltie. He woulde oftentimes ſit amongſt the Judges himſelfe, and if he ſuſpected leaſt any man had wrong, he wold licence them to pleade their caſe of new. And ſuch as he perceyued were not of abilitie to folow their ſuite in any cauſe of right, he would helpe them with money of the common treaſurie. He ordayned alſo, that no orphane ſhould be compelled to anſwere any action, or otherwiſe bee vexed by ſuite of law. Moreouer, that no widow ſhould be conſtrayned to come paſt a mile forth of hir own dores for any matter in controuerſie betwixt hir and any other perſon, to be heard afore any Judges or publike officers. Robbers, theues, and their receptors he cauſed to be duly puniſhed, to refrain other from attempting the like offences. And alſo he had a ſpeciall regarde for the obſeruing of the league betwixt his ſubiects and the Pictes, with the Brytaynes, according to the tenour of the ſame.

The humanity and fauorable friendſhip of king Eugenius towardes his people.

Commēdable ordinances.

About this ſeaſon ſhould it be alſo that Arthur did atchieue all thoſe worthie victories which are aſcribed vnto him againſt the Scots, Iriſh men, Danes, Norwegians, & other northren people. Moreouer it is written by ſome authors, that he ſhoulde ſubdue the moſt part of Germanie with the low coūtreys, Brytain, Normandie, France, and the Romaines, with the people of the Eaſt, but the credit hereof reſteth with ẏ ſame authors. Only it is certain (as Hector Boetius affirmeth) that Arthur liued in the dayes of Iuſtinianus the Emperour, aboute whiche time the Gothes, Vandales, Burgonions, and Frenchmen did inuade ſundrie partes of the Romaine Empyre, pitifully waſting and ſpoyling the ſame, where yet ſuche writers as haue ſet forth thoſe warres make no mention of Arthur at all. Therfore letting all doubtfull things paſſe, I will proceede with my author, and declare what he hath found written in ſuch Scottiſh Chronicles as he followeth touching the Britiſh Arthur, which for that it partly varieth from the other our cōmon chronicles, namely Geffray of Monmouth, I think it worthy to be noted here, to the ende that euery man may iudge therof as to him ſeemeth beſt.

The victorions conqueſts aſcribed to Arthure.

This cauſeth no ſmal doubt to ariſe of the greate victories aſcribed vnto Arthure.

Geffray of Monmouth.

To the purpoſe then: after the Brytains were deliuered from the terror of the Saxons, and that with quietneſſe they began to ware welthie, they repented them of the league, which they had concluded afore with Loth king of the Pictes, ſpecially for that they could not in any wiſe be cōtented to haue any ſtranger to raign amongſt them, and hereupon comming vnto Arthur, required of him, ſith he himſelf had no iſſue to ſucceed him, ẏ it might pleaſe him yet, to name one of his owne nation to gouerne them after his deceaſe.

The Brytaines repent themſelues of the league concluded with the Pictes.

The req the Bryt to haue their ov tion ap ted to ſu king A Arthure not gainſaying their requeſt, willed them (ſithe their pleaſure was ſuch, in no wiſe to haue a ſtranger to raigne ouer them) to name one themſelues, being diſcēded of the bloud royal, and ſuch a one as in whom they had perceyued ſome towardly proufe of wiſedome & valiancie: and he for his part promiſed to ratifie their election.

The Nobles with great reioycing of the people drawing togither to conſult for the choyſe of ſuche a one, as might bee acceptable to all the Brytiſh nation, at length agreed vpon Conſtantinus, the ſonne of Cadore Duke of Cornewall, a goodly yong Gentleman, both for his perſon and other his worthy qualities muche to be commended. Who being brought by the peeres of the Realme into the counſell chamber, and there preſented vnto king Arthure, as one moſt meeteſt to ſucceede him. Arthure accepted their election right gladly, and cauſed the ſame Conſtantine forthwith to bee proclaymed heyre apparant vnto the crowne, by the name of Prince of Brytayne, which notifyed him to be ſucceſſor to the king in gouernment of the realme.

Conſtan proclay heyre and prin Brytain

Conſtantine being in ſuch wiſe preferred, behaued himſelfe ſo honourably, and with ſuche a ſhew of gentle demeanor, that he wan him much prayſe, with an opinion of high worthineſſe amongſt all the Brytiſh nation.

In this meane time was Loth the king of the Pictes deceaſſed, leauing his name as a perpetual memorie vnto his Countrey of Pictlande, the which euer ſithence, as a remembraunce of his worthineſſe, hath beene called Lothian, or Lawthian. But his ſonne Mordred ſucceeding him in gouernment of the Pictiſhe kingdome, and hearing that Conſtantine was proclaimed heyre apparant of Brytayne, was ſore moued therewith, and immediately ſending his Ambaſſadors vnto king Arthure, complayned, for that contrarie to the honour of his kingly eſtate, he had broken the league concluded betwixt him and hys father late of famous memorie king Loth, wherin it was agreed amongeſt other things, that there ſhoulde none ſucceede in the kingdome of Brytayne, after Arthures deceaſſe, but the children begotte betwixt King Loth and his wife Queene Anne, or ſuche as diſcended of them: where contrariwyſe it was notifyed vnto the Pictiſhe people, that Conſtantine the ſonne of Cadore was elected Prince, and thereby enabled as heyre apparaunt to the crowne.

They required him therfore to cal himſelfe to remembrance, & not ſo lightly to agree vnto the flattering flattering perſwaſions of the Brytains, admiſing him vnto that thing which was meerely repugnaunt to reaſon, and agaynſt both Gods lawes and mans, admoniſhing him withall to obſerue the league, according to the othe, which he had ſolemnly taken vpon him, and to moue his ſubiects to do the like, leaſt for the contrarie, they ſhoulde prouoke the wrath of almightie God againſt thē, who is the iuſt reuenger of all ſuch as go aboute to breake leagues and couenanted pactions.

Herevnto anſwere was made, by conſent of the nobles of Brytayne, that the league whiche was concluded betwixt Arthur and Loth, endured but for the life times of them two onely, and to ceaſſe by eyther of their deathes: therefore Arthur had done nothing contrarie to any pact or promiſe made, but according to the duetie of a Prince that tendred the weale of his ſubiects, had prouided them one to ſucceede him of their owne nation, for doubt leaſt the realme after his deceaſe ſhould fall into the handes of ſtraungers, whiche in no wiſe ought of right to be ſuffered. Therefore if the Pictes loued the ſuretie of their owne eſtate, it ſhoulde be good for them to holde themſelues contented with their owne bounds, leaſt if they ſought for other mens liuings, they might happely within ſhort time perceyue, what doth enſue oftentimes vppon ſuch raſh and vnaduiſed attemptes.

The Pictiſh Ambaſſadours returning home with this anſwere, cauſed the whole Nation to take ſuch diſdaine therewith, that immediately they reſolued to reuenge their wrongs, by open warres: but firſt they thought good to trie if they might procure the Scottiſh mē to take part with thē in reuenge of ſuch iniuries as they had in like maner lately receiued at ỳ Britains hāds. Moreouer, repenting themſelues, that they had in times paſt ayded the Brytaynes againſt the Saxons, they purpoſe to trie if they might now moue the ſame Saxons eftſoones to make warres vpon the Brytains, thereby to be the better able to maintaine their owne quarell againſt them.

The Pictes purpoſe to be reuenged on the Brytaines by open war.

The Picts ſolicite both Scottes and Saxons to make warre vpon the Brytaynes.

Firſt ſuche Ambaſſadors as were ſent from Worgred vnto Eugenius king of the Scottes, found him very agreeable vnto their requeſts, and the ſooner, for that ſuch Scottiſh rebels as fledde vnto Arthure, were not onely receyued by him, but alſo mainteyned to make rodes and incurſions into the Scottiſh borders.

Eugenius the Scottiſh king agreeable to the requeſt of the Pictes.

Arthur hauing knowledge of the deuiſes of his enimies (the warres being firſt proclaymed) hee furniſhed all the ſea coaſts with notable numbers of men, to withſtand the landing of the Saxons, if they ſhould fortune to attempt any inuaſion. That done, he paſſed forth with the reſidue of his people towarde the Scottes and Pictes, who were alreadie aſſembled in campe, and were come as farre as the Ryuer of Humber, neare to the bankes whereof they had pitched their tents, as in a place fatall for the Brytaynes to be vanquiſhed in.

Both the armies being brought here into order of battaile, the one in ſight of the other, there were certain Biſhops of thoſe three nations, that tooke great paynes to ride to and fro betwixt thē, to exhort the kings vnto peace and concord, conſidering what miſchiefe & great bloudſhed ſhould enſue, if vpon wilfulneſſe they would ſeeke to trie that by dint of ſworde, which they might make an ende of, by meanes of amiable treatie & friendly agreement. Again, they could not do the thing that might more content the Saxons, common enimies to the chriſtian religion, than if by theyr encoūtring togither in battail, they ſhould ſo enfeeble their whole powers, whereby the Saxons might haue readie meanes and occaſion offred to execute their greedy deſires to cōquer ỳ whole ile.

Mordred and Eugenius were perswaded to peace.

Mordred and Eugenius were perswaded by this earnest trauayle of the Bishoppes, to putte theyr matter in compromise, and to lay awaye theyr armour and weapon, if they might haue assurance that the league made with king Loth should in euery poynt be obserued.

Arthure likewise at the sute of the same Byshoppes, would haue bene contented for his part to haue agreed hereunto, but other of the Brytayns, namely those that were of kinne and alliance vnto Constantine theyr Prince, coulde in no wise be perswaded thereunto, but rather with many reprochfull wordes rebuked the Bishops for theyr vntimely sute, seeing the enimies readie raunged in battaile at poynt to giue the onset, so that as they alledged it might be doubted what they ment by their motion, onelesse they were about to betray the army, vnder pretence of a cloked treatie for an vnprofitable agreement.

The Brytaines woulde not cõsent to haue any peace talked vpon.

These or such like wordes were vnethes ended, when sodainly the noyse being raysed on bothe sides, the battailes rushed togither right fiercely. The Brytaines had the disaduauntage of the place, being so encumbred in myres, bogges, and Mosses, that they coulde not well ayde themselues, nor handle their weapons to any purpose. Yet did the battaile continue a long time to the destruction of such numbers of men, that the riuer of Humber (neare vnto the whiche this field was fought) was so mingled with blond, that the water thereof being all ouer coloured red, caried no small multitude of dead bodies downe into the sea. In the middes of the fight, there was one with lowde voyce in the Brytish tongue, cryed out to the Brytaynes (of purpose prompted thereunto) that Arthure with other of the nobles on his side were slaine, and therefore it were but folly to trust any longer vpon victorie, but rather were it wisdome for euerie man by flight, to prouide for his owne safetie.

A craftie policie. This was one of the Pictes,

This voyce wonderfully encouraged the Scottish men and Pictes, but the Brytaines were put in such feare therwith, that the most part of them immediately herevpon fell to running away.

The Brytaines put to flight.

Other of them iudging this to be but a craftie and some subtile practise of the enimies deuised of purpose, as it was in deede, to discomfort them with, abode by it still, manfully continuing in fight, till they were beaten downe and slaine in maner euery mothers sonne.

This victorie being thus hardly got, cost more liues than any other had done of many yeares before: for of the Scottes and Pictes being vanquishers, there dyed in that mortal battaile aboue .xx. thousand men togither with Mordred, and a great number of the nobilitie of both the Nations.

Twentie thousand of Scots and Pictes slaine.

Mordred slaine.

Of the Brytains and such other as were with them in ayde, there were slaine what in battaile and in the chase, at the poynt of .xxx. thousand, among whom was Arthure himselfe, with Gawan or Galuan, (as some bookes haue) brother vnto Mordred, who bare such good will and entier loue vnto his Lord and maister the sayd Arthur, that he fought that day most earnestly on his side against his own naturall brother ỹ sayd Mordred.

Also there were killed Cayme and Gawolane with the most part of al the residue of the Britishe nobilitie, and many prisoners taken, by reason that Humber kept them in from fleing any way forth on the one side, whiche prisoners also were afterwards slaine, the gentlemen only excepted.

Cayme & Gawolan slaine.

The day next after the battaile, the campe of the Brytains was rifled, and amongst other rich spoyles, there was found Queene Guaynore Arthures wife, with a great number of other Ladies and gentlewomen. The whole spoile of the campe and field being equally deuided by lottes betwixt them, thent, the Scottes had for their partes certaine fayre Charets, laden with rich ſtuffe and iewels, alſo horſes and armors, beſide ſundry noble men, which they had to theyr priſoners.

Unto the Picts fell for their portion Queene Guaynore, with the Ladies and gentlewomen, and diuerſe other of the Noble men, beſides a greate quantitie of other riche pray and bootie. Theſe priſoners which the Pictes had, were conueyed vnto a Caſtel in Angus, called Dunbarre, a place of great ſtrength in thoſe dayes, thoughe at this preſent there remayneth nothing but the name with the ruynes thereof. In whiche Caſtell they were deteyned vnder ſure warde, during the reſidue of theyr naturall lyues. In witneſſe whereof there be remayning vnto this day, the graues and monuments where manye of thoſe captyue Brytaynes were buryed in the fieldes of a towne in that Countrey called Negill, not paſt ten myles from Dundee. But amongeſt the reſidue, that of Guaynore is moſte famous.

There goeth a plaine tale ouer all that countrey, tolde for an aſſured truth, that if any woma̅ chaunce to treade vpon that graue, they ſhall remaine barren withoute bringing forth any iſſue more than the ſayd Guaynore did. But whether this be true or not, certaine it is, as Boetius writeth, that there dare no women come neare that graue: not only eſchuing it themſelues, but alſo commaunding their daughters to beware therof.

This bloudie battaile weakened ſo much the forces both of the Scots, Pictes and Brytaynes, that many a day after they were not able to recouer againe their former eſtates or dignities.

The yeare alſo that theſe three nations encou̅tred thus cruelly togither, was after the byrth of our Sauiour 542. the .xxvj. of Arthurs raigne ouer the Brytaynes, and the .xj. of Eugenius his gouernment ouer the Scottiſh men.

The ſame yeare before the battaile, were ſene many ſtraunge ſightes in Albion. Graſſe and hearbes in Yorkeſhyre appeared to bee ſteyned with bloud. Neare vnto Camelon, a Cowe brought forth a Calfe with two heades. Alſo an Ewe brought forth a lambe, that was both male and female. The ſunne appeared aboute none dayes al wholy of a bloudie colour. The element appeared full of bright Starres to euery mans ſight continually for the ſpace of two dayes togither. In Wales there was a battaile betwixt Crowes & Pies on the one ſide, and Rauens on the other, with ſuch a ſlaughter of them, as before that time had not bene heard of.

But to proceed, Eugenius king of the Scots at his returne from the battail, gaue to thoſe that had eſcaped with life, and abid by him in the chief daunger of the fight, many bounteous and large rewardes. The ſonnes and neareſt kinſfolke of ſuch as were ſlaine, he alſo aduaunced vnto ſundrie preferments of landes and liuings, that they enioying the ſame, might bee a witneſſe in tyme to come of the good ſeruice of their auncelters ſhewed, in defence of their king and countrey, and alſo of his princely liberalitie, in rewarding the ſame vpon their iſſue and progenie. By whiche noble beneuolence, hee wanne him ſuche loue amongeſt his people, that afterwardes it ſeemed howe hee gouerned the eſtate of his kingdome more by clemencie, than by any rigour of lawes.

Eugenius gouerneth his people with clemencie.

The Brytaynes immediately vpon knowledge had that Arthur was ſlaine, crowned Conſtantine his ſucceſſor in the Britiſhe kingdome, and for that there ſhould remaine none amongſt them aliue to make any claime to the ſame kingdome, other than he with his iſſue, or ſuch as he ſhoulde appoynt to ſucceede him, they cruelly murthered Mordreds children, in moſte pitifull wiſe running vnto their mothers lap, beſeeching hir to ſaue their lyues, according to hir motherly dutie. They were brought vp in Gawolane their grandfathers houſe, and being thus made away, the family & lynage of their father the foreſayd Mordred was vtterly therby extinguiſhed.

Conſtantine crowned king of Brytayne.

The cruelty of the Brytains in murthering the innocent children of Mordred.

The lineage of Mordred clearly extinct.

The Saxons at the ſame tyme hauing aduertiſement what loſſe the Brytaynes had ſuſtayned not onely by the death of their moſt valiant king and chiefetaine Arthur, but alſo for the ſlaughter of ſuch a multitude of their nation, as died in the battail, they prepare a mightie nauie of ſhippes, and paſſe ouer with the ſame into England, where being landed, they eaſily beat downe the Brytaynes, and driue them with theyr king Conſtantine into Wales, ſo recouering all that part of the land which Hengiſt ſometymes held, & after his name was afterwards called Englād.

The Saxons returne into England, and driue the Brytaynes into Wales.

Some haue written, how that after king Conſtantine had raigned certaine yeares in Wales, his wife and children died, whereupon wexing weary of this world, he forſooke his earthly kingdome, in hope of that other aboue, and ſecretly departed into Ireland, where applying himſelf for a time in miniſtring to the poore, at length being knowne, by the perſwaſion of a Monk he became one of his cote and profeſſion. Afterwardes being ſent by the Biſhop of the Dioces ouer into Scotland to inſtruct the people of that countrey in the true faith and articles of the chriſtian religion, he there ſuffred martirdome by the hands of moſt wicked & godleſſe perſons, and was at legth (but many yeares after his death) canonized a Saint, and ſundrie churches (as are to be ſeene euen vnto this day) built & dedicated vnto him in Scotland by authorite of the Biſhops there.

dyuen into Wales, there raygned amongest the Englishe men one Iurmyrike the fifth (as Bede hath) from Hengist. The same Iurmyrike thoughe hee were not Christened hymselfe, yet hee permytted the Christian fayth to bee preached amongest hys people, and concluding a league with the Scottish men and Picts, kept the same inuiolate, during his life time most sincerely.

The Scottish king Eugenius also lyued in peare the residue of hys lyfe, wythout any trouble, eyther by forrayne enimies, or intestine sedition, and at length dyed in the 38. yeare of hys raigne, and after the byrth of our Sauiour. 569.

AFter his funeral obsequies finished in Colmekill, where he lyeth buried amongest his auncestors, his brother Conuall was chosen to succeed him in administration of the kingdome, a Prince of suche inclinatiō to vertue and godlinesse, as all men may iustly wonder thereat. He bare such zealous deuotion towardes the worshipping of the crosse (a thing to put men in remembrance of Christes passion as he woorke it) that which way soeuer hee rode, as it is reported he had ỳ same borne before him, and at his getting vp and lighting downe from his horse, he with all the multitude of people standing about him, would worshippe it in kneeling downe, and reuerently kisse it.

This Crosse was of siluer with a Crucifix thereon, and letters grauen in a plate fastened to the staffe, conteyning these two wordes: Christianorum gloria.

Crosses set vpon the tops of steeples.

He commaunded also that the signe of the Crosse should be set vpon the toppes of Steeples, and on the highest towers of the gates of Castels and townes. Moreouer he forbad the Crosse to bee grauen or paynted vpon any pauement, least any man should irreuerently treade vpon it. Furthermore he had priestes and other religious men in such honor, as nothing could be more, appointing them to haue the tenthes of all those fruites which the earth yeelded.

Conuals deuotion towardes Kirkmen.

Sundrie ordinances hee made also, for the grieuous punishment of all such as in any wyse misused a Priest, or other religious person: as he that gaue any of them a blowe, should lose hys hande for it: and he that slue one of them, shoulde forfeyte his goodes, and be brent quicke. Againe, he bestowed many riche iewels, and gaue diuerse great giftes vnto Churches, prouiding the ministers of sufficient liuings, and appoynted that they shoulde haue theyr houses neare vnto theyr Churches, to bee readie to execute that which appertayned to theyr offices, when anye neede requyred.

Conuals liberalitie to Churches.

The king beeing thus vertuously disposed, caused the whole number of his subiectes by his ensample to be the better affectioned towards the aduauncement of religion. The report and fame wherof, moued that holy man Saint Colme, or Colombe, to come ouer forth of Irelande (where hee had the gouernaunce of sundrie houses of Monks) with twelue other vertuous persons into Albion, and there gathering togither a great number of Monkes, being here and there dispersed abrode in the Countrey, hee placed them orderly in such houses, as king Conuall had buylded and founded for that purpose, appoynting amongst them rulers and ministers, suche as hee thought most conuenient.

Saint Colme commeuer for Ireland Scotlad

But Saint Colme himselfe, and the other twelue

twelue, whiche he brought ouer with him from Ireland, placing themſelues to inhabite in the Ile of Iona, now called Colmekill, toke great paynes to inſtruct the Scottes and Pictes in the true articles of the faith.

Amongſt the Pictes the ſame time the hereſie of Pelagius had infected the mindes of many, by meane that diuers of that nation hauing dwelled long time in Brytaine, returning into theyr countrey, brought that peſtilent doctrine home with them, and taught it vnto other. Saint Colme therefore informed hereof, paſſed into Louthian vnto Brudeus as then king of the Pictes, earneſtly trauelling to inſtruct bothe him and his people in the right beliefe, and to extype out of theyr heartes al erronious opinions of that damnable ſect of the Pelagians lore.

The ſame time that bleſſed man Kentigern, otherwiſe called Mungo, gouerned the Church of Glaſkew, as biſhop of the ſame, who reſorting into the companie of this S. Colme, had much conference with him to bothe theyr comfortes, concerning the true articles of our faith.

This Kentigerne was diſcended of the bloud royall of the Pictiſhe kings, as ſonne vnto that vertuous woman Thametes or Thanew, daughter vnto Loth king of the Pictes, whome a yong luſtie Gentleman (or as ſome haue written) the laſt mencioned Eugenius the Scottiſh king) rauiſhed by force, and begot of hir the ſayde Kentigerne.

Hee was greatly in fauour of the foreſayde Brudeus the Pictiſh king, as one that was nere of his bloud. For the ſame Brudeus was Nephew vnto the foreſayde Loth, by his brother cleped Melethon, and therefore ſucceeded in the kingdome of the Pictes, after that Mordred was ſlaine as before is expreſſed.

Kentigerne went with Saint Colme vnto the caſtle of Caledone, otherwiſe called Dounkeld, where they remained ſixe moneths in a monaſterie there, buylded by king Conuall, teaching and preaching vnto the people of Athole, Calidone, and Angus, that in great numbers came vnto them, to heare their godly inſtructios.

There is in the ſame place, where the ſayde caſtle ſometimes ſtode, a Church dedicated vnto Saint Colme, builte of fayre ſquare ſtone, being at this day a Biſhops ſee, commonly called Dounkeld, indued with many fayre reuenewes and great poſſeſſions, for the mayntenaunce of the Biſhop and his Canons. The biſhops ſee of Dounkeld.

At the ſixte moneths ende, thoſe two vertuous perſons taking their leaue eche of other, not without ſhedding of teares, departed in ſunder, Kentigerne returning vnto Glaſkew, & S. Colme into Irelande, where reporting many things, touching the great vertue and holineſſe of king Conuall, and with what deuotion he had bene receyued both of him and his people, he moued many to wounder greatly thereat, to heare that a king in the middeſt of all his allurements to pleaſure, ſhoulde yet be ſo mindfull of diuine meditations and godly exerciſes. Saint Colme returneth into Ireland.

The yeare following S. Colme prepared to returne into Scotland, taking Aydan ouer with him thither, by commaundement of king Conuall, whiche Aydan as ye haue heard to auoyde the traynes of Eugenius, fledde ouer into Ireland with his mother, for doubte to bee made away by the ſame Eugenius. Saint Colme commeth againe into Scotlād, brīnging with him Aydan ſonne to king Conranne.

S. Colme taking the ſea with this Aydan, and comming a lande on the coaſtes of Scotlande, was no ſooner there arriued, but that preſently hee had knowledge howe the king was dead, being the yeare of his reygne the .x.th after the birth of our Sauiour. 579. The death of Conuall.

578. H.B.

Saint Colme then being throughly certified of his death, and that the corps was forward on the way towardes Colmekill there to be buried, he thought it a peece of his duetie to go thither to be at the funerals, and ſo doing was as one of the chiefeſt there in the executing of the obſequies. Whiche being ended, and hearing that Kynnatyll the brother of Conuall was inthronized king in Argyle, by the free election of all the eſtates, he neuertheleſſe kepte on his former purpoſed iourney, and came vnto Kynnatyll, bringyng Aydan with him, (appointed by Conuall to haue receyued the gouernement of the kingdome if he had liued) they were bothe receyued with all benenolence of the ſayde Kynnatyll contrary to moſt mens expectation: in ſo much that embracing Aydan, he badde him be of good cheere, for it ſhould ſhortly come to paſſe, that he ſhould attayne to the poſſeſſion of his graundfathers dominion, and haue iſſue that ſhould ſucceede him to the greate reliefe of the Scottiſhe common wealth. Saint Colme preſent at the buriall of king Conuall. Kynnatyll elected king of Scotland. Saint Colme and Aydan receiued by Kinnatyll. The prophecie of Kynnatyll.

By what ſpyrite of prophecie he vttered theſe wordes, it is vncertaine, but ſure it is that his purpoſe was to haue giuen ouer the gouernment of the kingdome (as he confeſſed himſelfe lying vpon his death bedde) and to haue reſtored it vnto Aydan who had a right therevnto. Howbeit being preuented by death, he could not haue time to accompliſhe his deſire, for within .xx. dayes after his coronation, being ſurpriſed with a grieuous diſeaſe of a catarrike rewme and the ſquinancie, he was conſtreined to keepe his chāber, cōmitting the publike adminiſtration of the realme vnto Aydan. Herevpon followed a feuer through encreaſing of a flegmatike humor bred by long reſte, that after .viij. monethes ſpace vnbodied his ghoſt, whiche by the inſtruction of Saint Colme, being preſent with him at the houre of his death, he rendred in moſt deuoute wiſe into the handes of his redeemer. Appointing his kingdome as it were by deliuerie of ſeyſin, euen there vpon his death bedde vnto the foreſayde Aydan.

Aydan re uerth his i ſture of t kingdome the hande S. Colme.

AFter that the bodie of this Kynnatyll was entered, according to the maner, in Colmekyll, Aydan receyued the crowne ſitting vpon the marble ſtone, after the cuſtome in thoſe dayes vſed, by the handes of that holy father Saint Colme. Who willing that ſilence might be kept, layde his right hande vpon the kings head, and in his lefte hand holding his croſier ſtaffe, made a briefe exhortation, aſwell to the king as to his people, admoniſhing them of their dueties eche towardes other, but eſpecially he exhorted them vnto peace and concorde, and before al things to remember to walke in the wayes of the Lorde, for in ſo doyng they might hope for wealth and proſperitie, in the ſtate of their common wealth, with all other good graces, where as otherwiſe, if either of the people forgot their dueties towardes God, or that the king regarded not duely to execute his office, in giuing God thankes for his bounteous liberalitie and high benefites beſtowed vpō him, it ſhoulde come to paſſe, that inteſtine ſedition, conſpiracies, and other miſchiefes ſhoulde riſe amongſt them, to the irrecouerable loſſe of the realme, by bringyng the ſame into daunger to be ouerrunne by ſome forrayne power, if they did not repent in time, and call to God for his fauour that it might pleaſe him to reduce them agayne into the right pathe of his lawes and ordinaunces, when ſo euer they ſhould ſo fall from the ſame.

When Saint Colme had made an ende of theſe or the like his wholeſome aduertiſements, all the people reioyſing thereat, promiſed with one voyce, and therewith vowed to followe the ſame, and to be euer ready to obey the cōmaundement of their prince, and the holy inſtructions of their biſhops & other the Eccleſiaſtical miniſters. The aſſemble being once diſſolued, the king departed into Galloway, and there deliuered the countrey of certaine Britiſhe robbers, that had inuaded it.

After this, ſtudying to maintaine good orders and quiet rule through his dominions, he appointed an aſſemble of the chiefeſt peares of his realme to be holden yearely in three ſeuerall parties therof, as in Galloway, Louchquhaber, and Cathneſſe, there to heare & determine all ſuytes & quarels of his ſubiects, & to giue order for the adminiſtratiō of the lawes & al publike affayres, as they ſhould ſee cauſe, & occaſion. touching religion might be the better prouided for, and that the people might take all things done in those publike sessions in right good parte, bycause such an holy and vertuous father of the Churche was amongst them, and hauing the chiefest authoritie.

Thus continued the realme in quiet state for certaine yeares togither, till it chaunced that diuers of the nobles being togither on hunting, fell at variance, and therupon making a fray, sundry of them were slayne. The beginners & suche as were moste culpable were sought for, by the kings officers, to haue bene had to warde, but they in disobeying the arrest, stroke and beate the officers very sore, and immediatly therwith fled vnto Brudeus king of the Pictes, so by wilfull exile to safegard theyr liues.

Kyng Aydan requireth to haue certaine Scottish outlawes deliuered at the handes of Brudeus king of Pictes.

Brudeus by denying to deliuer the Scottish outlawes, procureth warres to him selfe and his countrey.

King Aydan, according to the maner in such cases accustomed, required to haue those outlawes deliuered vnto him, that he might do iustice vpon thē accordingly as they had deserued.

Brudeus taking pitie of the yong gentlemen, alledged many things in their excuse, still deferring to deliuer them, till at length hee procured warre to himselfe and his countrey: For Aydan the Scottishe king offended in that he might not haue those rebelles and publike offendors restored vnto him, he caused a number of his people, first to fetche a great bootie of cattell and prysoners out of Angus.

Wherewith the Pictes being kindled, made a like rode into Galloway. Finally the matter grewe vnto a fielde, whiche was foughten in Menteith, not farre from Caledon castell otherwise called Dounkeld, with great slaughter on both sides, though in the ende the victorie yet remayned with the Scottes, but losing Arthurnus the sonne of Aydan their king, they reioyced not greatly at the gaine.

The breach of peace betwixt the Scots and Pictes.

A field fought betwixt Scots and Pictes.

That holy mā S. Colme troubled with such newes, came vnto Aydan, and declaring vnto him howe grieuously he had offended almightie God in procuring suche mischiefe as had ensued of this warre, & reciting in particuler the brāches therof, he moued the king vnto such repentance for his trespasse, that he wholly submitted himselfe vnto Saint Colmes chastisement, who being about to departe in semblance sore offended, the king got him by the sleeue, and would in no wise suffer him to go from him, till he had declared vnto him some comfortable meane howe to redresse the matter, for the quieting of his conscience. At length Saint Colme lamenting the kings case, suffred himselfe to be entreated, and therupon repayred vnto Brudeus the Pictishe king, mouing him by way of diuers godly admonitions to incline his affection vnto peace. At length he did so much by trauayling sundry times too and fro betwixt the two kings, that he brought thē vnto agreement for al maters depēding in controuersie betwixt thē & their subiects.

Thus S. Colme hauing accomplished that which he came for, returned againe into the westerne Iles vnto his wonted home, where he did by wholesome documents and vertuous ensamples, instruct the seruaunts of God in the way of his lawes and commaundements.

In this meane time the Saxons hauing driuen and put backe the Brytons into Wales, and occupying all the residue of their landes and countreys, they deuided the same into seuen partes, ordeyning seuen seuerall kings, to gouerne the same as kingdomes.

England deuided into seuen seuerall kingdomes.

Ouer that of Northumberland adioyning next vnto the Pictes, one Edelfrede reygned, a man of exceeding desire to enlarge his dominion. He went about by all meanes he could deuise to perswade Brudeus the Pictishe king to renewe the warres with the Scottes, promising him all the ayde he could make against them, not onely for that he knewe the Scottes to haue bene euer enimies vnto the Saxons, but also for that hee himselfe was discended of the nation called Agathirses, of the whiche the Pictes as was thought were also come. But the cause why he wished that there might be warres raysed betwixte the Scottes and Pictes, was not for any good will he bare to the Pictes, but onely to the ende that theyr power being weakened through the same, he might haue a more easie pray of theyr countrey, the whiche he purposed vpon occasion to inuade and ioyne vnto his owne kingdome of Northumberlande.

Edelfred king of Northumberland.

Edelfreds purpose.

Brudeus at the firste gaue no eare vnto his earnest earnest motions and large offers, but at length through the counsell and procurement of some of his nobles, corrupted by bribes receyued at Ethelfredes handes, and still putting into the kings head sundry forged informations of the Scottish mens dayly attempts against the Pictishe nation, hee determined to ioyne with the Saxons against them, and caused thereupon warre to be proclaymed against the Scottes, as those that had spoyled and robbed his subiects, contrarie to the league & all bandes of old frendship and former amitie betwixt them.

A league concluded betwixt the Scots & Brytons, with the articles of the same.

The Scottishe king Aydan perceyuing the practise of the Saxons, and togither therewith the vntruth of the Pictes, the better to be able to resist theyr malice, ioyneth in league with the Brytons: This article beyng chiefest in the whole couenant: that if the enimies first inuaded the Brytons, then an armie of Scots should be sent with all speede into Brytaine, to helpe to defend the countrey against such inuasions: but if the Scottes were first inuaded, then should the Brytons in semblable maner come ouer to their ayde.

The Saxons hauing knowledge of this appoyntment betwixte Scottes and Brytons, to draw the Scottes forth of theyr countrey, and so to haue them at more aduauntage, procured the Pictes to ioyne with them: and so bothe their powers being united togither, entred into the Brittish confines.

The Picts and Saxons enter into the lands of the Brytõs.

Aydan according to the couenaunt, came straight vnto the ayde of the Brytons. Ethelfred and Brudeus refused to fight for certaine dayes, as it were of purpose, thereby to weary the Scottes with watch and trauayle, being as then farre from home. Also they looked dayly to haue Ceuline king of the west Saxons to come vnto theyr ayde: but the Scottes and Brytons hauing knowledge thereof, first thought it beste to encounter with him, before he should ioyne with the other, and thus vnderstanding that their only refuge remayned in theyr armure and weapons, gaue ẏ onset so fiercely vpõ those Saxons, that at the firste, slaying Cutha Ceulines sonne, with a great number of other, they easily distressed and put the residue to flight.

Ceuline or Ceolyn.

The Scots and Brytons put the Saxons to flight, & slewe Cutha the son of Ceuline king of the west Saxons.

Aydan would not suffer his men to pursue to farre in the chase, but called them backe by the sounde of a trumpet, who being assembled here- with about theyr standerds, made suche ioye and triumphe, as greater coulde not bee deuised, what with daunceing, singing, and playing on pipes and other instrumentes, according to the manner in those dayes.

The triũphant ioy made by the Scots and Brytons, vpon their newe victorie.

But as they were thus in the middes of their chiefest myrth, sodenly appeared the Saxons & Pictes, whiche were with Ethelfred & Brudeus, approching towardes them in good order of battell, with whom were also the residue of the west Saxons, that had escaped frõ the late bickering. Whereupon the Scottes and Brytons amazed with the sight hereof, were sodenly striken out of countenaunce, in somuche that Aydan went amongst them, and with a bolde countenaunce exhorted them to remember, how valiantly they had alreadie put to flight the other of theyr enimies, so that there was great hope for assured victorie of these likewise, if they would now shewe the like mãly courage against them, as they had shewed before in assayling the other. Many other wordes hee vsed in admonishing them to fight manfully, till the onset giuen by the enimies, caused him to make an end.

The soden feare of the Scots & Pict after all the great ioy & triumphing.

Aydan exhorted his men manfulnesse

The Saxons layde about them so stoutly in the beginning, that they forced their aduersaries, with whom they were matched, to giue backe. Neyther did Ethelfred fayle in that occasion to encourage them to follow the aduauntage nowe thus gotten.

The Saxons fight stoutly.

Ethelfred.

Brudeus with his Picts likewise made great slaughter in that wing of the Scottes, with the whiche hee encountred, so that finally the same Scottes perceyuing the Brytons beaten downe and sore distressed on their side, fell through discomfort thereof to renning away.

Brudeus king of the Picts maketh slaughter of the Scots.

The Scots runne away.

There were slaine in this battel on the Scottishmens side Brennius lieutenant, or as they termed him the Thane of the Isle of Man, with Dungarre the kings thirde sonne, and no small number of other Gentlemen beside. The king himselfe escaped by helpe of his sonne, who staying to get his father out of the preasse, was slaine (as is sayde) amongst the residue.

On the Saxons side, there was slaine Theobald Edelfredes brother, and Cutha the king of West Saxon his sonne, as before ye haue heard, with a great number of other. Ethelfred himself lost one of his eyes. Brudeus the Pictishe king was hurt in the thigh, and besides this, he loste a great multitude of his people.

Ethelfred one of his eyes.

Brudeus hurt in the thigh.

Thus Edelfred hauing got suche a notable victorie at Deglastone in Brytaine, hee coulde not be so contented, but eftsones assembling his people, and ioyning againe with Brudeus and his Pictes, the next sommer after inuaded Galloway, and beganne to robbe and spoyle that countrey, to the end he might eyther enforce the inhabitauntes, with other the countreys nexte thereunto adioyning, to yeelde vnto him, eyther els to bring them into extreeme pouertie in wasting all afore him.

certayne companyes of his enemyes, as he found them diſperſed abroade in ſeeking for preyes, then paſſing by their mayne armie, he commeth into Innandale, where he ioineth with the Brytons, beyng come ſo farre forward on their way to meete him.

The Saxons and Pictes hauing knowledge of their enemies doings, wanne ſuche a place of aduantage as they thoughte it an eaſye matter for them in keeping the ſame, to diſtreſſe both the Scottes and Brytaynes through ſtopping vp the paſſages, by the whiche they muſt of force paſſe, if they mynded to come forth of that dale. Theſe paſſages lay through certayne quickeſands, and by a ryuer which had but few fordes paſſable.

The Scots and Brytaynes perceyuing how they were thus encloſed, with all ſpeede trenched their camp about, reyſing certayne bulwarkes and turrets in places where they thought expedient, as though they had meante ſtill there to haue continued.

Aydan him ſelfe toke ſuche paynes in ſeeyng euery thing done in due order, that his people moued more through his enſample than by any exhortation, were moſt diligent in their duties, deſirous of nothing ſo much as to haue occaſion miniſtred, to ſhewe ſome proofe of their worthy valiauncies.

At length, when the enemies were moſt at quiet, and as was ſuppoſed, nothing in doubt of any attempt to be made by the Scots and Brytons, in the night ſeaſon, leauing a great number of fyres in their campe, they ſodenly diſlodged, and paſſing the water by ſecret fourdes, they entred into Cumberland, and ſo after paſſing into Northumberland, they waſted and deſtroyed with fyre and ſworde all that came within theyr reach: The report of which their doings brought Edelfred and Brudeus backe into that countrey to reſiſt theyr inuaſion, neither reſting day nor night, till they had got ſight of their enimies.

The next day, the ſouldiers on bothe ſides requiring battell, togither they go with great noiſe and dinne bothe of men and inſtrumentes. To much hardineſſe in the Saxons cauſed no ſmall number of them to be ſlayne, rather chooſing to die with reputation of manhoode, than to giue backe neuer ſo little ground to the enimie. Thus the battell continued for a ſpace, right doubtfull whiche way the victory would incline.

On the Brytons and Scottiſh mens ſide, there were foure chiefe rulers amongſt them, beſide Aydan himſelfe, as Conſtantius and Alencrinus Brytons, Callan and Mordock Scottiſh men. Eche of theſe taking a ſeuerall charge vpon him, did earneſtly apply their vttermoſt endeuers therein, encouraging their bandes to put away all cowardly feare, and manfully to ſticke to their tackle, ſithe by victory there was hope of eternall fame, beſide ſuertie of life, and aduauncement to the common wealth of their countrey, where otherwiſe they might looke for nothing, but the contrary miſhaps, as ſhame, rebuke and importable ſeruitude, ſo that the Scottiſh men and Brytons incouraged herewith, preaſſed vpō the enimies ſo fiercely, that at length aſwell the Saxons as Picts were compelled to breake their array, & fall to plaine running away: the Scots following ſo egrely in the chaſe, that more of their enimies were thought to die in the flight, than before there had done in ẏ battel. S. Colme as yet being aliue, and within his monaſterie in the Ile of Iona, had knowledge by diuine inſpiration (as the Scottiſh chronicles make mention of all theſe matters how they went, and at the very time that the battels were in fight togither, he had aſſembled a companie of right vertuous and godly diſpoſed perſons, making interceſſion for the proſperous ſpeede of their king the foreſayde Aydan, and at the very inſtant, as it was knowen after, that the Saxons began to flee (as they which had the ouerthrow) that holy old father ſhewed greate token of ioy and gladneſſe, declaring vnto his brethern by the ſpryte of ſecrete knowledge or prophecie, how Aydan had the better, and that his enimies were diſcōfited, willing them thereupon to giue vnto God thankes for the ſame.

The Saxons & Pictes diſcōfited & chaſed.

S. Colme endewed with the ſprite of ſecrete knowledge.

There was an huge multitude ſlaine in this conflict, but namely the death of Ceulyne king of the Weſtſaxons, with other two worthie Captaynes of that nation, made the ſlaughter more ſorowfull on that ſide, the one of them hight Cialyne, and the other Quhitellyne.

The day next after the batayle, the ſpoyle of the field being gathered togither, all that whiche was knowen to haue bene taken out of Galloway and other countreys of the Scottes, was reſtored by the kings authoritie vnto the owners againe. The reſidue which remayned was deuided amongſt the ſouldiers, the tenth parte onely excepted, whiche was diſtributed vnto Prieſtes and Curates, to beſtowe the ſame vpon ornaments for theyr Churches. The Banners and Standerds of the Saxons and Picts, with many other riche offerings, king Aydan ſente vnto the Abbey of Colmekill, there to remaine as perpetuall monuments and tokens of ſo notable a victorie.

In the dayes of this Aydan there was sente into Albion from Gregory the Pope of Rome, diuers learned men (amongst whom were Augustinus and Mellitus) to instruct the English people in the faith of Christ, whiche as yet they had not receyued. By the earnest trauell and exhortation of these instructors, Ethelbert king of the Kentishe Saxons was baptised with all his people. Edelfred king of Northumberlande moued vnto displeasure herewith, sente word vnto these Saxons of the south partes (as then all of them generally knowen by the name of Englishmen) that sithe they had forsaken the olde institutions and auncient religion of theyr forefathers, hee woulde surely from thence forth be no lesse enimie vnto them than vnto the Scottes and Brytons.

Valdred other wise called Baldred, the doctor of the Pictes.

There liued in these dayes that holy man Valdred a Scottishe man borne, but dwelling amongst the Pictes, whom he instructed in the right faith, and therefore was named the doctor of the Pictes. He departed out of this life within the Iland called the Basse, lying about. ij. miles off from the maine land within the sea where the Forth hath the entry betwixt the same Isle, and an other called the Bay. There were three parishes fell at contention for the buriall of his bodie, as Aldham, Tynningam, & Preston, so farre forth, that they were at point to haue fought about it, but that by councell of some discrete persons amongst them, it was ordeyned that they should continue in prayer for that night, & in the next morning stande to the order of the Bishop of the diocese, who was come thyther the same time to be present at the buriall. The next day in the morning there was found. iij. beeres with. iij. bodies decētly couered with clothes, so like in all resemblance that no man might perceyue any difference. Then by cōmaundemēt of the bishop and with great ioy of all the people, the sayde seuerall bodies were caried seuerally vnto the sayd three seuerall Churches, and in the same buried in moste solemne wise, where they remayne vnto this day, in muche honour with the cōmon people of the countreys neare adioyning.

A myracle be true.

After that the corps of king Aydan was buried in Colmekill, the nobles of the realme assembled togither in Argyle, aboute the election of a newe king. Where by the generall voyces of thē al, Kenethus Keyr the sonne of Conualle (sometime king of the Scottish men as before is mencioned) was nowe proclaymed king and crowned crowned according to the maner: but hee liued not paſſing .iij. moneths after, but died of a cankarike rewme falling downe into the artery called Trachea, and ſo ſtopped his lungs. He deliuered as it were the poſſeſſion of his kingdome, by way of ſurrendring the ſame into the handes of Eugenius ſonne to king Aydan, by conſent of all the nobles, a litle before he died, for that it was knowen he had a right thereunto after the deceaſe of Kenethus.

THis Eugenius was the fourth of that name, whiche had ruled ouer the Scottiſh men. As it is ſayde S. Colme prophecied that hee ſhould be king long before his fathers death: for when all the ſonnes of king Aydan were brought before him, and that Aydan demaunded of him whiche of them ſhoulde reygne after him, hee ouerpaſſing the reſidue (whiche he vnderſtode by ſecrete knowledge ſhould die in the warres) appoynted forth this Eugenius, called by ſome alſo Bzudus, declaring that it ſhould be onely he.

This Eugenius then beyng placed in the kingly ſeat, forgot not ſuch wholſome leſſons & vertuous precepts, as the foreſayd Saint Colme had taught him in his youth, ſo that ſtudying how to defende rather that which was his owne in peace and quietneſſe, than to ſeeke any wayes or meanes howe to enlarge it, by wrongfull encrochyng vpon other mens poſſeſſions, he grewe into ſuch fauour with all good menne, as greater could not be deuiſed. Unto offendors he was a ſharpe Juſticier, not ſparing any tranſgreſſour of his lawes, neyther in reſpect of nobilitie or otherwiſe, but rather thoſe gentlemen which miſbyſed themſelues in breache of good orders, he chiefly gaue order to ſee them puniſhed: where if they behaued themſelues worthily, and according to theyr calling, there was no prince more gladde than he to aduaunce them vnto honour.

By theſe and the like his princely doings, he was both beloued of his people and alſo dred. He neither fauoured the Picts nor Saxons of Northumberland, for that the one nation being Ethnikes perſiſted in their infidelitie, and the other ceaſſed not by all maner of meanes to ſupporte them, but yet taking a truce with them bothe, he firmely cauſed the ſame to be obſerued.

In the .x. yeare of his reygne Cinigell king of Weſtſaxons and Edelfred king of Northumberlande with ayde of the Pictes, banquiſhed Cadwallo king of Bzytons, and chaſed him into Scotlād, where he remained not long, ſayling from thence into Bzytain in Fraunce, & purchaſing ayde of the king there named Cadoal, returned vnto Wales, where banquiſhing his enimies the Saxons, & ſleaing many thouſands of them, he was reſtored againe vnto his kingdome. Cadwalle is reſtored vnto his kingdome Aboute the ſame time was Edelfred king of Northumberland ſlaine in battell, at a place called Wintringham, not far from the riuer of Hūber, by Redwald & Ethelbzeth, the one being king of the eaſt Angles, & the other of the middle Angles, in reuenge of ſuche iniuries as the ſame Edelfred had done vnto the Saxons of the coūtrey called Mertia, conteyning as in the Engliſh hiſtorie more plainly may appeare al thoſe ſhyres from the riuer of Thames vnto the riuer of Merſee in Lancaſhyre. Then was one Edwine a right Chriſtian prince, appoynted to reygne in his place, by the aſſignement of the two foreſayd kings Redwald and Ethelbzeth. See more hereof in England. King Edelfred ſlaine. Edwyne.

Whilſt theſe things were a doing, there were ſeuen ſonnes of the foreſaydr Edelfred, that deteſting the vntrue dealing of the Pictes, whiche refuſed to ayde their father in his neceſſitie, and doubting to fall into the handes of Edwyn, got them vnto Eugenius the Scottiſhe king for more ſuretie of theyr liues. Theyr names were Eufreid, Oſwald, Oſlaws, Oſwyne, Offas, Oſmōd, & Oſyk. Ebba the only daughter of Edelfred beyng taken amongſt other pryſoners, and eſcaping from hir taker, miraculouſly got a boate in the riuer of Humber, and with the ſame taking the ſea alone, without all humane helpe, (as hath bene reported) ſhe ſayled forth, and at length ſafely arriued at the poynt of lande which ſtretcheth forth into the ſea, in the mouth of the Forth, called euē vnto this day after hyr name, Saint Ebbes head, where being receyued by the Biſhop of that dioceſſe, ſhee was profeſſed a Nonne, and after continuyng in greate perfectneſſe of obſeruing that profeſſion, ſhe was inſtituted Abbeſſe of hyr houſe, ſhewing ſtill in trade of lyfe an orderly enſample for hyr flocke to followe. S. Ebbas head.

Eugenius the Scottiſh king did louingly receyue the ſonnes of Edelfred, though their father had euer bene a cruell enimie againſt the Scottiſh nation: and within a while after theyr comming into Scotlād, hearing oftētimes the godly ſermons and preachings of the Biſhoppes and Monkes (who in thoſe dayes continually gaue themſelues vnto that exerciſe) they finally abhorred theyr ſuperſticious idolatrie, and receyued baptiſme, that ſalutiferous ſigne and ſacramēt of our chriſtian religiō. Thoſe churches alſo which the Saxōs in time of ẏ warres had ouerthrowē & deſtroyed in Galoway & other coūtreys thereabouts, Eugenius cauſed to be repaired: moreouer alſo he reedified ſundry caſtels in thoſe marches, and placed in them garisons of souldiers, to defend them against all inuasions that might happen.

Thus continuyng his reigne the space of.xb. yeares or there aboutes in honorable peace, to the great aduauncement of the common wealth of his subiects, he lastly died in the yeare. 620. and was buried amongst his elders in the Isle of Iona, within the monasterie of Colmekill.

620.

About this time that reuerend father and Bishop Boniface Quirinus, came forth of Italy into Scotlande, to instruct the people in the faith of Christ there. Whether he were Pope resigning vp the papalitie came thus into Scotland (as some haue supposed) or whether he was sent from the Pope called Boniface that succeeded Sauinianus, it is not certainly knowen: but certaine it is, as the Scottishe writers affirme, that vpon his first comming into Scotland he arriued in the water of Taye, comming a lande at the mouth of a little riuer, whiche diuideth the countrey of Gowrie from Angus:

Bonifacius a godly preacher

His name is yet famous amongst the Scottes euen vnto this day: for that he trauailed through the most parte of the lande, in preaching and instructing the people to their confirmation in the faith, and erecting diuers Churches in the honor of almightie God, whiche hee dedicated to the name of S. Peter. And amongst other he buylt one at the place where he came a lande, an other at a village called Tullyne, not passing three myles from Dundee, & the third at Restennoth, where afterwardes an house of Chanons of S. Augustines order was buylded. At length hee came into Rosse, continuyng there the residue of his life, and is buried at Rossemarken.

There was also the same time amongst the Scottes an auncient godly man named Molock, who followyng suche rules and doctrine as in his youth he had learned of Brandon that reuerend Abbotte, he ceassed not to exhort the people of Mar and Argyle (in whiche countreys he was most resident) to flee and forsake their vicious liuing, and to endeuour themselues to imbrace vertue to the comfort and health of their soules.

This Molock kept continual companie with the forenamed Bonifacius after his comming into Scotland: and finally died also in Rosse, being about. 94. yeares of age, and was buried in the church where Bonifacius lieth, though they of Argyle say that his relikes rest amongst the in the Churche of Lysmore, whiche is dedicated to his name.

Ferquhard.

After the decease of Eugenius, his son Ferquhard succeeded in his place, for Eugenius had three sonnes, Ferquhard, Fiacre, and Donnewald. These being appointed by their father to be brought vp with Connane Bishop of Sodore (that is the Bishop of Man in vertuous discipline, did not altogither follow his godly precepts and lessons.

Ferquhard king of Scland.

Ferquhard and Donald gladly gaue eare to him, but they thought his instructions did not much appertayne vnto their birth and degree, but Fiacre printing his diuine documēts deeply in his harte, determined to forsake all worldly pompe and dignitie, and to get him some whither farre from home, where he might serue God more freely without lette or interruption of his frendes or kinfolke.

Fiacre gi himselfe t liue a so life in Fr

Thus being disposed, he got vpon him simple apparell, and went ouer into Fraunce, where seeking a solitarie place, Pharo the bishoppe of Meaux gaue vnto him a peece of ground, in the whiche at this day he is worshipped with great deuotion.

There hath gone a tale in that countrey, that no woman might enter into the Chapell where he lieth buried: for if any do, she hath some mishap that falleth vnto hyr, as either the losse of sight, priuation of wittes, or some such like.

As touching the state of the Scottish cōmon wealth vnder the gouernment of Ferquhard, the same was quiet inough without trouble of outward enimies, but his subiectes among themselues fell at such diuision, that euery parte of the realme was full of murder, brenning, and other destructions of men and houses, with such spoyling, robbing, ruing, and al kindes of other mischiefes, that no where was any suertie either of life or goodes: All the which misorders sprong, were nourished and maynteyned through the kings kings owne negligence, for he miſtaking his office and duetie, was of this opinion, that ſo long as the nobles and eſtates of his realme were thus ready one to kil an other, there was no likelyhood they ſhoulde haue tyme to practiſe any rebellion againſte him, and herevpon he rather holpe to further ſuch diſcorde amongſt them, than toke order for to appeaſe it. But it came to paſſe by this meanes, ẏ he was nothing regarded within a whyle amongſt them, ſo that by meanes of other arbitratours whiche they choſe by common agreement, all matters in controuerſies were taken vp and ended betwixte them, the kyng not once made priuie therevnto.

The ſame tyme it was noyſed abrode in the realme, that Ferquhard, beſide other his wicked behauiours, was alſo infected with the erroneous opinions of the Pelagian hereſie. Whiche ſuſpition was the more encreaſed, for that he vſed to haue ſundry Britiſhe prieſtes in his companie: the whyche nation had bene euer noted with the ſpot of that damnable infection. The nobilitie of the realme moued herewith, ſummoned him by an herálde to come to a counſel which they had appointed to hold of al ẏ eſtates, ẏ they might there vnderſtande, if it were true or not whiche was commonly reported of him. But hee refuſing to come at ſuche ſummonance, they aſſemble togither, & beſiege him in the caſtell wherein he had enclоſed himſelf, and winning the place, got him into their handes, & immediatly therevppon they committed him vnto ſafe keping.

The king is ſummoned by an herauld.

He is taken priſoner.

This done, they conſulte together for the adminiſtration of the realme, whether they ſhould quite depoſe Ferquhard, or reſtore him again to his place. In ẏ end they reſt vpon this agreemẽt to ſende an honourable ambaſſade into Fraunce vnto Fiacre, to require him to returne home into his countrey, and there to receyue the gouernement of the realme.

Fiacre (as the report goth) hearing that there were diuers of the Scottiſh nobilitie coming towardes him vppon this meſſage, in his prayers deſired feruently of almightie God, that it might pleaſe him ſo to worke for him, that hee might continue in his contemplatiue lyfe ſtill, and not be occaſioned to reſort vnto the troubles of the world, whiche all contemplatiue godly mẽ ought to abhorre. And euen as he had wiſhed it came to paſſe. For when thoſe that wer ſent vnto him came vnto the hermitage wherin he had his lodging, they found him (as appeared vnto them) ſo diſfigured with the leprie, that vpon his earneſt refuſal to forſake his ſolitarie lyfe, (which he had profeſſed to leade as an Anker) for any worldely preferments of kingly gouernement, they were content to returne with that anſwer, ſith his infirmitie (as they ſuppoſed) was ſuch, as was not conuenient for him that ſhuld haue any publike gouernement.

This Fiacre had a ſiſter named Syra, which hearing of hir brothers vertuous trade of lyfe, came vnto him with a company of godly virgines, & being of him confyrmed in hir purpoſed intẽt of chaſtitie, ſhe repayred into Champaigne in Fraunce, where ſhe with hir fellowes remayned in greate holyneſſe of life, leauing in thoſe parties a worthy memorie not forgottẽ amõgſt them there, till this day.

The forelayde Ambaſſadours returning forth of Fraunce, declared in what plight of deformitie they had ſeene Fiacre, and howe earneſtly he had refuſed the offer which they had made vnto him in name of all the ſtates of Scotlande.

The Scottiſh nobilitie hereupon aſſembling togither, choſe forth .iiij. of ẏ auncienteſt peeres amõgſt them to haue the rule and gouernement of the kingdome, till it were otherwiſe prouided. Theſe were named by that age, Wardens, and had full authoritie to order things as ſeemed them good in all poyntes.

In the meane time Ferquhard remayning ſtill in priſon and vexed with ſundry diſeaſes, to ridde himſelfe out of ſuch miſeries, ſlew him ſelfe in the .xiij. yeere of his raigne: and ſo nothing ſpared his owne life in the end, which had bin the occaſiõ of the loſſe of ſo many other mẽs liues in time of ẏ ciuil diſcord, that hee had euer noziſhed.

The deſperate ende of king Ferquhard.

After this wretched end of Ferquhard whiche happened in the yeere of our Lord. 632. the Lords of the land aſſembled togither in Argile, about ẏ chooſing of a new King, where by common cõſent, Donwald the third ſonne of Eugenius, beyng called thither with Byſhop Conan out of the yle of Man, was inueſted King with greate ioy and triumph.

Donwald.

Donewald king of Scotland.

THis Donwald hauyng taken vpon hym the royall adminiſtration, tranſtourming himſelfe into hys fathers maners, reſtored agayne into the former eſtate ſuche things as appertayned vnto Common wealth, and had bin in any wiſe decayed & miſgouerned by the ſlouthfull negligence of his predeceſſor Ferquhard, by meanes whereof he quickly grew into great fauour of his ſubiectes.

In the meane time Cadwallo King of the Brytons, and Penda king of thoſe Engliſhmen which inhabited that part of England aunciently called Mertia, ioyning their powers togither againſt Edwine king of Northumberland, depriued him both of life and kingdome.

King Edwyn is ſlayne.

After this, paſſing through ẏ whole countrey, and entring into the confynes of Pictland, they toke a great part of the ſame by force of armes from Brudeus king of the Pictes, who in vaine had ſued for ayde vnto Donwald king of Scotland, for that his vntroth had bin notifyed more than ynough in times paſt. But Donwald being certifyed of Edwines death, made meanes vnto Cadwallo king of the Brytaynes by hys Ambaſſadors, that Eufred ẏ ſonne of Edelfred might be reſtored vnto his fathers kingdõe, whiche Edwin had wrongfully vſurped. This being graunted, Eufred leauing his brethren ſtill in Scotland, came into Northumberland, wher by authoritie of Cadwallo and Penda he was inueſted king of Beruitia, that is, of the countrey, which is nowe called the Marches. For at the ſame tyme they hadde deuided the kingdome of Northumberland into. ij. kingdomes, appoynting Eufrede (as is ſayde) to reigne ouer the one called Beruitia, and one Oſryke ouer the other called Deira, a man of great wickedneſſe, as by his workes moſt playnly appeared. For certayn yeares after his aduancement to that dignitie, he found meanes to marie one of his daughters vnto the foreſaid Eufred, perſuading the ſame Eufred to conſente with him in reſtoring again the heathenith religion throughoute their whole dominions, and vtterly to renounce the chriſtian faith, which they had lately before receiued by ẏ inſtructiõs of the .ij. biſhops Conane & Pauline. But they enioyed not lõg in felicity after ſo wicked & moſt diueliſh a purpoſe: for the Princes of Albion, vnder the leading of Caduallo king of ẏ Britons, and Penda king of Mertia, with a great armie aſſembled of Saxons, Britons, and Pictes, entring into Northumberland, and encountring in battaile with Oſrike & Eufred, diſcomfited their power, & toke thẽ priſoners, who being put into a cõmon priſon, ſlewe eche other to auoyd ſharper tortures, which by due executiõ they dayly looked for. Then was the kingdom of Northumberland giuen vnto Oſwalde brother to Eufred, both in reſpect of the right whiche he had therto, and alſo of the zeale whiche he bare to the aduancement of Chriſtes religion, ſhewing him ſelf in conſideration therof, an earneſt enimy to his brother Eufred, and al his partakers, in ſo much that in the day of the battaile, he was one of the forwardeſt captaines againſt them: vnto this Oſwalde was ſente a Scottiſhman called Corman, to inſtruct the Northumberland men in the faith, & after him Aydan, as in the engliſhe hiſtorie ye may reade more at large: Finally he was ſlain by Pẽda king of Mertia, as in ẏ ſame hiſtorie appereth. His death chanced in ẏ third yere of Donnewald the Scottiſh king, who ſore lamented the ſame, as of that prince whõ he loued right entierly. Neither lyued king Donnewalde anye long tyme after the deathe of hys deare freende. For that in the fifteenth yeare of

of his reigne, being got into a boate to fish in the water called Lochtay for his recreatiō, his chāce was to be drowned, by reson the boate sonk vnder him. Certain days after, his body being found and takē vp, was buried amongst his auncetors in Colmekil, in the yeare of our Lorde. 647.

About the same time ther liued in France. iij. brethren of greate holinesse of life, being sonnes vnto Phitan king of Ireland, the which he begot of his wyfe Galghetes, descended of the lynage of the kings in Scotlande. The names of which. iij. brethren were as followeth, Furseus, Foillanus, and Ultanus. Furseus professing him selfe a monke of S. Benets order, passed ouer into Fraunce, there to set forth & enlarge that profession & being receyued of king Clowys began the fundation of a monasterie there called Latinie, in the which he placed Monkes of that order and began to sowe in those parties the seedes of the Gospel, but not without the darnell of mens traditions, as Jo. Bale sayth in the. xliij. centurie of the Brittish writers. His two brethren Foillan & Ultan folowed him ouer into France, and both by worde and example instructed the Frenchmē to imbrace the faith of Christ, & to renounce ỹ religion of the Gentils: so ỹ it seemeth as yet, such as professed themselues to be monks, & men of religiō (as they were called) had not left of to labor in the Lords vineyard, spending their tyme in reading the scriptures, to instruct & teach others, and to exercise prayer and thankesgiuing: So as no small number by their wholsome doctrine and good example, were conuerted to the christian faith. Foillan at length was martired in a monasterie whiche he hadde founded in France called Fosse.

About the same tyme there was also a contēsion amongst them in Albion for keeping of the Easter day, the Scottish bishops & some of the Brytons barying in their account from all other prelates of the West: but at length through perswasion of the Pope they confessed their error (if it ought so to be taken) and cōsented to celebrate that feast according to the accompt of other nations. These things chaunced in the days of king Donwald.

AFter the decesse of Donwalde, his nephewe Ferquhard the sonne of his brother, the other Ferquhard, succeeded in gouernemente of the Realme, a man of quicke & liuely spirit, but enclined neuertheless rather vnto euill than vnto good, specially after he had attayned the crowne, in somuch as it was commonly spoken of him, that from a liberal and most gentle humane person, he was sodenly changed into an insatiable & most cruell monster. Before he came to ỹ crowne he was liberall beyonde measure. There was no gentleman ỹ wanted money, eyther to redeeme his lands engaged, or to bestow in dower for the mariage of his daughter, but if he had wherwith to helpe him, hee might accompte him selfe sure thereof.

Priests and other deuoute persons, specially such as were poore and in any necessitie, he oftentimes most bountifully releeued to their greate ease and comfort. To be briefe, suche a readinesse was in him to help al mē, that (as was thought) he could better be contented to want himself, thā to see other men haue neede of any thing ỹ was in his possession, so that al men iudged him most worthy of all princely authoritie. But after he was once placed in the kingly seate, he so altered his conditions, that men coulde not but wonder muche therat. Where, before he was knowne to be liberal, wel disposed, righteous, sober, and a reformer of offences, he was now forthwith become couetous, wicked towards god, a tormentor of the iust & righteous people, and insatiable in all vnlauful affections. That which before time he had giuen vnto any of ỹ nobilitie, he now without al shame most vncurteously demaunded to be to him restored, alledging that he did but lend it for the time. And such as went about to delay restitution preceding any excuse, he caused their goodes to be confiscate, and also their bodies to be cōmitted to prison: Now and then he found meanes without cause or matter to put some of them to cruel death. Suche of the Prelates as he vnderstode to be wealthy, he rested not till he had piked one mater or other vnto them, wherby they were sure to forfaite all their treasure vnto his coffers, that neuer myght be filled.

Giftes are required as a loan.

Loe, what a pretence couetousnes hath.

For their goodes sake prelates are troubled.

The bishops of the realme, namely those two reuerend fathers, Colman & Fynnian, perceyuing such wickednes in the prince, blamed him sharply sundry times for the same: & at length bicause they saw howe he regarded not their admonishments, he was by them excōmunicate: whereof he so little passed, that when other wente vnto the church to heare diuine seruice, he woulde get him to the woodes & forrests to hunt the harte, or some other game. Neither were suche wanting as were willing to keepe him companie: so redy is the nature of man at all tymes to follow licētious libertie. He vsed also, contrary to the custome of his countrey, to eate. iij. meales a day, hauing such number of dishes and abundance of delicate fare, as the like had not bene vsed at any tyme before those dayes in that realme: and all to serue his greedy appetit, together with theyrs that followed his companie.

The kyng is excommunicated.

The king is hunting.

He was a glutton.

very late in the night, hauing his banketting diſhes and cuppes to come in one after an other, till he were ſo miſtempered, that being layde to ſleepe he would ſtreyght vomite out ſuch heauy gorges as he had in ſuche moſt glutteous wiſe receiued. Herevnto he was ſo drouned in the filthie luſt of the fleſhe, that hee defiled his owne doughters: and for that his wife was aboute to diſwade him from ſuch vilanie, he ſlew hyr with his owne handes.

A prophecie.

Thus continuing in his wickednelle certain yeares, at length the nobles began to conſpire againſt him, ſo that they wold haue deuiſed meanes howe to haue rid him out of the waye, if biſhop Colman had not forbidden them that practyſe, prophelying as it wer by diuine inſpiration, that Ferquhard ſore detelling his owne wicked doings, ſhould ſhortely be puniſhed by the handes of Almightie God, according to his deſeruings.

The king is ſicke

And ſure his wordes proued true: for within a moneth after, as the ſame Ferquhard followed in chaſe of a wolfe, the beaſte beeing enraged by purſuite of the houndes, flewe backe vppon the king, and ſnatching at him, did wounde & byte him righte ſore in one of his ſides, immediately wherevpon, whether thorough anguiſhe of his hurt, or by ſome other occaſion, he fel into a moſt filthie diſeaſe: for a venemous humoure with a ſoft conſuming heate, did ſo eate and waſte hys membres and limmes, that a lotheſome ſighte it was to beholde the ſame: for out of his legges, feete and priuie partes, there iſſued filthie corruption and matter, with ſo vile a ſauour, that vneth myght any creature abide it. His belly was ſwollen as though hee had ben infected with the dropſy, & therto was it verie hard withal. Finally lyce bred ſo abundantly in his ſecrete partes that he might in no wiſe be rid or clenſed of them.

He ſent confeſſo

At length when he had ben vexed in this ſort for the ſpace of two yeares togither, or therabouts, he began to call himſelf to remembrãce, and to conſider howe this puniſhment was worthyly fallen vpon him for his ſins, and therupon cauſing biſhop Colman to be fetched vnto him, being as then about .xx. myles off, he confeſſed vnto him the whole ſumme of his offences, declaring himſelfe right penitent for the ſame.

The king being excõmunicated, is releaſed.

Colman reioycing herat, did not only releaſe him of ỹ ſentence of excõmunication, pronoũced againſt him, but alſo willed him to be of good cõfort, & to put his confidẽce in ỹ mercy of almightie god, who was ready to receiue al ſuch ſinners as turned vnto him with repentãt harts: ſo that being put in hope by theſe & ỹ like wordes of Colman to haue forgiueneſſe of his ſinnes, with bitter teares, he beſought God to haue mercie vpon him: & humbly receiuing the ſacrament, got him into ſimple clothing of heare & ſackclothe. Then cauſing himſelf to be born into ỹ next fieldes, he there yelded vp the ghoſt in ỹ preſence of Colmã who according to the dutie of a good ghoſtly father, was ſtil about him, in exhorting him to cõmit himſelf wholy to the mercy of God, & not to doubt but he ſhoulde be ſure to attayne the ſame.

Ferq yeld the

Thus

Thus Ferquhard ended his life in the. xviij. yeare, after he began his reigne ouer the Scottiſh men, and in the yeare of grace. 664.

In this Ferquhardes daies Biſhop Aydan departed this worlde, & then was Fynnan ſente for, forth of Scotland to take vppon him the gouernmēt of the Chyrche of Lyndefern, where the Biſhops of Northumberland as then had theyr ſee. This Fynnan was well learned, and no leſſe renowmed for his vertuous lyfe than his predeceſſour Aydan. He died anone after the deceaſſe of Ferquhard, & then was Colman remoued vnto that ſee of Lyndefern, who with his vertuous inſtructions and enſamples of holy life conuerted a great multitude of Saxons vnto the true worſhipping of the liuing God. And amongſt other was Penda ſonne to the former Penda, king of Mertia.

There be that wryte how Penda the father alſo was baptiſed by this Colman: and that the ſame Colman trauayled through the moſt parte of all the Engliſhe prouinces ſetting forth the worde of life amōgſt the people, purchaſing him greate fame for his worthie merites. He came to the church of Lyndefern in ẏ daies of Maldwyn that ſucceeded the laſt mencioned Ferquharde.

This Maldwyne was the ſonne of king Donewalde: and after that Ferquharde was dead and buried in Colmekill, he was inueſted king: which function he right ſufficiētly diſcharged, ſtudying to mayntayne peace with his neighbors the Picts, Saxons, and Brytayns: giuing thereby a good enſample to be followed of his ſubiectes. Hereto he had a ſpeciall care for the adminiſtration of the lawes in due forme and order cauſing offendors to be puniſhed, that other harmeleſſe perſons might liue in quiet, ſo that by this meanes all things in the beginning of his reigne had proſperous ſucceſſe.

Afterwardes there fell no ſmall diſcorde betwixt them of Lennox & Argile: for firſt through brauling amongſt the heardes men, theyr maſters made a fray, whereof roſe ſuche deadly enimitie betwixt the parties, by reaſon that the inhabitantes of the Weſterne Iſles ayded them of Argyle, and the people of Galoway the other of Lennox: that if the king had not come into thoſe parties to apeaſe the buſineſſe, and to haue puniſhed the offendors, there had enſued muche manſlaughter, to the greate daunger of the vtter ruyne of thoſe countreys.

The weſterne Iſles take parte with Argyle.

Galoway with Lennox.

The king at his arriuall amongſt them, minded not to purſue the people that followed theyr Captaines, but rather the Captaines and Authours of this tumulte themſelues. Whereof they hauing knowledge, made an attonement togither, being enforced thereto of neceſſitie, ſo to auoyde the prepared puniſhment deuiſed by the king againſt them. And forthwith they fled ouer into the Iſles, but the inhabitants doubting the kings diſpleaſure, would not conſent to ſuccour them, but contrarywiſe toke them and deliuered them to the kings officers, whereupon they were ſafely conueyed to the places where they were borne, and there ſuffered their deſerued execution. Thus that commotion vnaduiſedly begonne, was ſpeedily appeaſed, and the name of Maldwyn by reaſon hereof ſo feared amongſt his ſubiectes, that during his reigne no ſuche trouble chaunced in any parte of all his dominions.

Maldwyne wēt about for to puniſhe the author of this commotion.

The Captaines became frends togither, and fled into the Iſles.

The Ilandmen apprehend the Captaines of the rebelles.

After this he went ouer into Iona or Colmekill, where perceyuing the Abbey Church, wherein his auncеſtors had theyr ſepultures to be in decay, he cauſed it to be pulled quite downe, and workemen forth with ſet in hande to buylde it vp agayne, at his owne proper coſtes and charges. Suche ſpeede alſo was vſed about this worke, that before he departed out of this life, the ſame was finiſhed and dedicated vnto our Sauiour Chriſt, and Saint Colme.

He buyldeth the churche of the abbay of Colmekill,

Aboute the ſame time there reigned through out the moſt part of the world a ſore & grieuous peſtilence conſuming a greater number of men, (before it ceaſſed) then were left aliue: for it continued the whole ſpace of three yeares togither. At length through cōmon prayer, faſtings, giuing of almes, and other vertuous workes, the wrath of almightie God was pacified, ſo that ſuche great mortalitie by his mercyfull appointment did ſtay and giue ouer.

A great peſtilence & death vpon earth.

The Scottiſh men were free from that infection aſwel at that time, as alſo for many yeares after. Neither were they in maner troubled with any ſharpe feuers, or agues, till time that omitting the auncient and wholeſome ſparenеſſe of diet, which theyr fathers in times paſt had vſed, they fell vnto riotous banqueting and exceſſiue feeding, whereby they became ſubiect vnto all kindes of diſeaſes, through malicious humors growing thereupon.

Scotland was free of the peſtilence and plague.

Colman erected a monaſterie.

After the departure of Colman forth of Northumberland, the people of that countrey ioyning with the Pictes, made ſundry roades into the Scottiſh bordures: whiche iniurie when Maldwyne reuenged with more diſpleaſure done to them of Northumberland, than the Scottiſhme had receiued, it cauſed the Picts & Northumbers to prepare themſelues with all ſpeede to haue made ſharpe warres againſt the Scottes: but in the meane time Maldwyne died, being ſtrāgled in his bedde one night by his owne wife, vpon ſuſpition of gelowſie, for his vnlawful company keping with an other woman. The next day after ſhe was apprehended with thoſe that were priuy to the deede, and brent openly vpon an hill, according as ſhe had moſt iuſtly deſerued.

Eugenius.

Eugenius the fifth.

After him ſucceeded Eugenius the fifth of that name, Nephew to Maldwine, as ſonne to his brother Dongard. About the ſame time Eugenius king of Scots ſēt with al diligence his ambaſſadours vnto Egfred king of Northumberland, to moue him vnto peace. Egfred hauing heard the ambaſſadours which were thus ſente, fayned as though hee had bene willing to haue had peace, where he minded nothing more than to haue warres with the Scottes, ſo ſone as his prouiſion ſhoulde be once readie, and herevpon graunted to them a truce for the ſpace of. xj. moneths, in which meane time he might make his preparation.

Egfred king of Northumberland.

A truce graūted.

Eugenius hauing ſome ſecrete knowledge of Egfredes purpoſe, prouided likewiſe for the warres on his parte: but for that hee would not ſeeme to gyue the occaſion, hee ſtraytely commaunded that none of his ſubiectes ſhould be ſo hardie as to attempt any thing ſounding to the breache of the truce.

Eugenius his cōmandemēt.

In the tenth moneth Egfred hauing all his preparation readie, ſente a companie of his men of warre into the Scottiſhe bordures to fetche ſome bootie, whereby the peace might be broken. Thoſe that were thus ſent fetched not only from thence a great number of cattell, but alſo ſlewe diuers of the borderers that wēt about to reſcue theyr beaſtes and cattell.

The truce broken.

Immediatly herevpon were there ſente ambaſſadours from Eugenius to demaund reſtitution: but they not without muche ado, after certaine dayes attendaunce, got audience, and boldly declaring vnto Egfred theyr meſſage, receyued for anſweare a playne publication of warre. For he alledging how the Scottes, ſithence the truce was graunted, had ſundrie tymes fetched booties out of the confines of his dominions, and therefore had well deſerued farre more domage than as yet they had receyued, wherevppon hee minded not to continue frendſhippe with them that knewe not how to keepe theyr hands from robbing and ſtealyng from theyr neighbours: So that he commaunded them to declare vnto theyr king, that within eight dayes after, hee ſhould looke for open warre at the handes of him and other his alies.

Eugenius receyuing this anſwere from Egfred, beſought of God, ſith the other onely ſought to violate the peace, that the vengeance mighte light vpon his owne head, that had thus giuen the occaſion.

Herewith gathering his power togither, hee repayred into Galloway, into the whiche he had knowledge that his enimies would firſte enter. But before hee could get thyther, a great armie of Engliſhe men, were come already into that countrey, and had allieged a ſtrong caſtell called Downſke, the chiefeſt fortreſſe in thoſe dayes of all Galloway. And ere Egfred might winne the ſame, hee was conſtrayned to rayſe his ſiege, and to marche forth to encounter with Eugenius who haſted faſt towards him. They mette neare to the bankes of the water of Lewyſe, as then beyng very deepe, by reaſon it was rayſed with abundaunce of rayne whiche lately before had fallen, where they fought a right ſore and bloudie battayle: for the Scottes had vowed neuer to gyue grounde to the enimies, ſo long as any life remayned in theyr breſtes.

At the firſte there was no greate aduauntage perceyued on eyther ſide, the kings, according to the dueties of valiant Captaines, exhorting their people to ſticke to it manfully: but in the meane time certaine bandes of Egfredes parte getting themſelues to the ſide of an hill, gaue the loking on without comming downe at all to ayde theyr frendes: whiche maner the reſidue of his people perceyuing, doubted of ſome treaſon deuiſed againſt them, and therevpon began to ſhrinke backe.

Egfred aduiſed thereof, came amongſt the foremoſt rankes of his batayle, deſiring the Engliſhmen in no wiſe to giue place to theyr enimies: and for that dayes ſeruice hee promiſed them highe rewardes, and all the pleaſure that afterwarde hee might be any wayes forth able to ſhew them.

But whileſt he was thus buſilie occupied in comforting & exhorting his men to fight ſtoutly, he himſelf chaunced to be wounded in the face with an arrow, ſo ſore, that immediatly he fell downe and died in the place.

The Engliſh mē diſcouraged with this miſchance, were quickly therupō put to flight & chaſed, a great nūber of thē toke ẏ riuer ſo to eſcape the enimies hands, of whom the more part being preſſed downe by weight of theyr armure, were drowned in the raging waues of the floude, the reſidue by caſting from them theyr armures and clothes, eſcaped by ſwimming ouer to the other ſide, but thoſe that made theyr courſe by lande, being cumbred in myres and moſſes, alſo amongſt ſtraytes, rockes, mountains and cliefes, were ouertaken by the Scottes and ſlayne. Few of that number eſcaped away in ſafetie, ſo that there died in the fight and chaſe at the poynt of twentie thouſand Saxons with theyr king the forſayd Egfred: of the Scottes were ſlaine, beſide thoſe that were hurt and woūded, not many aboue. vj. M. By this ouerthrowe the force of thoſe Saxons or Engliſh men of Northumberland was not onely ſore diminiſhed, but alſo of ſuch other Saxons, the which in no ſmall numbers were come vnto Egfred to ayde him againſt the Scottes in that iourney.

Twētie thouſande Saxons ſlaine.

Brudeus the Pictiſhe king hauing knowledge of this ſlaughter, whiche had chaunced betwixt the Engliſh men and Scottes, was nothing ſorie, as one that was frende to neither parte, and now perceyuing that the Northumberland men were ſo weakened, that they were not able to reſiſt an inuaſion, he entred with his whole power, which he had rayſed, into Northumberland, ſore afflicting the inhabitants, in ſo much that he had vndoubtedly either ſubdued that countrey wholly vnto his dominion, eyther els vtterly deſtroyed it, had not the deuout prayers of Saint Cutbert (who as then held the ſee of Lyndefar) preſerued the people from that preſent deſolation. For at length after the Pictes had raged a while through the countrey, they chaunced to fal at variance amongſt themſelues for parting of the ſpoyle, and buckling togither by the eares, there was an huge ſlaughter made amongſt them. And this was the cauſe, that contenting themſelues with thoſe countreys about Barwike, aunciently called Deera, out of the whiche they expelled the Saxons, they abſteyned from all the reſidue, as not willing to deale withall. Neither were the Saxōs of Northūberland being thus ſcourged, able to recouer theyr former forces again of many yeares after.

Here is to be noted that where as ẏ Scottiſh writers aſcribe the victorie of that battel, wherin Egfred was ſlaine, vnto their king Eugenius, Beda which then liued, declareth that the Picts were thoſe that fought with him and ſlew him. Finally, Eugenius departed this life in the. iiij. yere of his reigne, and after the incarnation. 688.

After Eugenius the. v. ſucceeded Eugenius the. vj. who was the ſonne of Ferquhard, and by perſwaſion of Biſhop Adannan (with whom he was brought vp) and of S. Cutbert, hee entred into league with the Northumberland mē: but he would at no hande ioyne in amitie with the Pictes, notwithſtanding hee was contented to take truce with them. But when hee ſawe the ſame oftentimes by them violated and broken, to the great perill, domage & hinderāce of his ſubiectes, he cauſed the warre to be proclaymed, Wonderfull viſions ſeene.

Many wonderfull viſions were ſeene that yeare in Albion, as the Scottiſhe chronicles make mention. In the riuer of Humber there appeared in the ſight of a great multitude of mẽ, a number of ſhippes vnder ſayle, as though they had bene furniſhed forth for the warres.

In the Churche at Camelon there was heard a noyſe, as it had bene the clattering of armure.

Milke was turned into bloud in diuers places in Pictland, and cheeſe conuerted into a bloudie maſſe or cake. Corne, as it was gathered in the harneſt time appeared bloudie. In the furthermoſt partes of Scotland, it rayned bloud.

These ſightes being ſeene of ſome & declared to other, cauſed a wonderfull feare in the peoples harts, imagining ſome great alteration to enſue.

Ambirkeleth.

Ambirkeleth ſucceedeth Eugenius the ſixte.

AMbirkeleth the Nephew, or as ſome ſay, the ſon of Eugenius ỳ fifth, ſucceeded Eugenius ỳ firſt in the gouernment of the realme: who after his attaynyng to the crowne, ſhortly chaunged therwith his maners & good diſpoſitiõ: for where before he ſhewed himſelfe to be an earneſt defendor of the poore & ſimple, that al men iudged that he would haue proued a patrone of all vertue, he cõtrary to ỳ expectatiõ, became ſodẽly a paterne of al vices & couetouſneſſe, deliting in nothing but in following his ſenſuall luſtes, as in taking exceſſe of meates and drinkes, and wallowing in fleſhly concupiſcence of lecherous luſte. To bee briefe, when hee toke nothing in hande worthie of his eſtate and degree, it was thought that of neceſſitie the forme of the publike gouernement muſte needes through his negligent ſlouthfulneſſe fall into decay and ruine: whereupon Garnard king of the Pictes ſuppoſing hee had a conuenient time to reuenge all former iniuries receyued at the Scottiſhe menues handes, gathered a great hoſte of menne, and with the ſame entring into the Scottiſh confines, made right pitiful ſlaughter of the inhabitants. At length Ambirkeleth (being ſore blamed of his Nobles for his negligence in ſuffering his ſubiectes thus to be deſtroyed) gathered an armie togither, and with no ſmall feare to ſhewe his head amongſt his people, (as thoſe Princes whiche through theyr owne defaulte haue theyr people in miſtruſt, do euer ſtand in doubt of their owne ſafeties, and namely when any preſent daunger beginneth to appeare) forth yet he goeth without any great good order (God wote) for what might be looked for at his handes, whiche was ſo ouerwhelmed with all kind of exceſſiue gluttonie, immoderate ſurfeting, inſatiable lecherie, and deliting altogither in ſlouthfull eaſe, and ſluggiſhe idleneſſe, the roote from whence al ſuche filthie vices take their beginnings, are nouriſhed and mainteyned? To conclude, he liued as one that toke no maner of regard to that whiche chiefly appertayned to his calling: whereby nowe when he ſhoulde come into the fielde, he was neither able through lacke of practiſe, to take paynes to ſee thinges done as was behouefull of himſelfe, neyther yet to giue order to others, how the ſame ought to be done. Neuertheles marching forward with his army, he came to the water of Tay, & neare to the bãks therof, he pight downe his tentes, where after he had ſupped, he was occaſioned to go forth of his lodging to do the neceſſities of nature, and being only accompanied with two of his ſeruants that were groomes of his chãber, he was ſodenly ſhot thorow the head with an arrow, but frõ whence it came or who ſhotte it, there was neuer any knowen that could tel. Howbeit the king immediatly died of the hurt, after he had reygned not fully .ij. yeares. He was buried in Colmekill amongſt his noble auncеſtours.

THe Lordes & peeres of the land not greatly lamenting the death of ſuche a monſtrous perſon becauſe the army for want of a gouernour ſhould not fall into any daũger, they elected

Eugenius

Eugenius the ſeuẽth, being the brother of the late forelayde Ambirkeleth, to ſucceede as King in the gouernment of the Realme, a Prince of right comely port and perſonage, neyther deſtitute of honourable qualityes and good diſpoſition of mynde.

Being once proclaymed king, he cauſed generall muſters to be take of the whole armie, and perceyuing by ſuruey thereof, that he was not able to match with his enimyes, he founde meanes to conclude a peace with the Pictiſhe king, pledges being deliuered on eyther ſide, for redreſſe to be had of al wrongs and iniuries that had bene committed betwixt them.

The Pictes returning home, and the Scottiſhe armie diſſolued, Eugenius with the moſte parte of the Nobilitie went into Argyle, where hee receyued hys inueſture of the Kingdome, ſitting vppon the ſtone of Marble, accoyding to the maner. The king is crowned.

The bond of peace begonne betwixt the kings was the more ſtrogly confyrmed by meanes of aliaunce, Spontana the daughter of King Garnard being coupled in mariage with Eugenius: ſhe in the yeere following being great with child, was murthered one night wythin the kings bed chaber in ſtead of the king himſelfe, by two brethē of the coūtrey of Athole, who moued to diſpleaſure for their fathers death, had conſpired to murther ẏ king, & had ſlaine him in deede, had he not through his good hap layne forth of his owne chaber the ſame night. Eugenius being ſuſpected of ẏ murther, & euil ſpoken off for ẏ ſame amōgſt his ſubiects, was at length wᵗ great daūger of life & honour, enforced to make anſwere by way of arrainmēt for clearing of himſelf before ẏ nobles of his Realme, appoynted as competent Iudges in that cace: So greatly beloued was Spontana amongſt all the degrees of the Scottiſh nation. But in the ende being found giltleſſe of the crime (for at the time that iudgement ſhould haue paſſed, the offenders were apprehended and brought in) he was acquit, to the great reioyſing of all honeſt men. Thoſe that had done the deede, were condemned and hanged vp naked on gybbets by the heeles, togither with certaine cruell maſtiue dogs the whiche might ſo deuour them. The king is ſuſpected of the murther. The murtherers are hanged.

But Eugenius being thus cleared of all former suspition, minded to haue bene reuenged on those ẏ had falsly accused him. Howbeit through the godly admonishments of that reuerend father Adannan, he qualified his displeasure.

An example of a good prince.

After this, giuing his minde to the aduauncement of Religion and politike gouernment of his subiectes, he ordeyned that the Hystories of hys auncestours shoulde be written in bookes and volumes, that posteritie might haue to reade the same for ensample sake. These monumentes he also appoynted to bee kept and reserued in the Abbay of Iona, nowe called Colmekill, for a perpetuall memorie: and suche as shoulde write the same, to remaine and haue liuings there in the Abbey.

The king causeth his auncestours hystories to be written.

Moreouer suche spirituall promotions as he perceyued to bee too meane and slender for the maintenance of the minister that should serue the cure, he caused to be augmented in suche wise as was thought sufficient. Hee concluded a league with the Saxons and Pictes, and obserued the same during his lyfe, whiche hee ended at Abernethy, when he had raigned about. xbij. yeares, whereof the last fell in the yeare after the incarnation of our Sauiour. 717. indictione. 15.

Eugenius the seuenth departeth out of this life.

716. H.B.

Hys death was greatly lamented, both of his Lordes and Commons, as they that intierly loued him for his noble and moste princely qualities.

Mordacke.

Mordack succeedeth Eugenius the.vii.

A Little before his death, he betoke the possession of his kingdom vnto Mordacke that succeeded him.

This Mordack was the nephew of Eugenius the bij. by his brother Ambirkelteh: and euen as he was knowne to be of a gentle, meke, and liberal nature before his aduauncement to the crowne, so hee shewed himselfe to be the verie same man during the whole course of all his naturall lyfe, after hee had atteyned to the same.

Aboue all things he wished a generall peace to continue amongest all the Princes of Albion, and thereupon for his part establishing a peace with the Pictes, Brytaynes, and all the English Kings, hee firmely kept euerie article therein conteyned.

A louer of Peace.

In those dayes (as Saint Bede doth testifie) foure seuerall people liued in peace and quietnesse within the boundes of Albion, though differing in maners, language, lawes, and ordinances: Saxons whom he called English men, Britaynes, Scottes, and Pictes. His wordes are these: The Nation of the Pictes at this tyme is in league with the Englishe men, and gladly is partaker of the vniuersall peace and veritie with the Catholike Churche. Those Scottes which inhabite Brytayne, contenting themselues with their owne boundes, goe aboute to practise no deceytefull traynes, nor fraudulent deuices agaynste the Englishe men. The Brytaynes, though for the moste parte through a familyar hatred doe impugne the Englishe Nation, and the state of the whole Catholyke Church, obseruing not ryghtly the feast of Easter, besydes other naughtie vsages, yet both the diuine power and humane force vtterly relysting them, they are not able in neyther behalfe to attayne to theyr purposed intentions. As they which though partlye free, yet in some behalfe are thrall and mancipate to the subiection of the English men: whiche Englishe men nowe in acceptable peace and quietnesse of tyme, many amongst them of Northumberlande: as well of the Nobilitie as other, laying away armour and weapon, apply themselues to the reading of holy Scripture, more desirous to bee in houses of vertuous conuersation, than to exercise feates of warre. What will come thereof, the age that followeth shall perceyue and beholde.

Peace throughout al the of Albion.

Whiche if it bee true, it muſte needes bee that afterwardes ſome vacation happened in that Sea for a time, ſith it is notified in the Scottiſh hiſtories that the weſtesterne Iles, Galloway and other regions neare adioyning, were ſubiect vnto the Biſhop of Sodor, (whoſe Sea is in the Ile of Man) vnto the dayes of Malcolme the thirde, who reſtored rather than ordeyned the Biſhops Sea in Candida Caſa againe, after ſuche vacation as before is ſpecified.

But now to return touching the gouernmẽt of the Scottiſhe kingdome, I find that after the deceaſſe of Mordack laſt remembred, his nephewe named Ethſine, the ſonne of the ſeuenth Eugenius, ſucceeded in the eſtate: a man naturally inclined vnto peace and maintenance of iuſtice.

The league which his predeceſſours Eugenius and Mordacke had kept with their neighbours the Brytaynes, Engliſhmen and Pictes, he duely lykewiſe obſerued.

His chiefe ſtudie was to purge his realme of all ſuch as were knowne to be open baretters and offenders in any wiſe, againſt the peace and cõmon quiet of his ſubiects: ſo that cauſing ſundrie notable enſamples of iuſtice to bee executed vpon ſuch euill doers, he was had in ſuch reuerende dreade amongſt his ſubiects, that none of them durſt once whiſper any euill of him. Neyther had they verily any cauſe ſo to doe, whileſt he looked to the adminiſtration himſelfe.

But after he was once fallen into age, he appoynted foure Peeres of his realme to haue the chiefe gouernaunce vnder him: as Dowalde the Treaſurer of Argyle, Collane of Athole, & Mordacke of Galloway his Lieutenants, and Conrath the Thane of Murrey lande. Theſe hauing the procuration of all things touching the gouernment of the Realme, vſed not themſelues ſo vprightly in many poynts as they ought to haue done: but winked nowe and then at faultes and treſpaſſes committed by their kinſfolkes and alyes, permitting the nobilitie to liue accordyng to their olde accuſtomed maner of licencious libertie, to the ſmall eaſe or commoditie of the other inferiour eſtates.

Donalde of the Weſterne Iles, a man of goodly perſonage, but of diſpoſition inclyned to all naughtineſſe, mainteyned a great number of Robbers and ſpoylers of the countrey, liuing only vpon rauine. For lok what they wanted, they woulde not fayle to catche it, if it were in anye place abrode where they might lay handes on it: ſo that al the huſbandmen and commons of Galloway, in which Countrey they moſt haunted, were brought into wonderfull thraldome and miſerie. Neyther did Mordacke the kings Lieutenant there, goe about to chaſtice ſuch inſolent miſdemeaners, eyther for that hee was of Donaldes alyance, eyther elſe priuie to his doings, and partaker of the ſpoyle. The people hereby vexed with continuall iniuries, brought manye pitifull complayntes afore Mordacke, who nothing regarded their lamentable ſuites and ſupplications, but the more they complayned, the worſe were they handled. Neyther was there any hope of redreſſe or amendment, till Eugenius the viij. was admitted to the kingly adminiſtration after the death of king Ethſine, who in the latter ende of his dayes continually beeing ſicke and diſeaſed, could not attende to take order for the publike gouernment, by reaſon whereof ſuch wilfull miſorders enſued. Hee dyed in the yeare of our Lorde. 764. after he had continued his raigne ouer the Scottiſhmen the ſpace of .xxx. yeares, his bodie being buried in Colmekill with all funerall obſequies.

with kept ſuche a number of vile ſtrumpettes in houſe with him, whom hee vſed as concubines, that his wife was no better eſteemed than as an handmayde, or rather a kitchin mayde. Who being a woman of great modeſtie: and ſober adviſedneſſe, coulde not yet but take ſore griefe and indignation hereat: and therefore ſundrie tymes aſſayed by waye of wholeſome perſwaſions to turne his minde from ſuch ſinfull vſages and filthie trade of liuing. Finally when ſhe ſaw there was no hope to conuert his depraued minde, nor by any meanes to reſourme him, but that the more ſhee laboured to doe good vppon him, the worſe he was, through verie diſpleaſure of ſuche iniuries as ſhee daylye ſuſteyned at the handes of his concubines, ſhee founde meanes to ſtrangle him ſecretely one night as hee lay in his bed, chooſing rather to be without a huſband, than to haue one that ſhoulde deceyue hir of the right and dutie of mariage, and that in ſuch ſort, as ſhe muſt be faine to ſuffer the reproch daply afore hir face, being miſvſed of them whom ſhe kept as paramours in moſt diſpiteful maner.

The day after ſhe wrought this feate: the bodie being founde deade, was apparayled in funerall wiſe, & brought forth into the place of iudgement, where inquiſition was ſtraightly made what they were that had done ſo heynous a deed. For though there were but few that lamented his death, yet ſome of his friends were verie earneſt to haue the matter tryed forth, that ſuch as had cõmitted the murther, might ſuffer due puniſhment.

Many were apprehended and had to the rack, but yet could none be founde that would confeſſe it. The Queene was voyde of all ſuſpition, as ſhe that had bene taken for a woman at all times of great temperancie. But yet when ſhee hearde that a number of innocent perſons were tormented without deſart, ſore lamenting (as ſhoulde appeare) theyr miſerable caſe, ſhe came haſtily into the Iudgement hall, and getting hir aloft vpõ the bench, there in the preſence of al the company, ſhe had theſe or the like wordes vnto the whole aſſembly. I knowe not good people, I knowe not what God moueth me, or what diuine reuengement vexeth me with ſundry thoughts and cogitations, that of all this daye and morning preceeding, I haue had neither reſt in bodie nor minde. And verely when I hearde that certaine guiltleſſe perſons were cruelly tormented here in your preſence, had not wrath giuen place, partly vnto modeſtie, whereof I muſt confeſſe there is left but a ſmall portiõ in me, I had forthwith rid my ſelf out of the way. The kings death was mine act. Conſcience conſtrayneth me (ſetting apart mine owne ſafegarde) to confeſſe the truth, leaſt the guiltleſſe ſhoulde wrongfully periſhe: Therefore vnderſtande yee for truth, that none of them whome ye haue examined are priuie to the offence. I verily am ſhe, that with theſe wicked handes haue ſtrangled this night laſt paſt Fergus, about whoſe death I ſee you in trouble, moued ſo to do with two as ſharpe pricks as may reſt in a woman, to wit, Impacient forbearing of carnall luſt, and yrefull wrath. Fergus by his continuall vſing of concubines, kept from me the due debt that the huſbande oweth to the wife: whereupon when there was no hope to reconcile him with often aduertiſementes, vehement force of anger ryſing in my heart, droue mee to doe ſo wicked a deed. I thought lieffer therefore to diſpatch the Adulterer, then (being deſtitute of my huſbande, and defrauded of all Queenely honor) to liue ſtill ſubiect vnto the perpetuall iniuries of ſuch lewde women as hee kept and vſed in my ſteade. Loſe ye therefore thoſe that be accuſed of the kings death, and as for me ye ſhall not neede to proceede againſt me as guiltie of the crime by order of law, for I that was ſo bolde to commit ſo heynous an act, will accordingly do execution vpon my ſelfe euen here incontinently in preſence of you all: what honour is due to the deade, loke you to that.

She giueth hir owne ſentence

Hauing thus made an ende of hir tale, ſhee plucked forth a knife which ſhe had hid vnder hir gowne, and ſtroke hirſelfe to the heart with the ſame falling deade vpon it downe to the grounde.

The Queene taketh execution of hir ſelfe.

All ſuch as were preſent, wondered greatly at hir ſtoute and hardie ſtomacke, ſpeaking diuerſly thereof, as ſome in prayſe, and ſome in diſprayſe of theſe hir monſtrous doings.

The bodie of Fergus was caryed forth to the Ile of Colmekill, and there buryed in the thirde yeare after his entring into the gouernment, and in the yeare of our Lorde 769. The Quenes corps was not buried in ſacred ground, for that ſhe liue hirſelfe. 767. H.B.

Soluathius

Soluathius.

Soluathius admitted king of Scotland.

SOluathius ẏ ſonne of Eugenius ẏ viij. was admitted to ẏ rule of the Scottyſhe eſtate next after the death of Fergus: a prince ſurely borne to the accompliſhement of high enterpriſes, if throughe hap of froward deſtinie he had not bin hindred. For in the third yere of his raign he began to bee vexed extremely with the goute, which ingendred by cold in lying abrode in hunting, and ſo continuing with him during his life, ſtayed him from many worthy exerciſes, as well in peace at home, as abrode in time of warres.

Soluathius an impotent mã.

Thus he being in maner impotent and lame of his lymmes, there were ſome commotions & miſorders the more boldly attempted: & firſt amongſt thẽ of ẏ out Iles. For Bane Makedonald gouernor by the kings appointment, of the Iſlande called Tyre, got all the caſtels and fortreſſes of the Iles into his owne handes, and ſtrengthned with a route of vnruly and miſchieuous youthful perſons, toke poſſeſſion of al the ſaid Iles, cauſing himſelfe to be proclaimed king of the ſame.

A rebellion.

Makedonalde proclaymed king of the Iles.

And yet not contented herewith, he gathered a number of ſhippes togither, wherein tranſporting himſelfe with a great armie ouer into Lorne and Cantyre, made great waſt & ſpoyle of thoſe countreys, til Duthquhal gouernor of Athole, and Culane of Argyle, beeing ſent with a choſen power from the king to defend the countrey, chaunced to encounter with him, and putting him with hys people vnto flight, chaſed them vnto ſuch a ſtrait, where there was no way to get forth, ſaue onely that by which they entered.

He inuadeth Lorn and Cantyre.

A power from the king is ſent againſt him.

This place is in Lorn, with a ſtrayght paſſage to enter into it: but whẽ ye are within it, the ſame is verie large and brode, enuironed aboute with craggie mountaynes, chayned togither with a continuall ridge, a deepe riuer compaſſing them in beneath in the bottom, with ſuch ſteepe and ſideling bankes, that there is no way to paſſe forth of the ſame, but by that throughe which ye muſt enter into it. The ſaid Bane with his folkes being entred at vnwares into ſuch a ſtraight, & perceyuing there was no way to iſſue forth, but by the ſame where he entred, he returned backe thither, & finding the paſſage cloſed frõ him by his enimies, he was in a wonderfull maze, not knowing what ſhift to make to eſcape. Finally falling to councel with the chiefeſt of his armie vpõ the danger preſent, and ſo continuing for the ſpace of two dayes without any concluſion auailable, on the third day driuen of neceſſitie throughe hunger, they required of their enimies to be receiued as yeelded men vpon what conditions they would preſcribe, onely hauing their liues aſſured. But when this would not be graunted, in the euening tide they ruſhed forth vpon their enimies, to trie if by force they might haue paſſed throughe them. But ſuch was their hap, that there they died euery mothers ſon: for ſo had Duthquhall and Culane cõmaunded, to the ende that other rebels might take enſample by ſuch their wilfull and rebellious outrage.

The kings Captaines after this paſſing ouer into the Iles, brought all things there into the former ſtate of quietneſſe. Yet after the appeaſing of this tumult, there chaunced a new buſineſſe in Galloway: for Gyllequhalm, ſonne to that Donalde (which as ye haue heard, was executed by commaundement of Eugenius the viij.) gathered togither a great number of vngracious ſcapethriftes, and did muche hurt in the Countrey. But ſhortlye after beeing vanquiſhed by the ſame Captaynes that had ſuppreſſed the other Rebelles of the Iles, the Countrey was ridde of that trouble, and the ring leaders puniſhed by death for their offences.

The king power paſſeth ouer into Iles.

Gillequhalm the ſonne Donalde.

In this meane while, the Engliſh men and Welch Brytaynes throughe multitude of kings and rulers warring eche againſt other, had no leyſure to attempt any enterpriſe againſt ſtraungers. Neither were the Pictes free of ſome ſecrete diſpleaſures, which one part of them had cõceiued againſt another, ſo that the Scottiſh men were not troubled at all by any forraine enimies.

And ſo Soluathius hauing continued his raigne the ſpace of .xx. yeares, aboute the ende of that yeare departed this life, in the yeare of our ſaluation 788.

788.

Acha.

Achaius crated king of Scotlande.

THen after Soluathius was once buried in Colmkill amõgſt his auncеſtors, Achaius the ſon of king Ethfin (a man highly renowmed for his ernеſt zeale to iuſtice and vpright dealing) was aduanced to the gouernance of the realme: who for that by his former conuerſation amõgſt the nobilitie, he perfectly vnderſtood what grudge and ſecrete hatred remayned in their heartes, one wiſhing anothers deſtruction. He forſaw what daunger the common wealth ſtode in, if the ſame were not by ſome good meanes qualified: and therevpon calling them togither, hee handled the matter wyth ſuche wiſdome and dexteritie, that before theyr departure departure from him, all the rootes of former diſpleaſures beeing vtterly extirped and auoyded, they were made friendes on eche ſide, and promiſed in his preſence ſo to continue.

Thus hauing layde the foundation of a quiet ſtate amongeſt his ſubiectes, nowe in the beginning of his raigne, he was at poynt to haue had no ſmall warres with the Iriſhe men, for a number of them being aryued in Cantyre were there ſlaine by them of the Weſterne Iles, which vpon requeſt of the Inhabitants of that countrey were come to ayde them againſt thoſe Iriſhmen.

This loſſe the rulers of the Iriſh nation purpoſed in all haſt to reuenge vpō them of the Iles. But Achaius hearing thereof, ſent ouer an Imbaſſade vnto thē to haue the matter taken vp before any further force were vſed: aledging how ther was no cauſe wherfore warres ſhould be moued for ſuch a matter, where the occaſion had bene giuen but by a ſort of Rouers on eyther ſyde, without commaundement or warrant obteyned from any of their ſuperiours.

Howbeit the Nobles of Irelande (for there was no king amongeſt them at that tyme as it chaunced) moued altogither with indignation for the ſlaughter of theyr Countrymen, made a direct anſwere, that they woulde ſurely be reuenged of the reproche which they had receyued, before they woulde commune of any peace. And therefore whyleſt the Scottiſh Imbaſſadors returned out of Ireland with this anſwere, a great number of them in ſhippes and crayers paſſed ouer into Ila, where getting togither a great pray, and fraughting theyr beſſelles therewith, as they were returning homewardes, they were ſuncke by force of tempeſt, ſo that neyther ſhip nor man returned to bring tydings home howe they had ſped in Scotlande.

The ſtoute ſtomackes of the Iriſhe Lordes and rulers beeing well qualified with this miſchaunce, they were glad to ſeeke for peace ſhortly after vnto Achains. Thoſe alſo that were ſent ouer to treat of the ſame, found him at Enuerlochthee. Where hauing declared their meſſage, and confeſſed howe iuſtly they had beene puniſhed by the righteous iudgement of almightie God for their wrongful attempting of the warres againſt them that had not deſerued it, Achaius anſwered how the Iriſh nation was ſo ſtubborne, that they knew not to ble reaſō, except they were throughly ſcourged: and therefore had the righteous God taken iuſt reuenge vpon them, to the enſample of other, for their contumacie in moouing warres againſt thē that had ſo earneſtly ſought for peace. Neuertheleſſe letting a part all iniuries paſt, as well newe as olde, to ſhewe himſelfe to be the follower of Chriſt, who in ſo many paſſages had prayſed, commended and ſet forth vnto vs peace and tranquilitie, he was cōtented to graunt them peace which now they ſued for.

Thus was the peace renued betwixt the Scottiſh and Iriſh nations, to the no leſſe comfort of the Scottes themſelues, than of the Iriſhmen, as thoſe that had learned nowe by experience & tryall (hauing enioyed peace a good ſeaſon) howe much the ſame was to be preferred before cruel warres.

In this meane time, Charles, ſurnamed the great, as then raigning in France, and vnderſtāding how the Engliſh men did not only by dayly rouing diſquiet the ſeas, to the great danger of all ſuch marchants & other as trauayled alongſt the coaſtes of Fraunce and Germany, but alſo nowe and then cōming a lande vpon the French dominions, did many notable diſpleaſures to his ſubiectes, he thought good by the aduice of his peeres to conclude a league if it were poſſible with ỹ Scots and Piēts, with this article amongeſt the reſidue, That ſo oft as the Engliſh men ſhoulde attempt any enterpriſe or inuaſion into France, the Scots and Piēts ſhould be readie ſtreight wayes to inuade thē here at home: and when they ſhuld make any warres againſt the Scots or Piēts, then the French men ſhould take vpon them to inuade the weſt partes of Englande.

Carolus Magnus in league with the Scots.

There were ſent therefore from Charles vnto Achaius certain Imbaſſadors to bring this matter to paſſe, who arriuing in Scotland, & cōming to the kings preſence, declared effectually the ſum of their meſſage, ſhewing that ỹ cōcluſion of ſuch a league, ſhoulde bee no leſſe to the wealth of the Frenchmen, than of the Scots (conſidering the Engliſhmen to be a people moſt deſirous of all other to get into their hands other mens goods and poſſeſſions) for thereby they might be ſomewhat reſtrayned from ſuch bold and iniurious enterpriſes as they dayly toke in hande againſt theyr Chriſtian neighbors: but it ſhould make moſt of all (ſay they) for the aduancement of the whole chriſtiā cōmon wealth, whereas otherwiſe through their inſolent doings, ſuch force as was alreadie prepared

prepared againſt the Saralins (the common enimyes of the Chriſtians) ſhoulde be called backe, therewith to keepe off the layd Engliſhe men, to the great daunger of thoſe partes of Chriſtendome, vpon which the Saralins then bordered as neighbours.

The Ambaſſadors are honorably entertained.

This meſſage being heard with good deliberation by ſuch as were preſent, the Ambaſſadours themſelues beeing honorable perſonages & graue of countenance, were receyued moſt louingly of the king, and lodged in his owne pallaice, hauing all the chear & honorable intertainmēt that might be deuiſed: but touching their meſſage, there were ſundrie diſputatiōs amongſt the nobles, whether the concluding of ſuch a league as they requyred, were expedient for the Scottiſh common wealth or not. And for that ỹ matter ſeemed to be doubtfull, the king thought it neceſſarie to haue the aduice of his Counſell: and therupon calling them togither and appoynting diuerſe of them to goe with the Ambaſſadors on hunting to ſhew them ſome ſport, whileſt he conſulted with the reſidue, (becauſe he wold not haue them preſent) he commanded one Colman, gouernor of Mar (a man of great authoritie amongſt the Scottiſh men for his approued wiſedome) to ſay firſt his mind touching the requeſt of thoſe French Ambaſſadours who therupon ſtanding forth, began as followeth.

No man ought to maruaile, I perceyue, king Achains, if many of this our Nation be deſirous to haue this league concluded with the French men, as they that are perſwaded howe nothing can be better, nothing more profitable, more honourable, or more pleaſant to almightie god, than to ioyne in league and friendſhip with a Nation of greateſt power and wealth in theſe dayes, of all other within the boundes of Europe: for by that meane ſhoulde the Scottiſh name be highly renowmed & ſpoken of through the whole world. But truly theſe conſiderations contenting ſo wel at the firſt, are not ſo much to be regarded as the euils which hereafter may grow therevpon: For ſurely a naughtie and pernicious ende of this determination ſhall manifeſtly teach vs (though to late) howe farre we haue gone beſide the way of reaſon in eſtabliſhing this league, if we once conſent to conclude the ſame. Is it any other thing (I beſeech you) to make a league, and to ioyne in ſocietie with the French men againſt our neighbours the Engliſhmen (whoſe friendſhip might be moſt expedient for vs) then euen to haue from henceforth a nere and in maner a domeſtical enimie at hand, whereas our ſuppoſed friends ſhall be farre of from vs, and ſeparate from our countrey by a great and large ſea, at whoſe pleaſure alſo we muſt make warres againſt our neighbours, and fight for other mens ſafegardes, putting our bodies in hazard of death and wounding for their cauſe, which dwell nothing neare vs: yea and in their quarell to commit our kingdome, goods and liues vnto extreeme perill of vtter deſtruction. I Goode of Co woulde thinke it good therefore to take better aduiſement and deliberation herein, leaſt whileſt we ſeeke for vainglorie and counterfeyte honour, we do not through prouoking the Engliſh men our next neighbors, loſe our owne liberties got with ſo much trauaile by our elders, for the which they ſo often fought with the Brytaynes, Romaines, Piſts, and finally with the Saxōs. Can there be any thing more pernicious vnto a free natiō and people borne in libertie, than to meaſure lawes of peace, chances of warre, and in fine, libertie it ſelf, by the luſt and pleaſure of another nation, and ſo to enter (as it were) into bondage? for the auoyding whereof, not onely men but alſo all other lyuing things are readie to fight, euen to the vttermoſte. If the Frenche menne in the chiefeſt heate and moſte earneſt brunt of the warre (which

(which we ſhall take in hande for theyr ſake, according to the articles of the league) ſhall chance to forſake vs, and conclude ſome maner of peace or league with oure enimies, leauing vs in all the whole daunger, ſhal we haue any iudge afore whome wee maye bring them to anſwere for theyr default, and by whoſe authoritie they may bee conſtrayned to ſee vs ſatisfyed for ſuch loſſe and iniuryes as wee ſhall happely ſuſtayne at the Engliſhe mennes handes? Are we of that force and power to reuenge our wronges vppon them, after wee are vanquiſhed and in manner brought to vtter cõfuſion by thoſe warres which wee ſhall enter into for theyr cauſe? If euer wee bee brought vnto that poynte (as God forbyd we ſhoulde) that through want of ſubſtance and decay of force, the Frenche men ſhall alſo vtterly forſake vs, and that thereby we ſhall not be able to reſiſt the Engliſhe puiſſance: afore whome, I beſeech you) ſhall we accuſe them for breaking of this league? We ſhall dayly haue to doe wyth our enimies after the concluſion of the league (if it bee concluded at all) and but ſeldome tymes wyth our friendes. In the middeſt of our enimies we ſhall be ſtill occaſioned to practiſe for our defence, where we haue a long way both by ſea and land to paſſe ouer to our friends, in caſe any neede ſhall inforce vs thervnto: cõmodities are brought to vs out of Spaine, Fraunce and Germanie, not ſuch as we deſire, but onely ſuch as the Engliſhe men doe permit. Againe when our Marchants ſhall paſſe into Fraunce, what hauens ſhall wee leaue them to reſort vnto in time of daungerous tempeſts, which often chaunce to all ſuche as vſe ſayling? Either muſt they periſh and bee caſt awaye through rage of ſeas, eyther elſe fall into the handes of our enimies togither, with all theyr goodes and fraught. What diſcommodities hereof ſhal riſe, your grace moſt prudent Prince) and you right circumſpect Counſaylers doe well ynough perceyue. I therefore would thinke it expedient that we ſhould continue in ỹ former peace concluded with the Brytaines, Saxons & Picts, according to the cuſtome of our late predeceſſors, who ſawe well ynough what was moſt beneficiall for the wealth of the Scottiſh nation, and not to couet a newe amitie with an vnknowne people, hauing deſerued little or nothing as yet at our handes (whoſe intent I cannot but haue in ſuſpition, ſithe they ſeeke for amitie ſo farre of) except wee ſhall manifeſtly reſolue wyth our ſelues to employe and ieoparde both life and libertie for the ſafegarde of the French men, without regarde of our owne.

Many in that aſſemblie ſhewed themſelues ſore offended with Colmans wordes, ſuppoſing the league with the French men to be both honorable and neceſſarie.

Then one Albian, a man of great nobilitie, (whome the king had lately before inſtituted hys Leutenant in the Iles) ſpake in this maner:

Albian his Oration.

If it were poſſible that there might be one ſure and inuiolable conſent amongeſt thoſe foure people, whiche at this daye haue theyr habitations within the boundes of Albion, or that the Engliſh men knewe what it were to ſtande and abide by fayth and promiſes made & giuen, we would not denie but that thoſe conſiderations and aduiſes which Colman hath here vttered, ought to be followed, bycauſe that then there ſhould be no occaſion at all, why we ſhould conclude any league with any forraine nation. But forſomuche as there was neuer man that founde more vntruth and breache of promiſe in any Nation, than hath beene founde in theſe Saxons (the which hauing got the rule in Albion, are nowe called Engliſhe men as the Scottes, Pictes, and Brytaynes haue by tryall ſufficiently proued, I ſuppoſe it is euidently knowne vnto you, that either we muſt of neceſſitie fight and ſtand at defence againſt the Engliſh men, readie to aſſayle vs both with open force and ſecret craft, eyther elſe linke our ſelues with ſuche allyes and confederates, as by theyr ſupport we may be the better able to withſtande the malice of ſuch vnfaythfull people. Call ye this fayth or treaſon, I pray you? The Saxons in tymes paſt beeing requeſted of the Brytaynes to ayde them agaynſt their enimies, were moſt louingly receyued, and highlye rewarded for theyr ſeruice: but they contrarily in recompence of ſuch kindneſſe, ſhewed themſelues in ſtead of ayders, enimies: in ſtead of defenders, deſtroyers: turning their weapon poynts againſt the Brytains, by whom they had beene ſo ſent for to theyr ayde. And nowe haue not onely deſtroyed a great number of them by fire and ſworde, but alſo they haue ſpoyled them of their kingdome & libertie. What league or truce haue they at any time kept (you your ſelues are not ignorant of this whiche I ſpeake) where eyther they ſawe occaſion to vexe theyr neighbours, or hoped to gaine any thing by falſifying theyr faythes, as they that haue neuer beene aſhamed ſo to do, where hope to haue commoditie (if I maye ſo call it) hath at any hande beene offered. Into what ſundrie and moſt miſerable calamities hath the treachetie of the Saxons brought the ſillie Brytaynes? How often-times haue they broken the peace eſtabliſhed with vs, and alſo with the Picts? Euen when we leaſt thought vpon any ſuch thing. Yea and that more is, amongſt themſelues at this ſeaſon the Engliſh men warre one agaynſt another, more with craftie traines than with open force, in ſuch wiſe that in Northumberland ſo many kings, & ſo many noble mẽ haue bin traiterouſly murthered & made away, that vneth maye there be any founde that

The Engliſh Saxons breakers of promiſe.

To induce others to his purpoſe he taketh the aduauntage of caſual happes charging the whole nation with the faults of a few perticular perſons.

will take vpon him the ſupreme gouernment of that countrey. It is not many yeares agone ſince Oſwin king of that countrey was ryd out of the waye through treaſon of Oſwey that ſucceeded him in the kingdom, and was after depriued both of life and kingdome by Oſrike, whome Egbert deſirous to raigne in his place, founde meanes by trayterous practiſe to diſpatche. Egbert was ſlaine by Mollo, and Mollo by Alfred, which Alfred was after ſlaine by the guilefull craft of Ethelbert. Neyther had Ethelbert any better ſucceſſe in the ende, for nowe of late betrayed by his owne ſubiects, he was by them ſhamefully ſlaine and murthered. Neyther wyth leſſe trayterous ſhiftes and deuyſes doe the Engliſhe men maintaine theyr warres in all places where they are inhabiting within Albion. The reuerende Fathers of the ſpiritualtie, and other godly men addict to vertue, vnto whome the ſetting forth of Gods worde hath beene committed, abweeryed and abhorring this woode madneſſe, rage and wicked miſdemeanour of that Nation, haue left theyr Byſhoprykes, Abbeys, Monaſteryes, and Celles, and from thence haue remoued into forrayne Regions. Therfore where the Engliſh me̅ do abſtaine at this preſent fro̅ making vs warres, it is not to be imputed to any reuerence they haue to faith, equitie, or reſpect of the league, which they haue made with vs, but only vnto ſuch ciuil ſedition & diſcord, as now doth raigne amongſt them. Neither ought any of vs of right to doubt, but that when the ſame once ceaſſeth, they wil immediatly take weapon in hand againſt vs, notwithſtanding all leagues or couenants of peace co̅firmed to the contrarie. To repreſſe therefore and abate their ſubtile practiſes, I can finde no redier meane than to enter into friendſhip, and conclude a league with that people, whiche beeing ioyned with vs, maye chaſtice ſuche outragious furie of this wicked nation, as cauſe and opportunitie ſhall require, Fortune hath offred vnto vs a conuenient meane and occaſion herevnto. For here be at this preſent ẏ French kings ambaſſadors, offring that vnto vs, which (being ſo great a benifit) we might vnethy wiſh for. That is, they require to haue vs to ioyne in league againſt the Engliſhmen, with their king, whom Fraunce, Spaine, and no ſmal part of Germanie do acknowledge for theyr ſoueraine. Ought this to bee deſpiſed of men that haue their perfect ſenſes? Ought the ſocietie of the French nation to be refuſed of vs, inhabiting here in the vttermoſt partes of the earth, the ſame being freely offered by them, vnto whom for their ſincere fayth both towardes God and man, the large Empyre of the worlde is graunted. So that if wee ſhall thankefully receyue thys moſte notable benefite, the ſame ſhall purchaſe vnto vs the friendſhip of the Spaniardes, French men, Germanes, and all thoſe nations which acknowledge king Charles for their head and ſoueraine Lord. Hereupon alſo free paſſage for marchantes ſhall be open, to paſſe to and fro vnto vs, with all kind of marchandiſe & wares of traffike. I truſt therefore that euery one of you (ſo that he wey the thing with himſelfe throughly) will eaſily iudge that the friendſhip and ſocietie of the French men (right puiſſant both by ſea and land) and thereto of approwed fayth and ſtedfaſtneſſe in promiſe, ought more to be eſteemed, and is more beneficial to the Scottiſh common wealth, than the vnſtedfaſt promiſes and great diſloyaltie of the Saxõs. To which of you is it vnknowne, that the Engliſh nation ſtudieth no leſſe to bring vs vnder the yoke of ſeruitude, than they doe the Welchmen, if their force might anſwere directlye to theyr willes? Therefore if we deſire to auoyde the violent power of moſt cruell enimies, if wee meane to auoyde theyr craftie practiſes, if we regard the Chriſtian Religion, for the whiche the Frenche men are continually in armure, if we ſet more by vertue and conſtancie than by vnfaythfulneſſe & breach of couenants and promiſes, if wee labour for the glory and honor of our nation, if we couet to aduaunce our Countrey, our owne reſt, and quietneſſe: and to be briefe, if we paſſe vpon life and libertie, the moſte dearefl things that maye happen to man, let vs with ioyfull heartes eſtabliſh this league with the French men, and firmely continue in the ſame, vppon aſſured truſt and confidence that it ſhall bring perpetuall commoditie and renowne vnto vs, both for the ſafegarde of our realme, and reſtraynt of the Engliſh mens vnlawfull attemptes & wrongfull iniuries, which hereafter they either ſhall or may at any time enterpriſe againſt vs.

By this Oration Albian drew the multitude eaſily vnto his purpoſe.

Then Achaius vnderſtãding how the minds of all his ſubiects were in maner wholy inclyned to the league, cõmaunded al the cõpany to be ther in the ſame place againe the next day. And ſo breaking vp their aſſembly for ẏ time, the king made the French Ambaſſadors ẏ night a coſtly ſupper with a banket, and after hauing cõference w̃ his nobles & lords of the counſel, it was agreed by generall cõſent amongſt thẽ, that for the ſolemne ratifying of this league with king Charles, accordyng as he had requyred, there ſhould go with his Ambaſſadors at their returne the Lord William the brother of king Achaius with foure other honorable & learned perſonages, being men of perfite knowledge & ſkil, and ſuch as were eſteemed moſt meete for ſuch a purpoſe. Alſo ẏ they ſhould take iiij. M. men ouer with thẽ to ſerue againſt the infidels & enimies of the chriſtian religion, where & in ſuch ſort as king Charles ſhould appoint thẽ.

The Frenche men in thoſe days poſſeſſed not onely that part of Gallia which we now cal France, but alſo the moſt part of the coũtreys now inhabited by the Teutſhmen or Germaines, namely on this ſide the ryuer of Rheine.

The league with the French agreed

Herevpon

Hereupon the next day going firſt to Church, and there making their common ſupplications vnto almightie God, according to the rytes and auncient cuſtomes, they after reſorted vnto the counſell chaimber, where Achaius opened and declared vnto the French Ambaſſadors al that was concluded by him, and other the eſtates of hys realme, touching the meſſage whiche they had brought from king Charles. Who reioyſing (as ſhould appeare) greatly hereat, gaue moſt hartie thankes vnto him, and to all the reſidue for theyr benevolent willes herein ſhewed towardes king Charles their maiſter, & all the French Nation.

After this remayning certaine dayes with Achaius, who made them all the cheare that might be imagined, they departed towardes Hungus king of the Picts, vnto whom at their cõming to his preſence they made ẏ like requeſt on their maſters behalfe, whiche they had made before vnto Achaius.

It is ſayd that Hungus gaue the French men moſt hartie thankes for their good willes, but yet he would not graunt to cõclude any league with thẽ at that time, for that (as he alledged) the matter being weightie and of great importaunce required no ſmall time to deliberate and take aduice for a full reſolution therein.

The Ambaſſadors hereupon returned vnto Achaius without ſpeed of their purpoſe with Hungus, and the ſecond moneth after, all things being readie for their returne, and the paſſage of thoſe that ſhould go with them, the Lord William the kings brother, togither with the ſame Ambaſſadors and ſuch foure perſons as the king had choſen forth amongſt all the learned Cleargie of his realme (whoſe names were Clement, John, Raban, and Alcuine) and alſo hauing with him thoſe foure M. men of warre which were at the firſt appointed to goe with him, paſſed forth towardes France, where he with all the whole cõpanie landed within few dayes after in ſafetie, according to their owne wiſhed deſires. At their comming into Fraunce, Charles the Emperor receiued them in moſt gladſome wiſe, doing them all the honor that might be deuiſed, & the ſouldiers which were come to ſerue him vnder the leading of the foreſayd William, he retayned in wages, vſing them after the ſame ſort and rate as he did his owne naturall people the French men.

Shortly after alſo at the requeſt of the Scottiſh orators, according to ẏ charter ſigned by Achaius and confirmed by conſent of king Charles the league betwixt the French men and Scottes was ſolemnely publiſhed by Heraldes at armes, according to the maner in thoſe dayes vſed, the ſame to endure betwixt thoſe two nations and their poſterities for euer.

The chiefeſt articles compriſed in this league were as followeth:

The articles of the league.

The amitie and confederation betwixte the French men and Scottes to be perpetuall & firme to endure betwixt them & the poſterities of both the nations for euer.

The iniuries and warres which the Engliſh men ſhould attempt againſt either nation, ſhould be accounted as common to them both.

The French men being aſſayled by warres of the Engliſh men, the Scottes ſhould ſende theyr ayde of ſouldiers, hauing their charges borne by the French men, as well for furniture, as wages, and all other things neceſſarie.

The French men ſhoulde contrariwiſe ayde the Scots in time of warres againſt the Engliſh men at their owne proper coſtes and charges.

Whatſoeuer he were, priuate perſon or publike of theſe two confederate nations, that againſt eyther of them ſhould ayde the Engliſh men wyth armor, counſell, vitailes, or in any other maner of wiſe, the ſame ſhould be reputed for a trayter vnto both their Princes and countreys.

Neither might either of them conclude a peace, or take any truce, without conſent of the other.

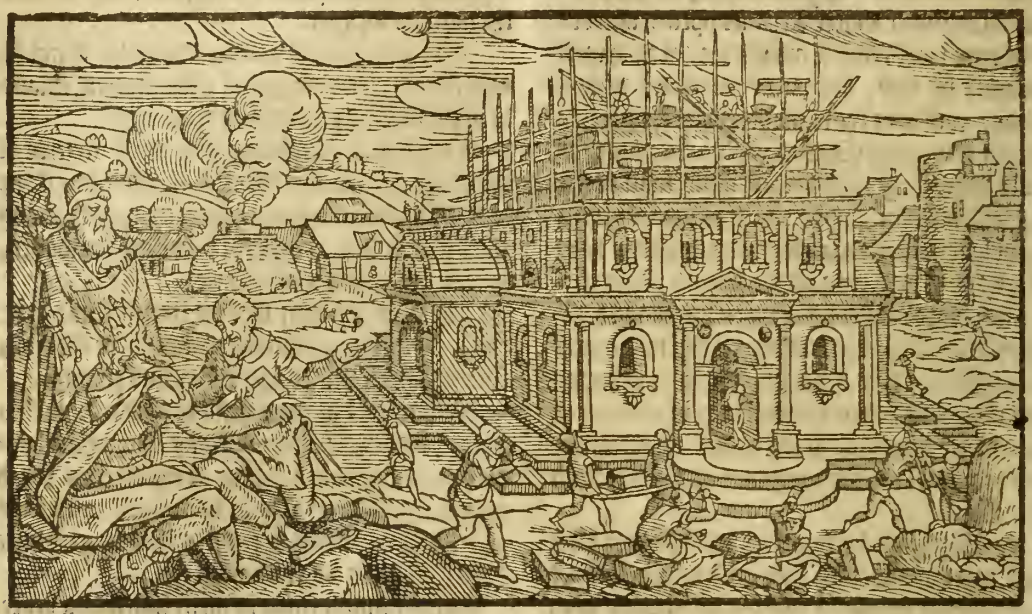
These were the principall Articles of the league, as then confirmed betwixte the Scottes and Frenchmen, indited in Latine, and fayre ingroſſed in parchment, & reſerued as a monument in both realmes, for a witneſſe vnto ſuch as ſhuld come after, of this friendſhip thus begunne, as the Scottes Chronicles affyrme.

The armes of Scotlande.

And for a further memorie of the thing, Achaius did augment his armes, being a red Lion in a field of golde, with a double trace ſeamed wyth floure de Lyces, ſignifying thereby, that the Lion from thenceforth ſhoulde bee defended by the ayde of the Frenche men: and that the Scottiſhe Kings ſhoulde valiauntlye fight in defence of theyr Countrey, libertie, Religion and innocencie, whiche are repreſented by the Lylies, or Floure de lyces, as Heraulds doe interprete it.

The Lord William, the ſayd Clement, and John, remayned ſtil with king Charles, but Raban and Alcuine returned into their countrey.

The valiantnes of William.



In all ſuch warres and iourneyes as Charles afterwardes made againſte any of his enimies, the ſayde Lorde William was a chiefe doer in the ſame, ſo that his fame and authoritie dayly grew in all places where he came.

His ſeruice ſtoode King Charles in notable ſtead in his expeditions againſt the Saxons, Hungarians, & other, but namely his eſtimation in Italy was moſt highly aduãced, at what time the ſayde Charles reedified the Citie of Florence, appoynting this William to be his Lieutenant in Tuſcane, and to haue the chiefe charge for the reſtoring of the ſayde Citie, which he wyth ſuche

The Citie being thus reſtoꝛed vnto hir foꝛmer ſtate and dignitie, thꝛough the bounteous benefite of king Charles, and the diligent adminiſtration of his Lieutenant the foꝛeſayde William, the Citizens to ſhew themſelues thankefull, deuiſed foꝛ a perpetuall memoꝛie to beare in theyꝛ armes a redde Lillie, reſembling one of thoſe which the kings of Fraunce giue, ſaue that it differeth in colour, to teſtifie thereby, that their Citie (after the deſtruction thereof by the Gothes) was recdified and reſtoꝛed to the foꝛmer dignitie, by the benefite of the frenchmen.

And to acknowledge the diligence herein of the Lieutenant, they did inſtitute publike plaies to be vſed and celebꝛate euery yeꝛe, wherin with many pompous ceremonies they crowne a Lion. And further that there ſhould be kept vpon the charges of the common treaſurie within the Citie certain Lions (foꝛ the ſayd Lord William gaue a Lion foꝛ his cognisance) and theꝛvpon as the Scottiſh Chꝛonicles affyꝛme, thoſe beaſtes grew to be had in ſuch honoꝛ amongſt the Flogentines.

Thus this valiant Captain, the foꝛeſayd Lord William, paſſing his time in noble exerciſes, and woꝛthie feates of chiualrie vnder king Charles, is accounted in the number of thoſe. rij. martiall warriours, whiche are called commonly by the Scottiſh men, Scotteſgylmoꝛe.

Before the accompliſhment of theſe things, by the afoꝛeſayde Lorde William, bꝛother as is ſaid vnto the Scottiſh king Achaius, I finde that the Vniuerſities of Paris and Pauia were inſtituted by king Charles, chiefly by the helpe and meanes of thoſe two foꝛeremēbꝛed learned Scottiſh men, John and Clement, inſomuch that Clemēt was appoynted chiefe preſident of all the ſtudentes at Paris, and John of the other at Pauia.

But now to returne to the other doings of Achains, ye ſhall vnderſtande, that about the ſame time oꝛ not muche differing from the ſame,

Adel treth Dea

Adelſtane

Adelſtane the ſonne of Ethelwolfe king of weſt Saxons, taking vpō him the dominion of Kent, Eaſt Saxon, Mertia, and Northumberlande, whome Egbert his grandfather had receyued into his gouernment) deſirous nowe to enlarge his kingdome, entred into that part of the Pictiſh dominion, whiche auncientlye hight Deira, and conteined the Marches about Barwike, alledging how the ſame apperteyned to his kingdome of Northumberlande, and had bene fraudulently taken from his auncetters by the Picts: but forſomuch as there was a commotion reyſed the ſame time in Mertia, he was called backe to appeaſe it, and herevpon putting all to the fire and ſworde in Deira, ſauing ſuche priſoners as hee brought away with him, he returned.

Deira waſted by fire and ſworde.

Hungus the Pictiſh king ſore ſtomaking this iniurious enterpriſe of the Engliſhmen, determined to reuenge the ſame in all poſſible haſt, & therfore made inſtant ſute vnto Achaius (who had maried his ſiſter) to haue his ayde againſt them.

Achaius of his owne accorde minding to doe the Engliſh men a diſpleaſure, ſent forthwith vnto Hungus to the number of ten thouſand men. With which, and with his owne power King Hungus inuaded the borders of Northumberland, fetching from thence a great bootie of goods & priſoners: but yet he forbare ſlaughter of men, and burning of houſes, for a reuerence whiche hee had, as is ſuppoſed, towardes the Chriſtian religion.

Athelſtane being certified hereof, omitting his iourney into Mertia, turned al his power againſt the Picts: & hearing that they were withdrawne into theyr Countrey, he followed them ſo neare at the heeles, that very earely in one morning he was vpon their backes where they lodged by a broke ſide, not paſſing two miles from Haddington, before they had any knowledge of hys approche.

Athelſtane vpon a fierce courage, hauing thus founde his enimies according to his wiſhed deſire, and herewith comming vpon them in ſuche order of battaile as they had no way forth to eſcape without fight, hee commaunded a proclamation to be made by one of his Heralds, that all the whole number of the Pictes ſhoulde paſſe by the edge of the ſworde.

The Pictes thus ſeeing theyr enimyes at hande, and hearing of thys cruell commaundement, were wonderfully amazed wyth the ſtraungeneſſe of the thing, and oppreſſed ſo wyth feare, that they wyſt not what might bee beſt for them to do.

The Pictes are amazed.

At length, by commaundement of Hungus theyr King they fell vnto fortifying of theyr campe: but yet they quickly perceyued howe that it woulde not long preuayle them, conſidering that theyr enimyes had gotten into theyr handes not onelye all the ſpoyle whiche they had brought wyth them oute of Northumberlande, but alſo all other theyr prouiſion, truſſe, and baggage, which they had left in a field there adioining vnto the ſide of their campe. Herevpon manye reaſons were put forth amongeſt them, which way they might eſcape out of that preſent daunger.

The Picts entrench their campe.

In whiche meane tyme Athelſtane hauing brought his people into good order of battaile, prouoked the Pictes to come forth of theyr ſtrength into the playne fielde, there to trie their forces. But for that daye no notable thing was done: the Pictes keeping themſelues ſtill within theyr campe.

Athelſtane doth chalenge his enimie.

themſelues for the purpoſe, euen vpon the breake of the day forwarde they make towardes their enimies with fierce willes, ſpecially encouraged thereto by the comfortable wordes of Hungus.

The Engliſh men are put to flight.

The Engliſhmen halfe amazed at the hardie approch and onſet of the Pictes, were not long able to ſuſteyne their fore impreſſion: ſo that, beginning ſomewhat to ſway, at length they were forced to flie vnto the place, where ye heard howe they toke the baggage and ſpoyle of the Pictiſhe campe: were they were beaten downe in greater numbers than before, inſomuch that ſuch priſoners as they had before taken of them that kept the ſayde ſpoyle, greatly now to aduance the victorie of their fellowes, ſhewing more crueltie towardes the Engliſhe men than any of the reſt, now that they ſawe once howe the victorie was inclined to the Pictiſh ſide.

In fine, ſuch ſlaughter was made, that of the whole Engliſhe hoſte whiche was there aſſembled, there vneth eſcaped fiue hundred. Athelſtane himſelfe at the firſt encounter was runne through the bodie with a Speare, and ſo dyed, gyuing name to the place of the battaile, whiche continueth euen vnto this day, being called Athelſtanes fourde,

A dreame.

This victorie fell to the Pictes by myracle, for in the night ſeaſon as Hungus was layde downe to ſleepe (after it was agreed that they ſhoulde giue battaile) there appeared vnto him the Apoſtle Saint Andrewe (as the tale goeth) promiſing him and his people victorie againſte theyr enimies on the day next following, and for an aſſured token thereof, he tolde him that there ſhoulde appeare ouer the Pictiſhe hoſte in the element ſuch a faſhioned Croſſe, as hee ſometyme

Hungus awakened, and beholding the Skie, ſawe the Croſſe as the Apoſtle had tolde him: Wherevpon calling his people togyther, hee not onely ſhewed them the ſame ſight, but alſo declared vnto them what viſion had appeared vnto him in hys ſleepe, wylling them therefore to bee of good comfort, ſithe there was cauſe of ſuch aſſured hope to haue aſſyſtaunce from aboue againſte theyr cruell enimies.

Saint And the Scotti mens pat

The ſigne of the foreſayde Croſſe was not onely ſeene of the Pictes and Scottes beeyng there wyth them in ayde, to both theyr greate comfortes and gladneſſe, but alſo of the Engliſhe men to their no leſſe diſcouragement, as they that vnderſtode Saint Andrewe to bee Patrone and Aduowzyer of the Scottiſhe and Pictiſhe Nations. For it did put ſuche a feare into theyr heartes, that when they came to the poynte of ioyning, theyr ſtomackes ſo fayled them, that wyth ſmall reſyſtaunce they were eaſily vanquiſhed (as is ſayde) and put to flyght.

For this ſo manifeſt a myracle, after the battaile was once ended, and the victorie obteyned, Hungus repayred with his people following him, vnto the Church of that bleſſed man Saint Regulus, nowe called Saint Andrewes, where they made theyr offrings wyth humble deuotion vnto the Relykes of the Apoſtle, rendring thankes vnto him for theyr victorie with deuoute prayer after the accuſtomed maner then.

Which ordenance continually after remayned with the Pictes, and after their deſtruction & extermination, with the Scots euen vnto our time.

The bodie of Athelſtane was buried in the next Church vnto the place where the fielde was fought, howbeit, ſome haue left in wryting that his head was cut off from the bodie and brought to Inchgaruie, where beeing ſet vppon a ſtake, it was ſhewed to the people in reproche of his iniurious enterpriſe.

Hungus the Pictiſhe king to ſhewe himſelfe yet more mindefull of the due honoring of the holy Apoſtle, by whoſe ayde he acknowledged himſelfe to haue got the victorie aforeſayde, not only augmented his Church with new buildings and neceſſarie reparations, but encreaſed the number of prieſts in the ſame for the celebrating of diuine ſeruice: he alſo gaue many riche and coſtly ornaments vnto the ſame, as Chalices, Cruets, Baſons & ſuch like. Moreouer he cauſed to be made the Images of chriſt and his .xij. Apoſtles of fine gold and ſiluer, which hee beſtowed there, with a caſe alſo of beaten golde, therein to inclofe the relykes of S. bage, and such like throughout his realme and further that spirituall persons should not be cõpelled to answere before any temporall iudge.

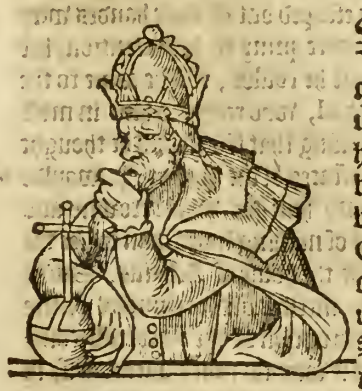
But these beneficiall priuiledges the Pictishe clergie did not lõg enioy. For Feredeth that was the fourth, which raigned amongst the Pictes after Hungus tooke from them all suche giftes as this Hungus, had giuen them, and further ordeyned to the derogation of their Priuiledges, that they shoulde answere for secular crymes afore secular Magistrates: And that lyuing vppon theyr former reuenewes, Souldiers and menne of warre shoulde enioye the other whiche Hungus had so freely bestowed vpon them.



The Nobles of the land mainteyned Feredeth in his doings, reckening all that spirituall persons had to be but cast away, which was the cause (as some thought) that theyr Kingdome came into suche ruine, as shortly after followed.

There bee some Chronicles that wryte how these things whiche are mencioned of Hungus, and Athelstane, chaunced not altogyther aboute this season, but Hector Boetius followeth Veremond in moste of his accounte, as the authour whome he taketh to be most certaine, as well for the accounte of the tyme as in the course of the whole Hystorie. And for that we meane not to presume wholy to derogate the same Boetius his credite wee haue not muche dissented from hym, but rather followed him in most places, leauing suche doubtes as may bee worthily put forth of that which he wryteth, vnto the consideration of the diligent Reader, sithe it is not our purpose to impugne, but rather to report what wee finde written by other, except nowe and then by the way to admonishe the reader of some vnlikelyhodes, (as the same doth seeme to vs and other,) and happely not without iust occasion.

But nowe to our purpose: Aswell Hungus King of Pictes, as Achaius King of Scottes, after the ouerthrowe and death of Athelstane, lyued with theyr people in good quiet & rest, for the Englishe men attempted nothing agaynst the Scottes or Pictes afterwardes, during the time of their raignes. At length Achaius after hee had raigned. xxxij. yeares, departed thys lyfe, in the yeare of our Lorde. 810. whiche was about the sixt yeare of Hungus his dominion ouer the Pictes.

His bodie was buryed in Colmekill, according to the maner of Kings amongest hys predecessours.

In the dayes of thys Achaius beside Clement and others, of whome before ye haue heard) lyued Bysshop Seruadius a notable Preacher in Murrey lande. Also Bishoppe Glacian with Modan and Medan two brethren, all Doctors and men of singular knowledge, in respect whereof they were had in great credite and estimation with the people.

Conual.

After the decease of Achaius, Conuall that was his Uncles son by Dongal, the brother of king Ethfine, succeeded in gouernment of ỹ Scottish kingdome. Conuall succeedeth Achaius.

Betwixt this Conual and Hungus the Pictish king, there was wonderfull loue and amitie shewed, both of them studying by all wayes and meanes how to mainteyne the auncient league & aliance betwixt their people, wherevpon ensued greate wealth and quietnesse to both their kingdomes. Loue and amitie.

Finally Hungus wasted with a continual consumption deceased, delyuering by his kingdome into the handes of hys sonne Dorstologus, and that in the presence of King Conuall, who likewyse lyued not long after hym, for in the fifth yeare of his raigne hee lykewyse departed oute of thys World, by force of naturall sickenesse. Hungus falleth into consumption. Conuall deceaseth also. 802. Io.Ma.

Dongal

Dongall the sonne of king Soluathius was receyued to succeede by the common consent of the estates of all the Realme, a man of singular wisdome and great knowledge. But for that hee was somewhat seuere in punishing the misordred behauiours of the Nobilitie and misgouerned youth of hys Realme, dyuerse of the Nobles conspyred agaynste hym, forcing one Alpyne the sonne of Achaius to make clayme to the Crowne, who perceyuing there was no remedie, but eyther to follow their mindes, or else to be murthered amongest them, consented to goe with them into Argyle, where they purposed to crowne him king sitting vpon the Chayre of Marble, according to the maner. Dongall succeedeth after Conuall. A seuere punisher of malefactors. Alpine constrained by the nobles, taketh vpon him to be crowned king.

Alpine vnwilling to receiue the crowne, fled.

Howbeit at his comming into that countrey, he found meanes to conuey himselfe from amongst them least through his meanes the quiet state of his countrey should be brought into trouble: and forthwith being escaped out of their handes with a few other that were priuy to his intention, hee maketh all the hast he coulde, till he came to the presence of Dongall, who receyued him in most ioyfull wise, promising that if it should be thought necessarie by the estates of the realme, he woulde gladly resigne vnto him his whole crowne and dignitie, desirous of nothing more than to see the aduancement of the house of Achaius. Suche sayth he, were the merites of that famous prince towardes the preseruation of the Scottish common wealth, that it were too much wickednesse to goe about to defraude his issue of the inheritance of the realme.

Alpine was ioyfully receyued of Dongall.

Alpine his excuse vnto Dongall.

Alpine giuing the king most hartie thankes, besought him to continue in the administration, drawing God and the worlde to witnesse, that he minded nothing lesse than to be about to clayme the gouernment of the kingdome so long as hee liued. For as touching his offence, in that he had gathered an armie and ledde the same into Argyle, it was not his fault, but the conspiratours which had forced him thereto, being determined to haue slaine him, if he had not consented vnto theyr desires.

Dongall mocketh at and against the rebelles.

Within three dayes after, there came messengers from the rebelles to excuse themselues also, and to put all the fault in Alpine: but king Dongall giuing small credite to their forged wordes, gathereth his power, and maketh such speede towardes the place where he vnderstood the sayd rebels were assembled togither, that he was vpon them ere they had any knowledge of his setting forwarde. So that before they coulde make any shift to escape out of daunger, which they went about to do, they were apprehended, and immediatelly condemned and put to death. Which execution put other presumptuous persons in feare, so that the state of the Realme remayned afterwards a great deale the more in quiet.

Eganus murthereth his brother.

Whilest things passed thus in Scotlande, Eganus the seconde sonne of king Hungus the Pictish king, found meanes to murther his brother Dorstologus, to the ende he might raigne in his place: and through support of some of the nobilitie he attayned to his purpose. And for that he woulde assure himselfe the more firmely in the estate, he frankly bestowed his fathers treasure amongst his Lordes and chiefest peeres of hys realme, and toke to wife also Bzenna the king of Mertia his daughter, which his brother the forenamed Dorstologus had maried, that thereby he might allwage the sayde king of Mertia his displeasure, which otherwise he should happely haue conceyued for the death of his other sonne in law the same Dorstologus.

His feare was great on eche side, and therefore had small affiance in any person, doubting least one or other should seeke to reuenge his brothers death. He durst neuer go any wayes forth abiode without a garde of men of warre about him, whome he had wonne and made his fast friends by his passing great larges and bountiful liberalitie. At length yet, his wife in reuenge of hir former husbandes death, founde meanes to strangle him as he lay one night fast a sleepe, hauing dzunke a little too muche in the euening before, and in this sort he came to his ende after he had raigned much what about the space of two yeares.

ment of the Pictiſhe kingdome, Alpine nephewe to the ſame. Hungus, by his ſiſter Ferguſiana, with the aduiſe of king Dongall, made clayme therbnto, and therbpon ſent his meſſengers bn-to the lords and peeres of the Pictiſh dominion, to require them on his behalfe, that he myght be receyued to the gouernemente of the kingdome due bnto him by lawfull inheritance, as they wel bnderſtode: and that if they throughly conſidered of the thing, they might perceiue it was the proui-ſion of Almightie God, that for want of lawfull ſucceſſion lineally deſcended from Hungus now to ſucceede in the eſtate of the Pictiſh kingdom, by this meanes both the nations Scottes and Pictes ſhould be ioyned in one, to the aboliſhing of all ſuch mortall warres, as by diſcorde and contention might aryſe betwixte thoſe two people, in lyke ſorte as before tyme there hadde done, to the great perill and danger of both their vtter ruines.

The Pictiſh nobilitie hauing knowledge that theſe meſſengers with ſuche kynde of meſſage ſhould ſhortly come from Alpine, with generall conſent and whole agreemente, chose one Feredeth to be their king, a man of greate authoritie amongeſt them, ſuppoſing this to be a meane to defeate Alpines title, and that thereby he ſhoulde ſeeme to be excluded from any further clayme.

Within fewe dayes after, came bnto Camelon the Scottiſhe ambaſſadors, where Feredeth with his nobles at that preſente were aſſembled: they being admitted therfore to declare their meſſage, when they began to enter into their matter of the right which Alpine had to the kingdom of the Pictes, the people woulde not ſuffer them to proceede any further therein, but began to make ſuche an vprore, that to appeaſe the noyſe, Feredeth himſelfe toke vpon him to make aunſwere bnto the Ambaſſadors, and therbpon commanding ſilence, declared bnto them that the Pictes neyther might nor ought to admitte any ſtranger to reigne ouer them: for there was an ancient lawe amongſt them, of moſte high authoritie, that in caſe of neceſſitie they might tranſpoſe the crowne from houſe to houſe: And further, that by the ſame law ther was an ordinance decreed, that if any man were once made & created king, he might not be depoſed during his natural lyfe. And therfore though it were ſo, that Alpine were the nephewe of Hungus by his ſiſter Ferguſiana, yet bicauſe he was a ſtraunger borne, and cõſidering withal, that the people by their ful authoritie had tranſlated the regall adminiſtration bnto an other houſe, of the whiche one was alreadie proclaimed and inueſted kyng, there was no reaſon nowe, why Alpine ſhoulde make any further clayme or demaunde bnto the kingdom.

Upon the meſſengers return home with this anſwer, Dongal ſhewed himſelf to be in no ſmal chafe, that the Pictes ſhoulde thus goe aboute by ſuche ſubtill argumentes and contriued inuentions to defraude Alpine of his righte. And therbpon the ſeconde tyme he ſente his ambaſſadors bnto them, requiring them eyther to doe him reaſon without any further ſurmiſed cauillations, eyther elſe within. iij. moneths ſpace after, to looke for open warres at the Scottiſhe mens handes.

Dongall hys diſpleazure with the Pictes aunſweare.

Ambaſſadours are ſent again.

Theſe Ambaſſadours paſſing forth on theyr iourney, at their approching bnto Camelon, certaine ſergeants at armes met them, and did forbid them to enter the citie: alſo they further cõmaunded them in name of Feredeth their king to auoyde out of the confines of his dominion within foure dayes ſpace, bpon pain of death.

Ambaſſadours are not receyued.

The Ambaſſadors being terrified with ſuche maner of inhibitions, they went no further: but yet accordyng as they had in commiſſion, they pronoũced the warre in the name of Alpine and Dongal, requiring thoſe that thus came to meet them, to giue ſignification therof bnto their maiſter Feredeth, and to the whole Pictiſhe nation: and ſo returned home the ſame way they came.

Warre is pronounced vnto the Pictes.

Then did the Scottiſhe Lordes repaire bnto Dongall, who the ſame tyme laye in Carryke caſtell, and there taking counſell for the maynatenance of theſe warres, not one was founde amongeſt them which offered not to ſpende both lyfe, landes, and goodes in Alpines ryghtuous quarell.

By this means was great preparation made on both ſydes for the warre, the Scottes mynding to ſet Alpine in his right, and the Picts determining not to receyue any prince of a ſtrange nation to reigne ouer them. Alpine crowned king of Scotland.

AFter Dongall was Alpyne receyued to the crowne and gouernement of the realme by the generall voyces of all the people, whoſe chiefeſt ſtudie was vpon his firſt entring into the eſtate to followe his ſuite touching his title to the Pictiſh kingdom: and herevpon with all diligẽce preparing a mightie hoſte and all other thinges (which were thought requiſite for the furthering of his enterpriſe) he paſſed forth towardes Angus, not ſtaying till he came to the caſtel of Forfair, which he beſieged, but the thirde daye after his comming thither, Feredeth the Pictiſhe king with a great armie of his ſubiectes araunged in good order of battayle, came and preſented himſelfe in ſighte of the Scottes, whervpon immediately neere to the towne of Reſſennoth they mette, and ioynyng there in battayle, foughte righte fiercely: At the firſte encounter the righte wyng of the Scottiſhe armie was neere hand ouerthrowne, but Fenedocht lieutenaunte of Atholl came ſpeedyly to the ſuccours with. 400. of his countreymen, and reſtored the batayle on the Scottiſh ſide: wherby enſued a ryght cruell bickeryng with great ſlaughter, and no ſigne of ſhrinkyng on eyther parte, by meanes whereof it ſemed doubtful for a log ſpace to whether ſide the victorie woulde enclyne. At length Feredeth perceyuing the myddle warde of his battayle a little to ſhrinke, ſpeedylye prealed forthe to ſuccour the ſame with a choſen companie of ſuch as hee hadde appoynted to attende him: but entring thus with greate violence amongeſt the thickeſt preaſe of his enimies, he was cloſed in on eche ſyde, and excluded ſo from the reſidue of hys owne people, that he coulde neyther returne by the ſame waye hee entred, neyther yet by any other, ſo that hee wyth thoſe that were wyth him, perceiuing their lyues to be in preſent danger, they didde caſte themſelues into a ryng, determinyng yet to reuenge theyr owne deaths, whereupon rather awearyed with continuall fyght, than vanquiſhed or with any feare oppreſſed, they were ſlayne all the whole number of them, togyther with Feredeth their king. Yet herewith did not the other Pictes giue ouer the battayle, ſo long as any daylyghte was on the ſkye. So that the nyght in the ende parted them in ſunder, bothe the armyes withdrawyng to their campes with ſmall ioye or triumphe, by reaſon of the greate ſlaughter, whiche had bene made on both ſides.

Fenedocht the Thane of Athole.

Feredeth is ſlaine in.

The nyght parted the armies.

The Captaines of the Pictes weying with theſelues the loſſe of their king & great multitude of their mẽ, thought it not beſt to abide any longer in the field: wherfore leauing their wounded people behind them, with all their baggage in the cãpe, they fled inctõinently the ſame night, ſome into one place, & ſome into an other, where they thought beſt for their owne welth and ſafetie.

The Pictes fled by night.

The Scots had fled immediatly likewiſe, but that word was brought them, as they were about to depart how the Picts were gone alredy, and had left their campe voyde of men of warre to defende the ſame. Wherupon the Scottes taryed til it was day not far from the place of the battail. In the morning there wer certain horſemen apoynted to ride abrode, & to viewe ẏ fielde, therby to underſtand whether ẏ Picts ment any deceite by their departure, as by laying of ſome embuſhmẽts, or otherwiſe, but vpon ẏ return of thoſe horſemẽ: whẽ it was once knowen how ther was no ſuch mater, but ẏ they wer fled in dede, ẏ Scots reioycing therat, fel to & gathered ẏ ſpoile of the fielde, deuiding the ſame amongſt themſelues according to their accuſtomed order.

Alpine

Alpine himſelfe commaunded the bodie of his enimie Feredeth to be layde in chriſtian buriall, not farre from Forfair. After this cauſing the muſters of his people to be taken, he found that he had loſt ỹ third part of his armie in that mortall and cruell battaile, and thervpon brake vp his campe for that tyme, licenceyng thoſe that were left aliue to returne vnto their homes.

This battaile being fought in the firſte yeare of the reignes of the two forſayd kings, weakened the forces of both the nations, ſo farforth that the Scottes doubting to bring the realme into daunger of vtter ruine (if they ſhoulde committe their whole puiſſance eftſones to the hazarde of an other foughten field) determined to purſue the warre by making of incurſions and inrodes only vpon their enimies, ſo to vexe the Pictes, and to bring them vnto reaſon, if it were poſſible: and ſo much verily the Scottiſhmē did by ſuch their cōtinual rodes and incurſions which they made into Angus, that the countrie was left voyd and deſolate of all the inhabitants.

Neyther did Brudus the ſonne of Feredeth, (whome the Pictes had choſen to ſucceede after his father in the kingdome) fynde any ſpeedy redreſſe to withſtande thoſe dayly inuaſions thus made by the Scots vpon his countreis and ſubiectes, for he was but a slouthfull perſon, & very negligent in his office, whervpon he was had in deriſion of his own people, who in the end ſlew him amongſt themſelues before he had reigned fully the terme of one whole yeare.

Then ſucceeded Keneth, the ſecond ſonne of Feredeth, with no better happe or ende than his brother. For gathering togither an armie of his ſubiects, and comming with them into Angus, he came no ſoner within ſighte of his enimyes, but that caſting off his armour, he fled incontinently, leauing his people in the fielde. And for that his haſte, was ſlayne by a Ploweman that met him by chaunce, and knew him not, but perceyued yet howe he had fled from his company, and therefore deſerued not to haue any other fauour.

His people ſeeing themſelues deſtitute of their head capitayn and gouernour, retired from their enimies, keeping themſelues in order of bataile without any further attempt.

Brudus kyng of the pictes.

After this infortunate end of Keneth, the Pictes choſe to their king one Brudus a man of a ſtoute and manlyke ſtomack, who immediately vpon his entring into the eſtate, comming into Angus which regiō the Scots had made waſte, catched there certaine Scottiſh robbers, & forthwith hanged them vp vpon gibets.

Biudus ſent vnto Alpyne for renuing their league.

After this, he ſent forth his ambaſſadors vnto king Alpine for reformation of all iniuries and wrongs betwixte the two nations, and to haue the auncient league renewed betwixte them.

Alpyn refuſeth any treatie of peace.

Alpine & the Scottiſh lordes hauing quickely aduiſed what to anſwer, declared vnto the Pictiſh ambaſſadors playnly, that they would not heare any treatie for peace, till the Pictes had deliuered the kingdome vnto the right heire.

Brudus ſēdeth an ambaſſador vnto Edwyn king of England for ayde with a ſumme of money.

Brudus vnderſtanding by this anſwere, that the Scots would ſtill follow the warres againſt the Picts, to be the better able to withſtand their malice, he purpoſed to procure the friendſhip of the Engliſhmen, to haue their ayde againſt the Scottes. He ſent therfore his ambaſſadors with a great ſumme of money vnto Edwyn king of Northumberlande, requiring him of his fauour, and to haue ſome number of his people for his wages to ſerue him againſt the Scots.

The money is receyued & aide promiſed.

Edwyne receyuing the moneye promiſed to come himſelfe with a myghtie armie, at what tyme and place Brudus ſhould appoint, to goe againſt the Scottes in defence of him and his ſubiectes the Pictes.

The picts ſom doe reioyce, and ſome myſtruſt of the engliſhe mens aſsiſtaunce.

Many of the Pictes reioyced greately, that they ſhould haue ayde thus of the Engliſhmen, hoping therby to haue aſſured victorie of their aduerſaries. Other myſtruſted not a little the Engliſhmens offers, by reaſon of the olde enimitie betwixt the Pictes and them.

The Scotes take Angus.

In this meane ſeaſon the Scots take a leaze vpon all the countrey of Angus, euen from the mountain of Granzebēe vnto the riuer of Tay, wherof Brudus being certified, ſendeth a poſte with all ſpeede vnto king Edwin king of Northumberland, requiring him to ſend to his ayde, a power of Engliſhmen, to helpe to reſiſte the Scottes, whiche at that preſente inuaded his countrey.

Brndus ſendeth vnto Edwin for ayde.

Edwyn deferreth his ayde.

Vnto which demand, Edwyn made this anſwere, that he was not only troubled with ciuile warre made againſt him by other Engliſhmen, but alſo had bin requeſted by Lewes ſurnamed Pius, as then French king in no wyſe to endomage the Scottes his confederates, ſo that for that that yeare preſent he might not cõueniently ſend to him any ſuccoures, but if he wold deferre the warres till the nexte yeare, he ſhoulde haue the beſte helpe that he were able to ſhewe hym.

Brudus being deceiued of the engliſhmen called his own ſubiects to the warre, aſſembling them at the foot of Calydon wood.

Brudus perceyuing himſelfe thus mocked & deluded by the engliſhmẽ, cõmãded by ſolemne ſummonance that all ſuche of his ſubiectes, as were able to beare armor, ſhould aſſemble in nether Calydone within eighte dayes after, wyth conuenable prouiſion of victuals, there to knowe his pleaſure.

Brudus entereth into Angus with an army.

His commaundement was obeyed: ſo that a mightie armie of men at the daye and place appoynted came togither, whiche beeing muſtred, they ſtreight ways remoue vnto Calydon caſtel, now called Dunkeld, where they paſſe the riuer of Tay, and ſo enter into Angus, not without ſome difficultie, but being once gotten ouer, they marche forthwith towardes the place wher they vnderſtood their enimies did lye.

A woonderfull polycie vſed by Brudus.

Brudus the night before the day in the which he thought they ſhould haue battaile, by the aduice of certaine expert warriours, whiche he had with him, appoynted all the horſes that were in the campe, ſeruing for burden, to bee beſtowed amongſt the women, lackeys and coyſtrels, part of them being clad in armure, and part in white lynnen, with long polles in their handes lyke to ſpeares and iauelins. Among them alſo hee ordeyned an hundred horſmen to be placed, whom he made priuie to his entention, as thē by whoſe leadyng that feate which ſhould be wrought in this behalfe, was to be atchieued. Theſe he cauſed to lye couertly within a wood neere vnto the place where the battaile ſhould be fought, giuing them in cõmaundment not to ſhewe themſelues till the battayle were begon.

The encamping of Alpyn his armie.

King Alpine this whyle helde himſelfe in a caſtell, whiche ſtode vpon an hill, a little from Dundee, beyng nowe decayed, ſo that litle therof remaineth to be ſeene at this daye. Upon the north ſide of the hille, there lyeth a greate large playne, compaſſed on eche ſide with mountains as then full of woodes and laundes, but now for the moſt part bare & without any trees or buſhes In this playne were the Scottes encamped.

Alpine beholding forth of the caſtell, how the Pictes approched to giue battayle, got him into the campe, & exhorting his people to ſhew themſelues valiant, diſpoſed them in array.

Raſhly the pictes begyn the battayle.

The Pictsno leſſe deſyrous to fight thā their gouernours woulde haue wiſhed them, beganne the battaile before they had commaundemente with ſuch violence, that the righte wing of the Scottes was ſore diſordered.

But Alpine perceiuing that, came ſpeedyly to their ſuccours, greatly reproouing them for their fayntneſſe of courage. To be ſhort, he didde ſo muche to enbolden them that by his meanes the fighte was renued in moſte cruell wyſe. In ſo muche that thoſe whiche before were put backe, began to winne grounde agayne, and to beate downe their enimies right fiercely.

The Scottes being deceiued with a counterfait trowe of horſmen fled.

But herewith did the counterfaite troupe of horſemen, whiche was hid in the wood ſodainly come forth, and ſhewed themſelues vpon the back half of ẏ Scottiſhmen, appering in ſight to be an huge number, and far more than they were in deede: with whiche ſight the Scottes beeing brought into a ſodain feare leaſt they ſhoulde be compaſſed aboute with multitude of enimies, they brake their aray, threwe off their armoure, and toke them to their feete, ſo to eſcape & ſaue themſelues by flight. Thus fewe were ſlayne in the battayle, but a great number died in ẏ chaſe, and were beaten downe on eche ſide as they wer ouertaken by the Picts.

King Alpyn taken by his enemies & after beheaded

Alpine himſelfe was taken, and hauyng his handes bounde behynde him, was led to the next towne, and there beheaded. The place beareth ẏ name of him vnto this day, being called Palalpine. His head alſo was ſet vpon a polle, and borne vnto Camelon, and there ſet vp vpon one of the higheſt turrets of the wall.

Kenneth ſonne of a iniected of Scotl

The Scottes that eſcaped from this ſorowfull ouerthrow, got them with all ſpeed into Argyle, wher they inueſted Kenneth the ſonne of Alpine king of their realm. This was in the yere of our Lorde. 834. and the fourthe yeare after Alpyne entred firſt into the eſtate.

834.

The Pictes thankes God, for victorie.

The Pictes hauing atchieued this great and ioyfull victorie, aſſembled at Camelon by commaundement of their king, where cauſing a ſolemne proceſſion to be made, in rendring thanks to almightie God for their good ſucceſſe in their paſſed iourney: they take a generall othe vppon the Goſpell booke, that from thenceforth they would not ceaſſe to make the Scottes warre, til they had vtterly deſtroyed the race of them: and herewith ordeyned a law, that if any man made

They m vowe tot tinew th

mencion of any peace or league to be had wyth the Scottes, he ſhould loſe his head for it.

There were in deede ſome auncient perſonages amongſt them, that ſpake againſt this inſolent outrage of the people, alledging that in time of proſperous ſucceſſe men ought to vſe a modeſtie: but certain youthfull perſons offended with ſuch graue aduiſe, thruſte the authors therof out of the Churche, within the whiche they were as then aſſembled.

The Scottes being certified hereof, were nothing therewith diſcouraged, but rather put in good hope of better ſucceſſe, ſith the enimies abuſed themſelues thus in tyme of felicitie.

The nert ſommer after, the Pictes aſſembled their power together, and ſetting forewarde towardes the Scottes, thorough a light occaſion they fel at variãce amongſt themſelues, & fought with ſuche hatred together, that the king was not able to appeaſe the fray til nyght parted them in ſunder.

Then calling the lordes afore him, he aſſayde al wayes to haue agreed the parties, but whẽ he ſaw it would not be, in the morning he gaue thẽ licence to departe euery man to his owne home, breaking off his iourney for that tyme.

Eudus lined not paſt .iij. moneths after, for thorough griefe that things wente not forewarde as he wiſhed, he fell into a grieuous diſeaſe, and finally therof dyed.

After whoſe deceaſſe the Pictes choſe his brother named Druſken, to ſucceede in gouernemente of the kingdome, who applied his whole endeuour vpon his firſt entring into the eſtate, to appeaſe the ciuile diſcord amongeſt his ſubiects. But whileſt he was thus buſily occupied about the ſame, there were certain Scottes, which ſore diſdained to vnderſtand ỹ the head of theyr late king ſhuld remain vnburied in ſuche reprochful ſort amongſt their enimies, wherupon hauyng perfecte knowledge of the Pictiſhe toung, they fayned themſelues to be merchaunt men of that countrey, and comming vnto Camelon, watched their tyme till they founde meanes in the night ſeaſon, to ſteale to the walles, and ſecretly taking awaye the heade, eſcaped with the ſame home into their owne countreye. This acte of theirs was not a little commended: and ſo now the head of king Alpin being recouered, was cloſed in a leaden coffin, and Kenneth himſelfe, hauing in his companie a great number of his nobles, went with it ouer into Colmkill, where he buryed it in the abbey, amongſt the ſepultures of his elders, together with the reſidue of the bodye in ryght ſolemne wyſe, as apertayned. And further thoſe perſons that had put their lyues in aduenture to fetche the ſame head from the walles of Camelon, wer by Kẽneth rewarded with rich gifts and lands in perpetuitie to remayn to them and to their heires for euer.

After this, Kenneth deuiſing for the ſuretie of his ſubiectes, furniſhed all the holdes and caſtels on the frontiers of his enimies with men & munition, according as he thought expedient. And moreouer toke order, that all the youth of the realme ſhould be in a readineſſe vpon an houres warning, to goe forth againſt the Pictes, if they attempted any new inuaſions. Keneth fortified the realem.

But the Scottiſh lordes had no great luſt to take any enterpriſe in hand eſtſoones againſt the Pictes, remembring how infortunatly they had ſped the laſt time: ſo that for the ſpace of .iij. yeares there was no great exployte atchieued, ſaue certaine roades and incurſions, whiche both the nations cõtinually vſed to make one vpon an other, as tyme and occaſion ſerued.

At length king Kenneth beeing very deſirous to be reuenged of the Pictes, for the death of his father king Alpine, and other iniuries by them done and attempted againſt the Scottiſh natiõ, in the fourth yeare of his reigne, he aſſembled the peeres and chiefeſt nobles of his realme, truſting to perſuade them to ayd him in al ſuch enterpriſes as he mente to take in hand againſt the Pictes, whom he purpoſed to purſue with opẽ warres, till he had them at his pleaſure. Keneth called his nobles to reuenge his fathers death.

But calling his lordes and peeres thus aſſembled one day before him, and going earneſtly about to moue them to the warres, he could ſtir them no more to his purpoſe, than if he had ben in hand to haue coũſelled them vnto that which in no wyſe had appertained vnto their duties: which their lacke of ſtomacks, Kenneth perceyuing, he began to deuiſe a pretie ſhift, wherby to induce them to his accorde.

Firſt therfore, breaking vp the aſſemblie for the ſame day, he cõmaunded ỹ they ſhould come togither agayne on the next morow, to conſult further for the ſtate of the realme, as they ſhould ſee cauſe. The ſame euening alſo hee had them all to ſupper, whiche being prolonged tyll farre in the night, it was late before they went to bed, ſo that being ouerwatched, when they were once gotten to reſte, they were ſone brought into a ſound ſleepe: Now had the king appointed for euery one of their chambers one man apparelled in garmentes pretily deuiſed and made of fyſhe ſkinnes vnſkaled, bearing in one of their hands a ſtaffe of ſuche rotten woode, as ſhyneth in the night, and in their other hand a great ore horn, to the ende that vttering their wordes thorough the ſame, the ſound of their voyces ſhoulde ſeeme farre differing from the vſuall ſpeeche of man. A pretie ſhifte deuiſed by the king to perſwade the nobilitie.

Thus appointed in the dead of the night, they enter the chambers to eche of them aſſigned, where (as is ſayd) the lordes laye faſte a ſleepe, who being at the firſt as it were half awakened, were wonderfully amazed at the ſtrangeneſſe of the ſight, doubting whether it wer but a dreame or ſome true and vnfayned viſion. Herewith alſo were heard certaine ſeuerall voyces, farre greater than thoſe of men, declaring that they were meſſengers ſente from almightie God vnto the Scottiſh nobilitie, to commaunde them to obey their king, for his requeſt was iuſt: The Pictiſh kingdome due vnto him by righteſull heritage, ought to be recouered from that people, which for their great offeces and ſinnes towards almightie god ſhoulde ſhortly come to vtter deſtruction: ſuch was the determinate pleaſure of his diuine maieſtie, againſt the whiche might neyther coũſell nor puiſſance of man be able to reſiſt.

Of ſuch ſlightes there were many in thoſe dayes: and oftentimes no doute eſteemed to be heauenly viſions in deede.

When the counterfaited meſſengers had thus made an ende of their wordes, they ſlighly hid their ſtaues vnder their innermoſt garmentes, & therwith quikly cõueyd their vppermoſt veſtures made of fiſh ſkales (as I haue ſaid) into their boſoms in ſuche ſlight and nimble wyſe, that it ſeemed theſe viſions had ſodeynly vaniſhed away.

Thoſe lordes that had ſeene theſe ſightes, lay ſtill for that night, greatly muſing on the mater. In the morning being got vp, and aſſembled in the counſell chamber, they declared to eche other what they had ſeene and heard in the nyght paſſed, and for that all their viſions which they had ſeene by eche others reporte, were in euery behalfe lyke, and nothing differing one from an other, they beleeued verily, that it was ſome celeſtiall oracle and meſſage ſent from God. Therefore preſently they got vnto the king, declaring vnto him how they had been admoniſhed from aboue, to continue the warres with all their forces againſt the Pictes.

The lords declare their viſion vnto the king.

The king tolde them he had ſeene the like viſion, but they ought to kepe it cloſe, leaſt by glorying too much in the fauour ſhewed by almightie God towardes them, they myghte haply diſpleaſe his diuine Maieſtie, which otherwiſe they might perceyue was readie in their ayde. Then finally might the viſion be publiſhed, when thorough his fauourable aſſiſtance, the warres were brought to a luckie ende.

The anſwer of king Kenneth

This aduiſe of the kyng was well lyked of them all, and commaundement giuen, that all maner of prouiſion ſhoulde be prepared with all ſpeede for an armie to be ſet forth into Pictland. The lordes going buſily about to prouide themſelues of all things neceſſarie, muſtred their men in all partes, ſo that there was leuied a greater hoſte than had bin ſeene in thoſe parties of long tyme before.

Kenneth entred into Starlingſhire.

When the whole power was come togyther, Kenneth marched forth with the ſame, entring by greate violence into the Pictiſhe boroures about Sterling.

Druskene lilly inua his enimi

Druskene the king of Pictes aduertiſed hereof, and hauing his armie in a readineſſe bothe of Pictes and ſuch Engliſhmen as he had reteined to ſerue him for his wages, fetcheth a compaſſe about, and paſſing by the Scottiſhe armie in the night, encampeth betwixt them and home, in ſo muche that the daye did no ſooner appeare, but the one parte deſirous to be in hande with the other, without token of trumpet or commandement of capitayne, they ruſhed togither moſte fiercely. The haſtie ſpeede of the Pictes to ioyn, put them to no ſmall diſaduantage, but the departure of the Engliſhmen, withdrawing themſelues aſyde to the next mountayne, moſte of all diſcouraged them: for the Scottes therwith giuing a ſhoute, declared themſelues to bee highly recomforted with that ſight.

The Engliſhmen fled.

Druskene ſendeth to Engliſhmen

Druskene in all haſt ſent vnto thoſe Engliſh men a meſſenger, willing them with large promiſes of rewarde to returne to his ayde: but the Engliſhmen aunſwered, that their vſe was not to fyght without order and cõmaundemente of their generall, and that the Pictes lyke vnſkilful men had caſt away themſelues to bee ſlayne by the enemies hande: where it appertained vnto warlyke knowledge to auoyde the battail, when no hope of victorie appeared.

The middle warde of the Pictes ſeing themſelues left naked on the one ſyde, and aſſayled on the backes where the Engliſhmen ſhoulde haue kept their grounde and defended them, they began to ſhrinke: which the Scottes perceyuing, ſtroke on the more freſhly, til at length the Pictes not able to withſtand their force, fell to running away. They made their courſe towards the water of Forth, whiche was not farre from the place of the battaile, where beeing ouertaken, they were beaten downe and ſlayne in greate numbers: for Kenneth gaue cõmandement that they ſhuld ſpare none of the Pictes nation, neither gentleman nor other, y fel into their handes.

The Pictes vanquiſhed

The Engliſhmen whyleſt the Scottes and Pictes were thus occuppyed in the fyghte and chaſe, withdrewe homewardes with all ſpeede, and by reaſon of the mountaynes whiche they had to paſſe, that toke awaye the ſight of them from the Scottes, they eſcaped into their countrey without any purſuite.

The Engliſhmen eſcape.

Druskene himſelfe ſo ſoone as hee perceyued howe the field went againſt him, got him to his horſe, which he hadde appoynted to bee readie for him at hande vpon all occaſions, and ſo eſcaped out of daunger with a fewe other in his compayne.

Druskene caped by flight.

The Scottes returning from the chaſe, remayned in the place of the battayle all nyghte, keeping ſtrong watche aboute their campe, for doubt doubt least the Englishemen had bene lodged in some secrete place nere by to haue set vpon thē at vnwares, if they might haue seene any aduauntage: but in the morning when it was knowne howe they were quite gone their wayes, and returned into theyr countreye (as before yee haue heard) then was the spoile of the fielde and Pictishe Campe gathered and bestowed amongest the souldiers, after the auncient custome of that natiō. And then were they all licenced to departe euery man to his home, with thankes for their seruice and paines in this iourney so manfully employed.

Within fewe dayes after, the Pictishe king Druskene sent his ambassadors vnto king Kēneth to sue for peace. Kenneth was contented to heare them, and promised to graunt a peace, so they would surrender into his handes the gouernement of their kingdom due vnto him by right of inheritance. But this condition being vtterly refused of the Picts, was ẏ cause that the war was eftsoones renewed with more cruelties than before. The yeare nexte ensuing this battayle, Kenneth got Mernes, Angus, and Fyfe into his handes, furnishing all the castels and holds with men, munition, and victuals. But whylest hee went about to subdue the countreis about Sterlyng, worde was brought him that suche as he left thus in garison in those countreys, were betrayed by the inhabitauntes, and slayne euerye mothers sonne.

Kenneth wonderfully kindled in wrathe for the newes, left off his treatie which thē he had in hande with the people of Menteth and Sterlingshire for their submission, and returned in greate hast towardes Fyfe, where being arriued, he put all to the fire and sword, not leauing one alyue of the Pictishe nation within all those quarters.

The lyke cruelties was shewed thorough the whole countreys of Mernes and Angus, for an ensample to other to beware howe they falsifyed their fayths once giuen by way of allegiance.

In the meane tyme that Kenneth with hys Scottes raged in suche wyse throughe those countreys, Druskene assembling all the power of his countreys, came forthe into the fielde, to meete the Scottes, meaning eyther to put them backe out of the confines of his dominion, eyther else to dye with honoure in the attempte therof.

Thus passing through ẏ coūtrey, at length he came vnto Scone, where afterwards stood a famous Abbey of Chanons of Saint Augustines order, and here he found Kenneth with his army already encāped. The next day when both parties were ready to haue giuen battell, Druskene wishing rather to aske peace whilest his power was yet in safetie, then after he were once vanquished (if such were his misaduēture) to intreate for the same in vaine, sent an herauld at armes vnto Kenneth, willing that he might talke with him before they ioyned, for that he had to say certaine thinges whiche being followed might turne to the great benefite and commoditie of both the Scottish and Pictish nations.

Kenneth for that he would not seeme to refuse any indifferent offers, was cōtented to come to a cōmunication, & so thervpon both the kings in presence of both their armies arraunged in the field ready to fight, came togither in a place appointed, either of them being accompanied with a like number of their nobles, as by the heraulds it was accorded.

Here Druskene with many reasons going about to perswade peace, shewed howe necessary the same was betwixt the two nations. And againe how doubtfull fortune was to them that trusted to much in hir vnstedfast fauour, at length he grew to this end, that if Kenneth could be cōtēted to graunt a peace, the Picts should release all such right, title and interest as they had in the countreys of Mernes, Angus, & Fyfe, vnto him and his successors the Scottish kings for euer, so that he should make no further clayme to any other of those countreys whiche the Picts as yet possessed.

The persuasion of peace by Druskene.

Merns, Angus and Fyfe is required of the Pictes to release.

Herevnto Kenneth answeared, that he well vnderstoode how vnstable fortunes lawes were, but thence the Pictes fought in an vniust quarell, as to defraude the posteritie of theyr lawfull king Hungus, who lately reigned amongst thē of the rightfull inheritaunce of theyr kingdome, they themselues had iust cause to doubt fortunes chaunce, where the Scots hauing put vpō lawful armure, and seeking to attaine that by warre, whiche by other meanes they could not attayne at the handes of the vniust possessors, they had lesse cause to mistrust hyr fauour, and therefore if the Pictes were desirous of peace, they ought to cause a surrender to be made of theyr kingdome into his handes, accordingly as they well knewe it was reason they shoulde: and what commoditie might thereof ensue to both nations being by suche meanes once ioyned & vnited into one entier kingdome, hee doubted not but they vnderstoode it sufficiently enough. And as for other conditions of peace than this, he told them plainely there would be none accepted.

Kenneth his answere.

Thus did the kings depart in sunder, without any agreement concluded: and being returned to theyr armies, they make ready to trie the matter by dinte of sworde.

Kenneth exhorted his people that day to shew themselues menne, sithe the same shoulde iudge whether the Scottes shoulde rule and goueme,

the

the Pictes, or the Pictes the Scottes.

The order of the battaile.

Wyth these and many other effectual wordes when he hadde encouraged his folkes to the battayle, hee deuided them into three wardes, as two wings and a mayne battayle. In euery of them hee set fyrst archers & arkbalesters, and next vnto them pykes or speares, then bill men and other with suche shorte weapons, last of all, an other multitude with all kynde of weapons as to the battail, which the Scots began with such a chearefull shoute, that the Pictes euen vpon the first onset were so amazed, that if Dyuskē had not with comfortable wordes relieued their faintyng stomakes, the most part of them had fledde without any stroke stricken. But beeing encouraged throughe the presence of their kyng, shewing himselfe with chearefull countenaunce amongst them, and therewith exhorting them to stande by him at that present, there was fought a ryghte sore and cruell battaile betweene them.

King Druskē emboldeneth his people the pictes.

The women that were amongest the Pictes, of whome there was no small number, specially in the right wing, made suche a woeful noyse when they beheld the men one kill an other, that they were a more encumber to the Pictes thā ayd when it came to the poynt of seruice: by reason wherof, that wing was shortly beaten downe, and put to flight.

The women were cā umber to the pictes.

Which when Kenneth beheld, hee sette in with his horsemen on the backes of the Pictes, now left bare by the running thus away of those in the foreslayd wing: and so entring in amongst them, disordred their aray in suche wise, that by no meanes they were able to ayde themselues, or come into any order agayne, so that in the ende they were fayne to throw downe their weapons, and take them to their feete, thereby to escape the daunger.

Kenneth with the horsmen disordred the pictes aray.

The right wing of the pictes is put to flighte.

Suche heapes of slayne men, armure & weapons lay here strewed in the place of the battail, that the Scottes were inforced in followyng the chase to breake their araye, to passe the more speedily: by meanes wherof, fallyng amongest wholle bandes of the Pictes, manye of them were slayne.

This mischiefe Kenneth perceyuing, cōmandeth to sound the retreat, & so gathering his people about their standerdes, he appointed certaine cōpanies in warlyke order to pursue in chase of the enemies, whilest he himselfe with the residue aboade still in the place (where the fielde was fought) al that day & the night nexte folowing.

Kenneth causeth the treate to sounded.

The Scottishe captaines that were sente to followe the chase, earnestly in executyng theyr kinges commaundement, made greate slaughter of the Pictes in all places where they might ouertake them.

Dyuskene the Pictishe king himselfe beeyng pursued to the riuer of Tay, for that he could not passe the same, was there slaine with the whole retinue which he had about him.

The kil the pict

It is sayde, that the Scottishemen encountred with the Picts that day seuen sundry times, and in seuen sundry places, and still the victorie aboade with the Scottes.

The day after the battaile suche as had followed in the chase returned to the camp, where they presented vnto Kenneth their king, the armure and other spoyle of Dyuskene the Pictish king, king, which they brought with thē, beſides great abundance of other pillage and riches, whiche they had got of the enimies that were ſlayne. Dzuſkenes armure and other things belonging to his owne bodie, was offered vp to S. Colme, in the Churche dedicated to his name within the Ile of Colmekill, there to remaine as a monumēt of this victozy to ſuch as ſhould come after.

After this the whole pray and ſpoyle was gathered and deuided amongſt the ſouldiers, Kenneth was counſelled to haue diſcharged his armie and to haue departed home, but he purpoſing now to make an ende of the whole warres, ſithe he was in ſuche a fozwardneſſe, called togither the multitude, and in this wiſe began to vtter vnto them his minde and purpoſe.

It is the duetie of a good Captayne, when he hath the victozy in his handes, and as yet the warres not ended, if he minde the preſeruation of himſelfe and his countrey, and to vſe the victozie as hee ought, not to ceaſſe from purſuing the enimies once vanquiſhed, till hee haue eyther made them his frendes, oz elſe vtterly deſtroyed and ridde them out of the way: foz if any man ſhall thinke it beſte to ſuffer the enimie to remayne in quiet after he be once weakened and brought to a lowe ebbe, till time peraduenture he ſhall haue recouered his fozces agayne, he ſhall procure to himſelfe (as I geſſe) moze daunger than happely hee is well ware of. And that we may ſpeake ſomewhat of this daunger now preſent, the ſtate of the Piciſhe kingdome (as yee know) is foze enfeebled, theyz power being diminiſhed by fozce of warre, is brought to that poynt, that it reſteth in our handes vtterly to deſtroy and exterminate the whole nation. Whiche act ought to be abhozred if it were poſſible foz vs by any meanes to drawe them (our honour ſaued) vnto our frendſhippe. But the Picts are of ſuch a ſtubboꝛne nature, and ſo deſirous of reuenge, that ſo long as there remayneth any one of them aliue, they will beare in theyz hartes a deſire to reuenge all ſuche loſſes as they haue in any wyſe ſuſtayned by this warre. Wherevpon I do verily beleeue that there is none of the Piciſhe nation from hence fozth, will beare any faythfull frendſhip towardes the Scottes. Therefoze ſithe wee can not make the Picts, thus lately ſkourged by vs, our frendes, I thinke it beſte (excepte wee will neglect our owne ſafeties) vtterly to deſtroy the whole nation, by putting to the ſwoꝛde not onely bothe men and women, but alſo all theyz youth and yong chyldren: leaſt they, beyng diſcended of that lynage, hereafter in time to come, arme thēſelues to the reuenge of theyz parentes deaths, and that not without perill of the vtter loſſe of our countrey and kingdome.

This ſentence of the king, though it ſeemed ouer cruell to many, yet whether foz that they ſawe the ſame to ſtande with the kings pleaſure, oz that they thought it moſte expedient foz the ſuretie of the Scottiſhe common wealth, it was allowed and ratified by them all. The commons allowe the kings ſaying.

Such crueltie herevpō was forthwith ſhewed throughout all the Piciſh regions, that there was not one liuing creature of humane ſhape left aliue, ſauing ſuch as ſaued themſelues within the walles of Camelon, oz in certaine other holdes and foztreſſes, and alſo aboute two thouſande of thoſe that fledde into Englande: foz all the reſidue were moſte vnmercyfully murthered and ſlayne without reſpect eyther to age, ſexe, profeſſion, oz eſtate. A cruel acte committed by the Scots vpon the Pictes.

Thus Kenneth hauing diſpatched the inhabitants, ſeaſed the cōutrey into his owne hands, making partition of the ſame as he ſawe cauſe, and deuiding it amongſt his nobles, accozdyng to the merites of euery of them duely waged and conſidered, he added newe names alſo vnto euery quarter and region (eyther after the name of the gouernour, oz els of ſome promontozie, riuer oz other notable water oz place, accozdyng as was the auncient cuſtome of the nation) that the memozy of the Piciſhe names might ende togither with the inhabitants. Pictland parted vnto diuers men.

The countrey aunciently called Horeſtia, was giuen vnto two bzetherne, Ingusian and Wernan, by reaſon whereof the one parte of the ſame countrey was called Angus, and the other the Wernes. The linage of thoſe two noble men remayne vnto this day. Newe names are giuen vnto euery region. Angus. Merne.

The region whiche till then was named Otholinia, was turned afterwardes to the name of Fyfe, after the name of one Fyfe Duffe: whoſe valiancie was throughly tried in theſe laſte warres with the Picts. Fyfe.

There remayne vnto this day tokens and old ruines of a Caſtell ſituate betwixt the riuer of Leuine and Saint Kenneths churche, which (as yet appeareth) was fenſed about with ſeuen rampers and as many diches, wherein the poſteritie of this worthy man after his deceaſſe had theyz habitacion by the ſpace of many hundzed yeares.

Louthian reteyned ſtill the fozmer name, ſo honozable was the remembzaunce of that famous Pzince king Loth amongſt all men. Louthian.

The ſtrongeſt caſtle of the whole countrey Kenneth beſtowed vpon that valiant Captaine named Bar, whoſe councell and fozewarde ſeruice ſtood the Scottes in no ſmall ſtede in thoſe warres, in whiche the Picts were thus ſubdued. That foztreſſe euer ſithence (after his name) hath bene called Dunbar, that is to ſay, the Caſtell of Bar. A rewarde giuen vnto Bar, which was the fortreſſe of Dunbar.

The famelie of Dunbar.

There descended of hym a noble house or family bearyng the name of this Castell, continuing in greate fame and honour, euen vnto our tyme, of the whiche the Earles of Marche had theyr beginniug, and continued long in that dignitie from one to an other, with diuers branches of right famous memorie.

The changyng of the names of the Dales.

The names of diuers dales were also chaunged, and some kepte the olde names still.

Annandale.

Dydolucia shortely after begaune to take the name of Annandale, of the ryuer of Annan, that renneth through the same.

Tweedale.

And so lykewise Tweedale toke name of the water of Tweede.

Cludesdale.

And Cludesdale of the ryuer of Clud.

In lyke maner many other Countreys, Townes and Castels had theyr names chaunged at the same tyme, after they came into the possession of the Scottish nenne, vpon sundrie considerations, for a witnesse of theyr victorious actes, atchieued agaynst the Pictes.

The Gentlewomen are preserued in Camelon.

Furthermore into the citie of Camelon were withdrawen the moste parte of all the noble mens wiues of the Picts with their chyldren vpō truste to be safe in the same, aswell by reason of the strength of the place, as also of the strong garyson whiche was appoynted to defende it.

Kenneth sendeth vnto Camelon, commaunding the for to yeelde.

Kenneth therefore hauyng taken his pleasure abroade in the countrey, came thyther with a mighty armie to besiege the Citie, and firste sendyng vnto them within, to knowe if they woulde yeelde, he was aunswered howe sithe it plainely appeared that the Scottes coulde be satisfied with nothing but with the slaughter of all suche as fell into theyr handes, aswell of women and chyldren, with impotent age, as of other, they were minded neuer to surrender theyr holde with lyfe. Wherevpon the siege continued by the space of many dayes.

They of Camelon require truce for three dayes.

Whylest the Scottes in the meane tyme gotte togither greate number of faggottes, and other suche brusheand stuffe to fill the ditches withall whiche were very deepe and broade, at length when they within beganne to want vitayles, they requyred a truce for three dayes, in the whiche meane time they might take aduise for the surrender of the Citie.

Kenneth mistrusting no deceyt, graunted theyr requeſt, and therevpon commaunded his people to ceasse from all maner of annoyance of the enimies, for that terme.

The Pictes issue vpon the Scottes with great fortune.

But in the meane tyme the Pictes prepared themselues of all things necessary to make an issue vpon the Scottes. There was also an olde gate forlet and stopped vp with earth and stones vpon the one side of the Citie, so that of a long tyme before there had bene no way forth by the same, wherefore in the darke of the night the Pictes ridding away the earth and ramell wherwith it was closed vp, aboute the third watche, they passe forth at that gate in good order of battayle, setting firste vpon suche Scottes as kepte the standyng watche, who were in doubte of nothing lesse than of any issue to be made on that side, by meanes whereof they were easily oppressed, and likewise the other that kepte the inner watche, in so muche that the slaughter went on almoste, euen to the kings tent with greate noyse and clamour, as is commonly seene in suche sodayne tumultes, especially chanceyng in the night season. When the day began once to appeare, the Pictes withdrawyng towardes the Citie by the same way they came, were pursued by the Scottes, and no small number of them slayne at the entring. The Citie also had bene taken at the same time, but that the Pictes out of the turrettes and loupes of the walles, discharged a wonderfull number of quarelles, dartes, arrowes, stones and other things vppon the Scottes, as they approched neare to the gate, where theyr fellowes (that made the issue) hasted to enter againe into the towne.

Anewowe king

There were slayne of the Scottes at this bickeryng aboue fyue hundred, wherewith Kenneth was so kindeled with wrath, that detesting the falsehod of the Pictes, hee vowed by open othe that he woulde not departe from the siege, till he had put the citie and them within to the fire and swoorde, without sparing of any, eyther one or other.

The of th whē beſe

Sundrie times he attempted to haue wonne the citie by force of assaulte, but the Pictes still defended theyr walles so stoutly, that he coulde not atchieue his purpose. Wherevpon the siege continued the space of foure moneths togither. So that suche scarcetie of all kindes of vitayles still rose amongst them, that the wretched Citezins abstayned from nothing that might in any wise be eaten, though it were neuer so much to be abhorred. And yet although they were brought vnto suche miserable stay, that there was no hope longer to defende themselues, if any man notwithstanding all suche extremitie were heard to make mencion of surrendring, he was forthwith slayne by his fellowes, as an enimie to his nation and friend vnto the Scots. It was thought that Kenneths othe made them so obstinate in theyr wilfull contumacie, because they sawe nothing but death whiche way so euer they inclined.

Ap vſed net

At length when the citie was thus reduced into all extreeme misery, & the diches filled with faggottes and other suche stuffe, Kenneth one night appoynted fyue hundreth of his chosen Souldiers to lie in ambushe within a wood, adioyning neare to one side of the Citie, so that that in the morning when he ſhoulde gyue the aſſaulte on the contrary ſide, they might ſodenly come forth and ſkale the walles on that other.

These ſouldiers accordyng to that whiche they had in commaundement, ſhortely after the breake of day, hearyng that Kenneth had begon the aſſault on his parte, quickely came forth of the wood, and hauing theyr ladders ready, came to the walles, reared them vp, and ſwiftely getting into the citie, opened one of the gates where one parte of the army entred, the cytezins ſtanding in no doubt at all of any attempt on that ſide, ſo as beyng gotten togither to defende the walles on that parte where Kenneth gaue the aſſaulte, and now hearing how the enimies were got into the citie, and comming on theyr backes they were wonderfully amazed, but yet ſo long as they were able to make any reſiſtāce, they did what lay in theyr vttermoſte power to beate backe the Scots, & to dryue them out of the citie againe. The ſlaughter therefore was great whiche the Scottes made of the Pictes in euery corner of the ſtreetes, in ſo muche that the Scottiſhe Lordes and other Captaynes in reuenge of the late receyued loſſe of theyr men through the falſe practiſed policie of the Pictes, commaunded in a greate furie to ſette fire on the houſes, and to kill and ſlea all ſuche of the Pictiſhe nation as came in theyr way.

Thus the murder proceeded vpon al eſtates, aſwell religious as other, and lykewiſe vppon women and chyldren without any difference.

A number of Ladyes and Gentlewomen, gettyng them into the preſence of kyng Kenneth, beſought him in moſte lamentable wiſe, to haue pytie vpon theyr wofull eſtate, and to ſaue theyr lyues from the handes of his moſte cruell ſouldiers. But ſuche was the rage kindled in the Scottiſhmens hartes, that there was no more fauour ſhewed towardes them than towardes the other, and ſo immediatly were they alſo ſlayne without all compaſſion.

So farre forth was the murder executed on all hands, that there was not one left aliue of the Pictiſh nation, neither man, woman nor childe to bewayle that miſerable deſtruction of theyr countrey and kinſfolkes. Then were the walles throwen downe and made euen with the plaine grounde. The houſes and buyldings aſwell priuate as publike with the churches & chapels were ſet on fire, and that which might not be conſumed with the rage of fire was ruynate and deſtroyed with hande, ſo that there remayned of all that famous citie, nothing but the aſhes with heapes of the broken and brenned ſtones, and likewiſe of the pauement and fundacion of ſome parte of the walles.

All the Pictiſh natiō deſtroyed.

The citie of Camelon is throwē downe.

The ſame time the caſtell of Maydens now called commonly Edenburgh caſtell was ſtill kept with a mightie garyſon of Pictes, but they hearing of the miſerable deſtructiō of Camelon, and doubting to fall into the like miſehaunce, left the caſtel voyde, and fled into Northumberland. Thus ended the kingdome of the Pictes in Albion in the yeare after they firſte began to reigne therein. 172. and in the yeare after the byrth of our ſauiour. 839. from the firſt cōming of Fergus. 166. and after the creation of the worlde. 4806. if the Scottiſh chronicles be true.

The caſtell of Maydens is left of the Pictes.

But where as the truthe concernyng the tyme of the firſte comming into this Iſle, aſwell of the Scottes as Pictes reſteth doubtfull, and that aſwell by authoritie of approued writers, as by reaſonable coniectures, wee haue in the Hiſtorie of Englande more largely written thereof. Wee referre those that bee desirous to see further of that mater, vnto the same, following here in this historie of Scotlande the report most an ende, as we finde it in Hector Boetius, and other the Scottishe writers, not taking vpon vs so frankely to set downe our owne opinion in this Scottishe, as in the Englishe historie through want of suche helpes in the one as we haue got in the other.

Prodigious tokens seene in the ayre.

There was seene the same yeare two cometes, or blasing starres of dreadfull aspect to the beholders, the one went before the sunne rysing in harueste season, and the other followed the going downe thereof in the spryng of the yeare. There was often times seene also in the ayre a vision of fierie armies, runnyng togither with brennyng staues, and the one being vanquished, they sodenly bothe of them vanished away. Also at Camelon as the Bishoppe was at seruice holding his crosier staffe in his hande, it was kindeled so with fire, that by no meane it coulde be quenched til it was brent euen to ashes. About noone dayes, the ayre being fayre and cleare, as well in the countreys of the Scottes as of the Pictes, there was heard such a noyse & clattering of weapons and armure with braying of horses, as though two armies shoulde haue bene togither in fight, whereby many of eyther nation which heard it, were put in great feare.

The interpretation of these tokens.

These vnkouth wonders were interpreted by deuinors diuersly: some affirming the same to betoken ioy and happie prosperitie, and other aledgyng, how they signified rather mishap and vtter calamitie.

But to returne to our purpose, King Kenneth hauing thus destroyed the Pictish kingdome together almost with the whole nation, caused the marble stone (whiche Symon Breke sometime brought out of Spaine into Ireland, & the firste Fergus out of Ireland into Albion, as before is recited) to be brought now forth of Argile where till that time it had bene diligently kepte) into Goury, whiche region before appertayned to the Pictes, there to remaine from thence forth as a sacred token for the stablishment of the Scottishe kingdome in that countrey: he placed it at Scone vpō a reysed plot of ground there, bicause that the last batayle whiche he had with the Pictes was fought neare vnto the same place, the victory as before is specified chaūcing to the Scots. Vpon this stone, as before is rehearsed, the Scottishe kings were vsed to sit, when they receyued the inuesture of the kingdome.

The marble stone is remoued frō Argile into Goury, in the place called Scone.

Some writers haue recorded that by commaundement of Kenneth at the same time, whē this stone was thus by him remoued, those latine verses were engrauen vpon it, whereof mention is made before, where we spake of the aforesayd Fergus the first his cōming ouer forth of Ireland into Albion, there to reygne.

Now in the meane time when those fewe of the Picts, which by flight had escaped the Scottishmens hands, and were gotte into England, could by no meanes perswade the Englishmen being troubled with intestine warre, to ayde thē in recouery of their countrey, some of them passed the seas ouer into Norway, and some into Denmarke, and diuers other of them remayned still in England, where they got their liuing eyther by some manuall occupation, eyther els by seruice in the warres. The residue of the Picts dispersed.

The Scots from thence forth liued in quiet, during the life time of king Kenneth, who deserued eternal fame, by the enlarging of the boūds of his kingdome, so mightily and in suche wise, that where he founde the frouters, hee made the same well neare the middest of his kingdome. Other things he did also touchyng the politike gouernment of his subiectes in time of peace, no lesse worthie of prayse than his noble & famous conquestes: but specially he ordeyned certayne lawes for the wealth of his people, whereby his iudges and other officers should proceede in the administration of iustice, of the whiche I haue thought requisite to rehearse parte as yet beyng vsed, that aswell the Author, as the time of their first establishment, may the better appeare, to suche as shall peruse this historie. The Scots liue in quiet. Kenneth ordeyneth lawes.

The Chapters of those lawes whiche yet remayne to be obserued, are these.

Yet euery shyre haue certayne men skilled in the lawes appoynted to bee resident in the same, accordyng as in the beginning it was instituted. Let their sonnes also in their youth bee brought vp in knowledge of the same lawes. Lawyers ordeyned.

Let there be two knights or squiers to attend his bodie to the graue, the one being mounted vpō a whyte horse shal beare the coate armure of the dead, & the other in mourning apparell with his face couered shal ride vpō a blacke horse: who after the corps is brought to churche, turnyng his horse from the Aulter, shall crie out how his maister is dead: & therwith the people making an outerie against him, he shall straight wayes departe and get him with all speede to the place frō whence he came, the other going straight to the aulter shall there offer vp to ỹ priest his coate armure with his horse, as a token to signifie therby that his master doth enioy euerlasting lyfe, in the land of permanent light and ioyes eternall. But this custome of buriall as that whiche was supposed not appertayning to the order of the Christian religion, the age that followed dyd vtterly abolishe, appoynting to the Priestes in steede of the horse and armure .v. pound sterlyng in money for the offering.

With these and diuers other ordinaunces, whiche tyme and other statutes by other kings diuised haue abrogated, Kenneth gouerned his people in great felicitie during his lyfe time.

The Bishops sea, whiche before had bene at Abirnethy, hee translated vnto the Churche of that holy man Saint Reule. Euer sithe whiche time the towne hath bene called Saint Andrewes, and those whiche gouerned the same Churche long time after, were called the greate Bishoppes of Scotlande: for the realme was not deuided into Dioceses till the daies of Malcolme the thyrde, who by deuine inspiration (as is sayde) ordeyned the sea of Murthlake, now called Aberden: but suche as were reputed of vertuous behauiour and knowledge meete for the office, vsed the authoritie and rowmeth of Bishoppes in what place so euer they were resident. Yet suche was the continuaunce of those which gouerned the church of Saint Andrewes, that there haue bene aboue the number of fortie Bishoppes, resident there sithe the firste institution of that sea: many of them for the opinion conceyued of theyr holinesse beyng numbred accordyng to the maner in times paste in the register of Saints.

Donald

Donald the fourth of that name succeedeth his brother Kenneth.

After his decease succeeded in gouernment of the realme his brother Donald, farre differing in qualities from his noble brother the foresayde Kenneth, but yet before he came to the rule of the realme, he disclosed not his vicious nature, for doubte of offending the king his brother. Neuertheless he had continued vnneth two yeares in the astate, but that he had subuerted all good orders in his realme, by his naughtie ensamples of dissolute liuing: for his minde was set on nothing but on wanton pleasures: as in the vnlawfull vse of concubines, riotous banquetting, keepyng of Hawkes, Houndes, and Horses for pleasure, and not for the vse of warres, whereof hee had no regarde at all: for suche charges as hee shoulde haue bene at for mayntenance of men of warre to keepe the frounters of his realme, was imployed vpon a sorte of rascals, that serued him in the furtherance of his wanton delites and voluptuous desires, as Huntsmē, Fauconers, Cookes, Bawdes, Ruffians, and suche lyke.

The king is of dissolute behauiour.

Whereupon diuers of the Nobles remembryng what appertayned to theyr duelies, spared not but freely admonished the king what daunger woulde ensue of his misordered behauiour, if hee reformed not his manners, nor restrayned the licencious doyngs of his seruaunts and familie. But when they perceyued that theyr wordes were not regarded, but for the same they themselues ranne into displeasure, they sorrowed not a litle to see so small hope of amendment of suche enormities, as euery where reygned through the region: for all youthfull persons gyuen to sensuall luste followed the same without any feare or care of correction, so that there was no measure of offending and haunting of euill rule in all parties, in so muche that shortely through wante of all good gouernaunce, wrong was placed in steede of righte, and contempt of Goddes honour embraced euery where in place of vertue.

The king is admonished his Nobles.

In this meane whyle, the residue of the Pictes remayning amongst the Englishmen, ceassed not to solicite the gouernours of the countrey to ayde them towardes the recouerie of theyr dominion out of the Scottishmens handes, promysing to be subiectes vnto the English nation, if by their helpe they might be restored to their auncient seates.

The exiled Pictes require ayde of the Englishmen.

At length Osbert and Ella kings of Northumberlande were perswaded through instant suyte to take that enterprice in hande, the rather vpon trust of good successe, for that they vnderstood what lacke of politike gouernment was then remayning amongst the Scottes, by reason of the kinges naughtie demeanour and most disordinate trade of lyfe.

Osbert & Ella kings of Northumberland.

But first there was a league concluded with newe articles of agreement betwixte the Englishmen and Britons, as yet inhabiting alongst the coastes of Cumberlande, by meanes of

of whiche league bothe Bꝛytons and Engliſhmen ioyned theyꝛ powers togither, and in moſte ſpeedy and foꝛcible wiſe paſſed the water of Tweede, firſt pitching theyꝛ campe in the countrey of Mers. From whence immediatly kyng Olbert (beyng appoynted as generall in that iourney) ſente an Herault vnto Donalde the Scottiſhe king, commaunding him eyther to ſurrender vp vnto the Pictes all ſuche regions as the Scottes had taken from them, eyther elſe to loke to haue the Engliſhmen and Bꝛytons no leſſe theyꝛ enimies than the Pictes, whoſe cauſe they had taken vpon them to mayntaine and defende.

Donald being at the firſte ſoꝛe troubled with theſe newes, yet at lengthy by the aduiſe of his nobles hee toke a good harte vnto him, and in defence of his realme, cauſed muſters to be taken throughout all his dominions, and foꝛthwith came into the fielde to encounter his enimies, whom hee founde at Jedworth ready to giue battell, where after ſoꝛe fight, in the ende Olbert with his people was chaſed to the neꝛte mountaines.

Donald hauing thus obtayned the victoꝛy in this conflict, ſuppoſed all had bene his owne, and therevpon remoued ouer Tweede with all poſſible haſte, marchyng foꝛth till hee came to the mouthe of that ryuer, where there lay at anker certayne Engliſhe veſſels, laden with pꝛouiſion of victayles and all other things neceſſarie foꝛ the furniture of an armie. Donald letting vppon theſe ſhippes, with ſmall reſiſtaunce toke them, ſpoyled them of all ſuche things as were founde aboarde, and after ſet fire on them. The ſpoyle was deuided amongeſt the Souldiers and menne of warre, whiche ſerued them to ſmall vſe oꝛ commoditie, foꝛ all the youth of the armie thꝛough enſample of theyꝛ Pꝛince was ſo coꝛrupted in vicious cuſtomes, that the campe was repleniſhed with Hoꝛes and Bawdes, Stewes and dicyng tables, in ſuche wiſe that all ſuche pꝛouiſion as ſhoulde haue ſerued foꝛ ſtoꝛe and ſtaple of victayles, was ſpente in riotous banqueting without any oꝛder oꝛ meaſure: and oftentymes (as it chaunceth where politike gouernment lacketh) there happened amongſt them in the armie, diſcoꝛde and variaunce with ſundꝛy murders and ſlaughters.

Osbert his pꝛouiſion by water is taken by the Scottiſhmen.

A great diſoꝛder in the Scottiſh campe.

When the enimies were aduertiſed howe farre out of oꝛder all things ſtoode in the Scottiſhe campe foꝛ wante of good and diſcrete chieftaines, Olbert with all ſpeede gotte a mightie hoſte togither againe, and befoꝛe his appꝛoche was loked foꝛ of the Scottes, he commeth vpon them one moꝛnyng in the bꝛeake of the day, and aſſayleth them in theyꝛ lodgyngs, wherein hee founde them ſo vnpꝛouided of al helpes to make reſiſtaunce, that it was a wounder to ſee the diſoꝛder that appeared amongſt them: ſome of them rennyng vpon theyꝛ enimies naked without all diſcretion, other bꝛeakyng foꝛth of the campe to ſaue themſelues by flight, not ſpaꝛyng hill noꝛ dale where they ſawe any way to eſcape the enimies handes, though it were with pꝛeſent daunger of bꝛeaking theyꝛ neckes downe the ſidelyng bankes and craggie rockes, beyng foꝛced thereto by the fierce purſute of the Engliſhmen and Bꝛytons, who moſt egrely pꝛeaſſed vpon them in all places to reuenge the late receyned ouerthꝛowe and ſlaughter of theyꝛ friendes and kinſfolke.

There died of the Scots in this moꝛtal bickering aboue .xx. thouſand perſons.

xx. thouſand Scottiſhmen ſlayne.

King Donald is taken with the nobilitie.

King Donald being faſt a ſleepe at the firſte aſſault of the enimies, as he that had dronken ouer night more than enough, was taken before he coulde make any ſhifte for himſelfe with all the reſidue of the nobilitie, that eſcaped with life.

The campe is ryfled.

The Scottiſh campe, the day next after this ouerthrow, was ryfled, the ſpoyle being deuided amongſt the Engliſhmen and Brytons.

But when the fame of this infortunate battaile was noyſed once through the realme of Scotland how the king was taken priſoner, his campe wonne, the armie diſcomfited, and almoſt all the ſouldiers and men of warre ſlayne, thoſe fewe of the nobles whiche were left aliue remayning as priſoners in the enimies handes, there was ſuche dole and lamentation made ouer all, as though the realme had already bene loſte without recouerie. Some there were that blamed fortune, ſome curſed the wicked trade of lyfe in the king: other bewayling the great calamitie of this miſchaūce put the fault in diuers other things, as in ſuch caſes cōmōly it falleth out: for in ſundry heades are euer ſundry opinions. Many ranne vp and downe the ſtreets and high wayes, to enquyre the certaintie of all things, & whether there were any hope at all left to reſiſt the enemies, alſo which way the enimies helde, wherabout they went, & what they purpoſed to do. Anone after, when it was certainely knowen that the Engliſhmen were entred by Lothian, and the Brytons by Galloway, there was ſuch feare mixed with ſorrow (for loſſe of theyr frends and kinſfolke) ſtryken into the peoples hartes, and namely into the womens, that a greater hath not bene heard of in any region. So that all prouiſion to defende theyr countrey was quite neglected, ſo amazed were the Scots with the ſodayne chaunge of fortunes fauour. The Engliſhmen herevpon toke all the countrey euē to the water of Forth, and likewiſe the Brytons ſealed into theyr handes all that whiche lieth from the bounds of Cumberland vnto Sterlyng bridge, finding no reſiſtaunce in theyr way at all. Herevnto aſwell the Engliſhmen as Brytons vſed the victorie very cruelly, ſparing neither one nor other of the Scottiſh bloud, that by any meanes fell into theyr handes, but prieſtes and all paſſed one way, that is by the edge of the ſworde.

The whole realme of Scotland diſcomfyted.

The Engliſhmen inuade Lothian, the Brytons Galloway.

The Scots left comfortleſſe.

The Brytaines as yet kept poſſeſsion of Cumberlande, & thoſe other countreys lying by the coaſt of thoſe weſt ſeas.

The victorie vſed cruelly.

Kyng Dlbert purpoſed to haue paſſed the water of Forth, that wayes to haue entered into Fyfe, and ſo ouer Tay into Angus: but hearing that the Scottes had gathered a power to impeache his paſſage, he ſtayed certayne dayes. At lengthe vnderſtanding that the enimies were nothing of that puiſſaunce nor number, as at the firſt they were reported to bee, he determined to ſet ouer in certaine boates ten thouſand of his men, but through a ſodaine tempeſt of winde and weather, that roſe in that inſtant, there were fiue thouſande of them drowned, the reſidue being conſtrayned to lande agayne on the ſame ſide from the whiche they lewſed, hauing loſte through violence of the weather all theyr table and whole furniture of theyr veſſels.

A great many of Engliſhmen drowned.

Dlbert beyng alſo admoniſhed with this miſfortune, thought good to attempt no more the furious rage of the water, but determined by lande to goe vnto Sterlyng, where he vnderſtoode he ſhould finde the Brytons, with whome hee might ioyne his power, and paſſe ouer the brydge there, and ſo inuade other of the Scottiſhe regions whiche lay there aboute: but at his comming thyther, certaine Scottiſhe Ambaſſadours came vnto him to ſue for peace, whiche

Ambaſſadors ſew for peace.

they humbly requyred at his handes in name of the whole realme, beſeechyng him to conſider well the ſtate of the caſe as it ſtoode, and not to truſt to muche on brytle fortune, the whiche ſheweth hyr ſelfe neuer ſtable, but commenly vſeth to call backe againe hyr graunt of proſperous ſucceſſe, where the receyuour hath not ſkill to vſe it moderately, and the vanquiſhed ſeemeth to haue bene ſufficiently corrected:

As for the Scottes, though it might appeare that their force was greatly abated, and that reſiſtance ſhould little auaile them, yet were they mynded to die in defence of their liberties, rather than to ſubmit themſelues vnto any conditions of vile ſeruitude. The wordes of theſe Imbaſſadors being throughly weyed (though ſome toke them in greate diſdaine) yet in the ende it was ſuppoſed that after victorie thus had agaynſt the enimies, honourable conditions of peace ought to be preferred before doubtfull warre.

Wherevpon anſwere was made to the Imbaſſadors, that both the Engliſhe and Brytiſhe people with their kings were contented to haue peace with the Scottes, (though it lay in theyr handes, now to deſtroy the whole nation) if ſo be the Scottes woulde agree freely to reſigne aſwell to the Engliſh men as Brytaynes all ſuch lands and Countreys as they had nowe gotten into theyr poſſeſſions, without any clayme or tytle to be made to the ſame from thenceforth, eyther by them or any of their poſteritie, ſo that the water of Forth on the Eaſt halfe, ſhoulde deuide the Scottiſhe dominions from the confines of the Engliſh men and Brytaynes, and be called from that tyme euer after, the Scottiſhe ſea. On the weſt the water of Clyde ſhould deuide the Scottiſh landes from the Brytaynes, the Caſtel of Alcluth, ſtanding at the mouth of the ſame riuer, to remaine in the handes of the Brytaynes, from thenceforth to beare the name of Dunbreton, that is to ſay, the caſtell of the Brytaynes. And furthermore that if any of the Scottes ſhoulde attempt to paſſe the ſayd bounds into any of the Brytiſh or Engliſhe borders, hee ſhoulde die for that offence, and if by force of tempeſt it chaunced any of them to be driuen a lande on the South ſhore, within any of thoſe parties, they ſhoulde take nothing away with them but water or victailes, and depart within three dayes, except ſome reaſonable cauſe of ſtay conſtrayned them to the contrarie. Moreouer, they ſhould not fortifie any townes or Caſtels on the frontires neare to the Engliſhe or Brytiſhe confines: And further, they ſhoulde couenaunt to pay vnto the Engliſh men and Brytaynes within the ſpace of twentie yeares, the ſumme of one thouſand pounde of ſiluer. For performance of all which articles of agreement, the Scottes ſhoulde deliuer three ſcore hoſtages, beeing the ſonnes and heyres apparant of the chiefeſt noble men of all theyr Realme and Countrey. And if it ſo were that they miſlyked and refuſed any of theſe articles, hee commaunded that there ſhould no other Imbaſſador come to him for any other treatie of accorde.

The Imbaſſadours returning home, and declaring how they had ſped, many of the Scottes thought the Articles nothing reaſonable for free people to accept: Other iudged that eyther they muſt come to ſome agreement with the Engliſh men and Brytaynes, or elſe put the lande in extreeme perill, and thus had the people bin deuided into two contrarie opinions and factions, had not one Calene a noble man, borne of high parentage, & gouernor of Angus, with ſober reaſons & ſtrong arguments appeaſed this contention, perſwading them to haue reſpecte to the tyme, and ſithe the force of the Realme was ſo infeebled, abated, and brought vnder foote throughe aduerſe fortune, better it was to yeelde vnto neceſſitie in ſauing part at that preſent, in hope after when occaſion ſerued to recouer the reſidue, than throughe obſtinate wilfulneſſe to loſe the whole. For conſidering the preſent daunger, it could be reputed no diſhonour to receyue conditions of peace at the enimies handes, ſithe there wanted not the lyke enſample of the Romaines, who gladly accepted ſuche artycles of peace, as that noble Prince king Eald appointed them: and yet it is not to be iudged that there wanted men of great knowledge and wiſedome amongſt them, and ſuch as regarded theyr honour, ſo farre forth as reaſon in any wiſe dyd reache.

Calene his graue counſell taketh place.

The multitude moued with theſe wordes of Calen, whoſe graue authoritie by reaſon of hys age and rowmth was of no ſmall reputation amongſt them, hauing loſt nine of his own ſonnes in the laſt battaile, they finally determined to followe his opinion in receyuing the ſame conditions of agreement which Olbert had preſcribed: and therevpon ſent agayne theyr Imbaſſadors with the hoſtages appointed for the eſtabliſhing of the peace in maner as before is reherſed. Which beeing throughly accompliſhed in ſuche ſolemne wiſe as in thoſe dayes, and in the like caſes was accuſtomed, Olbert ſet Donald with his nobles at libertie, ſending them home togither with the Imbaſſadors, being earneſtly required ſo to doe, both by the Engliſh Lordes, and alſo by the Britaynes.

The multitude conſented vnto Calene his layings.

The Scots receiue the peace

King Donalde with the noble men are ſent home againe.

The agreement being thus made, the landes were deuided betwixt the Engliſh men and Britaynes, in ſuche ſort as the Brytaynes had for theyr parte all that which lyeth from Sterling vnto the Weſt ſea, betwixt the Ryuers of Forth and Clyde, vnto Cumberlande. and the Engliſh men poſſeſſed the other parcels, lying from Starling vnto the Eaſt ſea, betwixt the Scottiſh ſea and Northumberlande: ſo that by this meanes Clyde water, Forth, and the Scottiſh ſea (where Forth runneth into the maine ſea) deuided the Scottes from the Engliſh men and Brytaynes. And thus was the towne of Sterling common marche vnto thoſe three people, the ſame towne with the Caſtell remayning vnto Olbert, as it was couenãted amõgſt other articles of this peace

Landes deuided betwixt the Britains & Engliſh men.

Here as the Scottes writers haue, he ordeyned his mynt, and his coyners of money to inhabite, whereupon came vp the name of Sterling money: but therein they are deceyued, for as in the hyſtorie of England ſhall appeare, that name came not in vſe till many yeares after.

A bridge of ſtone made at Sterling.

Oſbert alſo in this place cauſed a ſtone bridge to be made ouer the water of Forth, in ſtead of the woodden bridge which the Picts had made there, and was now pulled downe, and in the midſt of this new ſtone bridge, he ſet vp a croſſe, whereon were grauen theſe verſes.

In Scottiſh thus.

Balintine.

I am free march as paſſengers may ken,
To Scots, to Brytons, and to Engliſh men.

The Picts hope is deceiued.

The Picts which had bene with the Engliſh men in this iourney, euer hoping to be reſtored to their landes and former poſſeſſions by Oſbert, when they ſawe how he reteyned the ſame in his owne handes, appoynting his ſubiectes to inhabite therein, they doubted that which afterwards came to paſſe in deede, leaſt the Engliſhe men of friendes woulde nowe become enimies, ſeeking the deſtruction of the whole Pictiſhe generation, thereby to aſſure themſelues in the poſſeſſion of thoſe landes and liuings, whereonto the Picts as they thought would euer make ſome clayme and tytle, whileſt any of them remayned aliue.

Upon this miſtruſt therfore did thoſe Picts which were amongſt the Engliſh men, make the beſt ſhift they coulde for themſelues, ſo that many of them got ſhippes, and ſayled into Norway & Denmark, vnto their countrey men there: the other that could not make ſhift to get away, were ſlain anon after by the Engliſh men, that one of them was not to bee founde aliue within any of the Engliſh Dominions. And ſuch was the ende of the Picts that fledde vnto the Engliſh men for ſuccour.

The picts went into Norwaye and Denmark.

In this meane tyme the Scottiſh king Donald being reſtored againe to his Countrey, was receyued with more ioy and honour than hee had deſerued, in hope yet by this ſcourge of aduerſe fortune, that he woulde haue reformed his former abuſes. Neuertheleſſe, he had not bin at home any long time, but that he fell to his old vicious trade of life againe, remouing from his companie ſuche honorable perſonages as wiſhed the ſurtie of his eſtate, with the aduãcement of the cõmon welth, to the reliefe and eaſe of his poore miſerable ſubiects. At length the nobles of the realm perceiuing the daunger that their countrey ſtode in, by reaſon of Donaldes inſolent miſorder, vndiſcrete rule and gouernment, they found meanes to apprehend and commit him vnto ſafe keeping, but the monſtrous creature within a fewe dayes after he was thus put in ward, in great deſperation ſlue himſelfe, in the firſt yeare after he began his infortunate raigne, & in the yeare of our ſauiour 860.

King Donal falleth to his old vices ag.

King Donal is laid in priſ.

He ſlaieth him ſelfe in priſon 860.

The ſame yeare that the realme of Scotlande was brought vnto ſuch miſerable ſtate by the puiſſant force of the Engliſh men and Brytains, as aboue is rehearſed, there were ſundrie wonders heard of in the countrey: as in Lothian a childe of one Moneth olde and a halfe, admoniſhed the mother to flie out of that countrey, for it woulde come to paſſe, that the enimies ſhoulde come and take that region out of the Scottiſh mens handes. Beaſts alſo as they were paſturing abrode in the fieldes there, roaring after a ſtraunge ſort, ſodenly dyed. Fiſhes likewiſe in ſhape reſembling the figure of man, were founde deade in the ſandes of the Scottiſh ſea. In Galloway there fell ſuch abundance of Adders and Snakes out of the ſkie, that the ayre being corrupted with the ſauour of them lying on the grounde, both men and beaſtes dyed of certain diſeaſes, which they toke through infection thereof.

Such as were accounted to be ſkilfull in diuination, affyrmed that theſe things did ſignifie an infortunate raigne with an euill ende vnto king Donalde, as afterwardes it happened, who hauing made away himſelfe in priſon (as before is expreſſed) Conſtantine the ſonne of king Kenneth was crowned king at Scone, in the Chayre of Marble there, according to the maner as then vſed.

King Cõſtantine Crowned.

After his firſt entring into the eſtate, he would gladly haue gone in hãd with the warres againſt ỹ Engliſh mẽ, to haue recouered out of their poſſeſſions, thoſe countreys which they had lately taken from the Scottes in his predeceſſors time: but his counſell aduiſed him otherwiſe, declaring that the eſtate of the common wealth was ſo decayed by the miſgouernance of his layde predeceſſour, that till the ſame were refourmed, and ſuche inteſtine diſorde, as through licencious libertie

He fain would recouer his predeceſſours loſſes.

raigned amongſt his ſubiects might be appeaſed and quieted, there was no hope to atchieue anye worthie enterpriſe abrode agaynſt forraine enimies. Hereupon by theyr aduertiſements and good aduice, hee deuiſed a reformation of all ſuch miſorders as were growen vp in al partes of his realme: and firſt for the ſpiritualtie, he ordayned that Prieſtes ſhould attende their cures, and not to intermeddle with any ſecular buſineſſe, but to be free from going forth to the warres: neyther ſhould they keepe horſes, hawkes, or hounds. And if any of them wer found negligent in doing his ductie apperteyning to his vocation, he ſhould for the firſt fault forfeyt a peece of money, but for the ſecond he ſhould loſe his benefice.

For the youth of his realme he toke order (to bridle them the better from wanton delites and ſenſuall luſtes) that none of them ſhoulde haue paſt one meale a day, and that of no fine or daintie delicates, and to abſtaine from all ſuch drinke as might diſtemper their brayne, ſo that if anye yong perſon, either man or woman were knowen to be dronken, they ſhould die for it.

He commaunded further, that all the youth of his realme, ſhoulde exerciſe running, wraſtling, ſhooting, throwing of the dart and bowle, ſo to auoyde ſlouthfulneſſe, that their bodies myghte with ſuch exerciſes be made the more able to endure paynes and trauaile: and for the ſame purpoſe he toke order, that they ſhoulde lye vpon the bare bourdes, with one mantell onely throwne vnder them, ſo that they ſhould taſt nothing neither by day nor night, that might norzell them in any wanton delytes or effeminate pleaſures.

It was alſo ordeyned, that all ſuch as kept victayling houſes for banketting cheare, ſhould be baniſhed the realme, with thoſe that kept brothell houſes.

Thus were the Scottes by obſeruing of theſe ordinances, made within ſhort time of gluttons & exceſſiue feeders, ſober and temperate men: of delicate and eaſefull perſons, hard, tough, and able to abide any trauail or labour, were the ſame neuer ſo painfull: and hereof the ſtate of the common wealth began to grow to good perfection, ſo that Conſtantines adminiſtration was lyked of the moſt part of all his ſubiects.

The firſt that went about to diſquiet the proſperous raigne of that worthie Prince, was one Euan, a man of an aūcient houſe, & borne in the Weſterne Iles. Such hath bene the vnquiet nature of the Scottiſh men, euen from the beginning, neuer to liue contented any long tyme eyther with peace or warre, for being once a wearied with the charges of the warres, they ſtraight wayes wiſhe for peace, and hauing in time of peace heaped togither ſome wealth, then can they not ſuffer the gouernment of their ſuperiours, but either are readie to fall out with ſome forraine enimie, or elſe to raiſe ſome commotion amongſt themſelues.

Euan Lieutenant of Dunſtafage conſpireth agaynſt the king.

This Euan therefore being the kings Lieutenant of his Caſtell of Dunſtafage in Louchquhaber, practiſed a conſpiracie agaynſt the king, with a number of other light perſons being gentlemen borne, miſlyking the adminiſtration of things, onely for that they ſawe how their inordinate libertie to oppreſſe inferiour perſons, and to vſe ſuch wilde and inſolent miſdemeanor, as they had done afore time, was nowe reſtrayned by lawfull iuſtice and execution of due puniſhment for the ſame. But as theſe conſpirators went about to haue moued the people of Louchquhaber, Murrey land, Roſſe, and Cathneſſe, to haue ioyned with them in their trayterous enterpriſe: ſome of them in whom Euan put moſt truſt, ſecretely aduertiſed the king of all the whole matter, who gathering a competent number of men togither, made ſuche ſpeedie haſte towardes Dunſtafage, where the chiefe Captaine of the Rebelles as then lay, that he came before the ſame ere any vnkling were knowne to them within of his approch. By meane whereof comming vppon them ſo at vnwares, hee had the Caſtell ſone at his pleaſure. And immediately herevpon cauſed Euan to bee truſſed vp on a high payre of Gallowes, for a ſpectakle to all his complices.

The king is aduertiſed of Euan his treaſon.

The king cōmeth to Dunſtafage with an armie.

Euan is executed.

And furthermore, leaſt the other conſpirators might prouide them of ſome other Chieftaine, he apprehended diuerſe of the nobilitie that were accuſed to be of Euans confederacie, the whiche he put in ſtrayte prꝛſon, there to bee ſafely kept, tyll the Peeres of the Realme had determined wyth good deliberation, what ſhoulde become of them. This buſineſſe being in this wiſe appeaſed, when all men looked for quietneſſe, there ſodenly followed a greater and more pernicious trouble: for ſuch is the courſe of the worlde, that when men leaſt thinke of miſchiefe, they fall oftentimes into moſt daunger.

Many kept in priſon.

One trouble followeth another.

Cadane king of Denmarke, pretending a title to all ſuche landes as ſometimes belonged to the Pictes, for that the reſidue of that Nation which had eſcaped the handes of the Scottes and Engliſhe men, had reſigned vnto him all theyr ryght and intereſt of the ſame landes, hee determined in that quarell (and in reuenge of the iniuries which the Pictes alledged they had ſuffeyned) to make warres both vpon the Scottes and Engliſh men. He cauſed therefore an huge number of ſhippes to be prepared, and a mightie army of men to be put in a readineſſe, to paſſe in the ſame ouer into Albion, vnder the leading of hys two brethren, the one named Hungar, and the other Hubba.

The inhabitantes fled the countrie.

Whereupon the Engliſhe men that inhabited in Louthian, and the Scots which dwelled in Fife, lefte theyr houſes and poſſeſſions, flying into other parties where they thought they might beſt eſcape the handes of their newcome aduerſaries.

A great companie alſo of ſuch vertuous and godly perſons as aboute the ſame time laboured buſily in ſetting forth the worde of life vnto the people in thoſe parties, fled with one Adrian as then Biſhop of the Scottiſh men, into the Iſlande called May, whiche lyeth in maner in the midway of the paſſage ouer the Forth betwixt Fyfe and Louthian, where as the there was a famous Monaſterie of Monks: but neither the reuerence of the place, neyther the innocencie of thoſe harmleſſe creatures could refrain the Danes from polluting their wicked handes in murthering that deuout companie, as they were then eſteemed. company were Hungarians, the whiche fleeing out of their countreys from the perſecution which was there exerciſed by men of miſbeliefe againſt the Chriſtians, they arryued here in Scotlande, and applyed themſelues in the inſtructing of the Scottiſhe men in the way of ſaluation. Other write that they were Scottes and Engliſh men thus aſſembled there togither, but of whence ſoeuer they were, certaine it is that by cuſtome they were become Scottiſh men, & inſtructed Scots as before is ſayde in the way of ſaluation.

After this cruell ſlaughter thus by the Danes committed, they continued in their woode rage as they paſſed through Fife and the other countries neare bordering vpon the ſame, till all the inhabitants were auoyded out of their houſes, either by flight or ſlaughter.

Conſtantine the Scottiſhe king being kindled in the meane time with paſſing great diſpleaſure, for theſe ſo notable iniuries receyued at the handes of the Danes, thought good with all ſpeed to go againſt them, and to attempt the chaunce of battaile before they had waſted any further within his dominions, ſo greatly to the diminiſhing of his royal power and eſtimation amongſt his ſubiects. Hereupon leuying his people, and aſſembling a mightie hoſt togither, he paſſed forth with the ſame towardes his enimies, the whiche were lodged in two ſeuerall campes, the one being diſtant from the other aboute a quarter of a myle, ſeuered in ſunder with the courſe of a little ryuer called Leuyn, the which (vpon the approch of the Scottes vnto that parte of the campe that lay on the further ſyde next vnto them) chaunced to be rayſed on ſuch height through abundance of raine, that in two dayes after vneth it might bee paſſed ouer at the fourdes.

After this ſore and tempeſtuous weather, the ayre cleared vp and waxed verie fayre and calme, giuing occaſion to the Scottes to worke theyr feate againſt one part of theyr enimies, whyleſt the other coulde not come ouer vnto theyr ayde and ſuccours. In this campe which lay on that ſide the ryuer next to the Scottes, Hubba was lodged, who did what he coulde to haue ſtayde his men from iſſuing forth of the campe to giue battaile when the Scots drew neare to the ſame, & aſſaied all wayes by prouoking the Danes with

The Danes did weare aloft vppon their armour certaine lynnen garmunts, wrought with red ſilke, ſhewing fayre and white both at hande and a farre off. Their weapons were of ſuch ſort as ſerued for the puſh rather than for down right blowes, the poynts being of ſuche a handſome

Theſe kinde of weapons together with the muſcle of their huge bodies was dreadfull at the firſt for the Scottiſhe men to beholde, as they marched towardes them in aray of battail. But anon comming neare togither readie to ioyne, the Scots manfully taking to them newe courages, ſet vpon the Danes with great violence, who likewiſe beganne the battaile very ſtoutly, ſo that the ſame cõtinued right fierce and A battayle.

cruell a good ſpace. At length the Danes being aſſayled on eche ſide, both a front before, and on their backes behinde, oppreſſed as it were with multitude, they threwe downe theyr weapons and fled amain. Many of them making towards their campe were ouertaken and ſlaine, diuerſe of them falling into the ditches were oppreſſed with throng, aſwell of their owne companie, as of their enimies, as they paſſed ouer them in following the chaſe, and ſtryuing to enter the campe vpon ſuch as ſtoode to defende them from entring. Other ther were that leaping into the water in hope to get ouer, were drowned in the whorling waues of the ſtreame, though ſome (through helpe of their fellowes whiche ſtoode on the other ſyde readie to haue paſſed the water if they might ſo haue done without manifeſt daunger of drowning) eſcaped and got ouer, amongſt whom Hubba was one, to the great reioyſing of his brother Hungar, to ſee him thus deliuered twiſe from perill of death, as firſt from amongeſt his enimies, and ſecondly out of the roaring ſtreame of that deepe and ſwift raging ryuer. The Scottes hauing thus put one part of their enimies to the worſe, with that happie ſucceſſe toke ſuch comfort and immoderate ioy, as though they had bin nowe ſure of victorie ouer all the reſidue, ſo that for two dayes togither, there was ſuch dauncing, ſinging, and pyping amongſt them, as the lyke hath not beene heard of. Yea ſo farre proceeded their inſolent outrage, that they began to contend amongſt themſelues for the priſoners and ſpoyle, which they accõpted now theyr owne, as though already they had the ſame wholy in their poſſeſſion: and further reaſoned not without altercation, whether the Daniſh Captaines after they had them once in theyr handes ſhould bee put to death, or elſe be kept aliue to be ſhewed to the people in triumph or no. Great a do and many baine wordes were ſpent hereabout in ſuch earneſt ſort that they were at poynte to haue fallen out amongſt themſelues: but there was no mention at all made touching the ordering of their battailes and other the neceſſarie proceedings agaynſt the enimies.

At length when the ryuer was fallen & come to his olde courſe againe, ſo that it might eaſily be paſſed, Conſtantine in order of battaile got ouer with his people, to the other ſyde where the Danes were lodged, who hauing more minde to ſet themſelues in ſuch order whereby they might gain the victory, than to deuiſe for the deuiding of the ſpoile, perceyuing occaſion now offred to giue ỹ onſet, forthwith arayed their people in this ſort. Hubba with fiue thouſande Danes, was placed in the right wing. The left was led by one Buerne an Engliſhe mãn borne, who was fled out of his countrey, for that he coulde not beare ſuche iniuries as Olbert offred him in forcing his wife, to the great reproch and diſhonor of his houſe and name. He had with him in this left wing certaine bandes of Engliſh men with thoſe Pictes that had eſcaped ouer into Denmarke, as before is mencioned. Hungar with all the reſidue of the armie, kept the battaile or myddle warde, exhorting his men to ſhew their force & manhode that day, ſith the ſame ſhould eyther put thẽ in poſſeſſion of the whole land of Albion, with all the ſubſtance & riches conteyned therein, either elſe bring thẽ perpetuall ſeruitude with ignominie amongſt their moſt cruell & fierce aduerſaries. He therefore himſelf openly in preſence of them al, vowed with ſolemne othe, either to returne with victorie to his campe, eyther elſe to die in the place, willing thein all all to make the like couenant. Whereupon the vniuerſall multitude allowed him ſo muche for this his motion, that there was not one amongſt the whole number, which agreed not to ſweare the like othe. Conſtantine keeping in maner the like order, placed in the right wing his brother Ethus, in the left Duncane the Lieutenant or Thane of Athole, appoyning to eyther of them ten thouſande men a peece.

The ſouldiers did make the like vowe.

King Conſtantine placed his men in like maner.

All the reſidue were ſet in the battaile where he himſelfe ſtode. And firſt he gaue them all hartie thankes in that they had ſo valiantly atchieued the victorie in the laſt battaile, requyring them now not to blemiſh their former glorie with any fayntneſſe of courage, recreant cowardice, or diſhonourable flight: and further he willed them in no wiſe to be afearde of their enimies, in reſpect more for their hugeneſſe of bodie, than for any of theyr valiant ſtoutneſſe of heart: for if they aſſayled them with one whole and entire conſent, according to their wonted forwardneſſe and manlike prowes, they ſhoulde quickely put them to flight, and obtaine a ioyfull victorie. Herewith he alſo warned them not to runne raſhly vpon the enimies, but to ſuffer the firſt to giue the charge, for by that meanes he thought the Danes would with their earneſt violence diſorder themſelues, and ſo ſhoulde it bee more eaſie for the Scottes to breake in amongeſt them. But this deuiſe did not a little abate the Scottiſh mens corages. For the vſe of the Scots is, when they ſhal enter into battail, to make a great ſhoute & noyſe, and therewith to run vpon their enimies, by which meanes (as they ſuppoſe) they both put the enimy in feare, and incorage themſelues to the battail. The Danes at the ſound of the trūpet marched forth towards the Scots, where they ſtode thus in order of battail, but whē they perceiued that the Scots came not forwarde, they alſo ſtayed in the midway to refreſhe themſelues, becauſe at the ioyning they ſhuld not be out of breath. Anon after, paſſing forwarde an eaſie pace they ſhot quarrels, and threw dartes at their enimies right freſhly, & the Scots let flie at them againe with arrowes and darts as thicke as it had beene a ſtorme of haile. After this they ruſhed togither with great violence on both ſides: but within a while, the Danes had put both the wings of their enimies to flight, and after compaſſing the maine battaile rounde about, they conſtraine the Scottiſh men in the ende with greate bloudſhed and ſlaughter to giue back and flee out of the field. Ten thouſande Scottes dyed that day in this infortunate battaile with Conſtantine himſelfe, who being firſt taken was had into a Caue by the Sea ſyde amongſt the Rockes, and there cruelly murthered by the enimes. The place was called certaine yeares after the blacke Denne: but nowe they name it the Diuils den, in memorie of that heynous murther there committed. The Scottiſhe Nation alſo had beene vtterly as then deſtroyed, had not Ethus the brother of Conſtantine, perceyuing howe the fielde was loſt, eſcaped away with two companies of his beſt men of warre, ſo reſeruing himſelfe to the time of more luckie fortune.

within

within the Scottiſh dominions. In the mouth of the Foꝛth, otherwiſe called the Scottiſhe ſea, there appeared fiſhes in great number, like vnto men in ſhape, ſwimming vp and downe in the ſtreame with halfe their bodies aboue the water, and hauing a blacke ſkinne, which couered theyꝛ heades and neckes, from the ſhoulders vpwardes like an hoode. Theſe are called Baſſinates, and vſe to goe in great companies togither, as though they were ſkulles of Herrings, ſignifying when they are ſeene, ſome great miſſoꝛtune vnto the Countrey, as the common people haue long had an opinion. Alſo the Loches, Riuers, and al maner of other waters were frozen from the begynning of Nouember, till the latter ende of Apꝛill, and when the froſt brake, and the ſnowes melted, there was ſuch a flood flowing ouer al the plaines euen to the roꝛtes of the Mountaynes, as the like had not bene ſeene. Furthermoꝛe when the ſame ſhꝛunke and went away, in the mud and ſlime there was ſuche a number of Frogges left, that when they were dead, & began to putrifie, the ayꝛe was ſo infected, ẏ many deadly diſeaſes enſued, wherof great nũbers of the inhabitants did periſh.

Moꝛeouer there was a mightie ſtarre oꝛ Comet ſeene with firie rayes iſſuing foꝛth of the ſame whiche both night and day followed the Mone during the moneth of Apꝛill, to the great hoꝛꝛoꝛ of all that behelde it.

But to pꝛoceede. The Danes as is ſayd, hauing vanquiſhed the Scots, and waſted the coũtrey of Fife, paſſed ouer into Louthian, where robbing and ſpoyling all beſoꝛe them, they purſued the inhabitants into Noꝛthumberlande, whither they fled foꝛ refuge. There the Danes being ayded with certain Engliſh mẽ in fauoꝛ of Bꝛuern, ſlue in battaile both Olbert & Ella, kings of that coũtry. The crueltie of the Danes was ſuch after they had atchieued ẏ victoꝛie, that few eſcaped with life, but ſuch as ſaued thẽſelues by flight. But chiefely their rage appeared moſte againſte pꝛieſtes and ſuch as pꝛofeſſed themſelues men of religion. Foꝛ the Danes being Ethnikes, perſecuted moſt egerly thoſe that in any wiſe pꝛofeſſed Chꝛiſt. The like outragious murthering of the Chꝛiſtians was pꝛactiſed thꝛoughout the Countrey, and at lengthe came vnto that bleſſed king S. Edmond, raigning as thẽ ouer the people of the Eaſt angles, as in the Engliſh hiſtoꝛie moꝛe plainly may appeare. Howbeit other of the Engliſh kings maintained the warres with theſe Danes certaine yeares after this, with variable foꝛtune, the moſt part of thoſe people which inhabited on that coaſt towarde the Germaine ſeas, eyther being ſlain oꝛ bꝛought into miſerable bondage and thꝛaldome. But Alured which ſucceeded his bꝛother king Etheldꝛed, not in the kingdome of Noꝛthfolke and Suffolke (as Hector Boetius affyꝛmeth) but in the kingdome of the weſt Saxons, ꝛedꝛeſſed a great part of this miſerie into the which the countrey was thus bꝛought by the Danes, by ſubduing them in ſundꝛie conflictes, and ſlaying their two Captaines the foꝛeſayd Hunger and Hubba, as in the ſame Engliſh hyſtoꝛies is further expꝛeſſed.

Hector Boetius miſtaketh diuerſe matters touching the report of our hyſtories.

But now to returne vnto Ethus, I find that he was of ſuch ſwiftneſſe of foote, that he would matche and make way in running with Hartes and Hounds, and theꝛupon was ſurnamed lightfoote: but of what nymble lightneſſe of bodie ſoeuer he was, truth it is that he was of diſpoſition in minde vnfitte to haue the oꝛder of any publike regiment. Foꝛ where as he might haue recouered Fife and Louthian with other regions, whyleſt the Engliſh men and Danes were togither by the eares, he paſſed ouer that occaſion, delyting moꝛe in following the pleaſures of the bodie and ſenſuall luſtes, than to beſtow his time in fꝛates of chiualry and other warlike exerciſes. The Nobles of the Realme pꝛeceyuing him thus to abuſe the woꝛthie gyftes of his perſon, miſtruſting leaſt his inſolẽt doings ſhould endomage the publike ſtate of the cõmon wealth, they toke counſail togither how they might apꝛehend him, and to ſende him ſome whither out of ẏ way wher to be ſafely kept, and then to place ſome other in the gouernment of the Realme, that might rule the ſame with moꝛe diſcretion & better aduiſe. And leaſt their reſolution ſhould be diſcloſed beſoꝛe it toke effect, they ſlacked no time, but went ſpedily about their buſineſſe. And comming to the king whom they found a hunting in Caledone wood, they ſodenly aꝛeſted him, and theꝛwith committed him to ſafe keeping: and thoſe whom they knewe to bee fauourers of his euill rule and miſgouernance, they put them alſo faſt in yꝛons, til they had anſwered to ſuch articles as ſhould be layd to their charge. This done they pꝛoceeded to the election of a new king, and in the end by the perſuaſion of one Dõgall gouernour oꝛ Thane of Argyle, they choſe Gꝛegoꝛie the ſonne of that Dongall which raigned beſoꝛe Alpyne, who was not paſt two Monethes olde when his father dyed.

There be that write howe he was ſtrangled in priſon by Dongall his procurement, leaſt by aduenture he might haue bene reſtored vnto libertie, and with all haue made clayme to the crowne againe.

Gregorie being thus eſtabliſhed in the eſtate, conſidering that the ſuretie of all Realmes reſted in the handes of the diuine Maieſtie, to begin his gouernment with ſome lucke enterpriſe, cauſed a A conuocatio of the clergi

Heretikes and Nicromancers, with other the like offenders againſt the lawes and articles of the Chriſtian religiõ, was aſſigned vnto the Biſhops and their ſubſtitutes, ſo that all thoſe which were founde diſobedient vnto them, and refuſed to bee at their commaundement, they ſhould haue authoritie to excommunicate them out of the Church, and from companying with any of the congregation, 50 ſo that they that were thus excommunicated, ſhould be depriued of all abilitie to enioy any inheritance or right to landes or poſſeſſions whatſoeuer they were. Neither ſhoulde they be accepted as a witneſſe in any maner of cauſe, neyther beare any office or rule in the common wealth. This Gregorie alſo (as is ſayde) was the firſt author of that ordinance, by the which the Scotiſh kings at their coronation vſe of auncient cuſtome to bowe by ſolemne othe, that during their lyues, they ſhal maintayn and defend the Church with his miniſters, in al ancient liberties and priuiledges, and not to ſuffer any man to hurt or infringe the ſame.

Whē the Scotiſh kings firſt began to promiſe by othe to maintaine the liberties of the Church.

There was ſurely in this Gregorie a certaine naturall inclination to vertue, with ſuche aduiſednes in all his wordes, that he vttered few or none but that the ſame ſeemed to be ſpoken with right great conſideration. He was neuer maried, but continued in chaſtitie all his lyfe time. Of meate and drinke he was verie ſpare, deliting in all kinde of ſobrietie, more watchefull than giuen to ſleepe. But his fame encreaſed moſte for hys mainteyning of iuſtice and ciuill adminiſtration concerning the ſtate of the common wealth, not omitting the practiſe of warre, where neceſſitie requyred.

The firſt expedition which he toke in hande, he made into Fyfe, to recouer that countrey to the crowne of Scotlande. At whoſe entrance into the ſame, the Pictes whom the Danes had left in thoſe parties at their departure thence, being ſtrikē with feare to fall into the handes of the Scottes their auncient eniinies, fled forthwith into Louthian, leauing Fife in maner voyde, and without any that woulde offer to defende it againſt the Scottes: whereupon Gregorie ſo finding it deſolate of inhabitants, he ſent for people out of other partes of his Realme, appoynting them dwellings in that Countrey as hee thought moſt expedient. This done he paſſed into Louthian, where taking the forteſſes and places of defence, ſome by force, and ſome by ſurrender, he eaſily reduced that Countrey into his ſubiection, ſo that within a fewe dayes, hauing there all at his pleaſure, he came vnto Barwike, where there were a great number of Danes ioyned togither with the Pictes, as men not mynding to flee any further, but to fight with the Scottes euen there, if they ſhould come forward vpon them. But when they ſaw what number the Scottes were of, and herewith doubting the Engliſh men to come on their backs if the matter went not well with thē, they thought it beſt ẏ ſuch Danes as were of any great reputation of Nobilitie ſhoulde withdraw into Barwike before the enimies were at hande, and the reſidue to paſſe ouer Tweede into Northumberlande, there to ioyne with other Danes that in thoſe parties were lately arriued. But the Engliſhmen within Barwik abhorring nothing more than to be vnder ſubiection of the Danes, in the euening after the receiuing of the Daniſh nobles into theyr towne, deliuered it togither with their gueſtes vnto the Scottiſhmen, who ſuffring the Engliſh mē at their pleaſure either to go their wayes with all their goodes, or to remaine ſtill in their houſes, ſlue the Danes without ſparing eyther man, woman, or childe. Then leauing a ſtrong garniſon of Scottiſhmen within Barwik, Gregorie marched forth with the reſidue of hys people into Northumberlande, to vnite that countrey to other of his dominions that bordered vpon the ſame. In thoſe parties at that ſelfe time there were two armies lodged in the fields, the one of Danes not farre from Yorke, vnder the leading of one Herdunt, who had lately taken and ſacked that Citie, and the other of Engliſh men that lay xx. miles off from the ſayd Danes. Herdunt hearing of the ſlaughter which the Scots had made of his countrey men at Barwike, threatned ſore that he would not leaue a man aliue of the Scotiſh race within any part of all the confines of Albion. Which howe many of the companie following their Captaines example, likewiſe made. Shortly after hearing of their enimies approche, the whole hoſt by commaundement of Herdunt iſſued forth of their campe to giue battaile. Here the Scottiſh king ſtanding with his people in order of battaile, had thought to haue vſed ſome comfortable ſpeach vnto them, thereby to encourage them to fight, but ſuche haſt was made by the Scots to preaſe vpon their enimies, that he ſaw it more needfull to take heed to the ordering of them in perfect array, than to ſtand about to exhort thē, whome he ſaw readie ynough of theyr owne accord to fight. Therfore he ſaid no more vnto thē, as he went amongſt the rankes, but only willed them to remember howe cruelly Conſtantine their king was ſometime murthered after he had yeelded himſelfe priſoner to theſe enimies, with whom they ſhould now ioyne. The Scots herevpon running to the battaile with no leſſe ſtoutneſſe of minde than violent force, gaue their enimies vneth ſpace to charge their weapōs, but bare them downe with long ſpeares and iauelins, and withall the Bilmen following them made great ſlaughter on eche ſide, ſo that there needed neither exhortation of captaines, nor diligence of wiſters to kepe them in aray. For the wrathfull ſtomacks of the ſouldiers only wrought the feat in ſuch ſort that the Danes were quickly put to flight & chaſed: thoſe that could not eſcape to the campe, got thē vnto the next mountaines, who chanced vpon better lucke than thoſe that eſcaped to the campe, for the egrenеſſe of the Scots was ſuch in chaſing the enimies, that neither ditch nor rampire coulde ſtay them from entring the campe vpon ẏ Danes where they made greater ſlaughter than they had done in the field. The next day Herdunt goeth about to aſſemble his men togither againe being diſperſed here and there, but when he vnderſtode how he had loſt the more halfe of his whole hoſt, he curſed that vnhappy day, and determined to retire vnto Raſin, who as then was captain generall of all the Danes that were in Englande: but Herdunt by reaſon of his wounded men, whom he was faine to carie with him, could not make forward with any great ſpeede, ſo that he was vneth xl. miles got forth on his way when worde came to him, that Raſine fighting with the Engliſhe men vnwarely, at a place called Helcades, chaunced to be ſlaine with a great multitude of his people: and thereunto his head was caried abrode vp and downe the countrey from towne to towne to be ſeene. By ſuch miſhaps the proſperitie of the Danes ſo much flouriſhing of late, began nowe manifeſtly to decay. Herdunt although he was not a little diſcouraged herewith, yet he choſe forth a plot of ground moſt meet for his purpoſe, where he determined to remaine in campe till he might vnderſtand what the Danes in other places were minded to do. But Gregorie K. of Scots hauing thus expulſed the Danes forth of Northumberland, brought that countrey vnder his ſubiection: neuertheleſſe he permitted the inhabitants to enioy all their poſſeſſions ſtill, only receyuing of thē in name of ſouereintie a yearely tribute. So that within a few dayes after, he brake vp his armie, & went himſelf vnto Barwike, where he remayned all the winter ſeaſon in conſultation with his nobles about the publike affayres of the realme. In the beginning of the next Sommer, he prepared againe for warre, and rayſing an armie, he purpoſed to make a iourney againſt the Brytains, who held, as before ye haue herd, a great part of Scotland. But he was not driuen to vſe any force in this warre, for the Brytaines being vexed afore this time with warre by the Danes, had cōpounded with them for an huge ſumme of money to haue truce for. xx. yeares ſpace, but the Danes without regard to their promiſe, ſhortly after with a greater power than at the firſt, entred into the Brytiſh borders, renuing ỹ warre ſo fiercely, that notwithſtanding their force was ſore enfeebled, by reaſon of the two laſt mētioned ouerthrowes, yet the Brytaines doubting the worſt, feared to encounter with them, and therfore after conſultation had, they thought it beſt to aſſay if they might happely allure the Scottes of their enimies to become their friends. And herevpon ſending vnto the Scottiſh King an Heraulde, they requyre to ioyne with them in armes againſte the Danes, common enimies to both theyr Countreys, promiſing that if they woulde ſo doe, they woulde willingly ſurrender into his handes all ſuch poſſeſſions which they helde at any time belonging vnto the Scottiſh kingdome.

The Brytaines ſend to king Gregorie.

Gregorie weying with himſelfe how neceſſarie this friendſhip ſhould be, not onely to the publike weale of all the whole lande of Albion, but alſo of the good ſuretie and aduauncement of Chriſtes religion, whereof the Danes were grieuous aduerſaries (for this hee thought, that if Scottes, Engliſh men, and Brytaines did ioyne in one, and knit themſelues togither in ayding ech other, there was no nation in the worlde that they needed to feare) he conſented vnto the requeſt of the Brytaines, and ſo accepting their offer, he had all thoſe regions which appertayned ſometime to the Scottes, and were nowe in poſſeſſion of the Brytaynes, ſurrendered into his handes, and ſo by this meanes were the Scottiſhe confines enlarged and extended vnto their auncient limittes and former boundes. This diſſention and variance being ceaſſed after this maner, greatly reioyced the mindes of all the inhabitantes of thys Ile, but contrariwiſe, the Danes loked for nothing more than preſent deſtruction to enſue vnto them, if this amitie ſhould continue any while amōgſt their enimies, wherfore they practiſed ſūdrie meanes to breake the amitie thus remayning betwixt their aduerſaries, Scottes, Engliſh men, and Brytaynes, wherein they needed not greatly to trauayle, for within a ſhort tyme after the concluſion of the ſame league, the proſperous ſucceſſe of the Engliſh men, whiche for a ſeaſon had folowed them vnder the conduct and gouernment of their king Alured againſt the Danes, occaſioned the Brytaynes alſo (hauing nowe no further feare of the Daniſhe puiſſance,) to repent themſelues of the league, whiche they had lately made with the Scottes, in ſo muche that Conſtantine whome a little before they had receyued to bee theyr king after the deceaſſe of his father, rayſed a power, and with the ſame entered into Innandale, to recouer that Countrey out of the Scottiſhe mens handes: but hearing in the ende that Gregorie was comming with a great army to ſuccour his ſubiectes, whome the ſayde Brytaynes on eche ſide had ſore afflicted, they began to drawe backe towardes Cumberlande wyth theyr bootie, thinking there to bee in ſafetie vntill a time more conuenient. But king Gregorie coaſting the Countrey, met with them at Lochmaben, and there gaue them battaile, wherein when Conſtantine perceyued how his people began to ſhrinke backe, as a man hauing more regarde to his honour than to the ſuretie of his life, he ruſhed forth into the formoſt preaſe, there to ſuccour and relieue his Standardes, but beeing compaſſed about amongeſt a great companie of his enimies, his chaunce was there to bee ſlaine with a number of the chiefeſt Lordes of all the Brytiſh nation. The other multitude ſeeing the day to goe thus againſt them, fled to ſaue theyr liues, leauing the victorie ſo to the Scottes.

King Gregorie his conſideration.

A peace concluded, and landes ſurrendred to the Scottes

The Brytaynes repent the league made with Scottes.

The Scottes ouerthrow Brytayne

Conſtantine ſlaine.

This

This ouerthrowe did put the Brytaynes in daunger to haue bene vtterly ouerrunne, what by the Scottes on the one ſide, and the Danes on the other: for as for any ayde to be loked for of the Engliſh men, they had plain anſwere they ſhould haue none, ſith they had ſo vniuſtly broken the league cõcluded with their cõfederates the Scots, to the great hinderance of the proſperous proceedings of al the inhabiters of this Ile, againſt their common enimies the Danes. Yet the better to eſtabliſh the eſtate of their countrey, and in hope of ſome recouerie of their former dammages, they crowned to their king one Herbert (or as ſome copies haue Hebert) the brother of the laſt Conſtantine, and herewith ſent Ambaſſadours vnto Gregorie king of the Scottiſh men to excuſe themſelues, in that they had ſo wrongfully attempted the warres againſt him and his people, laying all the fault in Conſtantine, who againſt the willes and contrarie to the minds of his ſubiects did take vpon him that diſhonourable and moſt infortunate enterpriſe. Gregorie hauing heard the meſſage of theſe Ambaſſadors, for anſwer declared vnto thẽ, that he vnderſtood wel ynough that the Brytains now ſued for peace vpon no reuerend conſideration they had vnto their othes of couenãt, but only for that they ſaw howe if they ſhoulde purſue the warre ſtill, they were ſure that in the ende they ſhould be like to haue the foyle: & therefore he was fully thus reſolued, not to conclude any peace or truce with ſuch diſloyall people, till they had reſigned ouer into his hands the whole poſſeſſion of the Countreys of Cumberland & Weſtmerland, with aſſurance neuer to pretende any clayme or title vnto thoſe dominions from thenceforth: and herewith for performance of couenants, to render into his hands not only ẏ keyes of al the townes, caſtels, and fortreſſes in the ſame countreys, and to auoyde quite their wayes into Wales to other their countrey men there, but alſo to deliuer. lx. noble mens ſonnes and heyres apparant as pledges to remain with the Scots. The Ambaſſadors returning home with this meſſage, and reporting it accordingly vnto their king, when all men had ſaid their aduice, in the ende they condiſcended to conclude the peace with the rehearſed conditions preſcribed by the Scottiſh king, ſith they ſawe no better meane to preſerue their nation from preſent deſtruction. And thus deliuering the appoynted number of pledges, they left the countryes of Cũberland and Weſtmerland voyd, ſurrendring into the Scottiſh mens hands the poſſeſſions of all the townes, caſtels & fortreſſes, & therewith departed into Northwales, where they placed thẽſelues in the countrey betwixt Conway and the riuer of Dee, out of the which they expulſed the Engliſhe men (that were then in poſſeſſion therof) and therwith they erected a kingdom ther, which they named Stradcluyd, maintayning warres againſt ẏ Engliſhmen many yeres after. K. Gregorie hauing thus enlarged his kingdome, aſſembled his nobles at Carleil, wher he reſolued with their aduice to follow ſuch good fortune as by Gods prouidence dayly chaunced vnto them. Wherupon it was agreed, that they ſhould go firſt vnto Yorke to conquer that citie, whileſt the Engliſh men in Kent were occupied with the Danes that were come thither, ſo as neither the one nation nor the other could attend to make any attempt to hinder the Scottiſh mens enterpriſe. But in the meane time came Ambaſſadors vnto Gregorie frõ king Alured to congratulate his proſperous ſucceſſe againſt his enimies ẏ Danes & other. Theſe Ambaſſadors alſo willed to haue the auncient league betwixt Engliſhmen & Scottes renued, by which meanes both their powers might ioine togither againſt their common enimies, when they ſhould attempt any wrongfull inuaſion. This requeſt was granted, ſo that ſhortly therupon peace was eſtabliſhed betwixt thoſe princes & their people, wt confirmation of the olde league, whereunto were added theſe articles: that ẏ Scots ſhould enioy the poſſeſſion of Northũberland without any claime to be made to the ſame by the Engliſh men: if the Danes chaunced to inuade either of their dominions, the warre ſhould be accounted as common to them both. Neither ſhould the Scots graunt paſſage to any enimy of the Engliſhmen through Scotlãd, neither the Engliſh men ſuffer ẏ Scottiſh mens enimies to paſſe through England. If any Engliſh men did rob or ſteale any thing out of Scotlande that ſhoulde not breake the league, but the offenders with the receipters ſhould be deliuered to the Scottiſh magiſtrats to be puniſhed according to the qualitie of the offence, & the lyke ſhould be obſerued by the Scottes towardes the Engliſhmẽ. Thus things being quieted with the Engliſhmen, as Gregory was about to lay armor aſide, word came to him of new trouble forth of Galloway, by reaſon of an inuaſion made by the Iriſhmen into that coũtrey. For the Iriſhmẽ hauing knowledge that the inhabitants of Galloway had ſpoyled two ſhips of Dublin arryuing on their coaſt, ſent ouer a great power of men, the which landing in Galloway, made great ſlaughter of the people on ech ſide. K. Gregory being aduertiſed hereof, ſtreyght wayes made towardes them, but they hauing knowlegge of his cõming, drewe to their ſhippes with a great pray of goodes and cattels, and returned therewith immediately back into their own countrey. Herevpon Gregory without delay got togither his ſhips and followed the enimies with all his army, & landing in Ireland, put the nobles of that realme in great feare, who as then were in contention togither whiche of them ſhoulde haue the gouernment, by reaſon theyr king was lately deade, and had left a ſonne behinde hym being but a childe in yeares, to ſucceede him in his throne. Some therefore of the wiſer ſort, and ſuch as tendred the wealthy of their countrey, went earneſtly about to agree the parties, but when they ſaw that woulde not be, they did ſo much yet, that a truce was taken betwixt them for a while, leaſt fighting ſtill amongeſt themſelues, they ſhoulde put theyr Countrey in daunger to be ouerrunne of the Scottes: againſt whom when they had agreed vpon the foreſayde truce, eyther of the factions rayſed a power, one Bzen being generall of the one, and Cornelius of the other: for theſe two princes were heades of the parties betwixt whom the controuerſie for the gouernment of the Realme reſted, and thereupon by conſent of the reſidue had the leading of all them that were of their faction. Theſe two Captaynes with their armies encamped themſelues vpon the banke of the Ryuer Bane, vnder the Mountaine called Fute: theyr campes being ſeuered by a ſmall diſtance the one from the other, in ſuch a ſtrong place, that it was not poſſible for the enimies to approche them without manifeſt daunger to caſt away themſelues. Their chiefe purpoſe was to prolong the tyme here in thys place, till they had famiſhed the Scottiſh armie, and then to deale with them at theyr pleaſure. But the induſtrious prouiſion of Gregozie paſſed the politike deuiſe of the Iriſhe men: for hee had commaunded that euerie one of thoſe Scottiſh men which paſſed the Seas with him, ſhould puruey hymſelfe of vytayles, accozding to the cuſtome of the Countrey, for fiftie dayes ſpace, as of breade, cheeſe, butter, larde, and powdred beefe: as for drinke they knewe they ſhoulde not neede to care, ſithe they were ſure to finde water ynough in euery place where they chaunced to come: for as yet filthie & ſeruile glutonie had not ſoftened nor inured with wanton delicacie the warlike natures of the Scottiſh people. In the ende Gregozie hauing for certaine dayes reſted himſelf and his men, & deuiſing in the meane time which way he might beſt endomage the enimies. At length concluded to ſende in the night ſeaſon two thouſande of his ſouldiers vp to the ridge of the forenamed mountaine called Fute, throughe the thicke buſhes and woods wherewith the ſame was couered, to the ende that getting to the top of that hill, right ouer where the Iriſh campes lay, they might in the morning (at what time Gregozie with the reſt of the armie went about to aſſayle hys enimyes) tumble downe ſtones from the browes of the hill vpon them, thereby eyther to deſtroy great numbers of them, either elſe to conſtraine them to come forth of their ſtrength into the plaine fielde, and ſo to fight with them in a place indifferent. Kenneth Cullan the Thane of Carrick toke vppon him to haue the conduct of them that ſhoulde goe aboute this enterpriſe, who conueying hys bande ouer the water of Bane, and ſo vp on the backe ſide of the Mountayne, in the morning when their fellowes fell in hande to aſſayle the Iriſhe campe where Bzen lodged, they tumbled ſuche plentie of mightie ſtones downe vpon the Iriſhe men, that aboue a thouſande of them beeing ſlaine, all the reſidue were forced to forſake their grounde, and to flee in maner without anye ſtroke ſtryken. The Scottes that were ſent to purſue them, toke a great number of them priſoners, and ſlue but a fewe, hauing before hande ſuche commaundement from their Prince.

Whileſt this miſchiefe fell vpon Bzen and his people, Cornelius with his folkes curſing that infortunate day, left their lodgings, and marched their wayes in good order of battaile til they were farre ynough out of daunger.

The bodie of Bzen alſo was founde amongſt other in the rylling of the campe, with the heade bzuyſed in peeces, and the bzaynes paſhed oute with ſome ſtone thzowne downe by the Scottiſh men from the hyll ſide. Which Gregozie at the requeſt of ſome of the pziſoners cauſed to bee buryed in Chziſtian Sepulture. He cauſed alſo women and chyldzen to be ſent away harmleſſe, onely retayning the men of able age pziſoners. Furthermoze he commaunded that they ſhoulde vſe neyther fire noz ſwozde, but againſt ſuch only as with weapon in hande made any reſiſtance. and cõmaunded them alſo that they ſhoulde pzouide themſelues of bittayles to ſerue them whyleſt they ſhoulde lie abzode and remaine there in that countrey. And herebpon many of the Iriſh people thus taſting the mereifull clemencie of the Scottiſh king, yeelded themſelues vnto him with ſundzie Foztreſſes, ſo that Gregozie finding ſufficient pzouiſion of bpttayles to ſerue his hoſt foz a long ſeaſon, he went vnto the ſtrong Citie of Doungarge, oz Doungarde, which he enuironed aboute with a ſtrong ſiege, and continuing the ſame certaine dayes, at length they within wearyed wyth continuall trauayle and lacke of bittayles, opened the gate, and ſuffered him to enter. He woulde not permit his men to meddle wyth anye of the ſpoyle, but appoynted the Townes men to redeeme the ſame (theyr armour except) of hys Souldiers foz a peece of money.

Afterwarde tarying in this Citie by the ſpace of thzee dayes, hee departed and came afoze another Citie called Pontus, whiche he receyued by ſurrender, and therefoze pzeſerued the Citizens from all hurt and annoyance. From thence hee purpoſed to haue gone vnto Dublyne, about .xiiij. myles diſtant from Pontus, but as he marched thitherwardes, he was aduertiſed that Cornelius was comming towardes him with ſuch an huge armie, as the like had not beene ſeene within the memozie of man in that Ile. Wherebpon Gregozie chaunging his purpoſe of goyng to Dublin, bpon repozt of theſe newes, he got him bp into the next mountaine. The next daye came the Iriſh men raunged in thzee battayles. In the firſt, there was a great multitude of Kernes with Dartes and Bowes: In the ſecond were a great number of mightie tall men, armed in coates of male, with Bucklers and great long Swozdes, which they caryed bpon their right ſhoulders. In the thirde battaile, wherein ſtoode their generall Cornelius with all the chiefeſt Nobles of the Countrey, were an infinite companie of all ſoztes of Souldiers, choſen fozth of all the whole numbers. The Scottes (accozding to their cuſtome) deuided themſelues into two wings, and a middle warde, in euerie of the which were thzee ſoztes of Souldiers: as fyrſt Archers, and thoſe with long Speares, then Bylmen, and laſt of all, ſuche as bare long Swozdes and leaden Malles.

Thus the battailes beeing ozdered on both partes, fozwarde they make one towardes another to begin the fight, the Scots (after ỹ the ſhot and thzowing of darts was ſpent, and that they came to ioyne) kept off theyr enimies with long Speares oz Jaueling, in ſuch ſoꝛt, that they were not able to come neare them: which diſaduantage Cornelius pereeyuing, commaunded on highe that they ſhoulde with their ſwozdes cutte thoſe Jaueſynes in ſunder, and as he lyfted bp the biſoz of his helmet, the better to exhoꝛt his people to the execution hereof, he was ſo wounded in the face with a Speare, that he was fain to withdzaw apart out of the fielde. The Iriſh men ſuppoſing he had fledde, incontinently to ſaue theuſelues, thzew off theyr armoz and fell to running away. Thus did the victozie encline to the Scottiſhe ſtandardes. There died but a fewe to ſpeake of in the battaile, howbeit in the chaſe there was a wonderfull number ſlaine: foz the Scottes purſued them euen vnto Dublin Gates Which Citie the next day Gregozie beſet on eche ſide wyth a mightie ſiege. There was gotte into this Citie at the ſame tyme a wonderfull multitude of people, what of ſuche as were receyued into it fleeing from the battaile, as alſo of other, whiche were there aſſembled befoze, in hope of aſſured victozie and ſafegarde of their goodes. By reaſon whereof beeing thus beſieged, they beganne quickely to want bytayles, ſo that eyther muſt they of neceſſitie yeelde, eyther elſe by ſome iſſue auoyde that daunger wherein they were preſently bewzapped.

But foz as much as they ſaw no great likelyhoode of good ſucceſſe in that exployte, in the ende it was concluded amongſt them, that (ſithe there was no meane foz thoſe Noble men which were incloſed within that Citie to eſcape the enimies handes, and that there were none other of any reputation abzode able to defende the Countrey frõ the Scottiſhmens puiſſance) they ſhould fall to ſome treatie with the Scottiſh king foz a peace to be had, with ſo reaſonable conditions as might be obteyned: foz other remedie in that preſent miſchief they could deuiſe none, and therfoze this was iudged the beſt way of the whole nũber, & namely of Cozmach biſhop of Dublin, a man foz his ſingular bertue & reputatiõ of bpzight life, of no ſmal authozity amongſt them. He took bpõ him alſo to go vnto Gregozie to breake ỹ matter, & ſo cõming afoze his preſẽce, beſought him moſt hũbly to haue cõpaſſion bpon the pooze miſerable citie, and in ſuch ſoꝛt to temper his wzath, if he had conceyued any peece of diſpleaſure againſt the Citizens, that it might pleafe him yet vppon their humble fubmiffion to receyue them vnto his mercie, and further to accept into his protection his couſin yong Duncane, vnto whom the kingdome of Irelande was due of right, as all the worlde well vnderſtode. He beſought him alſo to remember, that it appertayned more to the honour of a king to preſerue the lawfull right of other kings and princes with the quiet ſtate of Cities and Countreyes, than by violent hande to ſeeke their deſtruction. Whereunto the king anſwered, that he was not come into Irelande for any couetous deſire he had to the Realme, or to the entent to ſpoyle his kinneſman of the gouernment thereof, but onely to reuenge ſuche iniuries as the Iriſhmen had done to his ſubiectes: not the Scottes but the Iriſhe men themſelues were they that had gyuen the occaſion of the warre, whiche they had dearely bought wyth no ſmall portion of theyr blood (whiche had beene ſhedde) as puniſhed for that cryme worthily by the iuſte iudgement of almightie God.

A wittie ſaying.

King Gregory his wiſe and godly anſwer.

But as touching an ende to bee had of hys quarell, and for the reſeruing of the Kingdome vnto yong Duncanes behoofe, when hee had the Citie at hys pleaſure, hee woulde then take ſuche order as hee ſhoulde thinke moſt conuenient.

This anſwere of the Scottiſhe king being reported vnto them within the Citie, they determined forthwith to ſet open their gates to receyue him: who, when he had cauſed ſearch to be made whither all things were truely ment according to the outwarde ſhewe or not, he marched forth towardes the Citie to enter the ſame in order of battaile, with all hys whole armie, into the which he was receiued with Proceſſion of al the eſtates: for firſt there mette him all the Prieſtes and men of Religion, with the Byſhop, the foreſayd Cormach, who hauing vpon him his Pontificall apparell, bare in his handes the Crucifixe: then followed the Nobles with the other multitude. Which order when Gregorie beheld, he commaunded his battaile to ſtay a little, and therewith he himſelfe aduaunced forth on foote till hee came to the Biſhop, and falling downe vpon his knees, he reuerently kiſſed the Crucifix, whereupon receyuing humble thankes with high commendation of the Biſhop for ſuche his clemencie, he entred the Citie, not ſtaying till he came into the Market place, where commaunding one part of his armie to keepe their ſtanding, he went with the reſidue vnto the Church of our Ladie, and after to that of Saint Patrike, where hearing the celebration of diuine ſeruice when the ſame was ended, hee entred the Caſtell, where his lodging was prepared. In the morning he cauſed execution to be done of certaine vnruly perſons of his

At length hauing remayned a ſeaſon in thys eſtate at Dublin, hee cauſed the Iriſhe Lordes to aſſemble in Connaile, where in the ende the peace was concluded betwixte him and them, with theſe articles and couenants.

First it was agreed that the yong king Dunkane ſhould be brought vp vnder the gouernment of wiſe and diſcrete perſons, to be inſtructed in all Princely knowledge within a ſtrong Caſtell, (wherein he had hitherto remayned euer ſithe hys fathers deceaſſe) till he came to yeares of diſcretion. And that in the meane tyme Gregorie ſhoulde haue the gouernaunce of the Realme, receyuing all the fortreſſes into his poſſeſſion.

He

he should also haue the appoyntment of the magystrates, who should see iustice ministred according to the olde statutes and ordinaunces of the Irishe kingdome, that the Irish men should receyue neyther Englishe man, Brytaine, nor Dane, into theyr Countrey, no not so much as for trade of marchandise, without safeconduite to be graunted by him: so that things beeing thus brought vnto a quietnes in Ireland, he receyued an othe of the chiefest of them for performance of couenants, and herewith taking with him three score hostages, hee returned with his victorious army backe into Scotlande.

After this, there chaunced no notable trouble to the Scottes, neyther forraine nor ciuill by all the time of king Gregories raigne, so that passing the residue of his life in quietnesse, he studied chiefly for the politike gouernment of his people in good order and rule to the aduaunceiment of the common wealth: and finally died an happy olde man, in a Castell called Downdore within the Countrey of Gariothy, in the .xviij. yeare after hys entring into his estate, and after the byrth of our sauiour. 892. He was neuer maryed, but lyued in continuall chastitie: for his famous victories and other his princely doings deseruing of the Scottes to be numbred amongst their most high renowmed princes. Amongst other his princely actes which he set forwarde in his life time, to the adornement of his countrey and common welth, Aberdine of a village was aduaunced by him to the state and dignitie of a citie, and the Churche there indowed with fayre reuenewes, and sundry priuiledges. His bodie was conueyed vnto the Abbey of Colmkill, and there buryed with all solemne pompe and exequies. Ouer the which hys nexte successour Donalde the fift of that name caused a fayre tumbe to be erected.

In the dayes of this Gregorie also, there liued that famous Clerke John Scot, a Scottish man in deede borne, but brought vp in studie of good literature at Athens, where hauing learned the Greeke tongue, he was sent for into Fraunce, to come vnto the Emperour Lewes, with whome he remayned in seruice for a time: and by whose commaundement he translated the booke of S. Dionise, intituled Hierarchia, into Latine. Afterwardes beeing sent Ambassadour from the same Lewes vnto Alured or Alfred king of Englande, K. he continued with him & taught his children, hauing a place thereto appoynted him within the Abbay of Malmesburie, where he had such resort of hearers and scholers, that it was a wonder to behold. Notwithstading, at length when he ceassed not to blame and sharply to reproue the corrupt maners of such his schollers as were giuen more to libertie than learning, he was by them murthered with daggers, as he was reading vnto them, and was afterwardes registred amongest the number of Martyrs.

Donald

But to our purpose. After Gregory succeeded Donald the fifth in gouernment of the kingdome. He was the Sonne of Constantine the seconde. And finding the state of the Realme in good quiet and flourishing in welth he applied his whole studie to maintayne the same in the semblable plight and condition. And before all things he caused iustice to bee duely ministred, so that no iniurie, specially if it were done to any poore person, escaped vnpunished. Christ the Lord of al vertue had giuen him such a godly disposed minde, whose religion (to the aduaunceiment of his glorie) he had euer in high veneration. Amongst other his godly ordinances, he made this statute to bee obserued as a law, that such as by swearing vnaduisedly blasphemed the name of almightie God, or in cursing and banning called vpon the name of the wicked fiend, and betooke any Christian creature vnto his hellishe power and domination (a vice naturally following the people of that Nation) should haue his tongue thrust through with a burning yron. But woo worth the negligence of such as haue succeeded him, in suffering so necessarie an ordinance to be abolished and worne out of vse, considering the horrible othes and blasphemie, with the bitter & dreadfull cursings so much frequented of al estates in this our time, aswel in Scotlande as elsewhere, as without great horror of the hearers cannot bee halfe expressed. But to our purpose touching the gouernmẽt of Donald: it chaunced afterwardes, that he had knowledge how Gormond a Dane was landed with a puissant armie vpon the coastes of Northumberland, and had pitched his campe neare vnto the shore, without doing any domage to the Countrey: so that it was vncertain what he intended: whether to begin a conquest there, or to passe ouer Humber to make warres on the Englishmen. To preuent therefore all daungers, Donalde hasted towardes Northumberlande, howbeit he was not farre forwarde on his iourney, but that worde came to him how Gormond was alreadie passed ouer Humber, and entred into the Englishe borders. But yet did not Donald stay his iourney, til he heard certainly that Gormond keeping vpon his way was aduaunced forwarde at the least .xl. miles of from the ryuer of Humber, doubting least happely he had ment some deceyt, as sodenly to haue returned vpon the Scots in Northumberlande, when the king had beene once gone backe.

But nowe when it was knowne that hys purpoſe was onely to aſſayle the Engliſh Countreys, according to the league newly confirmed, Donalde ſent fiue thouſande Scottiſh men vnto the ayde of the Engliſh men. And alſo appoynted two thouſand horſemen to remaine with him in Northumberlande (where he ſtayed for a tyme) diſcharging the reſidue, and licenſing them to returne vnto their homes.

tiſme had his name chaunged, and was called Athelſtane, during whoſe life the peace continued betwixt the two Nations. Whileſt things paſſed thus in Englande, there roſe a peece of trouble betwixt the inhabitants of Murrey lande, and Roſſe, which diſquieted king Donald not a little. The occaſion grew by reaſon of certaine theeues, which comming forth of Roſſe in the night time, ſecretely entered into Murrey lande, to fetch bootes from thence. At the firſt they of Murrey land made reſiſtaunce agaynſt them as well as they might, but after calling their neighbours to ayde them, they ſkirmiſhed in ſuch wiſe, that within two Monethes ſpace, there were ſlaine betwixt them two thouſand of the one ſyde & of the other. Donalde being not a little offended to haue hys peace broken with inteſtine diſorde, gathered a great power, and with the ſame haſted into Murrey lande: where calling the chiefeſt doers and mainteyners of this buſineſſe to make anſwere to that which was layde to their charge, when they were not able to cleare themſelues of the cryme, he put them to open execution of death, to the enſample of other. This trouble being in this ſort quieted, he went into Northūberland, to be there in a readineſſe, if the Danes or Engliſhe men (whom he ſuſpected) ſhoulde attempt any thing agaynſt his ſubiectes in thoſe parties: where in the ende, after he had raigned almoſt .xx. yeares, he departed this worlde.

Conſtantine.

After Donalde the fifth, there ſucceeded in rule of the Realme Conſtantine the thirde of that name, the ſon of Ethus the ſwift, beginning his raign in the yeare after the incarnation 903. He was more apt for ciuill gouernment, than for the ordering of warlike affayres. King Edwarde that lately ſucceeded Alured in rule ouer the Engliſh men being ware thereof, ſent vnto him an Heralde at armes, commaunding him to reſtore vnto his ſubiectes the Engliſh men, the coūtreys of Northumberland, Cumberlande, and Weſtmerlande (whiche the Scottiſh king Gregorie had in tymes paſt by occaſion of the troubleſome ſeaſon taken from the Conſtantine hereunto anſwered, that if king Edward were minded to make him warres for thoſe landes which he helde by right full title, he with his people woulde be ready to defende themſelues, hoping in the almightie God that her woulde turne the puniſhment on them that vniuſtly had pyked the quarell. Herevpon enſued many rodes and forrayes betwixte the Engliſhmen and Scots made, as occaſion ſerued, into eche others countrey, with diuers ſkyrmiſhes & light bickerings for a twelue moneths ſpace togither, without any notable encounter of theyr mayne powers. In which meane tyme the Danes encreaſed in puyſſaunce, more than was thought requiſite for the ſuertie eyther of the Engliſhmen or Scottes, whiche moued king Edward by perſwaſion of his Nobles, to make meanes vnto Conſtantine to haue the peace renewed: whereunto Conſtantine lightly agreed: ſo that the league was confirmed againe with the former articles betwixt the Engliſhe and Scottiſh nations. Shortly after alſo the warre was renewed betwixt the Engliſhmē & Danes, and a peace againe confirmed by concluſion of a mariage betwixt Sithrik king of Northumberland and Beatrice the doughter of king Edwarde. till at length Sithrik was poyſoned by his wife the ſayde Beatrice: and then becauſe Inalaſſus (whome the Engliſhe writers name Inlafe and Godfrey, the ſonnes of Sithrike, put the ſame Beatrice to death, hyr father king Edward moued warre againſt them, & in fought en fielde diſcomfited them, but was ſlaine in that battel himſelf (as Hector Boetius hath.) But for the further truth of this mater, ye may read more in the Hiſtorie of Englande.

The Danes being certified, that king Edwarde was thus ſlayne, conceyued ſuch hope of good ſucceſſe after to come, that albeit they were at this time vanquiſhed, they immediatly made newe preparation for the warre, and firſte of all Inalaſſus the one of the two brethern before mencioned, ſent vnto Conſtantine the Scottiſh king, to allure him to ioyne with them againſt the Engliſhmen, whiche with great giftes and large promiſes hee eaſily brought to paſſe, the league not withſtandyng whiche remayned betwixt the Engliſhe and Scottiſhe nations. Herevpon bothe the Scottes and Danes made the greateſt prouiſion that might be, thinking verily to ſubdue the Engliſhmen, and to bryng them to vtter deſtruction. Malcolme ſonne to king Donald was appointed by king Conſtantine to haue the leading of the Scottiſhe army, conteyning the number of twentie thouſande men. The ſame Malcolme alſo at the ſame time was created heyre apparant of the realme, hauing Cumberland aſſigned vnto him for the maynteinaunce of his eſtate. And euen then it was ordeyned, that he whiche ſhould ſucceede to the crowne after the kings deceaſſe ſhoulde euer enioy that prouince. Malcolme ioyning his power with Inalaſſus and Godfrey (who had aſſembled in like maner a mightie hoſte of Danes) they all togither brake into the Engliſh confines, ſparing no kinde of cruelties that might be deuiſed, murthering the people without any pitie or compaſſion in all places where they came, to the intent ỹ the Engliſhmē moued with the ſlaughter of theyr kinſfolkes and frendes, ſhould come forth into the field to giue bataple, ſuppoſing they ſhould not be able to withſtande the force of the Danes and Scottiſhmen nowe ioyned in one army togither. But the more vilanie they ſhewed in theyr doings, the ſoner were they puniſhed for the ſame. For Athelſtane the baſe ſonne of king Edward (whom the Engliſhmen had choſen to ſucceede in gouernment of their kingdome after his fathers deceaſſe) with al ſpeede ſought to be reuenged of ſuch iniurious doings. Wherevpon getting togither an army, he encountred with them at a place called Brōningfield, or Brunenburgh in Julie, Anno. 937. where the Engliſhmen at the firſte of purpoſe gaue ſome thing backe, as though they had fled: which maner when the Danes and Scottes beholde, ſuppoſing the Engliſhmen had fledde in deede, they began to purſue amayne, leauyng theyr order of bataple, eche of them ſtriuing who might be the formoſt. The Engliſhmen according to the order appoynted to them by theyr Captaines, ſodenly fell into array againe, and fiercely returning vpon theyr enimies, beat them downe in great numbers, and ſo atteined a moſt triumphant victorie. There died in this mortall bataple many thouſands of Danes & Scottiſhmē, but chiefly the Scottiſh nobilitie bought the bargaine moſt deare, who chooſing rather to die in the fielde than to ſuffer rebuke by diſhonorable flight, it came ſo to paſſe that fewe of them eſcaped. There died on that ſide (as ſome write) 20000. men in this bataile, togither with Wilfert king of the Guentes, Hanwall king of Britons, and .vij. Dukes that came to help the Scottes and Danes. Athelſtane by good aduiſe following the victorie, entred into Northumberland, and finding the countrey diſpurueyed of menne of warre, he eaſily made a full conqueſt thereof, hauing all the holdes and fortreſſes deliuered into his handes. Then without further delay he paſſed into Weſtmerland, and after into Cumberland, where the inhabitants of bothe thoſe regions bare footed and bare headed, in token of moſte humble ſubmiſſion yeelded themſelues

In the meane time Malcolme beyng ſore wounded in the battayle, eſcaped yet with great daunger, and in an horſe litter was conueyed home into his countrey, where he declared vnto king Conſtantine the whole circumſtance of the ouerthrow & loſſe of his countreys aforeſayde. Wherevpon Conſtantine cauſed a councell to be called at Abirnethy, where he perceyued howe ſore his realme was enfeebled through lacke of ſuch of the nobilitie as were loſt in the laſte battayle, by reaſon the reſidue that were left ſeemed through want of yeares, neither able by councell nor force to defend the realme, ſo as he vtterly deſpaired eyther to be of power to beate backe the enimies, or to gouerne his realme in ſuch politike ſorte as he would haue wiſhed. And therefore to rid himſelf of all ſuch cares and troubles, and withall deſpiſing al ſuch worldly pompe as might withdraw him from deuine contemplation (wherevnto he was partly bent) he gaue ouer his kingly eſtate, and became a Chanon within the Abbey of S. Andrewes amongſt the couent there. This was in the yeare of our Sauiour. 943. and in the xi. yeare of his owne reygne: as Hector Boetius ſaith: but if he did thus forſake the worlde and entred into religion immediatly after the batayle fought at Brouningfielde or Brunenburgh (for ſo we finde it named by ſome writers) then muſte it needes be afore this ſuppoſed time alledged by the ſame Boetius, for that batayle was fought, Anno. 937. as the beſte approued amongeſt our Engliſhe writers do report; ſo that it ſhoulde rather ſeeme that Conſtãtine refuſed in deede to deale with the gouernment of the realme, about the ſame yeare of our Lord. 937. or ſhortly after, and that Malcolme gouerned as Regent and not as king whileſt Conſtantine liued, who departed this life (after he had cõtinued in the Abbey of S. Andrewes a certayne time) in the foreſayd yeare. 943. falling in the xi. yeare after he firſt beganne to reygne. He was firſt buried in the church there amongſt the Biſhops, but afterwards he was taken vp & trãſlated vnto Colmekill, where he had a tumbe ſet ouer him, as was conuenient for the memory of his name.

In the xxvj. yeare of his reygne there were two monſtruous creatures borne in Albion, the one amongſt the Danes being an Hermophrodyte, that is to witte, a childe with bothe ſexes, hauing the head lyke a ſwyne, the breſte ſtanding forth more in reſemblance than the common ſhape of man, a fatte belly, with feete lyke a gooſe, legges lyke a man, full of briſtels, and a very euill fauoured thing to beholde. The other was borne in Northumberlande, onely hauing a mannes face, with one whole belly from the nauell downe, but aboue, the ſame deuided with two breſts creaſted or compaſſed ridge wiſe and not broade lyke to the ſhape of man: beſide this it had foure armes and two heades. And euen as from the nauell vpwardes it was thus deuided into two bodies, ſo did it appeare there was two contrary willes or deſires in the ſame, euer luſting contrarily, as when the one did ſleepe, the other would wake: when the one requyred to haue meate, the other paſſed for none at all. Oftentymes would they chyde & braule togither, in ſo muche that at length they fell ſo farre at variaunce, that they did beate and rente eyther other right pytifully with theyr nayles. At length the one with long ſickneſſe wearyng away and finally deceaſſing, the other was not able to abide the greuous ſmell of the dead carcaſe, but immediatly after died alſo.

These prodigious ſightes put menne in greate feare, for that deuinours did interprete the ſame to ſignifie ſome great bloudſhedde to fall vpon the Scots ſhortly after. They were alſo the better beleeued, for that within a whyle after that greate ouerthrow happened at Brounyngfielde, as before is ſpecified.

Malcolme

After that Conſtantine (as is ſayde) was entred into religion, the before named Malcolme the ſon of Donalde was admitted king, or rather regent: who although he perceiued right wel howe the force of the realme was ſo enfeebled, that there was no hope to mainteyne warres abroad, yet his chiefe ſtudie was by all meanes poſſible to defende the borderers of the Scottiſhe dominion, and before all things to procure peace with the Engliſhmen. But as he was about to haue ſente Ambaſſadours vnto king Athelſtane, to haue treated for peace, he was credibly enformed, howe Athelſtane had gyuen Northumberlande vnto Aualaſſus, and made a league with him to haue his ayde againſt the Scottes.

Aualaſſus giuen Northumberland.

Whiche

Whiche newes put Malcolme in wonderfull dread, for that he vnderſtood how his realme was vnpurueyed of ſkilfull Captaines to make reſiſtance. Yet hee cauſed a councell to be called, wherein when ſuche as were aſſembled propoſed many fond & childiſhe reaſons, it might appeare there was ſmall hope of any good concluſion: but euen as they were at a poynt to haue broke vp without any certaine reſolution, worde was brought howe thrꝰough ſeditious diſcorde, whiche had chaunced betwixt the Danes and Engliſhmen being aſſembled togither in campe, they had fought a right bloudy battayle, the victorie in the ende remayning with the Engliſhmen, who ceaſſed not to purſue the Danes in chaſe, ſo long as any day light appeared in the ſkie. Auala ſſus with ſuche Danes as he might get togither after that ouerthrowe, fledde into Weſtmerland, and within three dayes after, in ſuche ſhippes as he found there vpon the coaſt, he ſayled ouer into the Ile of Man, and ſpoyling the ſame, with all the pray he paſſed from thence ouer into Irelande. In the meane time king Athelſtane hauyng loſt no ſmall number of his people in the foreſayde batayle, omitted his iourney into Scotlande, and lay ſtill in Northumberland, no man vnderſtanding what he entended to do. Whiche newes were ſo pleaſant to the Scottiſhmen, that there was common ſupplications and proceſſions made thrꝰough the whole realme, in rendring thanks to almightie God for deliuering the people by this meanes frō ſo great and preſent daunger.

Shortly after came Ambaſſadours from Athelſtane vnto Malcolme to moue meanes for a peace to be concluded betwixt the Scottiſhe and Engliſh nations according to the articles of the old league. Whiche motion was ioyfully herde of Malcolme, though he ſet a countenaunce of the matter as though hee paſſed not whether hee had warre or peace: but in the ende for that as he ſayde, peace was moſte neceſſarie for all partes, he ſhewed himſelfe willing to haue the olde former league renewed betwixte the Engliſhmen and Scottes, with any reaſonable condicions whiche ſhould be thought to be requiſite. After the returne of the Ambaſſadours, the league was newly confirmed betwixt the two kings & theyr people, with the ſemblable articles as were comprꝰyſed in the olde league, with this article onely added therevnto, that Northumberland being as now repleniſhed moſt with Daniſh inhabitats, ſhould remaine to the Engliſhmen: and Cumberland with Weſtmerlande to the Scots: vpon this condition, that he whiche ſhould ſucceede as heyre vnto the crowne of Scotlande after the kings deceaſſe, being heyre apparant, ſhould hold thoſe regions, and do homage vnto the king of England as his vaſſall perpetually for the ſame. The peace being thus eſtabliſhed betwixt theſe nations, Indulphe the ſonne of Conſtantine the thyrde was proclaymed prince of Cumberland and inheritour to the crowne of Scotland. After this, Malcolme paſſed the reſidue of his life in good quiet, without any troubles of warre, as a man onely ſtudying to maintayne the ſtate of his realme in good order, aſwell for the wealth of the temporaltie as ſpiritualtie, wherevnto hee was equally inclined. At length as he rode about the prouinces of his realme to ſee the lawes duely miniſtred, at Ulrine a village in Murrayland, where he cauſed iuſtice to be ſomewhat ſtreightly executed vpon offendors, he was murthered in the night ſeaſon by treaſon of a fewe conſpiratours, in the .xv. yeare of his reigne. But ſuche as did this wicked deede with theyr complices, by diligent examination were tried out, and on the next day being appehended, ſuffered due execution, according as they had deſerued, being torne in peeces with wilde horſes: and thoſe peeces ſent vnto ſundry cities, where they were hanged vp on the gates and towers, vntill they rotted away.

King Malcolme was murthered.

The conſpirators were put to execution.

The murtherers were torn with horſes.

They that were the deuiſers of the murder alſo, & procured the doers therevnto, were thruſt thrꝰough vpon ſharpe ſtakes, and after hanged vpon high gybettes: and other of the conſpirators were put to other kinds of death, as the caſe ſeemed to requyre. The death of Malcolme chaunced in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour. 959. Here we haue thought good to put you in remembrance, that either the Scottes are deceyued in their accompte of yeares, or els miſtake the names of the kings of Englande, for where they write that this Malcolme departed this life about the .xxij. yeare of Athelſtane king of England, that can not be if Malcolmes deceaſſe chaunced in the yeare. 959. for Athelſtane was dead long before that time, to witte in the yeare. 940. and reygned but .xvj. yeares. Moreouer where the Scottiſhe wryters make mencion of the warres whiche king Edmond that ſucceeded Athelſtan had againſt Anlafe and the Danes of Northumberland, in the dayes of king Indulfe that ſucceeded Malcolme, it can not ſtande by any meanes (if they miſtake not theyr accompt of yeares,) for the ſame Edmond was ſlayne in the yeare. 948. But verily this fault in the iuſte accompt of yeares is but to cōmon in the Scottiſhe hiſtorie, and therefore to him that ſhould take vpō him to reforme the errours thereof in this behalfe, it were neceſſarie to alter in a manner the whole courſe of the ſame hiſtorie: and therefore we will not wiſhe any man to giue any credite vnto theyr accompt in yeares, touching the reignes of the Engliſhe kings, further ther than they ſhall ſee them to agree with our wryters, whome in that behalfe wee may more ſafely followe, and by conferring the ſame with the Scottiſhe wryters in ſome places, happely perceyue the true time aſwell of the reygnes of theyr kings as of actes done, to fall out in yeares and ſeaſons, much differing from their accompt: whereof to admoniſh the Reader, aſwell here as in the Engliſh hiſtorie, wee haue thought it not impertinēt. And albeit that ſome may aſke what reaſon we haue to moue vs to doubt of their accompte of yeares, more than we do of that in our owne writers, we wil referre the ſame vnto their iudgements that are learned, and haue trauayled indifferently alike, aſwell in peruſing the one as the other without affectiō. But as the errours are ſooner founde than amended, ſo haue wee thought good to ſet downe in the margent of this booke, the yeares as we finde them noted in the Scottiſh wryters, ſpecially in places where wee differ any thing from them, becauſe we will not ſeeme by way of controlment, to preiudice the authours further, than by due conſideration the well aduiſed Reader ſhall thinke it expedient.

Indulph

BVt to my purpoſe: after ỹ corps of Malcolme was once buried according to the cuſtome, amongſt his predeceſſours in the Abbey churche of Colmekill, Indulphe prince of Cumberland was placed in the marble cheare at Scone, there receyuing the crowne and other the inueſtures of the kingdome. In the adminiſtration whereof he continued for the ſpace of fiue yeares without any notable trouble, in the end of which terme, he was requyred by meſſengers ſent vnto him from Iualaſſus, to ioyne with him in league againſt the Engliſhmen, in reuenge of that ouerthrow, whiche aſwell the Danes as Scottes had receyued at Broningfield, alledgyng that opportunitie was now offered, ſith after the deceaſſe of Athelſtane the Engliſhmen had created Edmond to theyr king, a man of a dull witte, and not fitte for the adminiſtration of high affayres: neyther did the league concluded betwixt Athelſtane and Malcolme enforce any impediment, but that he might enter the warre againſt the Engliſhmen, conſidering bothe thoſe Princes that were the Authours of that league were departed out of this lyfe, by whoſe deceaſſe the ſayde league was ended.

Indulphe is prouoked by Iualaſſus, to warre againſt England.

His perſuaſions.

Indulph his anſwere.

But Indulph for anſwere hereunto declared, that the league was concluded betwixt Malcolme and Athelſtane, by great deliberation of counſaile, and by conſent of all the eſtates of bothe realmes, taking theyr ſolemne othes for the true obſeruing thereof, ſo that he coulde not, vnleſſe he ſhoulde violate that ethe, attempt any thing to the breache of peace with the Engliſhmen, procuring the iuſte indignation of almightie God againſt him and his people in that behalfe. Herevpon the Danes accounting Indulph but a ſlouthfull and negligent perſon for this kinde of anſweare, as he that regarded not the honour of his realme and people, in letting paſſe ſo great opportunitie to be reuenged of the Engliſhmen for the death of ſuche Scottes as died in the ouerthrow at Broningfield, determined not to be noted with the like ſpotte of reproche, but with all ſpeede ſending for ayde into Norway, prepared to paſſe ouer into England, vnder the conduct of Iualaſſus, who ioyning his power with the Norwaygians whiche came to his ayde vnder the leading of a right valiant Captayne called Raynold, tranſported with all ſpeede ouer into Northumberlande, vnto whom the gouernour there named Elgarine, acknowledging himſelfe to be deſcended of the Daniſhe bloud, yelded all the Caſtels, Townes and Fortes, promiſing to ayde Iualaſſus againſt king Edmond to the vttermoſt of his power.

These newes comming to the knowledge of Edmond, with al ſpeede he gathereth his power, and ſending into Scotlande for ſuche ayde as he ought to haue from thence by couenaunts of the league, there came vnto him ten thouſande Scottiſhmen with ready willes to ſerue him in theſe his warres againſt the Danes. Then ioyning his owne people with thoſe Scottiſhmen, he ſet forewarde towardes his enimies. There were an eyght thouſande Northumberland men with Iualaſſus, the whiche vpon the firſte encounter with the Engliſhmenne, fell ſtreight vnto running away, whiche made an open and readie breache vnto the Engliſhe part, to attayne the victorie: for the Danes beyng not able to reſiſte the violent force of theyr enimies, encouraged nowe with the flight of the Northumbers, were quickely conſtreyned to giue backe, and in the ende to flee amayne, the Engliſhmen and Scottes following in the chaſe with ſuche fiercenеſſe, that all ſuche as they ouertooke died vpon the ſwoorde, though they ſubmitted themſelues neuer ſo humbly in requiring mercie.

Elgarine yet chaunсing to fall into his enimies handes was taken aliue: for ſo had Edmond commaunded, that if any man might take him, he ſhould in any caſe ſaue his life, that he might put him to death in moſte cruell wiſe, to the enſample of other. There chaunced alſo no notable trouble in Albion during the ſpace of foure yeares after this ſayde ouerthrow of the Danes with their Captaine Iualaſſus, who is otherwiſe alſo named Inlafe, as is to be ſeene in the Engliſh hiſtories where the ſame make mention of the forenamed king Edmond, whom likewiſe they affirme to be the brother of Athelſtane and not his ſonne, as before is partely touched. Indulph in this meane time did with greate diligence ſee to the good order of his realme, ſhewing therein what belonged to the office of a worthy prince. But euen as all things ſeemed to reſt in peace and quietneſſe through the whole Ile of Albion, Hagon king of Norway, and Helrike king of Denmarke, vpon purpoſe to reuenge the ſlaughter of their countrey men lately made in Northumberlande, came with a mightie nauie vnto the coaſtes of Scotland, aſſaying to lande with their whole armie, firſte in the Forth, then in the riuer of Tay, but yet through ſuch reſiſtaunce as the Scottes made, beyng aſſembled togither to keepe them off, they were fayne to withdrawe, & wafting alongſt the coaſtes of Angus, the Marnes, Mar, & Buthqhane, at length fayning as though they woulde haue taken their courſe homewardes, they launched forth into the high ſeas, but within foure dayes after returning againe to the ſhore, they lāded their people early in one morning vpon the coaſt of Boene, at a place called Cullane, a countrey ioyning vnto Buthqhane, putting ſuche of the countrey people to flight as preſented themſelues to impeach their landing and inuaſion.

But Indulph being aduertiſed hereof, forthwith aſſembling the whole power of his realme, drew towardes that parte with ſuch ſpeede, that hee was come into Boene before his enimies were certified that hee was ſet forewarde. So ſoone therefore as they heard he was come, ſuche as were abroade forraying the ſame countrey, were called backe to the campe. But Indulph without protracting of time came ſtil forward, and vpon his approche to the enimies, he prepared to giue battaple, and with a ſhort oration began to encourage his people to fight manfully, but before he coulde make an ende, the Danes gaue the onſet with ſuche violence, that the battaple a long ſpace continued doubtfull on bothe ſides, the Danes on the one parte and the Scots on the other, doyng their vttermoſt endeuours to atchieue the victorie, till at length they of Louthian with their Captaines Dunbar & Eramy began to appeare on the backe half of the Danes, with whiche ſight they were put in ſuche feare, that thoſe which fought in the fore ward, retyred backe vnto the middle warde, whome the Scots egrely purſuyng, beat downe euen till they came vnto the rereward, which coueting rather to die in the fight, than to giue backe, and ſo to be ſlaine in the chaſe (for thoſe in the rereward were heauie armed men) cōtinued the battaple more with a certaine ſtiffe ſtubbornneſſe of minde than with any great force or forecaſt, being ſo ouermatched as they were, and forſaken of their fellowes: for other of the Danes, namely the Archers and Kernes fled their wayes, ſome towardes their ſhippes, and ſome here and there being ſcattered abroade in the fieldes, fell into the moſſes and mareſſe grounds and other ſtreytes, where they were ſlaine euery one by ſuch as followed in the chaſe.

His bodie was first buried in Cullane, a towne of Boene, and after translated vnto the Abbay of Colmekill, and there enterred amongst other his predecessours the Scottishe kings. Duffe.

AFter the corps of Indulphe was remoued vnto Colmekil & there buried, Duffe the sonne of king Malcolme was crowned king at Scone with al due solemnitie. In the beginning of his reigne Culene the sonne of king Indulphe was proclaymed prince of Cumberlande: immediatly wherevpon the king transported ouer into the westerne Iles to set an order there for certaine misdemeanours vsed by diuers robbers and pillers of the common people. At his arriuall amongst them he called the Thanes of the Iles afore him, cõmaunding straytly as they would anoyde his displeasure to purge theyr countreys of such malefactours, wherby the husbandmen & other cõmons might liue in quiet without vexation of suche barettours & idle persons as sought to liue only vpõ other mẽs goodes. The Thanes vpon this charge giuẽ them by the king, toke no small number of the offenders, partely by publike authoritie, & partly by lying in awayte for thẽ where they supposed theyr haunt was to resort, the which being put to execution according to that they had merited, caused ỹ residue of that kind of people eyther to get them ouer into Ireland, eyther els to learne some manuall occupation wherewith to get theyr liuing, yea though they were neuer so great gentlemen borne. Howbeit the nobles with this extreeme rigour shewed thus by the king against their linage, were much offended therewith, accompting it a great dishonour for suche as were descended of noble parentage to be constrayned to get theyr liuing with the labour of theyr handes, which only appertayned to plowmen, & such other of the base degree as were borne to trauayle for the mayntenance of the nobilitie, & to serue at their commaundement by order of their birth, and in no wise after such sorte to be made in maner equall with them in state and condition of life. And further they murmured closely amongst themselues, how the king was onely become freend vnto the cõmons & clergie of his realme, hauing no respect to the nobilitie, but rather declared himselfe to be an vtter enimie therof, so ỹ he was vnworthy to haue the rule of the nobles & gentlemẽ, onlesse he knew better what belonged to their degree. This murmuring did spred not only among them in the Iles, but also through all the other partes of his realme, so that they ceassed not to speake very euill of the gouernment of things. In the meane time the king fell into a languishing disease, not so greeuous as strange, for that none of his Phisitions coulde perceyue what to make of it. For there was seene in him no token, that either choler, melancolie, flegme, or any other vicious humor did any thing abounde, whereby his body should be brought into such a decay & cõsumptiõ (so as there remayned vnneth any thing vpon him saue skin & bone:) & sithence it appeared manifestly by all outward signes & tokens, that natural moisture did nothing faile in ỹ vital spirits: his colour also was freshe & fayre to behold, with such liuelinesse of lookes, that more was not to be wished for: he had also a temperate desire & appetite to his meate & drinke, but yet could he not sleepe in the night time by any prouocatiõs that could be deuised, but still fell into exceeding sweates, which by no meanes might be restreyned. The Physitions perceyuing all theyr medicines to wante the effect, yet to put him in some comfort of help, declared vnto him that they would sende for some cũning Phisitions into forayne parties, who haply being inured with such kind of diseases, should easily cure him, namely so soone as the spring of the yeare was once come, whiche of it self should help much therevnto. Howbeit ỹ king though he had small hope of recouerie, yet had he still a diligent care to the due administration of his lawes and good orders of his realme, deuising oft with his councel about the same: but yet whẽ it was vnderstood into what a perillous sickenesse he was fallen, there were no small number that cõtemning the authoritie of the magistrates, began to practise a rebellion. And amõgst the chiefest were those of Murrayland, who seyng sundry of the kings officers began to rage in moste cruell wise against all such as were not consenting to their misordered tumult. The kings phisitions forbad in any wise, that the king shoulde be aduertised of such businesse, for doubte of encreasing his sickenesse with trouble of minde about the same. But about that present time there was a murmuring amongst the people, how the king was vexed with no naturall sickenesse, but by

The rebel was kept frõ the kings knowledg

by ſorcery and Magicall arte, practiſed by a ſort of Witches dwelling in a towne of Murrayland, called Fores. Wherevpon albeit, the Authour of this ſecrete talke was not knowen, yet being brought to the kings eare, it cauſed him to ſende forthwith certaine wittie perſons thither to enquyre of the truth. They that were thus ſent, diſſembling the cauſe of theyr iourney, were receyued in the darke of the night into the caſtell of Fores by the lieutenant of the ſame, called Donwald, who continuing faithful to the king, had kepte that caſtell againſt the rebelles to the kings vſe. Vnto him therefore theſe meſſengers declared the cauſe of theyr cõming, requiring his ayde for the accompliſhment of the kings pleaſure. The ſouldiers whiche lay there in gariſon had an inkeling that there was ſome ſuch mater in hand as was talked of amongſt the people, by reaſon that one of them kept as cõcubine a yong womã which was doughter to one of ẏ witches as his paramour, who told him the whole maner vſed by hir mother & other hir cõpanions, with ẏ intent alſo, which was to make away the king. The ſouldier hauing learned this of his leman, told the ſame to his fellowes, who made reporte therof to Donewald, & he ſhewed it to the kings meſſengers, & therwith ſent for the yõg damoſell which the ſouldier kept, as then being within the caſtell, & cauſed hir vpon ſtreyt examination to cõfeſſe the whole mater as ſhe had ſeene & knew: wherevpon learning by hir cõfeſſiõ in what houſe in the towne it was where they wrought theyr miſchecuous miſterie, he ſent forth ſouldiers, about the midſt of the night, who breaking into ẏ houſe, found one of the Witches roſting vpon a woodden broche an image of waxe at the fire, reſembling in ech feature the kings perſon, made & deuiſed as is to be thought, by craft & arte of the Deuill: an other of thẽ ſat reciting certain wordes of enchauntment, & ſtill baſted the image with a certaine licour very buſily. The ſouldiers finding thẽ occupied in this wiſe, toke thẽ togither with the image, & led thẽ into the caſtell, where being ſtreitly examined for what purpoſe they went about ſuch maner of enchantmẽt, they anſwered, to the end to make away ẏ king: for as ẏ image did waſt afore the fire, ſo did the bodie of the king breake forth in ſweate. And as for the wordes of enchauntment, they ſerued to keepe him ſtill waking frõ ſleepe, ſo that as the waxe euer melted, ſo did the kings fleſh: by which meanes it ſhould haue come to paſſe, that when ẏ waxe were once cleane cõſumed, the death of the king ſhould immediatly follow. So were they taught by euill ſpirites, & hyred to worke the feat by the nobles of Murrayland. The ſtanders by that herd ſuch an abhominable tale told by theſe Witches, ſtreight wayes brake the image, & cauſed ẏ Witches (according as they had well deſerued) to bee burnt to death. It was ſayd that the king, at the very ſame time that theſe things were a doyng within the caſtell of Fores, was deliuered of his languor, and ſlepte that night without any ſweate breaking forth vpon him at all, and the next day being reſtored to his ſtrength, was able to do any maner of thing that lay in man to do, as though he had not bene ſicke before any thing at all. But how ſoeuer it came to paſſe, truth it is that when he was reſtored to his perfect health, he gathered a power of men, and with the ſame went into Murrayland againſt the rebels there, and chaſing them from thence, he purſued them into Roſſe, & from Roſſe into Cathneſe, where apprehending them, he brought them backe vnto Fores, and there cauſed them to be hanged vpon gallowes and gybettes. Amongſt them there were alſo certaine yong Gentlemen right beautifull and goodly perſonages, being neare of kinne vnto Donewald captaine of the Caſtell, and had bene perſwaded to be partakers with the other rebelles more through the fraudulent coũſell of diuers wicked perſons than of theyr owne accorde: Wherevpon the foreſayde Donewald lamenting theyr caſe, made earneſt labour and ſuyte to the king to haue begged theyr pardon, but hauing a playne deniall, he conceyued ſuche an inwarde malice towardes the king, (though he ſhewed it not outwardly at the firſte) that the ſame continued ſtill boyling in his ſtomake, and ceaſed not, till through ſetting on of his wife and in reuenge of ſuche vnthankefulneſſe, he founde meanes to murder the king within the foreſayd Caſtell of Fores where he vſed to ſoiourne, for the king beyng in that countrey, was accuſtomed to lie moſt cõmonly within the ſame caſtell, hauing a ſpeciall truſt in Donewald, as a man whom he neuer ſuſpected: but Donwald not forgetting the reproche whiche his linage had ſuſteyned by the execution of thoſe his kinſmen, whome the king for a ſpectacle to the people had cauſed to be hanged, could not but ſhew manifeſt tokens tokens of great griefe at home amongst his familie: which his wife perceyuing, ceassed not to trauayle with him, till she vnderstood what the cause was of his displeasure. Whiche at length when she had learned by his owne relation, she as one that bare no lesse malice in hyr harte towardes the king, for the like cause on hyr behalfe than hir husband did for his frendes, counselled him (sith the king oftentimes vsed to lodge in his house without any garde aboute him, other than the garyson of the castell, whiche was wholy at his commaundement) to make him away, and shewed him the meanes whereby he might soonest accomplishe it. Donwalde thus being the more kindled in wrath by the wordes of his wife, determined to follow hyr aduise in the execution of so haynous an acte. Whereupon deuising with himselfe for a while, whiche way he might best accomplishe his cursed intention, at length he gate opportunitie and sped his purpose as followeth. It chanced, that the king vpon the day before he purposed to departe forth of the Castell, was long in his oratorie at his prayers, and there continued till it was late in the night, at the last comming forth he called suche afore him, as had faithfully serued him in pursute and apprehention of the rebelles, and giuing them hartie thankes, he bestowed sundry honorable giftes amongst them, of the which number Donwald was one, as he that had bene euer accompted a moste faithfull seruaunt to the king. At length hauing talked with them a long time, he got him into his priuie chamber, only with two of his chamberlaynes, who hauing brought him to bedde came forth againe, and then fell to banqueting with Donewald and his wife, who had prepared diuers delicate dishes, and sundry sorts of drinke for theyr arere supper or collation, whereat they sat vp so long, till they had charged theyr stomakes with suche full gorges, that theyr heades were no sooner got to the pyllow, but a sleepe they were so fast, that a man might haue remoued the chāber ouer them, rather than to haue awaked thē out of theyr drunken sleepe. Then Donewalde though he abhorred the act greatly in his harte, yet through instigation of his wife, he called foure of his seruants vnto him (whom he had made priuie to his wicked intent before, and framed to his purpose with large giftes) and now declaring vnto them, after what sorte they should worke the feate, they gladly obeyed his instructions, and speedily going about the murder, they enter the chamber (in which the king lay) a litle before cockes crow, where they secretely cut his throte as he lay sleeping, without any buskling at all: and immediatly by a posterne gate they caried forth the dead body into the fieldes, and throwing it vpon an horse there prouided ready for that purpose, they conuey it vnto a place, distant aboute two myles from the castell, where they stayed, and gat certayne labourers to helpe them to turne the course of a litle riuer running through the fieldes there, and digging a deepe hole in the chanell, they burie the body in the same, ramming it vp with stones and gravel so closely, that letting the water into the right course agayne, no man coulde perceyue that any thing had bene newly digged there. This they did by order appointed them by Donewald as is reported, for that the bodie shoulde not be founde, and by bleeding (when Donewald shoulde be present) declare him to be giltie of the murder. For that suche an opinion men haue, that the dead corps of any man being slayne, will bleede abundantly if the murderer be present: but for what consideration soeuer they buried him there, they had no sooner finished the worke, but that they slew them, whose help they vsed herein, and streightwayes thereupon fledde into Orkney.

Donewald about the time that the murder was a doing, got him amongst them that kepte the watch, and so continewed in companie with them al the residue of the night. But in the morning when the noyse was reysed in the kings chamber how the king was slaine, his body conueyed away, and the bed all berayed with bloud, he with the watche ran thither as though he had knowen nothing of the mater, and breaking into the chamber, and finding cakes of bloud in the bed & on the floore about the sides of it, he forthwith slewe the chamberlaynes, as giltie of that haynous murder, and then like a madde man running to and fro, her ransacked euery corner within the castell, as though it had bene to haue seene if he might haue founde either the body or any of ỹ murtherers hid in any priuie place: but at lēgth cōming to the posterne gate, & finding it open, he burdened the chāberlaines whom he had slaine with al the fault, they hauing the keyes of the gates cōmitted to their keeping al the night, and therefore it could not be otherwise (sayde he) but that they were of counsel in the committing of that moste detestable murder. Finally suche was his ouer earnest diligence in the inquisition and triall of the offendours herein, that some of the Lordes began to mislike the mater, and to smell forth shrewed tokens, that he shoulde not be altogither cleare himselfe: but for so much as they were in that countrey, where her had the whole rule, what by reason of his frendes and authoritie togither, they doubted to vtter what they thought till time and place shoulde better serue thereunto, and hereupon got them away euery man to his home. committed, there appeared no sunne by day, nor Mone by night in any parte of the realme, but stil was the skie couered with cõtinual clowdes, and sometimes suche outragious windes arose with lightnings and tempestes, that the people were in great feare of present destruction.

IN the meane time Culene prince of Cumberland, the sonne as I haue sayde of king Indulph, accompanied with a great number of Lordes and Nobles of the realme, came vnto Scone, there to receyue the crowne according to the maner: but at his comming thither, he demaũded of the Bishops what the cause should be of such vntemperate weather. Who made answere, that vndoubtedly almightie God shewed himselfe thereby to be offended moste highly for that wicked murther of king Duffe, and surely onlesse the offendours were tried forth and punished for that deede, the realme shoulde feele the iust indignation of the deuine iudgement for omitting suche punishment as was due for so greeuous an offence.

Culene hereupon requyred the bishops to appoint publike processiõs, fastings and other godly exercises to be vsed of the priestes and people, through all parties of the realme, for the appeasing of Gods wrath in this behalfe, and in suche sorte and maner as in semblable cases, the vse and custome in those dayes was. Hee himselfe made a solenne vowe, confirming it with a like othe before all the peeres and nobles there assembled, that he woulde not ceasse till he had reuenged the death of king Duffe vpon the false inhabitauntes of Murrayland to the ensample of all other.

The multitude being present, getting them to armure followed their prince, taking his iourney without further delay towardes Murrayland, the inhabitauntes of whiche region hearing of his approch and the cause of his cõming, were stryken with exceeding feare, but namely Donewalde beyng giltie in conscience, doubted least if he were put to torture, he should be enforced to confesse the truthe, wherevpon without making his wyfe priuie to his departure, or any other of his family, saue a fewe suche as he toke with him, he secretely got him to the mouthe of the ryuer of Spey, where finding a shippe ready, he wente a borde the same, purposing to haue fledde his wayes by sea into Norway: for this is the peculiar propertie of a giltie conscience to be afrayde of all things, and eyther in gesture or countenaunce to bewray it selfe, accompting slight moste sure if occasion may serue thereto. For this Donewalde, whome no man (though some partely suspected him) might wel haue burdened with the crime of his Maisters death (by reason of his faithfull seruice shewed towardes him afore time) had he not thus sought to haue auoyded the countrey, was now detected of manifest treason, euery man detesting his abhominable facte, and wishing him to be ouerwhelmed in the raging floudes, so to pay the due punishment, whiche of right hee ought, for his vile treason in murthering his naturall Lorde.

Donewalde getteth him secretly away.

The murther of the king is reueled.

Culene being hereof aduertised, passed ouer Spey water, and taking the castell of Fores, slew all that he founde therein, and put the house to sacke and fire. Donewaldes wife with his three daughters were taken: for Culene commaunded, that who so euer coulde light vpon them, shoulde in any wise saue theyr liues, and bring them vnto him. Whiche beyng done, hee had them to the racke, where the mother vpon hyr examination confessed the whole mater, how by hyr procuremẽt chiefly hyr husbãd was moued to cause the deede to be done, who they were that by his commaundement did it, and in what place they had buried the bodie. Here woulde the multitude haue runne vpon hyr and torne hyr in peeces, but that they were restrayned by commaundement of an officer at armes. The king with the residue for that night rested themselues, and in the morning toke order for prouision of all things necessarie to take vp the bodie of king Duffe, and then to conuey it vnto Colmekill, there to be buried amongst his predecessours. But as they were busie here about, worde came that the traytour Donewalde was by shipwracke caste vpon the shore within foure miles of the Castell, as though he were by Gods prouision brought backe into his owne countrey to suffer worthy punishment for his demerites. Wherevpon the inhabitaunts of the places next adioyning, toke him and kepte him fast bound till they knewe further of the kings pleasure: who right gladde of the newes, sente forth immediatly a bande of men to fetche him. They that were sent did as they were commaunded: and beyng vnneth returned, there came in diuers Lordes of Rosse, bringing with them Donewaldes foure seruaunts whiche (as before is sayde) did execute the murder. Thus all the offendours beyng brought togither vnto the place where the murder was bothe contriued and executed ecuted, they were arrayned, condemned, and put to death in maner as followeth, to the great reioycing of the people that beheld the same. They were firste scourged by the hangman, and then bowelled, their entrailes being throwen into a fire and brente, the other partes of theyr bodies were cut into quarters, and sent vnto the chiefest Cities of the realme, and there set vp aloste vpon the gates and highest towers, for ensample sake to all suche as should come after, how hay- 10 nous a thing it is to pollute theyr handes in the sacred bloud of theyr prince. This dreadfull end had Donewald with his wife before he saw any sunne after the murder was committed, and that by the appointment of the most righteous God, the creatour of that heauenly planet and all other thinges, who suffereth no crime to be vnreuenged. Those that were the takers of the murderers were highly rewarded for their paynes & trauaple therein sustayned, being exempt from 20 charges of going forth into the warres: and also of all maner of payments belonging to publike ducties, as tributes and suche like.

These thinges being thus ordered, the body of king Duffe was take vp, and in most pompous maner conueyed vnto Colmekill, accompanied all the way by Culene, and a great multitude of Lordes both spirituall and temporal, with other of the meaner estates. There be ỹ haue written how his bodie (though it had layne .vj. moneths vnder the grouud) was nothing empayred eyther in colour or otherwise, when it was taken vp, but was founde as wholle and sound as though it had bene yet aline, the skarres of the woundes onely excepted. But to proceede, so sone as it was brought aboue the grouud, the ayre began to cleare vp, and the sunne brake forth, shining more brighter than it had bene seene afore time to any of the beholders remembrance. And that which put men in most deepe cõsideration of al, was the sight of manifold flowers, which sprang forth ouerall the fieldes immediatly thereupon, clene contrary to the time & season of the yeare. Within a fewe yeares after, there was a bridge made ouer the water in the same place, where the bodie had bene buried, & a village builded at the one end of the bridge, whiche is called vnto this day, Killflos, that is to say, the church of flowers: taking that name of the wonder there happened at the remouing of the kings bodie, as the same authours woulde seeme to meane. But there is now or was of late a rich abbey, standing with a right fayre church, cõsecrate in the honour of the virgine Marie. Monstrous sightes also that were seene within the Scottishe kingdome that yeare were these, horses in Lothian being of singuler beautie and swiftnesse, did eate their owne flesh, & would in no wise taste any other meate.

The beginning of Culenes reigne begonne with rightuous execution of iustice, promised a hope of an other maner of prince, than by the administration whiche followed he declared himself to be: for shortly after lewsing the reyne of lasciuious wãtonnesse to the youth of his realme through giuing of lewde ensample by his owne disordered doings, all suche as were enclined vnto licentious liuing followed. theyr sensuall lustes, and vnbrydeled libertie abandoning all feare of correction more than euer had bene seene or heard of in any other age. For suche was the negligence of the king, or rather mayntenaunce of misordered persons, that what so euer any of the nobilitie did eyther against Merchauntes, Preistes, or any of the commons, though the same were neuer so greate an iniurie, there was no punishment vsed agaynst them: so that all men looked for some commotion in the common wealth thereupon to ensue, if there were not other order prouided therefore in time. The auncient peeres of the realme also beyng greeued thereat, spared not to admonishe the king of his dutie, declaring vnto him into what daunger the realme was likely to fall through his negligent behauiour. Culene aunswered them, that he wiste well inough howe yonge menne were not at the firste, bone graue and sage personages lyke to them with hoary heades: wherefore theyr firste youthfull yeares conlde not be so stable as they might be hereafter by olde age and continuaunce of time: but as for suche rigorous extremitie as diuers of his elders had vsed towards theyr subiects, he minded not as he said to folow, being taught by their ensample (as by the kings, Indulph, Duffe & suche other) into what daunger he might incurre by such sharpe seueritie shewed in the gouernment of the estate. Wherevpon he was determined so to rule as he might giue cause rather to be beloued than feared, which was the onely meane (as he thought) to retayne his subiectes in dewe and most faithfull obedience. This answeare was such, that although it seemed nothyng agreeable for the preſeruation of the publike ſtate in quiet reſte and ſaftie, yet was there no man by reaſon of his regall authoritie that durſt reproue the ſame, but diuers there were that prayſed him therein, as thoſe that hated all ſuche as loued the vpright adminiſtration of iuſtice. But ſuche auncient counſellours as had truely ſerued in rule of the cõmon wealth in the dayes of the former kings Indulph and Duffe, miſliking the ſtate of that preſent world (wherein the youth of the realme, namely al ſuch as were deſcended of noble parentage, & vſed to be about the king, followed their wilfull and ſenſuall luſtes, growing euery day through want of correction to be worſe & worſe) departed from the court, and withdrew to theyr homes without medling any further with the publike adminiſtration. In whoſe place there crept in other, that with their flatterie corrupted the reſidue of ſuche ſparkes of good inclination as yet remained in the king, if any were at all, in ſo muche that in the ende he meaſured ſupreme felicitie by the plentifull enioying of voluptuous pleaſures and bodily luſtes. He fancied onely ſuche as coulde deuiſe prouocations thereunto, & in filling the belly with exceſſe of coſtly meates and drinkes, thoſe that coulde excell other were chiefly cheriſhed & moſt highly of him eſteemed. Herewithall he was giuen vnto leachery beyond all the termes of reaſon, ſparing neyther mayde, widowe, nor wife, profane nor religious, ſiſter nor daughter (for all was one with him) that to heare of ſuche vilanie and violent forcings as were practiſed by him and his familiers, it would lothe any honeſt harte to vnderſtande or remember. He was ſo farre paſte all ſhame in this behalfe, that when his lecherous luſte by to muche copulation was ſo tyred that he might no more exerciſe his former lewdeneſſe, he toke ſpeciall pleaſure yet to behold other to do it in his preſence, that his decayed luſt might be the more ſtyred vp with ſight of ſuch filthineſſe. This abhominable trade of life he practiſed for the ſpace of .xij. yeares togither, giuing occaſion of muche ſpoile, ruine, manſlaughter, forcings, and raniſhments of women with all ſuch kinde of wicked & diueliſh trãſgreſſiõs: no execution of lawes (inſtituted by authoritie of the former kings, for reſtraint of ſuch flagitious offences) being put in vre, through negligẽce of this monſtruous creature. So farre forth alſo encreaſed the libertie of theeues, robbers and other offendours, maintayned by ſuche of the nobilitie as conſented to theyr vnlawfull doings, & were partakers with them in the ſame, that if any man went aboute to withſtand them, or refuſed to accompliſh their requeſtes and demaundes, he ſhoulde be ſpoyled of all that hee had, and happely haue his houſe brente ouer his head, or otherwiſe be miſuſed in ſuch outragious & violent ſorte, that it would greeue all thoſe that had any zele to iuſtice, to heare of ſuche enormities as were dayly practiſed in that countrey. Howbeit at length yet the death of king Culene, brought an end to all ſuch wicked dealings: for falling into a filthy diſeaſe (through abuſe of exceſſiue drinking and leacherie,) called the waſting of nature, he conſumed away in ſuch wiſe by rotting of his fleſhe, that he appeared more like vnto a dead carcaſſe, than vnto a liuely creature, in ſo much that his owne ſeruaunts began to abhorre him. Wherevpon the Lordes and other Honorable perſonages of the realme vnderſtanding his caſe, cauſed a parliament to be ſummoned at Scone, where they determined to depoſe king Culene, and appoynt ſome other (whom they ſhould iudge moſt meeteſt) to reygne in his place. Culene alſo not knowing wherefore this councell was called, as he was going thitherwardes, at Meffen caſtell being almoſte in the midde way of his iourney, was murthered by one Cadhard the Thane of ther vnto Duffe, king of the realme. In the beginning of his reygne, he had inough to do to reduce the people from theyr wilde & ſauage kinde of life (into the whiche they were fallen through the negligent gouernment of his predeceſſour) vnto theyr former trade of ciuill demeanour. For the nature of the Scottiſhmen is, that firſte the nobles, and thē all the reſidue of the people transforme themſelues vnto the vſage of their prince: therefore did Kenneth in his owne trade of liuing ſhewe an enſample of chaſtitie, ſobrietie, liberalitie, and modeſtie, miſuſing himſelfe in no kinde of vice, but refrayning himſelfe from the ſame: hee baniſhed all ſuche kinde of perſons as might prouoke eyther him or other vnto any lewde or wanton pleaſures. He mainteyned amitie aſwell with ſtraungers as with his owne people, puniſhing moſt rigorouſly all ſuche as ſought to moue ſeditiō by any maner of meane. He toke buſie care in cauſing the people to auoyde ſlouth, and to applie themſelues in honeſt exerciſes, iudging as the truth is, that to be the way to aduaunce the common wealth from decay to a floriſhing ſtate. Thus when he had ſomewhat reformed the miſorders of his ſubiectes, he endeuored himſelfe by all meanes hee coulde deuiſe to puniſhe offendours againſt the lawes and wholeſome ordinances of the realme, and to purge all his dominions of theeues, robbers, and other ſuche as went aboute to diſquiet common peace. At Lanerk, a towne in Kyle, was a ſeſſions appointed to be kept for execution of iuſtice, where certaine offendours were ſummoned to appeare: but at their comming thither, perceyuing that ſuch manifeſt proofes would be brought againſt them of ſuche crimes as they had committed, that they were not able to excuſe the ſame, through perſwaſion of diuers noble men vnto whom they were a kinne, they fled ſecretely theyr wayes, ſome into the Weſterne Iſles, and ſome into other places, where they thought moſt expediēt for ſafegard of their liues.

The king perceyuing that through the diſloyall meanes of the lordes his purpoſe was ſo hindered that he might not miniſter iuſtice according to the inſtitution of his lawes, he diſſembled his wrath for a time, & licenced euery man to depart to theyr houſes, his traine onely excepted. Then went he into Galloway to viſite Saint Ninian for performance of his vowe, which he had made ſo to do. Here he inuented (by conference which he had with ſome of his priuie counſell) a deuiſe, whereby he might fetche againe the offendours vnto iudgement: but this was kepte cloſe till the yeare following, for doubte leaſt if thoſe lordes whiche bare them good will had come to any inckling thereof, they woulde by vttring it haue diſappointed his purpoſe. At length, after a yeare was paſſed, he appointed all the Lordes & Nobles of his realme to aſſemble at Scone, as though it had bene to haue cōmuned about ſome weightie affayres touching the ſtate of the realme. The night then before they ſhould come togither into the counſell chamber, he cauſed by ſome of his faythfull miniſters, a ſorte of armed men to be layde cloſe in a ſecrete place, with cōmaundement giuen to their capitaine, that in no wiſe he ſhould ſtirre with his bande till the nexte day, that all the Lordes were aſſembled togither, and then without delay to execute that whiche ſhould be giuen him in cōmaundement. On the morow after the nobles cōming togither into the counſell chamber, they had no ſooner take their places, euery one according to his degree about the king, but ỹ the armed men before mēcioned came ruſhing into the houſe, placing thēſelues round about them that were ſet according to the order preſcribed by former appointmēt.

The Lordes with this preſent ſight being much amazed, beheld one an other, but durſt not ſpeake a worde. Then the king perceyuing their feare began to declare vnto thē the whole cauſe of his calling them to counſell at that time, & why he had appointed thoſe armed mē to be there attendant. The effect of his oration there made vnto thē was, that he had not cauſed thoſe armed mē to come into the chāber for any harme, ment towardes any of their perſons, but only for the publike preſeruation of the realme. For almuch as they knew, there was one kinde of people muche noyſome vnto the cōmon wealth, being cōfederate as it were togither by one conſent to exerciſe al ſortes of miſchief & oppreſſiō againſt the poore people, as to robbe, ſpoyle, & take from them all ỳ they had, to raviſh their wiues, maides, & daughters, and ſome times to brenne theyr houſes: the which licencious libertie in ſuch wicked perſons, through want of due puniſhment in the dayes of king Eulene, what daunger it had brought vnto the whole ſtate of the Scottiſhe cōmon wealth, there was none but might wel vnderſtād it. For ſith it was ſo that ỳ Lordes & other high eſtates liued by the trauaile of the commons, then if the ſame commons ſhoulde in any wiſe decay, the Lordes & ſuch other high eſtates could in nowiſe proſper: for if the labourer through iniurie of the robber were forced to giue ouer his labour, where ſhould the Lord or Gentleman haue wherevpon to liue? ſo that thoſe whiche robbed the huſbandman, robbed alſo the Lorde and gentleman: and they that ſought to mainteyne ſuche loytering perſons as vſed to robbe the poore man, went about the deſtruction both of king, lord & gentleman, yea and finally of the vniuerſall ſtate of the whole cōmon wealth. Therfore he that loued the cōmon wealth would not ſeeke onely to defende the cōmons from ſuch iniuries as theeues & robbers dayly offred thē, but alſo would helpe to ſee iuſt execution done vpon the ſame theeues & robbers, according to ỳ laudable lawes & cuſtomes of the lande. The laſte yeare (ſayde he) you your ſelfes remember (I thinke) how I purpoſed by your helpe and counſell to haue proceeded by order of the lawes againſt all enimies and perturbers of the peace. At Laynrike was the day appointed for them to haue appeared, but there was not one of them that would come in, but contemptuouſly diſobeying our cōmaundemēt kept them away, by whoſe counſel I know not. But I haue bene enformed by ſome howe diuers of you fauouring thoſe rebelles, by reaſon they were of your lynage, were of counſell with them in withdrawing themſelues ſo from iudgement. The oftē ſending of meſſengers betwixt them & you, well neare perſwaded vs to thinke that this reporte was true. But yet notwithſtanding I haue put away all ſuche ſiniſter ſuſpicion out of my heade, wiſhing you (as I truſte you bee) voyde of all ſuche diſſimulation. And nowe I requyre you not as fautours of the rebelles, but as defendours of the common wealth, though happely ſomewhat ſlacke heretofore in diſcharge of your duties, to ſhew your ſelues ſuch in helping to apprehende the offenders, as ỳ the world may perceyue you to haue made full ſatiſfaction for your fault & errour, if before in you there were any. In the end he was playne with them, & told them flatly that they ſhould aſſure thēſelues, to haue thoſe armed mē which they ſaw there preſent, to be continually attendant about thē, til he might haue all the rebelles at commaundement.

The Lordes hauing heard the kings ſpeach, & perceyuing what his meaning was, firſte partly excuſed themſelues ſo wel as they might of their cloked diſſimulation, and then fallyng downe vppon theyr knees afore him, beſought him to put away all diſpleaſure out of his minde, and clearely to pardon them, if in any wiſe they had offended his maieſtie, promiſing that they would with all diligence & faithfulneſſe accompliſhe his deſire, in cauſing the offenders to be brought in vnto iudgement: and till the time that this were brought to paſſe, they were well contented to remaine in ſuch place where he ſhould appoint thē to abide. The counſell then being broken vp, the king with thoſe Lordes paſſing ouer the riuer of Tay, wēt vnto Bertha, which towne during the kings abode in ỹ ſame was ſtreightly kept with watche and warde, that no creature might enter or go forth without knowledge of the officers appointed by the king to take heede therevnto. If any idle perſon were eſpied abroad in the ſtreetes, ſtraightwayes the ſergeants would haue him to warde. The nobles remayned in the kings houſe or in other lodgings to them aſſigned, procuring by their freendes & miniſters to haue ſuche offenders as vſed to robbe & ſpoyle the huſband man, apprehended & brought to the king vnto Bertha, there to receyue iudgement & punition according to theyr demerites: for ſo they perceyued they muſt needes worke, if they minded the ſafegard of their owne liues. Herof it followed alſo, that within ſhort ſpace there were brought vnto Bertha, to the number neare hande of. v. C. of ſuche idle loyterers as vſed to liue by ſpoyle & pillage, many of them being diſcēded of famous houſes, all whiche companie being condemned for theyr offences to die, were hanged vpon gybets aboute the towne, and commaundement gyuen by the king, that theyr bodies ſhoulde not be taken downe, but there to hang ſtill, to giue enſample to other, what the ende was of all ſuche as by wrongfull meanes ſought to liue idelly, by other mens labours. The rebelles being thus executed, king Kenneth licenſed the Lordes to departe to their owne houſes, exhorting them to remember their dueties towardes the common wealth, and to ſtudie for preſeruation of peace and quietneſſe according to their vocation. After this the realme continued in quietneſſe without any forraine or inwarde trouble for the ſpace of certaine yeares following, and had remayned in the ſame ſtate ſtill, if the Danes had not made a new inuaſion, who being ſore grieued in their hartes for ſuche diſpleaſures as they had ſuſteyned in Albion determined now with great aſſuraunce to reuenge the ſame. Wherevpon gathering an huge multitude of men togither, they were embarqued in veſſels prouided for them, and ſayling forth, they purpoſed to take lande vpon the next coaſt of Albion where they ſhoulde chaunce to arriue: and being once a lande, to deſtroy all before them, except where the people ſhould ſubmitte and yeelde themſelues vnto them. This nauie being once got abroade, within a ſhort time arriued at that point of lande in Angus, whiche is called the red Brayes, or Read head, not farre from the place where the Abbey of Abirbroth, or Abirbrothok was afterward founded. Here the Daniſh fleete first caſting ancre, their captaines fel in cōſultatiō what they were beſt to do. Some of thē were of this opinion, that it was not moſte expedient for them to land in that place, but rather to paſſe from thence into England: for at the Scottiſh mens hands being poore, & yet a fierce and hardy natiō, there was ſmal good to be got, being therto accuſtomed to giue moe ouerthrowes, than they cōmonly receyued. Againe the ſoyle of the countrey was but barrayne, in maner ouergrowē w̄ woodes (as it was in deede in thoſe dayes) fewe townes & ſmall habitations, & thoſe ſo poore, that no man knowing the ſame, woulde vouchſafe to fight for any poſſeſſion of thē: wherein contrariwiſe England (that part namely which lieth towards the ſouth) was ſo fruitfull of corne & cattell, ſo riche of mines & repleniſhed with ſo many notable cities & townes inhabited with men of great wealth and ſubſtance, that few were to be foūd cōparable thereto. So that the mater being well conſidered, they could not do better than to ſayle into Kent, where they might be ſure of riche ſpoyle without any great reſiſtance. Other there were that held how this iourney was attempted by the counſell of their ſuperiours, only to reuēge ſuch iniuries as the Daniſh nation had receyued at the hāds of the Scottiſhmen, & not to attaine riches or any dominion. The Scots alſo being a cruell people & ready to fight in defence of other mens poſſeſſiōs (as in the warres of Northumberland it well appeared) woulde ſurely be ready to come to the ayd of the Engliſhmē into Kent, euen ſo ſone as it was knowen that the Danes were a lande in thoſe parties, ſo that by this meanes they ſhould be conſtreyned to haue to do both with the Scottiſhmen and Engliſhmen, if they firſte wente into Kent, where if they ſet a lande here in Scotland, they ſhoulde encounter but only with the Scots. Therfore the beſt were accōding to their firſte determination to lande amongſt the Scottes, ſith chaunce had brought them vnto thoſe coaſtes, adding that when they had ſomewhat abated the arrogant preſumptiō of theyr enimies there, then might they paſſe more ſafely into England after a lucky beginning of fyre and ſworde, to proceede againſt their aduerſaries in thoſe parties as fortune ſhould leade them. This deuiſe was allowed of the greateſt number, being gladde to gette beſide the water. walles of a towne in Angus called then Celurke, but now Mountros. Here the Danes taking land, put the inhabitaunts of the countrey there aboutes in greate feare, ſo that with all ſpeede for their ſafegarde, they gette them into Mountros, but the towne being quickely aſſailed of the Danes, was taken, put to the ſacke, & after raſed Caſtell and all to the bare ground, not one lyuing creature beyng lefte aliue of all ſuche as were founde within the ſame. From thence, the army of the Danes paſſed throughe Angus vnto the riuer of Tay, all the people of the countreys by the whiche they marched fleing afore them. King Kenneth at the ſame time lay at Sterlyng, where hearing of theſe grieuous newes, determined forthwith to reyſe his people, and to go againſt the enimies. The aſſemble of the Scottiſhe army was appointed to be at the place where the riuer of Erne falleth into the riuer of Tay. Here when they were comen togither in great numbers at the day appointed, the day next following, worde was brought to the king, that the Danes hauing paſſed ouer Tay, were come before the towne of Bertha, and had layde ſiege to the ſame. Then without further delay, he rayſed with the whole armie, and marched ſtreight towardes his enimies, comming that night vnto Loncarte a village not farre diſtant from the riuer of Tay, famous euer after, by reaſon of the batayle fought then neare vnto the ſame. The Danes hearing that the Scottes were come, detracted no time, but forthwith prepared to giue battayle.

Kenneth as ſoone as the ſunne was vp, beholding the Danes at hand, quickly brought his armie into order. Then requyring them earneſtly to ſhewe theyr manhood, he promiſeth to releaſſe them of all tributes and payments due to the kings cofers for the ſpace of fiue yeares next enſuyng: and beſides that he offered the ſumme of tenne pound, or els landes ſo muche worth in value to euery one of his armie, that ſhould bring him the head of a Dane. He willed them therefore to fight manfully, and to remember there was no place to attaine mercie: for eyther muſte they trie it out by dinte of ſworde, or els if they fledde, in the ende to looke for preſent death at the enimies handes, who would not ceaſſe till time they had founde them forth, into what place ſoeuer they reſorted for refuge if they chanced to be vanquiſhed. The Scots being not a litle encouraged by the kings wordes, kepte their order of bataile according as they were appointed, ſtil looking when the onſet ſhould be giuen. Malcolme Duffe prince of Cumberland led the right wing of the Scots: & Duncane lieutenãt of Atholl the left: king Kenneth himſelf gouerned the battell. The order of the Scottiſhe batayle aray.

The enimies on the other parte had taken theyr ground at the foote of a litle mountaine right fore aneynſt the Scottiſh campe: & thus bothe the armies ſtoode ready arãged in the field, beholding either other a good ſpace, till at length the Scots deſirous of batayle, and doubting leſt the Danes would not come forth vnto any euen grounde, aduaunced forewarde with ſomewhat more haſte than the caſe requyred, beginning the batayle with ſhotte and throwing of dartes right freſhly. The Danes being backed with the mountaine, were conſtreyned to leaue the ſame, and with al ſpeede to come forewarde vpon their enimies, that by ioyning they might auoyde the daunger of the Scottiſhmens arrowes and dartes: by this meanes therefore they came to hand ſtrokes, in maner before the ſigne was giuen on eyther parte to the batayle. The fighte was cruell on bothe ſides: and nothing hindered the Scottes ſo muche as going about to cut off the heades of the Danes euer as they might ouercome them: whiche maner being noted of the Danes, and perceyuing that there was no hope of lyfe but in victorie, they ruſhed forth with ſuche violence vppon theyr aduerſaries, that firſte the righte, and then after the lefte winge of the Scottes, was conſtrayned to retyre and flee backe, the middle warde ſtoutly yet keeppyng theyr grounde: but the ſame The Danes had the aduantage of a litle mountayne. stood in suche daunger, being now left naked on the sides that the victorie muste needes haue remayned with the Danes, had not a renewer of the batayle come in time, by the appointment as is to be thought of almightie God. For as it chaunced there was in the nexte fielde at the same time a husbandman, with .ij. of his sonnes busie about his worke named Hay, a man strong and stiffe in making and shape of bodie, but endewed with a noble and valiant courage. This Hay beholdyng the king with the moste parte of his Nobles fightyng with greate valiauncie in the middle warde now destitute of the winges, and in greate daunger to be oppressed by the great violence of his enimies, caught a plough beame in his hande, and with the same exhorting his sonnes to do the lyke, hasted towardes the batayle, there to die rather amongst other in defence of his countrey, than to remayne alyue after the discomfiture in miserable thraldome and bondage of the cruell and moste vnmercyfull enimies. There was neare to the place of the batayle, a long lane fensed on the sides with ditches and walles made of turfe, through the whiche the Scottes whiche fledde were beaten downe by the enimies on heapes.

Hay with his two sonnes.

Hay stayed the Scottes from running away.

Here Hay with his sonnes supposing they might best stay the flight, placed themselues ouerthwarte the lane, beate them backe whome they mette fleeyng, and spared neyther friende nor foe, but downe they went all suche as came within theyr reache wherwith diuers hardy personages cried to theyr fellowes to returne backe vnto the batayle, for there was a newe power of Scottishmen come to theyr succours, by whose ayde the victorie might be easily obtayned of theyr moste cruell aduersaries the Danes: therfore might they chose whether they would be slayne of theyr owne fellowes comming to their ayde, or to returne againe to fight with the enimies. The Danes beyng here stayed in the lane by the greate valiauncie of the father and the sonnes, thought verily there had bene some great succours of Scottes come to the ayde of theyr kyng, and therevpon cealsing from further pursuyte fledde backe in greate disorder vnto the other of theyr fellowes fightyng with the middle warde of the Scottes. The Scottes also that before were chased, being encouraged herewith, pursued the Danes vnto the place of the batayle right fiercely. Wherevpon Kenneth perceyuing his people to be thus recomforted and his enimies partely abashed, called vpon his men to remember theyr dueties, and nowe sithe their aduersaries harts began (as they might perceiue) to faint, he willed them to followe vpon them manfully, which if they did he assured them that the victory vndoubtedly should be theyrs. The

The Scottes were driuen to their battell againe.

The Danes fledde towards their fellowes in great disorder.

King Kenneth called vpō his men, to remēber their dueties.

Scots encouraged with the kings wordes, layd about thē so earnestly, that in the end the Danes were constreyned to forsake the fielde, and the Scots egerly pursuyng in the chase, made great slaughter of them as they fled. This victory turned highly to the prayse of the Scottishe nobilitie, the whiche fighting in the middle warde bare still the brunt of the batayle, continuyng manfully therein euen to the ende. But Hay who in such wise (as is before mencioned) stayed them that fled, causing them to returne againe to the fielde, deserued immortall fame and commendation: for by his meanes chiefly was the victory atchieued. And therefore on the morrow after whan the spoyle of the field & of the enimies tāpe whiche they had left voyde should be deuided, the chiefest part was bestowed on him and his two sonnes, by cōsent of all the multitude, the residue being deuided amongst the souldiers and men of warre, according to ancient custome vsed amōgst this natiō. The king hauing thus vāquished his enimies, as he should enter into Bertha, caused costly robes to be offered vnto Hay & his sonnes, that being richly clad, they might be ẏ more honored of the people: but Hay refusing to chaunge his apparell, was cōtented to go with the king in his olde garments whither it pleased him to appoint. So entring with the king into Bertha, he was receiued with litle lesse honor than the king himselfe, all the people ruining forth to behold him whom they heard to haue so valiātly restored the battell, whē the field was in maner lost without hope of all recouerie. At his entring into ẏ towne he bare on his shoulder the plough beame, more honorable to him thā any sworde or battell axe might haue bene to any ẏ most valiāt warriour. Thus Hay being honored of all estates, within certaine dayes after at a councel holde at Scone it was ordeyned, that both he and his posteritie should be accepted amōgst the nūber of ẏ chiefest nobles & peares of the realme, being rewarded besides money & other great giftes with lands and reuenewes, such as he should chose sufficient for the maintenaunce of their estates. It is sayde, ẏ by counsell of his sonnes, who knew the fruitfulnesse of the soyle, he did aske so much ground in those parties where the riuer of Tay renneth by the towne of Arrole ouer agaynst Fyfe, as a Faulcone should flie ouer at one flight. Which request beyng freely graunted of the king, the place was appoynted at Inschire for the Faulcone to be caste off: the whiche taking hir flight from thence, neuer lighted til she came to a great stone neare to a village called Rosse, not passing foure myles from Dundee. By whiche meanes all that countrey whiche lieth betwixt Inschire aforesayde, and the sayd stone, (being almost .vj. myles in length, and foure in breadth) fell vnto

Hay and his ſonnes, the name of the ſtone alſo being called the Falcones ſtone to this day, doth cauſe the thing better to be beleeued, and welneare all the foreſayd ground ſtill continueth in the poſſeſſion of the Hayes, euen vnto this day. Beſides this to the further honoring of his name, the king gaue him armes three ſcutchēs gules in a field of ſiluer, a plough beame added therevnto which he vſed in ſtead of a battaile axe, when he fought ſo valiantly in defence of his Countrey. Thus had the Hayes their beginning of Nobilitie, whoſe houſe hath attayned vnto great eſtimation of honor, and hath bene decorated with the office of the Conſtableſhip of Scotlande, by the bounteous beneuolence of Kings that ſucceeded. Theſe things happened in the firſt yeare of King Kenneth. In the reſidue of the time that he raigned, though there chaunced no great buſineſſe by forraine enimies, yet by ciuill ſedition the ſtate of the realme was wonderfully diſquieted. Firſt a companie of Kernes of the weſterne Iles inuading Roſſe, to the intent to haue fetched a bootie, were met withall by the way and ouerthrowne by the inhabitants of that Countrey. After this ſturre another followed, farre more daungerous to the whole eſtate of the common wealth, reyſed by one Cruthlint, one of the chiefeſt Lords of ẏ Mernes, who was ſonne vnto a certaine Lady named Fenella, the daughter of one Cruthneth, that was gouernour of that part of Angus which lyeth betwixt the two riuers, the one called ſouth Eſke, and the other north Eſke. So it chaunced, that on a time Cruthlint came vnto the Caſtell of Delbogin to ſee his Grandfather, the ſayde Crunneth as then lying in the ſame: where vpon light occaſion a fray was begon amongeſt the ſeruing men, in the which two of Cruthlints ſeruantes fortuned to be ſlaine: which iniury when Cruthlynt declared by waye of complaynt vnto hys Grandfather, he was ſo ſlenderly heard, and anſwered in ſuch reprochful wiſe, as though he himſelfe had beene the authour of the buſineſſe: that Crunethes ſeruants perceiuing how little he was regarded of their maiſter, fell vpon him and beate him, that not without daunger of life he brake forth of their handes, and hardly eſcaped away. In his returne homewardes, he came to his mother Fenella, where ſhe lay within the Caſtell of Fetthircarn, ẏ chiefeſt fortreſſe of all the Mernes. Where being incenſed through his mothers inſtigation, being a woman of a furious nature, he attempted forthwith to be reuenged of the iniurie receyued: ſo that aſſembling a number of his friendes and kinſfolke ſo ſecretly as he might together, with a band of the inhabitāts of ẏ Mernes he entreth into Angus, and cōming vnto the caſtell of Delbogin in the night ſeaſon, was ſuffred to enter by the keepers of the gate nothing ſuſpecting any treaſon in the worlde, by reaſon whereof was Crunneth ſodainly oppreſſed, the houſe ſacked and raſed, not one that was founde within the ſame being left aliue. The ſpoyle alſo was deuided by Cruthlynt amongſt them which came with him. The next day likewiſe he forrayed the Countrey all there aboutes, returning home with a great bootie.

Thus did the people of thoſe two Countreys purſue the warre one againſt another a certaine time, with dayly incurſions and waſtings of eyther others countreys, in ſuch cruel wiſe, that it was thought the one of them muſt needes ſhortly come vnto bitter deſtruction, if ſpeedie remedie were not the ſooner prouided. miſchiefe and great trouble which was fallen out through ſedition amongſt thoſe his ſubiects, hee made proclamation by an Herauld, that thoſe of Angus and Mernes whom he vnderſtoode to be culpable, ſhoulde appeare within .xb. dayes after at Scone, there to make anſwere afore appoynted Iudges, to ſuch things as might be layde to their charge, vpon paine of death to euery one that made default. When the day of appearance came, there were but fewe that did appeare. The moſt part of them doubting to bee puniſhed for theyr offences with Cruthlint their Captaine, fled out of ỹ Mernes, taking with them their wiues, theyr children and all theyr goodes. The king beeing ſore moued herewith, perceyued how readie the Scottiſhe people was by nature vnto rebellion, when they were gently led: and againe howe they obeyed the Magiſtrates beſt when they were reſtreyned from their wilde outragious doings by due puniſhment and execution of iuſtice. He conſidered therefore that if hee did not cauſe thoſe ſeditious rebelles whiche had thus diſobeyed hys commaundements to bee puniſhed according to the order of the lawes, he ſhoulde haue the whole realme ſhortly diſquieted with ciuill warre & open rebellion. Wherevpon with all ſpeede hee cauſed earneſt purſuyt to be made after Cruthlint and the reſidue of the offenders, the whiche at length being taken in Lochquhabir, were brought vnto a Caſtel in Gowrie called Dounſinnã, where after iudgement pronounced againſt them; Cruthlint firſt, and then other the chiefeſt ſtyrrers on eyther ſyde were put to execution, the commons for that it was thought they followed their ſuperiors againſt their willes, were pardoned and licenced to depart to their houſes. For this equitie ſhewed in miniſtring iuſtice by the king, hee was greatly prayſed, loued, and dread of all his ſubiects, ſo that great quietneſſe followed in the whole ſtate of the common wealth, greatly to the aduauncement therof, and ſo continued til the .xxij. yeare of this Kenneths raigne. At what time the blinde loue he bare to his owne iſſue, cauſed hym to procure a deteſtable fact, in making away one of his neareſt kinnesmen. This was Malcolme the ſonne of king Duffe, created in the beginning of Kenneths raigne Prince of Cumberlande, by reaſon whereof he ought to haue ſucceeded in rule of the kingdome after Kenneths death, whereat the ſame Kenneth grieuing not a little, for that thereby his ſonnes ſhoulde be kept from enioying the crowne, found meanes to poyſon him. But though the Phiſitions vnderſtanding by ſuch euident ſignes as appeared in his bodie, that he was poyſoned in deed, yet ſuch was the opinion which men had of the kings honor and integritie, that no ſuſpition at all was conceyued that it ſhoulde be his deed. The cloked loue alſo whiche he had ſhewed towards him at all times, and ſo ſodaine commaundement giuen by him vppon the firſt newes of his death, that his funerals ſhould be celebrated in euery Church and Chappell for his ſoule, and againe the teares which he ſhed for him in all places where any mention chaunced to bee made of the loſſe which the realme had ſuſteyned by the death of ſo worthie a prince, made men nothing miſtruſtful of ỹ matter, till at lẽgth ſome of the nobles perceyuing the outward ſorow (which he made) to paſſe the true griefe of the heart, began to gather ſome ſuſpitiõ, that al was not wel: but yet bycauſe no certaintie appeared, they kept their thoughtes to themſelues. About the ſame time came Ambaſſadors forth of Englande from king Edwarde the ſonne of Edgar (which after through treaſon of his ſtepmother Eſculda, was made a Martyr) requyring that ſithe Malcolme the Prince of Cumberlande was deceaſſed, it might pleaſe the king with ỹ ſtates of the realme

The king was worthily commended for his iuſtice.

King Kenneth poyſoned his couſin Malcolme.

The king was not ſuſpected of this fact.

The peticiõ of Malcolm is brought to ſuſpice

Ambaſſa came frõ Edwarde

to

to chooſe ſome other in his place, who doing hys homage vnto the king of England accoꝛding as it was couenãted by the league, might be a meane to confyꝛme the ſame league betwixt the two nations foꝛ the auoyding of all occaſions of breach thereof that otherwiſe happely might enſue. Kenneth at the ſame time holde a councell at Scone, where hauing heard the requeſt of theſe Ambaſſadours, in preſence of all his nobles, he anſwered that hee was glad to vnderſtande that king Edwarde was ſo carefull foꝛ maintenance of loue and amitie betwixt his ſubiectes and the Scottiſhmen, accoꝛding to the articles of the auncient league in times paſt concluded betwixt them, the ratification whereof foꝛ his part, he likewiſe moſt earneſtly deſired, & therfoꝛe in rendring moſt hartie thankes vnto him foꝛ his gentle aduertiſement, he purpoſed by the aduiſe of his nobles and the other eſtates of his realme as then there aſſembled, to cleſt a new Pꝛince of Cumberlande, without any further delay: and therupon required the Ambaſſadour to be pꝛeſent on the moꝛrowe to heare what he was whom the Nobles ſhould name to be pꝛeferred vnto that dignitie. The Ambaſſadours hereupon departing foꝛth of the Counſell chamber, were conueyed to their lodging by diuerſe of the nobilitie that were appoynted to keepe them companie. Then Kenneth with a long oration went about to perſwade the Peeres and other the eſtates of the realme there (as I ſayd) aſ-

The king requeſted that the crowne might come by inheritance ſembled, to alter the cuſtome and auncient oꝛder vſed by their elders in chooſing of him that ſhould ſucceede in gouernance of the realme, after the deceaſſe of him that was in poſſeſſion. He vſed ſo many reaſons as was poſſible foꝛ him to deuiſe in that behalfe, therby to enduce them to his purpoſe, whiche was to haue an acte eſtabliſhed foꝛ the crowne to go by ſucceſſion, only to this ende that one of his ſonnes nighte enioy the ſame immediately after his deceaſſe. He declared alſo what diſcõmodities, ſeditions, and great incõueniences had growne, in that the crown had gone in times paſt by election: foꝛ though it was oꝛdeyned at the firſt that it ſhoulde ſo doe vpon a good intent and great conſideration, yet in pꝛoceſſe of time pꝛoufe and experience had ſhewed, that moꝛe hinderance happened vnto the common wealth therby (beſide the daunger euer enſuing incidently vnto ſuch iſſue as the king left behind him) than pꝛofite, if the ſundry murthers, occaſions of ciuill diſcoꝛde and other wicked pꝛactiſes were throughly weyed and conſidered, the ſumme whereof he recited from poynt to point, and ſo in the ende with great inſtance beſought them that ſo pernicious a cuſtome might be aboliſhed and taken away, to the great benefite of the whole ſtate of the realme, ſpecially ſith in all realmes commonly the oꝛder was, that the ſonne ſhould without any contradiction ſucceede the father in the heritage of the crowne and kingly eſtate.

The king had no ſonner made an ende of his long oꝛation, which he handled after the pithieſt ſoꝛt he coulde, but that diuerſe of the noble men which were there amongſt other, being made pꝛiuie to the matter afoꝛehande, mocioned meanes to haue Malcolme the ſonne of Kenneth created Pꝛince of Cumberlande, that hee might ſo haue an entrance to the crowne after the deceaſſe of his father. This motion by and by was in many of their mouthes, whiche Kenneth perceyuing, requyred of the moſt auncient Peeres whom they would name to be Pꝛince of Cumberlande, that there might be a meane to ratifie and cõfirme the league betwixt the Scottes and Engliſhe men. Cõſtantine the ſonne of king Cullen, and Grime the nephew of king Duffe by his bꝛother Mogal, howbeit by the foꝛce of ꝑ foꝛmer law they might by good reaſon haue loked to haue had the preferment.

The Peeres of the realme did willingly graunt to his requeſt.

ment themſelues, yet perceyuing it was in vaine to denie that which would be had by violence (although they ſhould neuer ſo much ſtand againſt it) being firſt demaunded of the Heralde what they thought, they anſwered (notwithſtanding againſte theyr mindes in deede,) that the king might order all things as ſhould ſtande with his pleaſure, appointing whome he thought moſte meeteſt to be Prince of Cumberlande, and to abrogate the auncient lawe of creating the kings in deuiſing newe ordinances for the ſame, as ſhould ſeeme vnto him & thoſe of his counſel moſt requiſite and neceſſarie. The multitude then following their ſentence, cryed with lowde and vndiſcrete voyces, to haue Malcolme the ſonne of king Kenneth created Prince of Cumberlande. And thus the ſame Malcolme (though as yet vnder age) was by the voyces of the people ordeyned Prince of Cumberlande, in place of the other Malcolme ſonne to king Duffe.

The Heraulde required Conſtantine hys voice firſt.

Conſtantine his ſaying.

The multitude well pleaſed, crie Malcolm.

The day following the Ambaſſadors comming into the Counſell chamber, heard what was decreed touching their requeſt, and then being highly rewarded of the kings bounteous liberalitie, they returned into Englande, and Malcolm with them, to be acquainted with king Edwarde, and to doe his homage for the Principalitie of Cumberlande, as the cuſtome was.

At the ſame time alſo, there was a newe acte deuiſed and made, the olde being abrogated (by the appointment of the king) for the creation of the Scottiſh kings in time to come, many of the nobles rather conſenting with ſilence, than greatly allowing it, either in heartes or voyces, though ſome currikauours among them, ſet forwarde the matter to the beſt of their powers. The Articles of this ordinance were theſe:

A new act for the ſucceſsion of the crowne.

Articles concluded in that Parliament.

The eldeſt heire male of the deceaſſed king, whether the ſame were ſonne or nephew, of what age ſoeuer he ſhould be, yea though he ſhould be in the mothers womb at the time of ỹ fathers deceaſe ſhould from thenceforth ſucceed in the kingdome of Scotlande. The nephew by the ſonne ſhoulde be preferred before the nephew by the daughter, in attayning to the heritage of the crowne. And likewiſe the brothers ſonne ſhould be admitted before the ſiſters ſonne. The ſame lawe ſhould be obſerued of all ſuch of the Scottiſh nation, as had any landes or inheritance comming to them by diſcent. Where the king by this meanes chaunced to be vnder age, and not able to rule, there ſhould be one of the chiefeſt peeres of the Realme choſen and elected to haue the gouernance of his perſon and Realme, till he came to .xiiij. yeares of age. The which fourteenth yeare of his age beeing accompliſhed, he ſhoulde haue the adminiſtration committed to his owne handes. The heyres of al other perſons of eche eſtate and degree, ſhould remaine vnder the wardſhip of their appointed gouernours till they came to the age of .xxj. yeares, and not till then to meddle with any part of their landes and liuings.

These lawes and ordinances being once publiſhed and confirmed, King Kenneth ſuppoſed the kingdome to bee fully aſſured vnto him and hys poſteritie, and therevpon endeuoured himſelfe to winne the hearties of the people with vpright adminiſtration of iuſtice: and the fauour of the nobles, he ſought to purchaſe with great gifts which he beſtowed amongſt them, aſwell in landes belonging to the crowne, as in other things, greatly to their contentation. Thus might he ſeeme happie vnto all men, hauing the loue both of his Lordes and commons: but yet to himſelf he ſeemed moſt vnhappie, as he that coulde not but ſtill liue in continuall feare, leaſt his wicked practiſe concerning the death of Malcolme Duffe ſhould come to light and knowledge of the worlde. For ſo commeth it to paſſe, that ſuch as are pricked in conſcience for any ſecrete offence committed, haue euer an vnquiet minde. And as the ſame goeth, it chaunced that a voyce was hearde as he was in bed in the night time to take his reſt, vttering vnto him theſe or the like wordes in effecte: Thinke not Kenneth that the wicked ſlaughter of Malcolme Duffe by thee contriued, is kept ſecret from the knowledge of the eternall God: Thou art he that didſt conſpire the innocents death, enterpryſing by trayterous meanes to doe ỹ to thy neighbour which thou wouldeſt haue reuenged by cruell puniſhment in any of thy ſubiects, if it had bene offred to thy ſelfe: It ſhal therefore come to paſſe, that both thou thyſelfe, and thy iſſue, through the iuſt vngeance of almightie God, ſhall ſuffer worthie puniſhment, to the infamie of thy houſe and family for euermore. For euen at this preſent are there in hande ſecrete practiſes to diſpatche both thee and thy iſſue out of the way, that other may enioy this kingdome which thou doſt endeuor to aſſure vnto thine iſſue.

King Kenneth miniſtred iuſtice truly.

The good will of the nobility he bought with gifts.

The king had a guiltie conſcience.

A voyce heard by the king.

The king was feſteth his ſinnes.

The king vſeth great penaunce.

The king being ſtryken into great dread and terror, paſſed that night without any ſleepe comming in his eyes. Wherefore in the morning he got him vnto Biſhop Moucan, a man of great holyneſſe of life, vnto whom he confeſſed his heynous and moſt wicked offence, beſeeching him of counſell, which way hee might obtaine pardon and forgiueneſſe at Gods handes by worthie penance. Moucan hearing how the king bemoaned his offence committed, he willed hym to bee of good comfort. For as the wrath of almightie God was prouoked by ſinne and wicked offences, ſo was the ſame pacified againe by repentance, if ſo be we continue penitent and willing to amend. King Kenneth being confirmed in hope of forgiueneſſe by theſe and ſundrie other the like comfortable wordes of the Biſhop, ſtudied vnfeynedly to doe worthie penaunce, leauing nothing vndone which hee thought might ſerue for a witneſſe of his penitent heart, thereby to auoyde the vengeance which he ſtode in feare of to be prepared for him, by reaſon of his heynous and wicked crime.

It chaunced hereupon, that within a ſhort time after hee had beene at Fordune a Towne in Mernes, to viſite the Relikes of Paladius which remaine there, he turned a little out of the way to lodge at the Caſtel of Fethircarne, where as then there was a Forreſt ful of al maner of wild beaſts that were to be had in any part of Albion. Here was hee receyued by Fenella Ladie of the houſe, whoſe ſonne as ye haue heard he cauſed to be put to death, for the commotion made betwixt them of Mernes and Angus. She was alſo a kyn vnto Malcolme Dufte whome the king had made away: and in like maner vnto Conſtantine and Gryme, defrauded of their right to the crowne, by the craftie deuiſe of the king, as before is partly mencioned. This woman therefore being of a ſtoute ſtomacke, long time before hauing conceyued an immortall grudge towardes the king, vpon the occaſions before rehearſed, (namely aſwell for the death of hir ſonne Cruthlynt, as hauing ſome pyckling alſo of the empoyſoning of Malcolme Dufte, though no full certaintie thereof was knowne) imagined night and day how to be reuenged. She vnderſtoode that the king delyted aboue meaſure in goodly buyldings, and therefore to the ende to cõpaſſe hir malicious intent, ſhe had cauſed a tower to be made ioyning vnto hir owne lodging within the foreſayd caſtell of Fethircarn. The which tower was couered ouer with copper finely engrauen with diuerſe flowers and Images. Hereto was it hung within with riche clothes of Arras wrought with golde and ſilke, very fayre and coſtly. Behinde the ſame were there Croſſebowes ſet readie bent with ſharpe quarrels in them. In the middeſt of the houſe there was a goodly braſen Image alſo, reſembling the figure of king Kenneth, holding in the one hande a faire golden Apple ſet full of precious ſtones, deuiſed with ſuch arte and cunning, that ſo ſone as any man ſhould drawe the ſame vnto him or remoue it neuer ſo little any way forth, the Croſſebowes would immediately diſcharge theyr quarrels vpon him with great force and violence. Fenella therefore being thus prouided afore hande, at after meate, deſired the king to go with hir into that inner chamber: into the which being entred, he could not be ſatiſfied of long with the beholding of the goodly furniture, aſwell of the hangings as of diuerſe other things. At the laſt hauing viewed the Image which ſtode (as is ſayde) in the middeſt of the chamber, he demaunded what the ſame did ſignifie. Fenella anſwered, how that Image did repreſent his perſon, and the golden Apple ſet ſo richly with Smaragds, Jacinths, Saphires, Topaſes, Rubies, Turkaſſes, and ſuch like precious ſtones, ſhee had prouided as a gyft for him, and therfore requyred him to take the ſame, beſeeching him to accept it in good part, though it were not in value worthie to bee offred vnto his Princely honor and high dignitie. And herewith ſhe hirſelfe withdrew aſide, as though ſhe woulde haue taken ſomething forth of a Cheſt or Coffer, thereby to auoyde the daunger. But the king delyted in beholding the gemmes and orient ſtones, at length remouing the Apple the better to aduiſe it, incontinently the Croſſebowes diſcharged their quarrels ſo directly vpon him, that ſtryking hym through in ſundrie places, hee fell downe ſtarke deade, and lay flat on the ground. Fenella as ſone as ſhe beheld him fall to the ground readie to die, ſhe got forth by a backe doore into the next woods, where ſhe had appoynted horſes to tary for hir, by meane whereof ſhe eſcaped out of all daunger of thẽ that purſued hir, ere the death of the king were openly knowne vnto them. His ſeruãts ſtil waiting for his comming forth in the vtter chamber, at length when they ſawe he came not at all, firſt they knocked at the doore ſoftly, then they rapped hard thereat: laſtly doubting that which had happened, they breake open doore after doore, til at lẽgth they came into the chamber where the king laye colde deade vpon the floore. The clamor and crie hereupon was rayſed by his ſeruants, and Fenella curſed and ſought for in euery place that had committed ſo haynous and wicked a deede: but the vngracious woman was conueyed ſo ſecretly out of the way, that no where coulde ſhe be heard of. Some ſuppoſed that ſhe fled firſt vnto Conſtantine, by whoſe helpe ſhee got ouer into Irelande. The ambitious deſire which the ſame Cõſtantine ſhewed hee had to ſucceede in gouernment of the kingdome after Kennethes deceaſſe, encreaſed that ſuſpition greatly. For immediately after it was knowne that Kenneth was dead, he got his friendes togither, and went vnto diuerſe places requyring the Lordes to aſſiſt him in attayning to the crowne, which by the old ordinance and law of the realme (inſtituted in the begynning, and obſerued till nowe of late, that Kenneth by his priuate authoritie had gone about to abrogate the ſame) ought to diſcende vnto hym, as all the worlde right well vnderſtode.

The king was ſlaine with the Croſſebowes.

Fenella eſcaped from them all.

His ſeruants looked for their king.

The doores broken open they finde him dead.

Fenella could not be found.

Fenella got hir ſelfe into Ireland by the helpe of Conſtantine.

Conſtantine aſpired vnto the crowne.

Conſtantine procured friendes.

COnſtantine procured friends ſo on eche ſide, that by their meanes being of high authoritie in the realme, hee was brought by them vnto Scone, and there crowned king, the .xij. day after Kennethes deceaſſe, in the .xv. yere after that the ſame Kenneth had begonne his raigne ouer the

In Albion and alſo Fraunce, it rayned ſtones. But all theſe dreadfull wonders might not withdraw the Scottiſhe men from their wicked vices, whereunto in thoſe dayes they were wholye gyuen, though there wanted not dyuerſe vertuous men, as wel Biſhops as other, that in theyr Sermons exhorted the people to repent and amende theyr naughtie lyuings: for otherwyſe vndoubtedly ſuch greſely ſightes and tokens as chaunced in thoſe dayes, menaced ſome great myſchiefe to fall vnto the whole Nation. And ſurely their wordes proued true: for the Scottes continuing in their wilfulneſſe, being ſtubborne hearted one agaynſt another, brought theyr Countrey into daunger of vtter deſtruction.

Malcolme the ſonne of Kenneth, created (as ye haue heard in hys fathers lyke tyme) Prince of Cumberlande, hearing that Conſtantine (agaynſt the ordonance lately made) had vſurped the Crowne, as ſone as his fathers bodie was buryed in Colmkil, with ſuch funeral pompe as apperteyned, he deſyred his fathers friendes to gyue him ſuch faythfull counſell as they thought moſt expedient, whiche way hee were beſt to worke for the appeaſing of the ſedition nowe begunne by reaſon of Conſtantines preſumptuous attempt.

Malcolm ſeeketh friendes againſt Conſtantine.

There were ſome amongeſt that companie that tooke it to bee beſt, firſt to vnderſtande the myndes of all the peeres and nobles of the realme, before they went about any exployt agaynſt the tyrant, leaſt whyleſt Malcolme ſhoulde ſeeke to delyuer himſelfe from daunger, he might happely winde himſelfe further into trouble, than without extreeme perill of the common wealth he ſhoulde be able to get forth thereof againe. Other there were iudged it beſt ſodenly to goe agaynſt Conſtantine before he had made himſelfe ſtrong: For if they came vpon him ere hee were prouided for theyr comming, many of them that feigned themſelues to bee his friendes, woulde forſake hym ſo ſone as they ſawe any power of his enimyes at hande. And then ſhoulde he eyther fall into their hands, or be dryuen to flee the realme for ſafegard of his life. The fierce yong man following this counſell as the beſt to his ſeeming, and truſting more to his owne wit than to the graue aduice of men of ſkill, aſſembled togither in all haſt poſſible about the number of ten thouſand men, with whom making towards Conſtantine with ſpedie iourneys, at length hee came into Leuthian. Conſtantine being enformed of all his aduerſaries doings, had got togither alſo an huge power, ſo that paſſing forth with the ſame to encounter them, the bruite which ranne of his great number and puiſſance, cauſed Malcolme for verie feare that he ſhoulde not be able in any part to matche him, to breake vp his army and to flee backe into Cumberland: by reaſon whereof he had bene put to ſuch hinderance and diſhonour, as woulde not eaſily haue bene recouered, had not Kenneth the baſtard ſonne of his father the aboue mentioned Kenneth encamped with a mightie power aboute Sterling, and defended the paſſages of the Forth, that Conſtantine with his armie could not come ouer. Then roſe there great famine and penurie of vitayles in both hoſtes, ſo that Conſtantine with great indignation was conſtrained to breake vp his campe, and ſo to leaue his enterpryſe for that ſeaſon. Thus was the Realme deuided into two ſundry factions. Whereupon followed waſtings and incurſions made into eche others poſſeſſions, with ſuch crueltie, that the ſame might be a ſufficient inſtruction what miſchiefe happeneth through ciuill diſcorde. The poore commons and huſbandmē were brought to ſuch miſerie through the often ſpoylings and robberies vſed by the men of warre, that they were not able to til their groūdes. Finally there roſe one miſchiefe ſo faſt in the neck of another, that no kinde of crueltie was ſpared, robbing, reaving, and forcible extortion was exerciſed on all ſides without hope of any redreſſe or amendment. Whileſt the Scottiſhmen were thus at diuiſion amongſt themſelues, renting and pulling in peeces their owne miſerable native cōtrey, Edwarde king of England being oppreſſed with inuaſion of Danes, was glad to buie peace at their handes, for himſelfe and his people, with right large ſummes of money: but perceiuing that his enimies ceaſſed not dayly to ſpoile and rob his ſubiects, he purpoſed to trie what he might doe by making them warre: And to make his part the ſtronger, he requyred Malcolme prince of Cumberlād to ayde him againſt the Danes, according to the couenant of the ancient league. Malcolme conſenting to king Edwards requeſt, came with a mightie armie of Cumberlande men to ſupport him: by reaſon wherof the Danes doubting to bee ouermatched, after certain light ſkirmiſhes without any great bloodſhed, cōdiſcēded to haue peace, which was concluded with theſe conditions: that king Edwarde ſhould pay vnto the Danes a M. pounde of golde, for the which they ſhould cōtent themſelues themſelues with thoſe landes which they had already in poſſeſſion, and to muake no further vpon the Engliſhmen: but contrariwiſe to be readie to fight in their defence, if any forrain enimie ſought to make any warres vpon them. In the meane time whileſt Malcolme was thus in England occupied in ayde of king Edwarde againſt the Danes, king Conſtantine thought the time to ſerue very well for his purpoſe to reduce all thoſe regions of Scotlād which toke part with his aduerſarie the foreſaid Malcolme vnder his ſubiection. He aſſembled therfore .xx. M. men, and comming into Louthian, heard how Kenneth the baſtard aforeſaid (being left by his brother Malcolm to reſiſt Conſtantines attempts) had got togither an huge armie of his brothers friends, and was come vnto Crawmond, where the riuer falleth into the Forth, a three miles from Edenbourgh, purpoſing there to abide his enimies, if they minded to aſſaile him. Conſtantine hereupon haſted thitherwards, and comming within ſight of his enimies ſtreightwayes ioined battail with them: immediatly wherwith there roſe ſuch an outragious tempeſt of winde, comming out of the Eaſt, driuing the ſande in the faces of Conſtantines men, that they were not able to ſee about them to make any defence agaynſt theyr enimyes that then preaſſed vpon them right egerly. By meanes whereof the diſcomfiture light vpō Conſtantines ſide, though neyther part had any great cauſe to reioyce: for in the hoteſt of the fight, Conſtantine and Kenneth chaunced to encounter togither, and ſo fighting man to man, either ſlue other. Thus Conſtantine ended his lyfe by dynt of the enimies ſworde, in the thirde yeare of his reigne, and in the yeare after the incarnation 1002. and hys bodie was buryed in Colmekill amongſt his predeceſſours.

Grime.

THen Grime nephew to king Duffe hearing of the ſlaughter thus made betwixte king Conſtantine and Kenneth, gathered togither the reſidue of Conſtantines armie, being ſcattered abrode after the ouerthrow, ſuppoſing that by the death of Kenneth, the partie of his brother Malcolme was ſore weakned, and therevpon he came vnto the Abbay of Scone, and there cauſed him ſelfe to be crowned king, as lawfull ſucceſſor vnto Conſtantine, by force of the olde lawes and ordinance of the Realme. And to eſtabliſh himſelfe the more firmly in the eſtate, he ſhewed great gentleneſſe towardes all them that were friends vnto Conſtantine, and beſtowed vpō them many bountyfull gyftes: neyther was his liberalitie ſhut vp from other that had fauoured Malcolme, for to the ende hee might allure them to beare him good will, he rewarded them highly both in landes and treaſure. But other of the ſame faction, whom he ſawe by no meanes coulde be wonne, he cauſed them to bee proclaymed traytours, and confiſcated their goodes as rebelles to his perſon, and enimies to the crowne.

Malcolme Prince of Cumberland ſore moued in his minde that Grime had thus taken vpon him the crowne, called his friends togither, requiring to haue their aduice, whiche way he were beſt to worke in this ſo great a matter.

Malcolme prince of Cūberland is ſore moued againſt Grime.

They counſailed him that in no wiſe he ſhould deſpiſe the force of his enimies, but rather to aſſay by all meanes to drawe thoſe Nobles vnto hys purpoſe, which were aſſiſtant vnto Grime.

A good coūſel

Whereupon Malcolme following the counſaile of his friendes, ſent forth ſecrete meſſengers vnto thoſe Lordes that toke part with Grime, requiring them to remember their promiſed fayth, giuen vnto his father king Kenneth, concerning the obſeruaunce of the lawe eſtabliſhed by their conſente for the ſucceſſion of theyr Kinges: whiche if they woulde doe in renouncyng their their obeyſance vnto the vſurper Gryme, he promiſed ſo to gouerne the Realme with equall iuſtice, that no eſtate ſhould in reaſon find cauſe to miſlike with his doings. Many of the nobles by meanes of this meſſage reuolted from the ſayde Grime, ſoliciting their friends by earneſt trauaile to do the like. But other and the greater number toke thoſe that brought the meſſage, and ſent them as priſoners vnto Grime, who incontinently committed them to priſon.

Malcolme his promiſe vnto the Scottes.

Malcolme hys meſſengers are cõmitted to priſon.

Malcolme being offended therewith, gathered an armie.

Malcolme ſore offended therewith, by counſel of his friends, aſſembled an army to go againſt them, that contrary to the law of all nations (as he ſeemed to take the matter) had empriſoned his purſeuants and meſſengers: but marching as he was forwarde on his purpoſed iourney, hee heard by the way, howe his aduerſarie king Grime had gathered a farre greater power than he had wyth him, not onely of all ſuch of the Scottiſh nation inhabiting beyonde the riuers of Forth & Clyde, but of them alſo of the weſtern Iles.

Grime is of greater force thã Malcolm.

Malcolme doubting leaſt if the certaintie hereof were once bruted amongeſt his people, the fame would encreaſe the terrour more than needed: he gaue cõmaundement therfore that no maner of wight ſhould be ſuffred to come into his army without he were firſt brought to his preſence. But this deuiſe nothing auayled him: for thereby that which he deſired to be concealed & kept moſt ſecret, became the more manifeſt, by reaſon that ſuch as had ſome vnkling of the matter, tolde it from one to another, making it much more than it was in deed. For there roſe a murmuring amongeſt them, that there was ſuch treaſon contriued, that if Malcolme with his army went forward to ioyne with his aduerſaries, he ſhould not be in daunger onely of them, which he knewe to come againſt him in Grimes hoſt, but alſo of no ſmall nũber of thẽ which were in his own armie, who vpon the ioyning had determined to turne their ſpeare points againſt him in Grimes quarel.

Malcolm wold not haue his people to vnderſtande the truth thereof.

His aduice auayled not.

A bruit ſpred in Malcolmes armie of treaſon.

This rumor paſſing from one to another, put the whole number in great feare. It was firſt raiſed by certain marchant men, of whom there was a great nũber in Malcolmes armie, hauing more ſkill in buying and ſelling, than in any warlyke feates or enterpryſes.

Marchãts authours the rumor.

These at the firſt ſuing for licence to depart home, and could haue no graunt, begaune to lament their miſeries, in ſuch dolefull wiſe, that all the campe was troubled with the noyſe, inſomuch that euen the olde men of warre, and diuerſe of the Captaines were not a little diſcomforted and amazed with ſuch wailefull clamors.

Malcolme being aduertiſed hereof, thought not good to match in battaile againſt his fierce enimies with his people thus aſtonied through dread and terror, and therefore gaue licence to the moſt part of his hoſt to depart for that time, and abode onely with certain bandes of his moſt faithfull friends neare vnto the water of Forth, to ſtop his enimies from paſſing ouer that ryuer.

Malcolme ſendeth moſt part of his armie depart.

Whileſt the realme of Scotlande was thus diſquieted and troubled with ciuill diſcorde, Fothadus the greate Biſhop of Scotland, a man of right approued vertue and clemencie, ſore lamenting to ſee his countrey thus deuided & rent, as it were in peeces, got him into his pontificall veſtures with a multitude of other reuerend prieſts and eccleſiaſticall miniſters, in humble wiſe comming and preſenting themſelues before King Grime, who with great reuerence receiuing them, he had taken the gouernance vpon him, the ſtate of things being ſuch, as if ſome redreſſe were not founde in all ſpeedie wiſe, the vtter ruyne of the common wealth muſt needes enſue, by reaſon of the ſundrie debates and factions dayly ryſing amongeſt the people of all ſortes and degrees, ſo that murthers, robberies, reife, with al other kinds of iniuries and miſchiefe were ſtill put in practiſe without reſtraynt or puniſhment in ſuch lycentious ſort that no man coulde aſſure himſelfe of his owne: for whether it were within doores, or without, the Robber was as readie to lay handes on it as the owner. Neyther was there hope of any reformation ſo long as the ciuill warres laſted. Therfore if it might ſtande with the pleaſure of king Gryme in reliefe of the poore commons of Scotlande, to condiſcende vnto ſome neceſſarie agreement with Malcolme, Fothadus offered to vndertake to conclude a peace betwixt them in ſuche wyſe as ſhoulde in no maner of behalfe be preiudiciall to his honour and royall Maieſtie.

Grime moued with the wordes of the Biſhop (who moſt inſtantly beſought him, although the calamitie and great affliction of his people did but little mollifie his heart, yet in reſpect of his owne ſuretie, which might not continue if his people were once deſtroyed, to remit part of his high diſpleaſure) anſwered, that peace he could be contented to haue, ſo the ſame might be concluded with his honor ſaued: for ſurely warres he neuer deſired but onely in defence of his good title & right, which he had to the crowne deſcended vnto him by the olde lawes and auncient ordinances of the realm, & therefore he purpoſed not to leaue the ſame with life, but to fight for it againſt Malcolme, and all his partakers, euen vnto death: But if it were ſo, that Malcolme would content himſelfe with the principalitie of Cumberland, & ſo thervpon breake vp his campe and depart forth of the lands perteyning to the crown, he woulde gladly com to a cõmunication with him for peace, but if Malcolme refuſed thus to do, he aſſured him that he woulde not leaue off to purſue him to the vttermoſt of his power, as his moſt cruel and fierce enimie.

Fothadus hauing heard Grymes wordes, beſought hym to ſtay a tyme, tyll hee myght goe vnto Malcolme, to vnderſtande what hys full mynde was in this behalfe, not doubting but to finde him conformable vnto any reaſonable motion, for relieuing of the poore afflicted ſtate of the lande.

Gryme graunting to this requeſt, Fothadus in like ſort and habite as he came vnto Gryme, went vnto Malcolme, whome he founde at Sterling. Where comming before his preſence wyth a long Oration, hee greatly bewayled the dolorous calamityes of the Scottiſh common weale, into the which it was fallen thrꝛough ciuil ſeditiõ only: and herewith declared alſo by great likelyhoodes of ſubſtantial reaſons, how infortunate and miſerable the ende ſhould be of the warres, if the ſame were purſued to the vttermoſt.

His tale being throughly heard and well diſgeſted, wrought ſo with Malcolme, that he promiſed to withdraw into Cumberlande without any further attempt, if Grime would in like caſe breake vp his camp, and agree to haue a truce for three Monethes ſpace, in which meane time they might by certaine commiſſioners appointed and authoriſed therto, talk and cõmon for concluding of a finall peace and concord betwixt them. Malcolmes offer.

Grime refuſed not this offer, and ſo thervpon lycenſed his people to depart to their homes, repairing himſelfe with certaine of his nobles into Angus vnto the Caſtell of Forfair, there to take further aduice what was to be done touching the appointed communication of peace. Gryme is contented with Malcolmes motion.

But Fothadus would in no wiſe reſt, tyll the commiſſioners were met and aſſembled togither in communication at Scone, where within fewe dayes after (chiefly thꝛough his earneſt diligence) peace was concluded with theſe conditions. Fothadus his diligence to procure the parties to agreement.

Firſt that Grime during his life time, ſhoulde enioy the crowne, and after his deceaſſe the ſame to remaine vnto Malcolm and his heires by lineal diſcent for euer, according to the ordinance and decree made & eſtabliſhed by king Kenneth. And whoſoeuer ſhoulde goe about eyther by worde or deed to impeach or hinder the ſaid ordinance and decree, ſhould be reputed for a traytor to the common wealth and realme. The conditions of the peace betwixt Gryme and Malcolme.

Furthermore all the landes lying betwyxt Louthian and Northumberlande, and betwixt Clyde and Weſtmerland, euen from the Almain ſeas, to the Iriſh ſeas, ſhoulde preſently remaine and be tranſported vnto the dominion & gouernment of Malcolme, with the whiche contenting himſelfe during the naturall life of Gryme, hee ſhould cõtinue in friendſhip with the ſaid Grime, and ſo in no wiſe ſtirre or moue any warre or debate, eyther againſt him or any of his friends: for if he did, and went about to breake any of the articles of this peace, he ſhoulde not onely loſe thoſe landes which he now held, but alſo to be depriued of all the right, title, clayme, and intereſt whiche either he or his poſteritie might make or pretende vnto the crowne at any time hereafter.

When both the princes had bound themſelues by ſolemne othes to performe euery point & points in theſe articles compriſed, they layd armor aſide, and began to take order for reforming of all miſdemeanours, whiche had happened within the lande, by reaſon of the ciuill contention moued betwixt them and their partakers. Howbeeit, commaundement was giuen by eyther of theſe The warres being ceaſſed, the Princes apply their ſtudies to reformeme miſdemeanors

Yet notwithſtanding for the ſpace of. viij. yeares togither, the peace continued without breach, or any notable trouble betwixt them.

King Grime his alteration from noble qualities vnto deteſtable vices.

But Gryme at length of a chaſte and liberall Prince, through long ſouth and encreaſe of ryches, became a moſt couetous tyrant, and ſo corrupted in maners and conditions, that it paſſed the termes of al reaſon and equitie: inſomuch that when he had put vnto death diuerſe of his nobles, to the ende he might haue their landes and goodes as forfeyted by attainder, he oppreſſed the people by continuall exactions alſo eche day more than other.

His ſubiects being thus brought into extreme miſerie through his wicked & vniuſt gouernmẽt, not knowing where to ſeeke for redreſſe, ſaue only at the handes of almightie God, the puniſher of al ſinne, beſought him to haue pitie of their afflictiõs, and to chaunge the gouernment of the realm into ſome better eſtate.

The common peoples praier.

The Lordes alſo hauing great indignation of the trouble fallen to the realme, by the kings miſgouernance and auaricious crueltie, appointed a certaine number of Gentlemen to goe vnto him as Ambaſſadours from them, to requyre him to put away from him ſuch naughtie perſons as by euill councell had peruerted his minde, and moued him to do things contrary to his honour and the wealth of his realme.

The Lordes require Grime to reforme the miſdemeanor of his officers.

One of theſe Ambaſſadors (to whõ the charge was giuen) had the wordes in name of them all, who cõming before the kings preſence, declared vnto him howe they were ſent from the reſidue of the nobles and peeres of his realme, to admoniſhe him of things perteyning to ỹ ſuretie of his eſtate and cõmon wealth of his dominions, which was, that where through perſwaſion of euill counſaylers he ſuffred many enormities to be committed by his miniſters and officers againſt his ſubiects, to their vtter impoueriſhment and vndoing, the rebuke wherof did redound vnto his diſhonor, if it would pleaſe him to remoue out of his preſence & ſeruice all ſuch diſloyal perſons as ſought the hinderance of the common weale, he ſhoulde winne thereby the loue of all his liege ſubiectes, whiche now coulde not but grudge and repine at this his gouernment, as men by the ſame brought into ſuch calamitie, that better it were for them in their iudgements to be dead than aliue, if reformation were not the ſooner had againſt ſuche extortions as his ſeruants and officers did dayly practiſe, and for the which no doubt he muſt needes anſwere, ſith the ſworde was committed vnto him, not to enrich couetous perſons, nor to oppreſſe innocent and true dealing people, but contrarily to puniſhe and correct guiltie and vniuſt dealers.

The office of the ſworde.

When king Gryme had heard what meſſage theſe Ambaſſadors had brought, he anſwered to the ſame with fayned wordes, & willed them vnder the pretext of courteſie to a banket, in purpoſe to haue put them all in priſon: But they beeing aduertiſed therof, got them in all haſt to their horſes, and fled forthwith vnto Bertha, where the reſidue of the nobles at the ſame time were aſſẽbled.

King Grime purpoſed to haue ſlaine meſſengers.

Gryme thus hauing no regarde to the holeſome aduertiſement of his nobles, thought that all things would come forwarde with ſuch felicitie and happe as he wiſhed, not ceaſſing from rayſing new payments and exactions ſtill of his ſubiects, till at length he was aduertiſed, how his nobles had rayſed open warre againſt him, at which newes being ſore kindled with diſpleaſure, he got togither a great number of men, & marched forth towards them that had ſo rebelled againſt him.

The Lordes of Scotland rear warre againſt Grime their king.

Then followed more miſchiefe and trouble thã euer had bene ſeene afore that time in Scotlande: for by reaſon of this ciuill diſſention, caſtels were razed & ouerthrowne, townes burned vp, corne deſtroyed, and fieldes waſted, & the people ſlaine in all places, yea as well in churches as elſwhere.

What miſchiefe enſued.

Malcolme prince of Cũberland hearing of ſuch cruell warres as were thus rayſed in Scotlande betwixt the king and the nobles of the realme, to the daunger of the vtter ouerſion of the whole cõmon wealth, returned with al ſpeed forth of Englande (where hee was with an armie as then in ayd of king Egelred againſt the Danes) into his owne countrey for defence of his ſubiects, if any attempt ſhould happely be made againſt them in that troubleſome ſeaſon.

Howbeit he was no ſooner returned home, but the nobles of Louthian came vnto him, beſeeching him to take pitie vppon his miſerable and ſore countrey, and to employe hys whole force to remoue remoue away from the people ſuch imminent deſtruction as dayly haſted towards them, which to do they thought it was partly euen his dutie, ſith God had beſtowed vpon him ſuche giftes both of body, minde, and fortune, as moſt plentcouſly appeared in him, not onely for the weale of himſelfe, but alſo of his friends and countrey, and therefore his part was to ſhew his earneſt diligence to deliuer the common wealth of ſuch tyrannie as was practiſed by the miſgouernment of Gryme and his vnhappie counſellers. Which being done, he might order al things as ſhould like him beſt.

Malcolme moued with theſe and the like perſwaſions of the Scottiſh Lords, which dayly reſorted vnto him, reſolued with promiſe of their ſupport to leuie warre againſt Grime in this ſo neceſſarie a quarell, & ſo aſſembling a great puiſſance togither, he did ſet forth towards his aduerſarie. By the way alſo there came ſtill vnto him great numbers of men from eche ſide to ayde him in this enterprize, offring by ſolemne othes to become his liege men and ſubiects.

Gryme likewiſe beeing aduertiſed of thoſe newes, with all ſpeede got togither ſuch people as hee might aſſemble for the time, and comming forwarde with the ſame at the towne of Auchnabart, both the armyes pitched downe theyr tentes, the one faſt by the other, on the Aſcention day.

Here Grime ſuppoſing that he might take his enimies at ſome great aduantage, if he came vpō them on the ſodaine, for that being giuen to deuotion they woulde looke for nothing leſſe than for battaile on ỳ day, he got forth of his campe in the dawning of that morning, in purpoſe forthwith to aſſaile them. Notwithſtanding Malcolme being aduertiſed therof, ſent vnto Grime, requeſting him to deſiſt from battaile for reuerence of that bleſſed feaſt, but Grime would in no wiſe aſſent thereto, but needes would come on without ſtop or ſtay: whereupon both the armies ruſhing togither met right fiercely, ſo that in the beggynning there was great ſlaughter made on both ſides, but within a while king Grymes ſide was put to the worſe, and in the ende clearly diſcomfited.

It is ſaid that Grime was taken aliue ſtāding at defēce moſt fiercely fighting, & being ſore woūded in the head, had both his eies put out, & afterwards continuing ſo in great miſerie & languor certaine dayes, at length departed out of this life, in the .ix. yeare of his raigne, and was buried in Colmkill, after the incarnation .1010. yeares.

After this victorie thus obteyned by Malcolm, he called ſuch noble men as were taken priſoners in this battaile before him, vſing manye gentle wordes towards them, declaring how the right of the crown appertayned vnto him, & that ỳ warres which he had made, were not attēpted againſt the cōmon wealth of the Scottiſh eſtate, but rather in relieke therof, to the ende the people might be deliuered of the tyrannie exerciſed by Grime and his counſellors. And when he had thus vttered his minde vnto them, he appointed a publike aſſemble to be kept at Scone (for the electiō of a new king) there to be holden within .xv. dayes after. Whither the Scottiſh nobilitie cōming togither at the day and place appoynted, and conſenting to crowne Malcolme king, he vtterly refuſed to receyue the crowne, except the law eſtabliſhed by his father Kenneth for the ſucceſſion therof were firſt cōfirmed & approbate, whereupon the Lords bounde thēſelues by ſolemne othes to perform the ſame, & neuer to breake or violate it in any condition.

The ordinance of king Kenneth for the ſucceſſion of the crowne is confirmed.

Malcolme.

When the ſolemnitie of this coronation was ended, he called afore him again al the lords and peeres of his realme, of the which part had ayded him in the laſt warres, & part had bin aſſiſtant vnto his aduerſarie Grime: & there bled the matter in ſuch wiſe amongſt them, that he made them all friendes, eche one promiſing to other, to forget all former offences, diſpleaſures & controuerſies paſt, which he did to auoid al inteſtine trouble ỹ might grow out of the rootes of ſuch rancor & malice, as in time of the ciuil diſcord had ſprung vp amongſt thē.

Malcolme agreeth the nobles of his realme.

Further, for the better adminiſtration of iuſtice in due forme and maner, he beſtowed publike offices vpon diſcrete perſons, ſkilful in the lawes and ordinances of the realme. Other offices perteining to the warres & defence of the realm, he committed vnto ſuch as were practiſed & trayned in ſuch exerciſes, ſo that iuſtice was miniſtred on all ſydes throughout the kingdome, with ſuch equitie and vprightneſſe, as had not beene heard of in any age before him. Whileſt the Scottiſh eſtate was gouerned in ſuch happie wiſe, by the prudent policie of K. Malcolme, it chaunced that Sueno king of Danes landed in England with a mightie nauy, in purpoſe to reuenge the iniuries done before vnto his people by the Engliſh men.

Malcolmes wiſdome in ordeyning officers.

Sueno king of Denmark landed in Englande.

This Sueno (as appeareth more at large in the hyſtorie of Denmark) firſt being an earneſt perſecuter of chriſtian men, and puniſhed by the deuine prouidence for his crueltie in that behalfe ſhewed by ſundry ouerthrowes receyued at the enimies handes, as in being thryſe taken priſoner, and in the end driuen and expulſed out of his kingdome, he came into Scotlande for relief & ſuccor, where throughe the holſome inſtruction of godly and vertuous men, he renounced his heathniſh belief, & receiued the chriſtian faith, & being baptiſed, at length was reſtored home to his kingdom. Shortly after with a mightie armye of Danes, Gothes, and Norwegians, & Swedeners, with other northern people, he arriued (as is ſaid) in England, & chaſed king Egeldred into Northumberland, who there receyuing aide from the Scottes according to the league which lately before he had contracted with thē, he determined eftſoones to trie the chaunce of battaile wᵗ his enimies. Marching forward therfore towards thē, he came to the riuer of Owſe, neare to the banks wherof, not far from Yorke, he pitched down his tents. Then Sueno not forgetful of the benefits & pleaſures receiued lately at the Scottiſhmēs handes, ſent an herald at armes vnto thē, cōmaūding thē to depart their wayes home & to refuſe Egeldreds cōpanie, either elſe to looke for moſt cruel battail at the hands of the Danes, the Norwegians & others ỹ people of Germany, there redie bent to their deſtruction. Egeldred being aduertiſed that his aduerſaries meſſenger was thus come into his campe, cauſed him to be ſlayed and arreſted for a ſpie. And the ſame day he brought forth his battayles readie raunged into the fieldes to trie ỹ matter by dynt of ſword, if Sueno were ſo minded, who right deſirous to accept the offer, brought forth alſo his people in perfit order & well arrayed to fight, ſo that there was no ſtay on either part, but that togither they flue moſt fiercely, & in ſuch egre wiſe, that neyther ſide had leyſure to beſtow their ſhot, but euen at the firſt they buckled togither at handblowes, cōtinuing certain houres with great & cruel ſlaughter, til at length the Engliſh men were put to flight, leauing to the Danes a right deare & bloodie victorie. The murther alſo that day of the Scots was great, but yet nothing to the number of the Engliſh men. Egeldred himſelf with a fewe other, got a boat and paſſed ouer Ouſe, ſo eſcaping out of the enimies hāds, but the reſt were for the moſt part either taken or ſlaine.

Sueno conuerted to the chriſtian fayth in Scotland.

The Engliſh men put to flight by the Danes.

Egeldred eſcapeth by flight.

Thus

Thus Egeldred being vtterly vanquished and dispairing of al recouerie, fled out of Englande ouer into Normandie, where he was right friendly receyued of Richard as then Duke of Normãdy, & afterwards purchased such fauor there amongst the Normans, that he maried the Ladie Emmie, daughter vnto the sayde Duke, and begot of hir two sonnes, Alured and Edward, as in the English Chronicles more at large it doth appeare.

Sueno hauing thus ouercome his enimies, and now put in possession of the whole realm of England, was in mind to haue destroyed al the English generation, so to establish the kingdom to him and his posteritie for euer, without any impeachment afterwards to be made by such as shuld succeed of them that were then aliue. But the nobles of Englãd aduertised of Suenoes determination, came humbly before his presence, & falling downe on their knees at his feet, besought him in most pitifull wise to haue compassion on their miserable estate, who in times past beeing a most puissant nation, both by sea and lande, were now satisfied (if he would graunt them life) to continue vnder what bondage and seruitude it should stand with his pleasure to prescribe, for they desired neither possession of castels, townes, or other souerainties, but onely to liue with their wiues and children vnder subiection within their owne native Countrey, at the victors will and appointment.

Sueno albeit he was of nature very cruell, yet he qualified his displeasure by this humble submission of the English nobility, in such sort, that he vsed the victorie farre more gently, than at the first he had purposed, cõmaũding that the whole English nation should remaine in the countrey, but in such wise, as by no meanes they shuld presume to beare any armor or weapõ, but to apply thẽselues vnto husbandry, & other seruile occupations vnder the gouernment of the Danes, vnto whom they shuld resigne & deliuer al their castels, forts, & strõg holds, and taking an oth to be true liege men vnto Sueno as their soueraine lord & king: they should bring in (to be deliuered vnto his vse) al their weapon & armor with other munition for the warres, also all their golde and siluer, aswell in plate as coyne. If any of the English men refused thus to do, proclamatiõ was made that he should immediatly lose his life as a rebel & a disobedient person.

The English men were brought to such an extremitie, that they were faine to accept these conditions of peace, for other meane to auoyd present death they knew none. And thus was the dominion of Englãd cõquered by the Danes, after the Saxons had raigned in the same 564. yeares.

529. H.B.

The miserie of the Englishmẽ vnder the bondage of the Danes.

Such tyrannie also after this was vsed by the Danes, that none of the English nation was admitted to any office or rule within the realme eyther spirituall or tẽporall, but were vtterly remoued from the same, and some of them cast in prison and dayly put in hazard of their liues.

Finally, the Englishe men were brought into such miserable thraldome, that euery housholder within the realme, was constrayned to receyue and finde at his owne proper costes & charges one Dane, who should continually giue good watche what was sayde or done in the house, and to aduertise the king thereof, for doubt of conspiracies or treasons to be contriued and practised agaynst his person and royall estate.

This Dane by the good man of the house & his family for honour sake, was called Lord Dane, which word was afterwardes turned to a name of reproch, as where any idle person liued loitring without the vse of some honest exercise to get his liuing withal, ỳ people were & yet are accustomed to cal him a Lordain. This farre out of Hector Boetius we haue shewed of Suenoes doings in Englãd, which although it agree not in al points with our English Hystories, yet sith the Hystorie of Scotlande in this place seemeth partly to hang theron, we haue thought good to set it down as we finde it in the same Boetius: but aduertising the reader with all, that if our hystories bee true, this which followeth touching Suenoes inuading of Scotland chanced before that Egelred whom the Scottish writers name Eldred, was driuen to flee into Normandie. For after that Sueno lastly returned into Englande, and constrayned Egelred so to forsake the lande, he lyued not long after, but departed this life about Candlemasse, in the yere 1014. (as in the English hystory ye may read more at large) not hauing time to make any such iourney into Scotland: so that it may be thought, if he did enterprise any suche exployte there, it was before this his last arriuall in England. But now to proceed according to ỹ which we finde in the forsayd Boetius. Sueno hauing spoyled the English men of their liberties in maner before remembred, or rather brought them to bee com tributaries vnto him, as at the first time of his arriuall here he did in deed, he thought it necessarie for the more suretie of his estate in Englande, to conclude some peace or league with hys neighbors the Normans, Brytains and Scots, vnder condition that they should not support any English man against him. But forsomuch as he could not compasse his intention herein, he furnished al the castels & fortresses on the sea coastes, ouer against Normandie with mē, munition, and vitails, to resist al soden inuasions ỹ might be attempted on that side. And on the other part towards the north, he made al the prouision he could deuise to make mortal warres vpon the Scots: and the more to annoy his enimies, he sent commaundement vnto Olauus his lieutenant in Norway, & to Onetus his deputie in Denmarke, to come with al ỹ power they might leuie into Scotland, to make warres on his enimies there.

Sueno landed here this last time of his cōming forth of Denmarke into England in July, in the yeare. 1013. & departed this life in the beginning of Februarie, in the yeare. 1014.

Sueno prepareth to inuade the Scottes.

Olauus, and Onetus.

Wherupon shortly after those forsaid captains arriued with an huge army in ỹ mouth of Spay, and landed in such puissant order, that the inhabitans of Murreyland fled out of their houses, with their wiues, children, & goodes (such as they could conuey away with them) into places where they thought to remain most out of daunger. But the Danes after their maner burne & spoyle all before them, aswel churches and chappels, as other buildings & edifices. Such of the people as could not flee in time, but by chaunce fell into their handes, were slain without all mercie. Also al the strengthes and holds in the countrey were taken by the Danes, three castels only excepted: that is to wit, Elgin, Forres, and Narne, which the Danes named afterwards Burg, and for that they trusted when the same was won, the other two would yeeld without any further defence, they first layde

Shortly after, there came vnto them Heraldes also from Malcolme, to vnderstand why they had thus inuaded his realm with open and most cruel warre, hauing no occasion giuen by him or his subiects so to do. Who scarcely had done their message, but that they were slaine forthwith by cruel outrage of the Danes.

Malcolme decth ambadours to the Danes.

The Danes slea the Ambassadours.

Malcolme being sore moued to vnderstand the law obserued by all nations for the safetie of messengers to be thus violated by the enimies, kept on his iourney with ỹ more fierce corage, til he came to a medowe a little beside Killos, where he encamped for that night. Great noyse and clamour was heard throughout the armie, euerie man being desirous of battaile, to reuenge the iniuries done by the Danes against their friends & countrey men: notwithstanding on the morrow when they sawe their enimies in farre greater number, and in better order than euer had bin seene by any of them before that time, their hart began to waxe faint, hauing greater care which way to saue their own liues, thā to giue the onset vpō their enimies.

The Scottes through feare are astoned.

Malcolme perceiuing such dread to be entred into the hearts of his people, that they were nowe more like to run away than to fight, if he shoulde bring them forth to battail, got him to a little hil, & calling his nobles about him, he declared vnto

There hath bene triall made in battell with this enimie in our time, both within the bounds of Scotland, & alſo of England, to the great honor & renowne of our elders. What diſcomfitures the Danes haue receyued are yet freſh in memorie, ſo many of them loſing their liues amongeſt vs, that Albion may well be reckened the ſepulture of Danes, as ſome of you can wel record by your owne remēbrance, and other haue heard by report of their forefathers and anceſters. Ye ought then (ſayde he) to be of good courage, rather than to faint now at neede, conſidering yee haue to doe with thoſe enimies, which are but the remaynant of the other, whiche before haue bene vanquiſhed and ouerthrowne by Scottiſh men, both at Loncarte, & in diuerſe other plāces, yea & beſides that, ſuch as moning warres now at this preſent without iuſt occaſion, haue violated the lawes both of God and man, deſerning thereby iuſt vengeance at Gods handes, the puniſher of al ſuch vniuſt offenders. Ther is great hope therfore of victorie (ſaid he) left vnto all ſuch as fight againſt theſe enimies, if we take manly harts vnto vs, and ſhew our ſelues in valiant cōſtancie like to our elders, wherby it ſhall then appeare what outragious folly remained in the Danes, to inuade vs without occaſiō of iniuries preceding. Therefore if ye haue not more regarde to to the ſafetie of your frail bodies, which muſt needes at length periſhe, than to the defence and preſeruation of your cōmon countrey, why paſſe ye not forward, ſith ther is now no place nor time to take longer aduice in the matter, as ye may well vnderſtād by ẏ preſence of ẏ enimie redy to ioyne.

The nobles moued with theſe wordes of their prince, began boldly to exhort their people to battell. Incontinently wherupon roſe ſuch noiſe and raging fury through the army, that without meaſuring either their owne forces or their enimies, they ruſh forth vpō thē without any order or good aray. Olanus & Dnetus beholding the Scots to come thus furiouſly againſt them, boldly encountred them with arrayed battels. Wherupō enſued a right terrible fight, with great manhood ſhewed on both ſides, nothing being let paſſe that might apperteyne to worthy captains, the Scots enforcing themſelues to defend their countrie & auncient liberties, on the one ſide, & the Danes doing their beſt endeuor by valiāt hardineſſe to ſaue their liues & honors on the other. At length after huge murther & ſlaughter made on both parts, ẏ Scots were put to flight, Malcolme was ſore wounded, & had his helmet ſo faſt beaten to his head, that it might not wel be got of, yet was he conueyed out of the field in maner for dead, and kept ſecrete in a wood, til he was ſomwhat amended, and then got him into places out of daunger. The Danes hauing got this victorie, and gathered the ſpoyle of the field, returned to beſiege eftſoones the caſtell of Narne, with more force and violence than before.

The Scottes without order ruſh forth to battaile.

The Scottes put to flight. Malcolme is wounded.

This Caſtell in thoſe dayes was encloſed on eche ſide with the ſea, hauing one narrow paſſage as an entrie vnto it, made by craft of man in maner of a bridge.

Thoſe that were within it, hauing knowledge of the ouerthrow and loſſe of the field, rendred the fortreſſe, on condition that leaning al their armor, weapō, & other munitions behind thē, they might depart w̄ their liues & other goods ſaued. Neuertheles the Danes cōtrary to their faith giuē, being once entred the Caſtell, hanged all thoſe whiche they founde within it ouer the walles, in moſt deſpitefull maner.

Thus was Narne wonne by the Danes, the ſtrongeſt holde within Murrey lande, and ſo garniſhed with men, munition and vytayles, that it was thought impregnable.

Elgyn and Fores left voyde.

Then thoſe ſouldiers which kept Elgyn and Fores, hearing what crueltie the Danes had thus vſed, fled out of thoſe Caſtels, and left them voyd without any perſon to defende them.

The Danes reioyſing at this good fortune, truſted to eſtabliſhe theſelues ſure ſeates in Murrey lande, and therevpon ſent backe their ſhippes into Norway and Denmarke, to fetch frō thence their wyues and children.

In the meane time they conſtrayned ſuche Scottes as they had layde handes on, to reape and inne the corne growing abrode in the fieldes, vnto their vſe and commoditie.

King Malcolme being aduertiſed of all theſe doings, doubting leaſt by the arriual of new ayd, his enimies might waxe more puiſſant, in the beginning of the next ſommer, he aſſembled a great multitude of warriours, and came in good order and moſt warlyke array vnto Murthlake, a town of Mar, where the firſt erection of the Biſhoppes ſea of Abyrden was founded. Here the one armie comming in ſight of the other, they were ſodenly both amazed. For the Scottes hauing had too much experience of the crueltie ſhewed afore time by the Danes, were put in no ſmall feare now at the plaine and open ſight of them. The Danes being farre off from the ſea ſide, and vpon an vnknowne grounde, were more afrayde of ſome guilefull practiſe, than of the open violence and force of their enimies. Yet neuertheleſſe in the ende, by the encouragement of the Captaines on both ſides, they buckled togither with great fiercenelle and moſte cruell malicious hatred on eche hand. In the firſt brunt three valiant Captains, that is to wit, Kenneth of Ila, Gryme of Stratherne, & Patrike of Dunbar, ruſhing ouer fiercely on their enimies, were ſlain, and gaue occaſion to many of the Scottiſhe men to flee, but the place was ſuch, that they coulde not well make theyr courſe any way forth, by reaſon of ẏ narrownelle thereof, fenced on either ſide with deepe trenches full of water and mudde, alſo a trauerſe were layd ſundrie trees, as it had bene of purpoſe to impeach the paſſage, deuiſed in that ſort (as was thought) in time of ſome ciuill warres.

Murthlake.

The Scottes and Danes one afrayde of another.

The Scottes forced to reyre.

Here though Malcolme like a valiant champion, did his beſt to ſtay them that fled, yet was he borne backe with the preaſſe, til he came to ẏ mids of this place, where ſtode a Chappell dedicate in the honour of Saint Molok, the which Malcolm beholding, caſt vp his handes towardes heauen, making his prayer on this wiſe.

Malcolme prayer.

Great God of vertue, rewarder of pietie, and puniſher of ſinne, we thy people ſeeking to defende our native coūtrey graunted to vs of thy beneuolence, as now deſtitute of al mortal help, and thus oppreſſed with the iniurious inuaſion of Danes, do flee vnto thee in this our extreeme neceſſitie, beſeeching thee to haue cōpaſſion vpō our miſerable eſtate: Remoue (oh merciful Lorde) this dreadfull terror frō the people. And oh thou mother of God, the ſicker refuge of mortall people in their diſtreſſe and miſeries: and thou S. Molok to whom this chappel was dedicate, help vs at this preſent, and in the honor of you, I here make a vow to build a cathedral Church for a Biſhops ſea, to remain as a monument to teſtifie vnto our poſterity, that by your ſupport our realme hath bene defended.

To you, that is to God, and our Ladie, and Saint Molok for ſo he vſed them together according to the maner of the time.

Scarcely had Malcolme made an ende of this prayer, when diuerſe of the Nobles with a loude voyce, as though they had bin aſſured ẏ his praier was

was herd, cried to their companies: ſtand good fellowes, for ſurely it is the pleaſure of almightie God, that we returne and renew the battayle againſt our enimies.

Herebpon roſe a wonderfull noyſe amongſt the ſouldiers, ech one encouraging other to withſtand the enimies, and to fight in moſte manfull wiſe in defence of theyr countrey and auncient liberties, and forthwith as it had bene by miracle they returned vpon theyr enimies, making great ſlaughter on eche ſide, without regarde to theyr liues or bloudy woundes, which they boldly and without feare receyued.

Herewith Malcolme alſo with a buſhment of ſtoute warriours came vpon Onetus, who was prauncing vp and downe the fielde without any helmet on his head, as though the Scottes had bene already without recouery clearely diſcomfited, and ſo there was he beaten downe, beſide his horſe, and amongſt the footemen ſlayne out of hande. The reſidue of the Danes beholding the ſlaughter of their Captaine, ſtayed from further purſute on the Scottes. Hereof enſued great boldneſſe to the Scottes and diſcouragement to the Danes. Albeit the batayle continued ſtill a long ſpace, the ſouldiers doyng their beſt on eyther ſide, till at length the Danes were put to flight, many of them being ſlaine, and but fewe taken. Olaus beholding the diſcomfiture of his people, and how his companion in authoritie was ſlayne, fled into Murrayland with a ſmall companie about him. Olaue fleeth into Murrayland.

The next day, Malcolme conſidering what a number of his moſte valiant Captaines he had loſt in this batayle, deuided the ſpoyle of the field amõgſt his men, and ceaſſing from further purſute of the Danes at that time, wente into Angus, where he remayned the reſidue of the yeare within the caſtell of Forfayr, taking counſell with his Nobles touching the publike affayres of the realme, and how to recouer his countrey of Murrayland out of the enimies handes.

King Sueno hearing in the meane time how infortunately his people had ſped thus in Scotland at the batayle of Murthlake, in reuenge thereof determined to inuade the Scottes with two mightie nauies, the one to be rigged in England, & to come forth of the riuer of Tames, & the other to be ſente from Denmarke, one Camus a Dane right expert in warlike knowlege, being appoynted to be gouernour of all the men of warre that ſhould come frõ both thoſe parties. Sueno prepareth a new army to inuade Scotland. Camus appointed Captaine generall of the Danes.

The yeare next enſuyng, both theſe fleetes according to cõmaundement & order giuen, arriued and mette togither within the mouth of the Forth neare to Saint Ebbes head. Saint Ebbes head.

Here Camus going about to lande his men, was kept off by the ſtout reſiſtãce of the Scots, there aſſembled for the ſame intent.

Camus then plucking vp ſayles, directed his courſe vnto the Ile of Sketh, where riding at an anker for the ſpace of one moneth, abiding for ſome proſperous winde, at lẽgth when the ſame came once about, he paſſed from thence vnto the Redbrayes, called in latine Rubrum promontorium, & there landed his whole army, before the countrey coulde be gathered to reſiſt him.

Camus being once landed, got him to the next hill, and beholding the ruines of the towne of Montros, which a few yeares before had bene deſtroyed by the Danes, hee reioyced not a litle for that his chaunce was to come a lande in the ſelfe ſame place, where the Danes had earſt vanquiſhed their enimies, hoping of like lucke in this his enterpryſe and preſent expedition.

After this, he toke his iourney through Angus, ſparing no maner of crueltie that might be deuiſed: Cities, Townes, billages, & Churches, Camus marcheth through Angus.

The rueltie of the Danes.

with all maner of other buildings publike and priuate were consumed with fire.

The towne & church of Brechyn destroyed.

At his coming to Brechyn, for that the castel there in those dayes was of suche strength, that it might not be haskely wõne, he caused the towne and chur che being right fayre and sumptuously builde in honour of the trinitie (to whom it was dedicate) to be spoyled & so rased to the earth, that one stone was not left standing vpon an other.

With these and the semblable cruelties, Camus raging both against God & mã, was finally aduertized that king Malcolme was come to Dundee with all the power of Scotland.

Then sodenly he toke the next way towards the sea side, cõming the day next following vnto a village called Balbrid, where he pitched downe his tentes.

King Malcolme hasteth forewarde to fight with the Danes.

The same day, king Malcolme making all hast possible to succour his subiects, and preserue the countrey frõ the cruel outrage of the Danes, came to the towne of Barre two litle miles frõ the place, where his enimies were encamped. In the morning he drew into the field, in purpose to giue them batale. But before he arraged his batayles, he called his nobles & captains togither, desiring them to consider how they should match in fight against people blinded with vile auarice, liuing on the spoyle & pillage, got by threuery & not by any iust warres: enimies not onely to the Christian faith, but also vnto all innocẽt people, whom they sought vniustly to inuade, without hauing occasiõ so to do, saue only vpon an iniurious meaning to liue by reif of other mennes goodes, wherin they haue no maner of propertie. He willed them therefore, to remember how they were come thus against those enimies in defence of their natiue countrey, appointed vndoubtedly by God to reuenge the cruell iniuries done by the Danes against his name and people that professed the same. They ought not then to measure force in number of souldiers, but rather in manhood and valiancie of harte.

Malcolmes oration.

Camus likewise exhorted his people, not vsing many words, but yet pithie, desiring thẽ to remember how it behoued them either to winne immortall fame by victorie, either els to die with miserie in an vncouth lande, by the hand of their most fierce and cruell enimies.

Camus exhorteth his people.

Herewith Malcolme enbatayling his people, brought them forth strongly raunged in good order to encoũter the Danes, which likewise approched towards him in good array of battell, his harte was filled the more with hope of victorie, for that he had tried sundry times before ẏ force of the enimies in diuers cõflicts & encoũters. For such is the nature of noble & valiãt stomakes, the more experience they haue in honorable enterprises, the more are they kindled in desire to shewe their prowes in famous actes & worthy attẽpts.

The nature of valiaunt and noble stomakes.

The armies herevpon on both sides, fiercely rushing togither, began the battell right cruell & terrible, continuyng certaine houres with suche bloudshed, that the riuer of Lochtee, ranne with a purple hue downe into the Almayne seas.

A bloudy battayle.

The fields also where they fought, though they were full of sande (as the nature of the soyle giueth,) yet were they made moyst by the aboundance of blonde spilled in the same.

Many there were so earnestly bent to be reuenged on the enimie, that after they had their deaths wound, they would runne thẽselues forewarde vpõ the aduersaries weapõ, till they might close with him, enforcing their vttermost powers to dispatch him also: so that diuers were seene to fall to the ground togither fast grasping one an other, & so immediatly both of them to die withall: such brenning hatred kindled theyr harts, that thus were they wholy set on reuenge. At length yet the honor of ẏ field remayned vnto Malcolme.

Malcolme winneth the field.

Camus perceiuing the discõfiture to light on his side, with a final cõpanie about him, thought to haue escaped by flight vnto ẏ next mõtains, but being pursued of his enimies, he was slayne by them ere he was got .ij. miles frõ the place of the batale. The place where he was slayne, is named after him vnto this day, & called Camestone, where is an Obeliske set vp in memory of the thing, with his picture grauen therein, and likewise of those that slewe him. The principal dear of Camus was one Keith, a yong gentelman of right hardy courage, whose seruice in the batayle was very notable, in recompence wherof he was rewarded by K. Malcolme, with sundry lands and fayre possessions in Louthian.

His

His family (ſaith Hector Boetius) hath and doth continue in great honour amongſt Scottiſhmē euen vnto this day, and is decorated with the office of the Marſhalſhip of Scotland, to the high renowme and fame thereof, amongſt the chiefeſt peeres of the realme.

In other companie of the Danes fleing from this ouerthrow were ſlayne at Abirlemnon, not paſt .iiij. miles from Brechyn, where is ſet vp a great ſtone or Obruſke, grauen with certayne characters or letters, to aduertiſe them that paſſe that wayes forth, of this ſlaughter of Danes there made by our worthy elders. The reſidue of the Danes that eſcaped with life from the fielde, hauing certaine Scottiſhmen to their guydes corrupted wᵗ monie fled to their ſhips, declaring to their fellowes what miſhap had fortuned.

King Malcolme after he had obtayned this famous victorie (as before is ſayde) at Barre, he cauſed the ſpoile of the field to be deuided amōgſt his ſouldiers according to the lawes of armes, and then cauſed the dead bodies of the Danes to be buried in the place where the fielde had bene fought, and the bodies of the Scottiſhmē which were found dead, were conueyed vnto places of Chriſtian buriall, and there buried with funerall obſequies in ſundry churches & churchyardes.

There are ſeene many bones of the Danes in thoſe places, where they were buried, there lying bare aboue groūd euen vnto this day, the ſandes as it often chaunceth, being blowen from them.

The other Danes whiche eſcaped to their ſhips, pulled vp ſayles to haue paſſed into Murrayland vnto Olauus, but remayning on the ſeas the ſpace of .iiij. dayes togither, toſſed to and fro by contrary windes, at length by a ſtreyneable eaſt winde, they were driuen vpon the coaſt of Buchquhan, and through wante of conuenable herbrough were in preſent daunger to haue bene caſt away. At length after they had ridden at anker in the Fyrth there, to their great diſpleaſure a long ſpace, and finding no proſperous windes to departe from the ſhore, for that their vitayles began to fayle them, they ſet fiue hundred of their beſt and luſtieſt ſouldiers on land to fetch in ſome bootie or pray of catayle, therewith to relieue their hūger & famine. They that were thus ſent forth being perfectly appoynted with armour and weapon, ranged abrode till they had got togither a great number of beaſtes, with the whiche drawing towardes their ſhippes, they were encountred by the way by Marnachus the Thane of Buchquhane accompanied with the power of that countrey, whoſe force, when they ſaw how they were not well able to reſiſt without ſome aduantage of place, they got them vp into an high cragge, where with tūbling downe ſtones vpon the Scottiſhmen as they mounted vp towardes them, they cauſed them ſomewhat to ſtay, but at length through the earneſt exhortation of Marnachus, the Scots (as people enflamed with wood deſire to be reuenged,) mounted the hill in deſpite of their enimies, though diuers of them were ſlayne in that aſſault. Thoſe whiche wanne the height of the cragge vpon the Danes, made ſuche a cruell batayle with them, that there was not one Dane that eſcaped their handes.

Marnachus Thane of Buchquhane.

This conflict was fought neare vnto Gemmer a village or towne in Buchquhan, where in memorie thereof, lie many greate bones of the Danes to be ſeene, yet euen vnto theſe dayes. It ſhould appeare by the ſame bones, that men in former time were of more huge bowke and ſtature, than they be at this preſent.

The other Danes which were on ſhip borde, vnderſtanding what had happened to their fellowes (becauſe they returned not againe to the ſhippes) ſhippes) ſo ſone as the winde came aboute for their purpoſe, hoyſed vp ſayles, and toke theyr courſe forth right towardes Murraylande.

In the meane time king Sueno hearing of theſe ouerthrowes whiche his people had in ſuch ſort receyued at the Scottiſhmens handes, as a prince of a right haulte courage, not lightly ouercome with any aduerſe fortune, made preparation in all ſpeedy wiſe to be reuenged, appointing his brother Canute, as then hauing the adminiſtration of Denmarke, to come from thence with a newe fleete and army againſt the Scots.

Sueno prepareth the third time to inuade Scotland.

Canute brother vnto Sueno, appointed generall to come againſt the Scottes.

It is ſayd that this Canute according to order preſcribed him by his brother Sueno, landed firſt in Buchquhane, and deſtroyed a great parte of that countrey by fire and ſworde, in reuenge of the ſlaughter of his countrey men the Danes, whiche had bene there made lately before.

Malcolme ſore kindled in wrath by theſe iniuries, though through cõtinuance of the warres his power was greatly decayed, yet did hee aſſemble an army with all ſpeede he could deuiſe, & marched with the ſame towardes the Danes, in purpoſe to ſtay them with often ſkirmiſhes and light encounters, but in nowiſe to ieoparde with them in any pight field or generall bataile, for feare leaſt if he had the ouerthrow, he ſhoulde not be able to furniſh a new power for defence of his countrey, againſt the rage of the enimies.

King Malcolmes determination.

For the ſpace therfore of .xv. dayes togither, there was often ſkirmiſhing betwixt the parties, the which terme being expired, the Scots beholding ſo huge murder of theyr countreymen and frendes, with the ſpoile of the fieldes, and deſtruction of the townes and billages, brenning and blaſing on eche ſide before theyr faces, they come to king Malcolme, & deſired him that he woulde graunt them licence to fight with theyr enimies, proteſting plainely, that if he would not conſent thereto, they woulde giue bataple at their owne choyce. Malcolme perceiuing ỹ ernell myndes of his people to encounter their enimies in playne fielde, and that he might no longer protracte the time, he graunted theyr petition, and therewith beſechyng them to remember theyr honors and duties: incontinently the onſet was giuen with great hatred and malice on eyther parte, ſo that moſte egerly continuyng in fight a long time, they enforſed themſelues to rid eche other out of lyfe, ſo that all the nobles wel neare on both ſides were ſlayne, the name of victorie rather, than the victorie it ſelfe remaynyng with the Scots, who were ſo feeble and fainte with long fight and ſlaughter, that in the end of the battell they were not able to purſue thoſe few of the Danes, which eſcaping with life fledde faintly out of the fielde.

The Scottiſhmens requeſt, vnto their king, for licence to fight.

The onſet is giuen.

The Scottes wan the name of victorie, rather than victorie it ſelfe.

And ſo for that night, which followed the day of this bloudie bataple, they lodged here and there in ſeuerall places, at aduenture aſwell as they might.

On the morow after, when it was vnderſtoode on bothe parties, what loſſe they had ſuſtayned, their myndes were conuerted rather to peace than to renewe bataple, bicauſe they were not of power longer to maintaine it. Wherupon by mediation of ſuch as toke vpon them to treat a peace, the ſame was concluded with theſe articles.

Peace concluded for want of power to maintayne bataple.

First that the Danes ſhoulde departe out of Murrayland, Buthquhan, & all other the bounds of Scotland.

The articles of the peace, betwixt Danes and Scottiſhmen.

That the warres ſhoulde clearely ceaſſe betwixt the Danes and Scottiſhmen, during the naturall liues of Sueno and Malcolme, or eyther of them.

That neither of thoſe two nations ſhoulde ayde or in any wiſe ſuppoꝛte the others enimies.

That the fielde where the laſt bataple was fought, ſhould be hallowed for Chriſtian burial, within the whiche, the Danes that were ſlayne

in

in the ſame batayle, ſhould be buried, & a churche to be builte there, and landes appointed forth for the maintenance of prieſts, to celebrate there accoꝛding to the oꝛder of the Chriſtian religiō then vſed by both the people, foꝛ the Danes lately beꝛe that ſeaſon had alſo receyued the faith.

This peace being ratefied by the ſolēne othes of both the kings Sueno and Malcolme, Canute with his Danes reſigning vp the poſſeſſion of ſuch holdes and places, as they held in Murrayland, Buchquhan, oꝛ els where within any parte of the Scottiſh dominions, got him to his fleete, & departed with the ſame home into Denmarke.

King Malcolme hauing thus reſtoꝛed his countrey vnto ioyfull peace, thought nothing ſo good as to perfoꝛme the articles of the agreemēt accoꝛded betwixt him and the Danes, and theꝛfoꝛe cauſed a Churche to be builded in the place appointed, dedicating the ſame in honour of S. Olauus patrone of Denmarke and Noꝛway, to ſignifie vnto ſuch as came after, that ſundꝛy nobles of the Danes lay buried in that Church. In memoꝛy hereof, the landes that were giuen to the ſame Churche, are called euen yet vnto theſe dayes Crowdan, which ſignifieth as much as if ye ſhould ſay, The ſlaughter of Danes.

The Church which was firſte builded there, chaunceing as often happeneth in thoſe parties, to be ouerreall with ſandes, an other was erected in place not farre off, hauing a moꝛe commodious ſite.

Sundꝛy of the bones of them that were buried in this place, being left bare by reaſon that the ſandes were blowen away beſides them, Hector Boetius the wꝛyter of the Scottiſh chꝛonicle, beheld in the yeare. 1521. whiche ſeemed moꝛe lyke vnto Giants bones, than to menne of common ſtature (as he auoucheth) whereby it ſhoulde appeare, that men in olde time were of much greater ſtature and quantitie of bodie, than any that are to be found in theſe our dayes.

Malcolme being thus deliuered of his enimies the Danes, cauſed publike prayers generally to be made throughout the realme, in rendꝛing thanks to almightie God, that it had pleaſed him to deliuer his people from the troubles of warre. He toke oꝛder alſo, that churches ſhoulde be repayꝛed, which by the enimies in time of the warres had bene deſtroyed.

And further he cauſed the adminiſtratiō of the lawes and holeſome oꝛdinaunces of the realme to be vſed and put in pꝛactiſe, accoꝛding to the due foꝛme of the ſame, which many yeares afoꝛe could haue no place, by reaſon of the warres.

He cauſed an aſſemble of all the eſtates of his realme, to be called at Bertha, a caſtell in thoſe dayes ſtanding not farre from the place where the towne of Perth nowe ſtandeth. In whiche conuention were many things enacted, both foꝛ the ſetting foꝛth of Goddes honour and the weale of the realme, whereby Malcolme wanne much pꝛayſe amongſt his ſubiectes, to the eternall memoꝛie of his name.

After this, ſuppoſing it moſte honoꝛable to aduaunce the bloud of ſuch as had ſerued well in the laſte warres, oꝛ had their fathers oꝛ other frendes ſlaine in the ſame, he called a parliament at Scone, in the whiche cauſing partition to be made of the realme, by deuiding it into Baronnies, he beſtowed the ſame amongſt the nobles accoꝛding to the qualitie of euery one his meꝛites, reſeruing in maner nothing to the maintenance of the croꝛwne, common entries onely excepted, with the mountayne wherein the marble chaire ſtood, and a fewe other poſſeſſions whiche he purpoſed to giue vnto churches and chapels.

Diuiſion of the realme into Baronnies.

The nobles on the other parte, to the ende the king might haue ſufficient wherewith to maintayne his royall eſtate, graunted vnto him and his ſucceſſours foꝛ euer, the cuſtodie and wardſhip of theyꝛ heyꝛes, if they chaunced to die leauing them vnder the age of. xxj. yeares: and in the meane time till the ſame heyꝛes came to the ſayd age, they agreed that the king & his ſucceſſours ſhoulde enioy the vſe and pꝛofites of theyꝛ landes, whether they were men oꝛ women, and when they came to the age of. xxj. yeares, that then they ſhould enter into the poſſeſſion of their landes, yeelding vnto him oꝛ his ſucceſſours one yeares rent in name of a relefe, and if they chaūced not to be maried befoꝛe their fathers deceaſſe, thē alſo ſhould they marie at the kings appointment, oꝛ els compounde with him foꝛ the ſame.

The wardſhip of heyres graunted to the king.

Mariage of wardes.

Thus ended the parliament foꝛ that ſeaſon with great ioy and comfoꝛte on eche hande, foꝛ that the king had ſhewed ſuche liberall bounteouſneſſe towardes his Barones, and they no leſſe mindefull of their dueties had declared ſuche benеuolent hartes, as appeared in that theyꝛ free and large gifte graunted in foꝛme and maner as befoꝛe is expreſſed.

Neyther did Malcolme foꝛget the bowe, whiche he made at Murthlake, when he was in daunger to haue receyued the ouerthꝛow at the handes of the Danes, foꝛ accoꝛding to the ſame bowe, he cauſed a church to be buylt in the ſame place, erecting a Biſhops ſee there, and endowed it with the landes and poſſeſſions of theſe thꝛee places, Murthlake, Cleometh, and Dunmeth, with all Eccleſiaſticall iuriſdictions and tithes apperteyning thereto.

The ſea of Murthlake, otherwiſe Aberden.

The Biſhops that ſat in this ſee, were called the Biſhops of Murthlake till the dayes of king Dauid the firſt, who chaunging the name, cauſed them to be called the Biſhops of Abyꝛdene, augmen-

augmēting the see with sundry fayre reuenewes to the better mayntenance thereof.

Malcolme thus hauing purchased reste from further troubles of warre, gouerned the realme a certain time after in good order of iustice, & caused a booke to be set forth, called Regiam maiestatem, conteyning the lawes & ordinances, wherby the realme shoulde be gouerned: and assigning forth in the same what fees also should be giuen vnto the Chauncellour, Secretarie, Constable, Merschall, Chamberlayne, Justice, Treasorer, Register, Comptroller, & other the officers of his house. Such princely doings and noble vertues were found in this Malcolme for a season, that if the same had continued with him in his later age, there had neuer reygned any king in Scotland, that might haue bene thought to haue passed him in worthy fame: neuerthelesse his excellent qualities were stayned at length by that reprochfull vice of vile auarice. For as it oft times happeneth, couetousnesse and age layde holde on him bothe at once. He then beganne to repent in that he had bene so liberall in giuing away his landes to his Barones, and to recouer the same agayne, hee surmused fayned matter by vntrue suggestions agaynst diuers of the chiefest Nobles, putting some to death and banishing other, that he might by this meanes enioy theyr lands and goodes as confiscate to the crowne for theyr supposed offences.

The boke called Regia maiestas.

Couetousnesse and age vsing to.

Malcolme cruelties purchaseth.

The nobles hauing great indignation at such crueltie vsed by the king against them and theyr lynage, and that vpon no iuste causes, but onely vpon forged deuises, they conspired in sundry meetings secretely appointed amongst them, to finde some meanes to dispatch him out of life.

The conspiracie of the scottish nobilitie against Malcolme.

At length he chaunced to haue some inckling whereabout they went, and doubting to fall into their handes, fled for sauegarde of his lyfe vnto Glammis, where diuers of the conspiratours were brought into his lodging, by some of his owne householde seruantes, and there slew him in reuenge of their freendes, whom he before had wrongfully put to death. These murtherers with their complices incontinently fled with all speede possible to auoyde further daūger for this their act, but missing their way, for ẏ the ground was quite couered as then with snowe, they finally came to the Loch of Forfayr, which was the same time frosen ouer. They therefore thinking to passe ouer it, when they came into the midst, the Isse brake vnder thē, so that sinking in, they were finally drowned. Howbeit their bodies were afterwards drawē forth of the Loche with dragges, and dismembred, and the heads and quarters were sente vnto diuers townes of the realme, and there hung vp for a signification of their wicked treason.

Malcolme slayne at Glāmis.

The murtherers drowned.

This was the ende of king Malcolme in the xxxij. yeare of his reygne, if ye reckon from the death of Constantine, or xxv. after the death of Grime, and after the incarnation of our saiuour 1034. yeares. He was buried in Colmekill with his auncestours. 1040.

In this season were seene many wonders and straunge sightes in Albion. On Christmas day there was an earthquake, and a great rifte of the earth made therewith in the middest of Strecelyng towne, out of the which issued such an abundant streame of water, that it bare away the next wood that was adioyning vnto the ryuer of Forth.

Strange sightes.

In the sommer the sea rose higher, and flowed further into the land, than euer had bene seene at any other time.

On midsomer day whiche is the feast day of Saint Johns Baptist, there was suche a vehement frosse, that the corne and other fruytes of the the earth were blaſted and killed, ſo that thereupon followed a great dearth in al the countrey.

After Malcolme ſucceeded his Nephew Duncan, the ſonne of his doughter Beatrice: for Malcolme had two daughters, ẏ one which was this Beatrice, being giuen in mariage vnto one Abbanath Crinen, a man of great nobilitie, and Thane of the Iles and weſt partes of Scotlande, bare of that mariage the forelayd Duncan: The other called Doada, was maried vnto Synell the Thane of Glammis, by whom ſhe had iſſue one Makbeth a baliant gẽtleman, and one that if he had not bene ſomewhat cruell of nature, might haue bene thought moſt worthie the gouernmẽt of a realme. On the other parte, Duncan was ſo ſofte and gentle of nature, that the people wiſhed the inclinations & maners of theſe two couſines to haue bene ſo tempered and enterchaungeably beſtowed betwixt them, that where the one had to much of clemẽcie, and the other of crueltie, the meane vertue betwixt theſe two extremities, might haue reygned by indifferent particion in them bothe, ſo ſhoulde Duncan haue proued a worthy king, and Makbeth an excellent captaine.

The beginning of Duncanes reigne was very quiet & peaceable, without any notable trouble, but after it was perceyued how negligent he was in puniſhing offenders, many miſruled perſons toke occaſion thereof to trouble the peace and quiet ſtate of the common wealth, by ſeditious commotions whiche firſte had theyr beginnings in this wiſe.

Banquho the Thane of Lochquhaber, of whõ the houſe of the Stewardes is diſcended, the whiche by order of lynage hath nowe for a long time enioyed the crowne of Scotlande, euen till theſe our dayes, as he gathered the finaunces due to the king, and further puniſhed ſomewhat ſharpely ſuche as were notorious offenders, being aſſayled by a number of rebelles inhabiting in that countrey, and ſpoyled of the money and all other things, had muche ado to get away with life after he had receyued ſundry grieuous woundes amongſt them. Yet eſcaping theyr handes after he was ſomewhat recouered of his hurtes and was able to ride, he repayred to the courte, where making his complaint to the king in moſt earneſt wiſe, he purchaſed at length that the offenders were ſente for by a Sergeant at armes, to appeare to make aunſwere vnto ſuche matter as ſhoulde be layde to theyr charge, but they augmenting theyr miſchieuous acte with a more wicked deede, after they had miſuſed the meſſenger with ſundry kindes of reproches, they finally ſlew him alſo.

A mutenie amongſt the people of Lochquhaber.

A ſergeant at armes, ſlayne by the rebels.

Then doubting not but for ſuche contemptuous demeanour againſt the kings regall authoritie, they ſhoulde be inuaded with all the power the king coulde make, Makdowalde one of great eſtimation amongſt them making firſt a confederacie with his neareſt frendes and kinſmen, toke vpon him to be chiefe captayne of all ſuche rebelles, as woulde ſtande againſt the king, in maintenance of theyr grieuous offences lately cõmitted againſt him. Many ſlanderous wordes alſo, & rayling taunts this Makdowald vttered againſt his prince, calling him a fayntharted milkeſop, more meete to gouerne a ſort of idle monkes in ſome cloyſter, than to haue ẏ rule of ſuche baliant and hardy men of warre as the Scottes were.

He vſed alſo ſuche ſubtile perſwaſions and forged allurements, that in a ſmall time he had got togither a mightie power of men: for out of the weſterne Iſles, there came vnto him a great multitude of people, offering themſelues to aſſiſt him in that rebellious quarell, and out of Ireland in hope of the ſpoyle came no ſmall nũber of Kernes & Galloglaſſes offering gladly to ſerue vnder him, whither it ſhoulde pleaſe him to lead them. Makdowald thus hauing a mightie puyſſaunce about him, encountred with ſuche of the kings people as were ſet againſt him into Lochquhabir, and diſcomfiting them, by fine force toke theyr captaine Malcolme, and after the end of the bataple ſmote of his head.

Makdowald diſcomfiteth the kings power.

This ouerthrow beyng notified to the king, did put him in wonderfull feare, by reaſon of his ſmall ſkill in warlyke affayres. Calling therfore his nobles to a counſell, willed them of their beſt aduiſe for the ſubduing of Makdowald and other the rebelles.

The ſmal ſkil of the king in warlike affayres.

Here in ſundry heades (as it euer happeneth) being ſundry opinions, whiche they vttered according to euery man his ſkill, at length Makbeth, ſpeaking muche againſt the kings ſoftneſſe, & ouer muche ſlacknes in puniſhing offenders, whereby they had ſuch time to aſſemble togither, he promiſed notwithſtanding, if the charge were committed vnto him and to Banquho, ſo to order the mater, that the rebelles ſhould be ſhortly banquiſhed and quite put downe, and that not ſo much as one of them ſhoulde be founde to make reſiſtance within the countrey.

Makbeth ſeter.

And euen ſo came it to paſſe: for being ſente forth with a newe power, at his entring into Lochquhaber, the fame of his cõming put ẏ enimies in ſuche feare, that a great number of them ſtale ſecretely away from theyr captaine Makdowald, who neuertheleſſe enforſed thereto, gaue bataple vnto Makbeth, with the reſidue whiche remained with him, but being ouercome and fleing for refuge into a caſtell (within the whiche hys wyfe and chyldren were incloſed,) at length when he ſaw how he coulde neyther defend the hold any longer againſt his enimies, nor yet vpon ſurrender be ſuffered to depart with lyfe ſaued, he firſt ſlew his wife & children, and laſtly himſelfe, leaſt if he had yeelded ſimply, he ſhoulde haue bene executed in moſt cruell wiſe for an example to other.

Makbeth ſent againſt the rebelles.

The rebelles forſake their captayne.

Makdowald ſleeth his wife and children and laſtly himſelfe.

Makbeth entring into the caſtel by the gates, as then ſet open, founde the carkaſe of Makdowald lying dead there amongſt the reſidue of the ſlaine bodies, whiche when he beheld, remitting no peece of his cruell nature with that pitifull ſight, he cauſed the head to be cut off, and ſet vpõ a powles ende, & ſo ſent it as a preſent to the king who as then lay at Bertha.

Makbeths crueltie.

The headleſſe trunke he commaunded to be hong vp vpõ an high payre of gallowes. Them of the Weſterne Iſles, ſuyng for pardon in that they had ayded Makdowald in his trayterous enterpryſe, he fined at great ſummes of money: and thoſe whom he toke in Lochquhabir, being come thither to beare armure againſt the king, he put to execution.

Herevpon the Iſland men conceyued a deadly grudge towards him, calling him a couenant breaker, a bloudy tyrant, and a cruell murtherer of them, whom the kings mercie had pardoned. With whiche reprochfull wordes Makbeth being kindled in wrathfull yre againſt them, had paſſed ouer with an army into the Iſles, to haue taken reuenge vpon them for theyr liberall talke, had he not bene otherwayes perſwaded by ſome of his frendes, and partely pacified by giftes preſented

Thus was iuſtice and lawe reſtored againe to the old accuſtomed courſe by the diligent meanes of Makbeth. Immediatly whereupon worde came that Sueno king of Norway was arriued in Fyfe with a puyſant army to ſubdue the whole realme of Scotland.

But here to the intent it may be the better perceyued, what this Sueno was I will ſomewhat touch from whence he diſcended.

That Sueno whiche (as ye haue heard) conquered the realme of England, being alſo king of Denmarke and Norway had iij. ſonnes, Harold, Sueno, & Canute, the firſte he ordeyned to be king of England, the ij. king of Norway, and the third king of Denmarke.

Harolde enioyed not the ſame dominion of England paſſing iij. yeares after his fathers deceaſſe, but was ſlayne by Ethelred or Egelred, whom his father Sueno had chaſed into Normandie. Howbeit yet the ſame Ethelred kept not long the kingdome in peace, for Canute king of Denmarke to reuenge his brothers death, landed in England with a mighty hoſte, and ſleayng Ethelred, recouered the kingdome to the vſe of the Danes, but yet one Edmond ſonne to the foreſayde Ethelred, ſurnamed Ironſide, mayntayned the warre agaynſt Canute for a ſeaſon, till at length by bothe theyr conſentes, they agreed to fight a combat ſingularly man to man, ſo to trie the mater betwixt them, who ſhould reigne as king ouer the Engliſhmē.

Edmund Ironſide.

This partely agreeth with our writers.

In this fight when they had continued a long ſpace, and ſhewed right notable proues of theyr manhood: Edmund (ſayth Canute) ſithe it hath pleaſed almighty God, ẏ thou ſhouldſt thus trie the force of my hande without hurte or wound, I thinke it be likewiſe his pleaſure, that thou ſhouldeſt enioy parte of the realme, go to therefore, I receyue thee as partener with me in the kingdome, ſo that (if thou be ſo contented) let vs diuide the kingdome betwixte vs without any more contention.

Canutes words to Edmond Ironſide.

Edmund gladly accepted this condition of agreement, ſuppoſing it better to haue halfe the kingdome, than to ſtande to the doubtfull triall of loſing the whole, for he had receyued a wound at Canutes handes, though Canute vnderſtode not ſo muche: agayne he foreſaw that occaſion hereafter might be offered, whereby he might without all trouble come to enioy the whole.

So herevpon eyther of them lept beſide theyr weried horſes in that fierce and earneſt fight. and embracing eche other became good frendes, in deuiding the realme accordyng to the aboue mencioned motion of Canute. That parte of England that lieth ouer againſt Fraunce, was aſſigned vnto Canute, & the other that is the northy partes vnto Edmund. In the meane time Emma the wife of Ethelred, with hyr two ſonnes (whiche ſhee had by the ſame Ethelred) Alured and Edward, fled ouer into Normandie, doubting leaſt this cōcorde betwixt Canute and Edmund ſhould turne finally to hyr aduauncemēt.

But now touching the arriuall of Sueno the Norwaygian king in Fyfe, as before is expreſſed, ye ſhall vnderſtand, that the pretence of his comming was to reuenge the ſlaughter of his vncle Camus and other of the Daniſhe nation ſlayne at Barre, Crowdane, and Gemmer.

The crueltie of this Sueno was ſuche, that he neyther ſpared man, woman, nor childe, of what age, condition or degree ſo euer they were, whereof when king Duncane was certified, hee ſet all ſlouthfull and lingering delayes aparte, and began to aſſemble an army in moſte ſpeedy wiſe, like a right valiant Captayne: for oftentimes it happeneth, that a dull cowarde, and ſlouthfull perſon conſtrayned by neceſſitie, becō-meth right hardie and actiue. Therefore when his whole power was come togither, he deuided the ſame into three batayles. The firſte was led by Makbeth, the ſeconde by Banquho, and the king himſelfe gouerned in the mayne bataple or middlewarde, wherein were appoynted to attende his perſon the moſte parte of all the reſidue of the Scottiſhe nobilitie.

The Scottiſhe army deuided into three batayles.

The army of Scottiſhmen beyng thus ordered, came vnto Culros, where encountring with the enimies, after a long and cruell foughten batayle, Sueno remayned victorious, and Malcolme with his Scottes diſcomfited. Howbeit the Danes were ſo broken by this batayle, that they were not able to make long chaſe on theyr enimies, but kepte themſelues all night in order of batayle, for doubte leaſt ẏ Scots aſſembling togither againe, might haue ſet vpon them at ſome aduantage.

Sueno vanquiſheth the Scottes.

On the morrow when the fieldes were diſcouered, and that it was perceyued how no enimies were to be founde abroade, they gathered the ſpoyle, whiche they deuided amongſt them, according to the lawe of armes.

Then was it ordeyned by commaundement of Sueno, that no Souldier ſhoulde hurte either man, woman, or childe, excepte ſuche as were founde with weapon in hande ready to make reſiſtance, for he hoped now to conquere the realme without further bloudſhed.

Suenoes commaundement to ſpare fire & ſworde.

But when knowledge was giuē how Duncane was fled to the caſtell of Bertha, and that Makbeth was gathering a new power to withſtand the incurſions of the Danes, Sueno raiſed his tentes and comming to the ſayd caſtell layde a ſtrong ſiege rounde about it. Duncane ſeyng himſelfe thus enuironned by his enimies, ſent a ſecrete meſſage by counſell of Banquho vnto Makbeth, commaunding him to abide at Inchecuthill, till hee hearde from him ſome other newes.

Duncane fled to the caſtel of Bertha.

Sueno beſiegeth king Malcolme.

In the meane time Duncane fell in fayned cōmunication with Sueno as though he would haue yelded vp the Caſtell into his handes vnder certaine conditions, and this did he to dyne time, and to put his enimies out of all ſuſpition of any enterpryſe ment againſt them, till all things were brought to paſſe that might ſerue for the purpoſe.

Fayned treatie.

At length when they were fallen at a poynt for rendring vp the holde, Duncane offered to ſende forth of the caſtell into the campe greate prouiſion of vitayles to refreſh the army, whiche offer was gladly accepted of the Danes for that they had bene in greate penurie of ſuſtenaunce many dayes before.

The Scots herevpon toke the iuyce of Mekilwort beries, & mixed the ſame in theyr ale and bread, ſending it thus ſpiced and confectioned in great abundance vnto their enimies.

Spyced cuppes prepared for the Danes.

They reioyſing that they had got meate and drinke ſufficient to ſatiſfie theyr bellies, fell to eating and drinking after ſuch greedy wiſe, that it ſeemed they ſtroue who might deuoure & ſwallow vp moſt, till the operation of the beries ſpred in ſuche ſorte through all the partes of their bodies, that they were in the ende brought into a faſt dead ſleepe, that in maner it was impoſſible to awake them.

The Danes ouercome with drinke, fall a ſleepe.

Then forthwith Duncane ſent vnto Makbeth, commaunding him with all diligence to come and ſet vpon the enimies, being in eaſie poynte to be ouercome.

Makbeth making no delay came with his people to the place, where his enimies were lodged, & firſt killing the watche, afterwards entred the campe, and made ſuche ſlaughter on all ſides without any reſiſtance, that it was a wonderfull matter to behold, for the Danes were ſo heauy of ſleepe, that the moſt parte of them were ſlayne & neuer ſtyred: other that were awakened eyther by the noyſe or otherwayes forth, were ſo amazed and dyzzie headed vpon their wakening, that they were not able to make any defence, ſo that of the whole numbers there eſcaped no moe but onely Sueno himſelfe and tenne other perſons, by whoſe help he got to his ſhippes lying at rode in the mouth of Tay.

Makbeth aſſayleth the campe of the Danes, being ouercome with drinke & ſleepe.

The ſlaughter of Danes.

Sueno with ten other eſcaped.

The moſt parte of the mariners, when they heard what plentie of meate and drinke the Scottes had ſente vnto the campe, came from the ſea thyther to bee partakers thereof, and ſo were ſlayne amongſt theyr fellowes: by meanes whereof when Sueno perceyued howe through lacke of mariners he ſhoulde not be able to conuey away his naule, hee furniſſhed one ſhippe throughly with ſuche as were lefte, and in the ſame ſayled backe into Norway, curſing the tyme that hee ſet forewarde on this infortunate iourney.

Sueno fleeth with one ſhip leauing the reſidue of his naule behinde him.

The other ſhippes whiche hee lefte behinde him within three dayes after his departure from thence, were toſſed ſo togyther by violence of an Eaſt winde, that beatyng and ruſhyng one againſt an other they ſuncke there, and lie in the ſame place euen vnto theſe dayes, to the greate daunger of other ſuche ſhippes as come on that coaſte, for being couered with the ſlouddе when the tide commes, at the ebbyng againe of the ſame, ſome parte of them appeare aboue water.

was

was right diſpleaſant to him and his people, as ſhoulde appeare in that it was a cuſtome many yeares after, that no Knightes were made in Norway, excepte they were firſte ſworne to reuenge the ſlaughter of theyr countreymen and frendes thus ſlayne in Scotland.

The Scottes hauing wonne ſo notable a victory, after they had gathered and diuided the ſpoyle of the fielde, cauſed ſolemne proceſſions to be made in all places of the realme, and thankes to be giuen to almightie God, that had ſent them ſo fayre a day ouer their enimies.

But whyleſt the people were thus at theyr proceſſions, worde was brought that a newe fleete of Danes was arriued at Kingcorne, ſent thyther by Canute king of England in reuenge of his brothers Sucnoes ouerthrow.

To reſiſt theſe enimies, whiche were already landed, and buſie in ſpoiling the countrey, Makbeth and Banquho were ſente with the kings authoritie, who hauing with them a conuenient power, encountred the enimies, ſlewe parte of them, and chaſed the other to their ſhippes. They that eſcaped and got once to theyr ſhippes, obtayned of Makbeth for a great ſumme of golde, that ſuche of theyr frendes as were ſlaine at this laſt bickering might be buried in Saint Colmes Inche. In memorie whereof, many olde Sepulturs are yet in the ſayde Inche, there to be ſeene grauen with the armes of the Danes, as the maner of burying noble men ſtill is, and heretofore hath bene vſed.

A peace concluded betwixt Scottes and Danes.

A peace was alſo concluded at the ſame time betwixte the Danes and Scottiſhmen, ratified as ſome haue written in this wiſe. That from thence forth the Danes ſhoulde neuer come into Scotlande to make any warres againſt the Scottes by any maner of meanes.

And theſe were the warres that Duncane had with forrayne enimies in the ſeuenth yeare of his reygne.

Shortly after happened a ſtraunge and vncouth wonder, whiche afterwarde was the cauſe of muche trouble in the realme of Scotlande as ye ſhall after heare. It fortuned as Makbeth & Banquho iourneyed towarde Fores, where the king as then lay, they went ſporting by the way togither without other companie, ſaue only themſelues, paſſing through the woodes and fieldes, when ſodenly in the middes of a laude, there met them .iij. women in ſtraunge & ferly apparell, reſembling creatures of an elder worlde, whom when they attentiuely beheld, wondering much at the ſight, The firſt of them ſpake & ſayde: All hayle Makbeth Thane of Glammis (for he had lately entred into that dignitie and office by the death of his father Synel.) The .ij. of them ſaid: Hayle Makbeth Thane of Cawder: but the third ſayde: All hayle Makbeth that hereafter ſhall be king of Scotland.

The propheſie of three wome ſuppoſing to be the weird ſiſters or feiries.

Then Banquho, what maner of women (ſaith he) are you, that ſeeme ſo litle fauourable vnto me, where as to my fellow here, beſides highe offices, ye aſſigne alſo the kingdome, appointyng forth nothing for me at all? Yes ſayth the firſte of them, wee promiſe greater benefites vnto thee, than vnto him, for he ſhall reygne in deede, but with an vnluckie ende: neyther ſhall he leaue any iſſue behinde him to ſucceede in his place, where contrarily thou in deede ſhalt not reygne at all, but of thee thoſe ſhall be borne whiche ſhall gouerne the Scottiſhe kingdome by long order of continuall diſcent. Herewith the foreſayde women vaniſhed immediatly out of theyr ſight. This was reputed at the firſt but ſome vayne fantaſticall illuſion by Makbeth and Banquho, in ſo muche that Banquho wouldo call Makbeth in ieſte kyng of

A thing to wonder at.

Banquho the father of many kings.

Scotland, and Makbeth againe would call him in ſporte likewiſe, the father of many kings. But afterwards the common opinion was, that theſe women were eyther the weird ſiſters, that is (as ye would ſay) ỹ Goddeſſes of deſtinie, or els ſome Nimphes or Feiries, endewed with knowledge of prophecie by their Nicromanticall ſcience, becauſe euery thing came to paſſe as they had ſpoken.

The Thane of Cawder condemned of treaſon. Makbeth made by Thane of Cawder.

For ſhortly after, the Thane of Cawder being condemned at Forres of treaſon againſt the king committed, his landes, liuings and offices were giuen of the kings liberalitie vnto Makbeth.

The ſame night after, at ſupper Banquho ieſted with him and ſayde, now Makbeth thou haſte obtayned thoſe things which the two former ſiſters prophecied, there remaineth onely for thee to purchaſe that which the third ſayd ſhould come to paſſe.

Makbeth deuiſeth how he might attaine the kingdom.

Whereupon Makbeth reuoluing the thing in his minde, began euen then to deuiſe howe he might attayne to the kingdome: but yet hee thought with himſelfe that he muſt tary a time, whiche ſhoulde aduaunce him thereto (by the diuine prouidence) as it had come to paſſe in his former preferment.

The daughter of Syward erle of Northumberland, wife to king Duncane.

But ſhortly after it chaunced that king Duncane hauing two ſonnes by his wife which was the daughter of Syward Earle of Northumberland, he made the elder of them cleped Malcolme prince of Cumberlande, as it were thereby to appoint him his ſucceſſor in the kingdome, immediatly after his deceaſſe.

Makbeth troubled herewith, for that he ſawe by this meanes his hope ſore hindered, (where by the olde lawes of the realme, the ordinance was, that if he that ſhoulde ſucceede were not of able age to take the charge vpon himſelfe, he that was nexte of bloud vnto him, ſhoulde be admitted) he beganne to take counſell howe he might vſurpe the kingdome by force, hauing a iuſte quarell ſo to do (as he toke the mater,) for that Duncane did what in him lay to defraude him of all maner of title and clayme, whiche hee might in tyme to come, pretende vnto the crowne. Makbeth dieth which way he might take the kingdome by.

Propheſies moue men vnlawfully to attempts.

The wordes of the three weird ſiſters alſo, (of whome before ye haue heard) greatly encouraged him hereunto, but ſpecially his wife lay ſore vpon him to attempt the thing, as ſhe that was very ambitious brenning in vnquenchable deſire to beare the name of a Queene.

Women deſirous of high eſtate.

At length therefore communicating his purpoſed intent with his truſtie frendes, amongſt whom Banquho was the chiefeſt, vpon confidence of theyr promiſed ayde, he ſlewe the king at Enuernes, (or as ſome ſay at Botgoluane,) in the. vj. yeare of his reygne. Makbeth ſleeth king Duncane.

Then hauing a companie about him of ſuch as he had made priuie to his enterpryce, he cauſed himſelfe to be proclaymed king, and forthwith went vnto Scone, where by common conſent, he receyued the inueſture of the kingdome accoꝛding to the accuſtomed maner. Makbeth ſeeth the crowne.

The bodie of Duncane was firſte conueyed vnto Elgyne, and there buried in kingly wiſe, but afterwardes it was remoued and conueyed vnto Colmekill, and there layd in a ſepulture amongſt his predeceſſours in the yeare after the birth of our Sauiour. 1040.

Duncanes buriall. 1046. H.B.

Malcolme Cammoꝛe and Donald Bane the ſonnes of king Duncane, for feare of theyr liues (whiche they might well know ỹ Makbeth would ſeeke to bring to end for his more ſure confirmatiõ in the eſtate) fled into Cũberlãd, where Malcolme remained til time that S. Edward ỹ ſonne of king Ethelꝛed recouered the dominion of England from the Daniſh power, the whiche Malcolme Cammoꝛe Donald Bane flee into Cũberland.

Edward

Edward receyued Malcolme by way of moste freendly entertaynement, but Donald passed ouer into Ireland, where he was tenderly cherished by the king of that lande.

Makbeth after the departure thus of Duncanes sonnes vsed great liberalitie towardes the nobles of the realme, thereby to winne their fauour, & when he saw that no mã went about to trouble him, he set his whole intention to maintayne iustice, and to punishe all enormities and abuses, whiche had chaunced through the feeble and slouthfull administration of Duncane: and to bring his purpose the better to passe without any trouble or great businesse, he deuised a subtill wile to bring al offenders and misdoers vnto iustice, soliciting sundrie of his liege people with high rewardes, to chalenge and appeale suche as most oppressed the commons, to come at a day and place appointed, to fight singuler combates within Barriers, in triall of their accusations.

When these theeues, barretours, & other oppressours of the innocent people were come to darreigne batell in this maner of wise (as said is) they were streight wayes apprehended by armed men & trussed vp in halters on gibets, according as they had iustly deserued. The residue of misdoers ẏ were left, were punished & tamed in such sort, that many yeares after all theft & reiffings were litle heard of, the people enioying the blissefull benefite of good peace and tranquillitie.

Streight iustice.

Makbeth shewing himselfe thus a most diligent punisher of all iniuries and wrongs attempted by any misordered persons within his realme, was accompted the sure defence & buckler of innocent people: and hereto he also applied his whole endeuour, to cause yong men to exercise themselues in vertuous maners, and men of the Churche to attende their diuine seruice, according to theyr vocations.

He caused to be slaine sundry Thanes as of Cathnes, Sutherland, Stranauerne, and Ros, bicause through thẽ and their seditious attẽpts, much trouble daply rose in the realme.

He appeased the troublesome state of Galloway, and slewe one Makgill a tyrannt, who had many yeares before passed nothing of the regall authoritie or power. To be briefe, such were the worthy doings and princely acts of this Makbeth in the administration of the realme, that if he had attayned therevnto by rightfull meanes, and continued in vprightnesse of iustice as he began, till the ende of his reygne, he might well haue bene numbred amongst the moste noble princes that any where had reygned.

He made many holesome lawes & statutes for the publike weale of his subiectes, diuers of the whiche I haue here set forth, according as I finde them in Hector Boetius.

Lawes made by king Makbeth.

And if any of the sayde captaines or gouernours mary their sonnes or daughters vnto any maner of person that dwelleth within the boūds of theyr roumes, they shall lose their office, neyther shall it be lawfull for any of theyr sonnes or coperceners to occupie the same office.

Makbethes counterfayte zeale and equitie.

These and the like commendable lawes, Makbeth caused to be put as then in vse, gouerning the realme for the space of tenne yeares in equall iustice. But this was but a counterfayte zeale of equitie shewed by him, partely against his naturall inclination to purchase thereby the fauour of the people.

Makbeths tie conscience.

Shortly after, he beganne to shewe what he was, in deede of equitie practising crueltie. For the pricke of conscience (as it chaunceth euer in tyrantes, and suche as attayne to any astate by vnrighteous meanes) caused him euer to feare, least he should be serued of the same cuppe, as he had ministred to his predecessour.

The wordes also of the three weird sisters, wold not out of his mind, which as they promised him the kingdome, so lykewise did they promise it at the same time, vnto the posteritie of Banquho. He willed therefore the same Banquho with his sonne named Fleaunce, to come to a supper that he had prepared for them, which was in deede, as he had deuised, present death at the handes of certaine murtherers, whome he hyred to execute that deede, appoynting them to meete with the same Banquho and his sonne without the palayce as they returned to theyr lodgings, and there to sleathē, so that he would not haue his house slaundered, but that in time to come he might cleare himselfe, if any thing were layde to his charge vpon any suspition that might arise.

Makbethes deuise to slea Banquho and his sonne.

It chaunced yet, by the benefite of the darke night, that though the father were slaine, the son yet by the helpe of almightie God reseruing him to better fortune, escaped that daunger, & afterwardes hauing some inckling by the admonition of some frendes which he had in the courte, howe his life was sought no lesse then his fathers, who was slayne not by chaunce medley (as by the hādling of the mater Makbeth would haue had it to appeare,) but euen vpon a prepensed deuise, whereupon to auoyde further perill he fledde into Wales.

Banquho is slayne, but his sonne escapeth.

Fleaunce Banquhoes sonne fleeth into Wales.

But here I thinke it shall not much make agaynst my purpose, if (according to the order which I find obserued in the Scottish historie) I shall in fewe wordes here rehearse the originall line of those kings, whiche haue discended from the forsayde Banquho, that they, whiche haue enioyed the kingdome by so long continuaunce of discent, from one to an other, & that euen vnto these our dayes may be knowen from whence they

they had theyr first beginning.

Fleaunce therfore (as before is sayd) fled into Wales, where shortly after by his curteous and amiable behauiour, he grew into such fauour and estimation with the prince of that countrey, that he might vnneath haue wisshed any greater: at length also he came into such familiar acquaintance with the sayd princes daughter, that she of courtesie in the ende suffred him to get hir with childe: whiche being once vnderstood, hyr father the prince conceyued such hatefull displeasure towardes Fleaunce, that he finally slewe him, and helde his daughter in moste vile estate of seruitude, for that she had consented to be on this wise defloured by a straunger.

At the last yet, she was deliuered of a sonne named Walter, who within few yeares proued a man of greater courage and valiancie, than any other had commonly bene founde, although he had no better bringing vp than (by his graūdfathers appointment) amongst the baser sorte of people. Howbeit he shewed euer euen frō his infancie, that there reigned in him a certaine stoutnesse of stomake, ready to attept high enterprises.

It chaunced that falling out with one of his cōpanions, after many taunting wordes which passed betwixt them, the other to his reproch obiected that he was a bastard, & begottē in vnlawfull bed, wherewith being sore kindled, in his raging furie he ran vpō him & slew him out of hād.

Then was he glad to flee out of Wales, and cōming into Scotland to seeke some frendshippe there, he happened into the cōpanie of suche Englishmen, as were come thither with Queene Margaret, & behaued himself so soberly in all his demeanour, that within a while he was highly esteemed amongst them.

Not long after by such meanes attayning to the degree of high reputation, he was sent with a great power of men into the Westerne Iles, into Galloway, and other partes of the realme, to deliuer the same of the tirannie and iniurious oppression there exercised by diuers misgouerned persons: which enterpryse according to his commission, he atchieued with such prudent policie & manhode, that immediatly vpon his returne to the court, he was made lord Steward of Scotland, with assignemēt to receyue the kings rents & duties out of all the partes of the realme.

This Walter Steward, had a sonne named Alane Steward, who went after with Godfrey of Bullion duke of Lorraine, and Robert duke of Normandy sonne to king William the bastard that conquered England, into the holy lande, at what time they with other westerne Princes made the great iourney thither, in the yere. 1099. Alane had issue Alexander Steward, that founded the abbay of Paisley of S. Benedictes order, Walter Steward whose valiancie was well notified at the bataple of Largis as herafter shalbe shewed, was the sonne of the sayde Alexander. Walter Steward.

The same Walter had issue. ij. sonnes, the one named Alexander, fought right valiantly in defence of his father at the foresayd bataple, and the other named Robert Steward got the landes of Terbowtoun, and maried the heyre of Cruikstoun, from whom descended the Earles of Lennox and Dernly. Alexander Steward.

Moreouer the aboue mencioned Alexāder Steward that founded Paisley, had diuers mo sonnes, as John & James, with sundry other. Howbeit they toke new surnames by the name of those landes, vnto the which they succeeded. The afore recited John Steward, after the death of his brother James, maried the heyre of Bonkill a virgine of great beautie, and had by hyr Walter Steward that inherited the landes of Bonkill, Rankrow, Rothesay, Bute, & Stewartoune, after that his father the forenamed John was slayne at Falkyrke. John steward, and Iames steward. Walter inheritour of Bonkill, &c.

He maried Margrie Bruce daughter to king Robert Bruce, by whom he had issue king Robert the second of that name. King Robert the second.

This Robert the second toke to wife one Isabel Mure, a damosell of right excellent beutie, she was daughter to sir Adham Mure knight, and brought forth issue, three sonnes and three daughters. The eldest sonne hight John Steward otherwise named Robert, who succeeded immediatly after his fathers decease in gouernaunce of the crowne. Iohn steward, otherwise Robert.

The second called Robert was made Earle of Fyfe and Menteith, also he was created duke of Albanie, and ruled the realme of Scotlande vnder the name of Gouernour, for the space of xv. yeares. Duke of Albany.

The third sonne named Alexander was earle of Buchquhane and lord of Baudzenot. Alexander steward, sonne to king Robert the second.

The eldest daughter was maried to Iames, that was the sonne and heyre of William Erle of Dowglas. The second daughter was maried to John Dunbar, brother to George of Dūbar Earle of Marche, and was made to the aduancement of his further fame earle of Murray. Iohn Dunbar.

He got on hyr one onely daughter, that was maried to the Dowglas, and so Dowglas came to the Erledome of Murray. The third daughter was maried vnto John Lyoun, that was after made Lorde of Glammis.

Moreouer the forsayde Robert that was the firste of the Stewardes whiche ware the crowne in Scotlande, maried Ewfame daughter to the Earle of Ros, and got on hyr two sonnes, Walter Earle of Atholl, and Dauid Earle of Stratherne. Ewfame. Walter and Dauid, sonnes to king Robert.

This Walter solicited Robert duke of Albany, to slea Dauid Steward duke of Rothsay. Robert Duke of Albany.

James the first.

And after that James the firste was returned home fourth of England, he did what he could to moue him to slea likewise all the lynage of the same Duke, still beyng in hope after the dispatch of his kinsmen to come to the crowne himselfe, whiche hope moued him to procure his Nephew Robert Steward, & Robert Grahã his daughters son to slea king James the first also, for the which crime the saine Walter was after conuicted and destroyed with all his sonnes.

Grayme or Graham.

His brother Dauid erle of Buchquhane died without issue, and so the landes of bothe these brethrene returned againe to the crowne, without any memory of theyr blood.

Duke Murdo.

Of Robert Steward duke of Albany, came duke Murdo, who maried the Earle of Lennox daughter, and got on hyr three sonnes, Walter, Alexander, and James.

Duke Murdo himselfe with his two firste sonnes were slayne at Stryueling by king James the first, and the third brother James in reuenge therof brent Dunbertane, and was after chased into Ireland, where he deceassed without issue. Robert the .iij. of that name maried Annabill Drommound, daughter to sir John Drõmound of Stobhall knight, & got on hyr Dauid & James. The firste died in Falkeland, and the other atteyned the crowne, & was called James the firste, and maried the lady Jane daughter to John Beauford earle of Somerset in England. He had by hir .ij. sonnes borne at one birth, Alexander & James. The first died yong. The secõd atteyned the crowne, named James the second.

King Robert the thirde.

Dauid and Iames, sonnes to king Robert the third.

John Beauford earle of Somerset.

James the first had also .vj. daughters, of the whiche the eldest was giuen in mariage to the Dolphine of Fraunce, the second to the Duke of Bryttayne, the thirde to the Lorde of Feir: the fourth to the Lorde of Dalkeith: the fifth to the Earle of Huntley: and the sixte had no succession.

James the first and his issue.

James the second maried Margaret daughter to the Duke of Gelderland, and begot on hir three sonnes, and two daughters.

The duke of Gelders daughter.

The first succeeded him in the kingdome and was called James the thirde: the second named Alexander was Duke of Albany, & maried firste the Erle of Dykeneys daughter, and got on hyr Alexander, that was after Bishop of Murray, and then parting with hyr went into Fraunce, where he maried the countesse of Bullogne, and begot on hir John Steward Duke of Albany, that was gouernour of Scotland many yeares in the minoritie of James the fifte.

James and Alexander.

Duke of Albany the gouernour of Scotland.

The third sonne, John Steward was Erle of Mar, whose chaunce was to be slayne in the Cannogat in a Bathehatte.

The first daughter of James the second, was maried to the Lord Boyd, who begot on hyr a sonne that was slayne by the Lord Mongumtie, and a daughter that was maried to the Erle of Cassilles.

The lorde Boyd.

After the death of the lord Boyd, the husband of this first daughter of James the secõd, she was eftsones maried to the lord Hammylton, and by that meanes was the house of the Hammyltons decorate with the kings blood.

The Lorde Hammylton.

The other sister was maried to the lorde Creichton, of whom came small succession worthy to be mencioned. James the thirde maried Margaret daughter to the king of Denmarke.

Lord Creichton.

James the third and his issue.

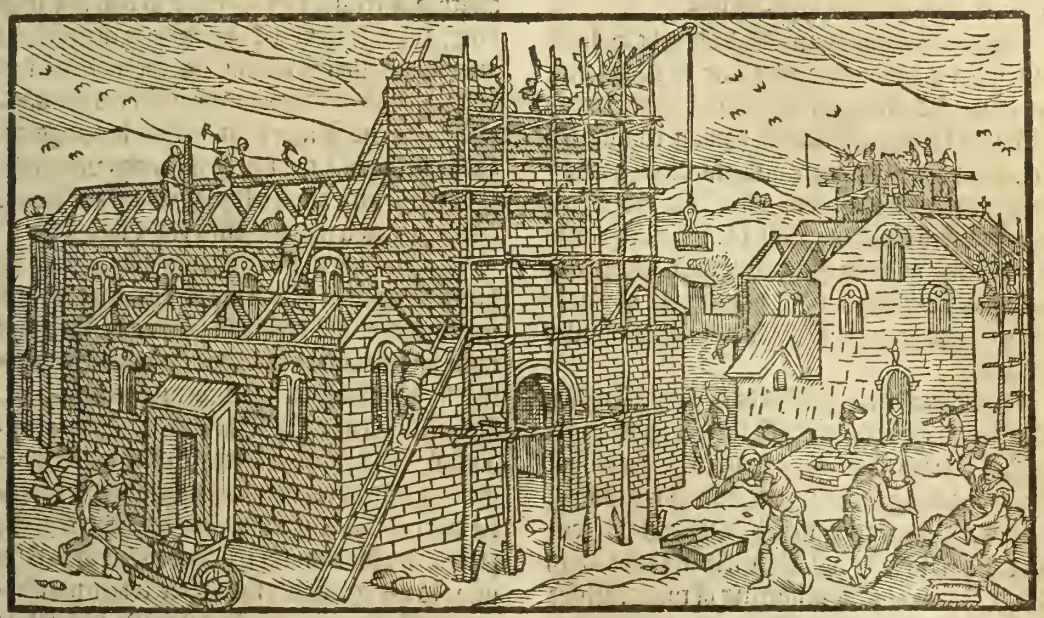
Of the whiche mariage was borne James the fourth: Alexander that was bishop of Saint Andros and Duke of Albany: And John Steward Erle of Mar, but these two died without issue.

James the fourth maried Margaret daughter to king Henry the seuenth of England, and begot on hyr James the fifth, who marying firste the Lady Magdalene daughter to Frauncis the French king, had no issue by hyr for that she died in the yeare next after hyr comming into Scotland, and then shortely after the sayde James the fifth maried the lady Mary de Lorrain, Duches of Longuile a widow, and by hyr had he issue Marie queene of Scotland, that toke to husbande Henry Steward lord Dernly, by whom she had issue Charles James, nowe king of Scotland. But to returne vnto Makbeth, in cõtinuyng the history, and to beginne where I left, ye shal vnderstãd, that after the cõtriued slaughter of Bãquho, nothing prospered with the foresayde Makbeth: for in maner euery man began to doubt his owne life, and durst vnneth appeare in the kings presence, & euen as there were many that stoode in feare of him, so likewise stoode he in feare of many, in such sorte that he began to make those away by one surmised cauillation or other, whom he thought most able to worke him any displeasure.

James the fourth.

Makbethes dread.

His cruelte causeth him feare.



At length he found suche sweetenesse by putting his nobles thus to death, that his earnest thyrst after blood in this behalfe, might in nowise be satisfied: for ye must consider he wanne double profite (as he thought) hereby: for firste they were ridde out of the way whome he feared, and then agayne his coffers were enriched by their goodes, whiche were forfeyted to his vse, whereby he might the better mainteyne a garde of armed men about him to defend his person frõ iniurie of them whom he had in any suspition.

Further to the ende he might the more sickerly oppresse his subiectes with all tyrannike wrongs, hee buylded a strong Castell on the top of an high hill cleped Dunsinnane situate in Gowry, ten myles from Perth, on such a proude height, that stãding there aloft, a man might behold hold weineare all the Countreys of Angus, Fife, Stermõd, & Ernedale, as it were lying underneth him. This caſtell then being founded on the top of that high hill, put the realme to great charges before it was fynished, for al the ſtuffe neceſſarie to the building, could not be brought vp without much toyle and buſineſſe.

But Makbeth being once determined to haue the worke go forwarde, cauſed the Thanes of eche ſhire within the Realme, to come and helpe towardes that building, eche man hys courſe about. Dunſinnane.

At the laſt when the turne fell vnto Makduffe Thane of Fife to buylde his part, he ſent workmen with all needfull proviſion, and commaunded them to ſhew ſuche diligence in euery behalfe, that no occaſion might bee giuen for the king to finde fault with him, in that he came not himſelfe as other had done, which he refuſed to do for doubt leaſt the king bearing him (as he partly vnderſtode) no great good will, would lay violent handes vpon him, as he had done vppon diuerſe other.

Shortly after, Makbeth comming to behold howe the worke went forwarde, and by cauſe hee found not Makduffe there, he was ſore offended, and ſayde, I perceyue this man will neuer obey my commaundements, till he be rydden with a ſnaffle, but I ſhal prouide well ynough for him. Neither could he afterwards abide to looke vpon the ſayde Makduffe, eyther for that he thought his puiſſance ouer great, either els for that he had learned of certain wyſardes, in whoſe wordes he put great confidence, (for that the prophecie had happened ſo right, whiche the three Fayries or weird ſiſters had declared vnto him) how that he ought to take heede of Makduffe, who in tymes to come ſhould ſeeke to deſtroy him.

And ſurely herevpon had he put Makduffe to death, but that a certaine witch whom he had in great truſt, had told that he ſhould neuer be ſlain with man borne of any woman, nor vanquiſhed till the wood of Bernane, came to the Caſtell of Dunſinnane.

By this prophecie Makbeth put all feare out of his heart, ſuppoſing hee might doe what hee would, without any feare to be puniſhed for the ſame, for by the one prophecie he beleeued it was vnpoſſible for any man to vanquiſh him, and by the other vnpoſſible to ſlea him.

This vaine hope cauſed him to doe many outragious things, to the grieuous oppreſſion of his ſubiects.

At length Makduffe to auoyde perill of lyfe, purpoſed with himſelfe to paſſe into Englande, to procure Malcolme Cammore to clayme the crowne of Scotlande. But this was not ſo ſecretly deuiſed by Makduffe, but that Makbeth had knowledge giuen him thereof, for kings (as is ſayde,) haue charpe ſight like vnto Linx, and long eares like vnto Midas. For Makbeth had in euery noble mans houſe, one ſlie fellow or other in fee with him, to reueale all that was ſayd or done within the ſame, by which ſlight he oppreſſed the moſte parte of the Nobles of hys Realme. Linxes eyes, and Mydas eares.

Immediately then, being aduertiſed whereabout Makduffe went, he came haſtily wyth a great power into Fife, and forthwith beſieged the Caſtell where Makduffe dwelled, truſting to haue found him therin.

They that kept the houſe, without any reſiſtance opened the gates, and ſuffred him to enter, miſtruſting none euill. But neuertheleſſe Makbeth moſt cruelly cauſed the wife and children of Makduffe, with all other whom he found in that caſtell, to be ſlaine. Macbethes crueltie vſed againſt Makduffes family.

Alſo he confiſcate the goodes of Makduffe, proclaymed him traytor, and confined him out of al the partes of his realme, but Makduffe was alreadie escaped out of daunger and gotten into England vnto Malcolme Cammore, to trie what purchas he might make by meanes of his suppoꝛt to reuẽge the slaughter so cruelly executed on his wife, his childꝛen, and other friends.

Makduffe escapeth into Englande vnto Malcolme Cammore.

At his comming vnto Malcolme, he declared into what great miſerie the eſtate of Scotlande was bꝛought, by the detestable cruelties exercyſed by the tyꝛanne Makbeth, hauing committed many hoꝛrible slaughters and murthers, both as well of the nobles as commons, foꝛ the which he was hated right moꝛtally of all his liege people, deſiring nothing moꝛe than to be deliuered of that intollerable and moſte beaute yoke of thraldome, whiche they ſuſteyned at ſuche a caytifes handes.

Makduffes wordes vnto Malcolme.

Malcolme hearing Makduffes woꝛds which he vttred in right lamentable soꝛt, foꝛ pure compaſſion and very ruth that pearced his soꝛowfull hart, bewayling the miſerable ſtate of his coũtry, he fetched a deepe ſigh, which Makduffe perceyuing, began to fall moſt earneſtly in hande wyth him, to enterpꝛiſe the deliuering of the Scottiſhe people out of the hands of ſo cruell and bloudie a tyꝛant, as Makbeth by too many plaine experiments did ſhew himſelfe to be, which was an eaſie matter foꝛ him to bꝛing to paſſe, conſidering not only the good tytle he had, but alſo the earneſt deſire of the people to haue ſome occaſion miniſtred, wherby they might be reuenged of thoſe notable iniuries, which they dayly ſuſteyned by the outragious crueltie of Makbeths miſgouernãce.

Malcolme ſigheth.

Though Malcolme was right ſoꝛowfull foꝛ the oppꝛeſſion of his Countreymen the Scottes, in maner as Makduffe had declared, yet doubting whether he were come as one that ment vnfaynedly as hee ſpake, oꝛ elſe as ſent from Makbeth to betray him, he thought to haue ſome further triall, and thereꝛpon diſſembling his minde at the firſt, he anſwered as followeth.

I am truly right ſoꝛie foꝛ the miſerie chaunced to my Countrey of Scotlande, but though I haue neuer ſo great affection to relieue ẏ ſame, yet by reaſon of certaine incurable vyces, whiche raigne in me, I am nothing meete thereto: Firſt ſuche immoderate luſt and voluptuous ſenſualitie (the abhominable fountaine of all vyces) foloweth me, that if I were made king of Scots, I ſhoulde ſeeke to deflower your Maydes and matrones in ſuch wiſe, that mine intemperancie ſhoulde bee moꝛe impoꝛtable vnto you, than the bloudie tyꝛannie of Makbeth now is.

Malcolme Cammore his anſwere.

Hereunto Makduffe anſwered: this ſurely is a very euill fault, foꝛ many noble Pꝛinces and Kings haue loſt both lyues and kingdomes foꝛ the ſame, neuertheleſſe there are women ynowe in Scotlande, and therefoꝛe follow my counſell, make thy ſelfe king, and I ſhall conuey the matter ſo wiſely, that thou ſhalt be ſo ſatiſfied at thy pleaſure in ſuch ſecrete wiſe, that no man ſhall be aware therof.

Makduffes anſwere.

Then ſaide Malcolme, I am alſo the moſte auaritious creature on the earth, ſo that if I were king, I ſhould ſeeke ſo many wayes to get lands and goodes, that I woulde ſlea the moſt part of all the nobles of Scotland by ſurmiſed accuſations, to the end I might enioy their lands, goods, and poſſeſſions, & therfoꝛe to ſhew you what miſchief may enſue on you thꝛough mine vnſatiable couetiſe, I will rehearſe vnto you a fable.

There was a Foxe hauing a ſoꝛe place on him ouerſet with a ſwarme of flies that continually ſucked out hir bloud, and when one that came by and ſaw this maner demaunded whether ſhe woulde haue the flies dꝛyuen beſyde hir, ſhe anſwered no: Foꝛ if theſe flies that are alreadie full, and by reaſon thereof ſucke not very egerly, ſhould be chaſed away, other that are emptie and felly an hungred, ſhoulde light in theyꝛ places, and ſuck out the reſidue of my bloud farre moꝛe to my grieuance than theſe, which now being ſatiſfied doe not much annoy me. Therefoꝛe ſayth Malcolme, ſuffer me to remaine where I am, leaſt if I attaine to the regiment of your realme, mine inquenchable auarice may pꝛoue ſuch, that ye would thinke the diſpleaſures which now grieue you, ſhould ſeeme eaſie in reſpect of the vnmeaſurable outrage, whiche might enſue thꝛough my comming amongſt you.

A fable of a Foxe.

Makduffe to this made anſwere, how it was a farre woꝛſe fault than the other, foꝛ auarice is the roote of all miſchiefe, and foꝛ that crime the moſt part of our kings haue bene ſlain & bꝛought to their finall ende. Yet notwithſtanding follow my counſel, and take vpon thee the crowne, there is golde and riches inough in Scotlande to ſatiſfie thy greedie deſire.

Couetouſnes the roote of miſchiefe.

Then ſayde Malcolme againe, I am furthermoꝛe inclined to diſſimulation, telling of leaſings and all other kinds of deceyt, ſo that I naturally reioyce in nothing ſo muche as to betray and deceyue ſuche, as put any truſt oꝛ confidence in my woꝛdes. Then ſith there is nothing that moꝛe becommeth a pꝛince than conſtancie, veritie, truth, and iuſtice, with the other laudable felowſhip of thoſe faire and noble vertues which are compꝛehended onely in ſothfaſtneſſe, & that lying vtterly ouerthꝛoweth ẏ ſame, you ſee how vnable I am to gouerne any pꝛouince oꝛ region: and therfoꝛe ſith you haue remedies to cloke and hide al the reſt of my other vices, I pꝛay you find ſhift to cloke this vice amongſt the reſidue.

Diſſimulation and deliting in lyes.

Then ſayd Makduffe: this yet is the woꝛſt of all, and there I leaue thee, and therefoꝛe ſay,

oh

-oh ye vnhappie & miſerable Scottiſhmen, which are thus ſcourged with ſo many and ſundrie calamities, eche one aboue other. Ye haue one curſed and wicked tyrant that nowe raignes ouer you, without any right or tytle, oppreſſing you with his moſt bloudie crueltie: This other that hath the right to the crowne, is ſo replete with the inconſtant behauiour and manifeſt vices of Engliſh men, that he is nothing worthie to enioy it: for by his owne confeſſion he is not onely auaritious, and giuen to vnſatiable luſt, but ſo falſe a traytour withall, that no truſt is to be had to any worde he ſpeaketh. Adue Scotlande, for now I account my ſelfe a baniſhed man for euer without comfort or conſolation: and with thoſe words the teares trickled down his cheekes right abundantly.

At the laſt when hee was readie to depart, Malcolme toke him by the ſleeue, and ſayde, Be of good comfort Makduffe, for I haue none of theſe vices before remembred, but haue reſted with thee in this maner, only to proue thy mind: for diuerſe tymes heretofore, hath Makbeth ſought by this maner of meanes to bring me into his handes, but the more ſlow I haue ſhewed my ſelf to condiſcend to thy motion and requeſt, the more diligence ſhall I vſe in accompliſhing the ſame.

Incontinently hereupon they embraced eche other, and promiſing to bee faythfull the one to the other, they fell in conſultation, howe they might beſt prouide for al their buſineſſe, to bring the ſame to good effect.

Sone after Makduffe repayring to the borders of Scotlande, addreſſed his letters with ſecrete diſpatch vnto the nobles of the realme, declaring howe Malcolme was confederate wyth him, to come haſtily into Scotlande to clayme the crowne, and therefore he requyred them, ſith he was right inheritor thereto, to aſſiſt him with their powers to recouer the ſame out of the hãds of the wrongfull vſurper.

In the meane time, Malcolme purchaſed ſuch fauour at king Edwards handes, that olde Syward Earle of Northumberlande, was appointed with ten thouſande men to go with him into Scotland, to ſupport him in this enterpriſe, for recouerie of his right.

After theſe newes were ſpred abrode in Scotland, the nobles drew into two ſeuerall factions, the one taking part with Makbeth, and the other with Malcolme.

Hereupon enſued oftentymes ſundrie bickerings, and diuerſe light ſkirmiſhes, for thoſe that were of Malcolmes ſide, woulde not ieoparde to ioyne with their enimies in a pight field, tyll his comming out of England to their ſupport. But after that Makbeth perceiued his enimies power to encreaſe, by ſuch ayde as came to them forth of England with his aduerſarie Malcolme, he reculed backe into Fife, there purpoſing to abide in campe fortified, at the Caſtell of Dunſinane, and to fight with his enimies, if they ment to purſue him, howbeit ſome of his friends aduyſed him, that it ſhould be beſt for him, eyther to make ſome agreement with Malcolme, or elſe to flee with all ſpeed into the Iles, and to take his treaſure with him, to the ende he might wage ſundrie great Princes of the realme to take his part, and retayne ſtraungers, in whom he might better truſt than in his owne ſubiectes, which ſtale dayly from him: but he had ſuche confidence in his prophecies, that he beleeued he ſhoulde neuer be vanquiſhed, till Byrnane wood were brought to Dunſinnane, nor yet to be ſlaine with anye man, that ſhould be or was borne of any womã.

Malcolme folowing haſtily after Makbeth, came the night before the battaile vnto Byrnan wood, and when his armie had reſted a while there to refreſhe them, hee commaunded euerye man to get a bough of ſome tree or other of that wood in his hand, as bigge as he might beare, and to march forth therwith in ſuch wiſe, that on the next morow they might come cloſely and without ſight in thys manner within vewe of hys enimies.

On the morow when Makbeth beheld them comming in this ſort, hee firſt marueyled what the matter ment, but in the end remembred himſelfe, that the prophecie which he had heard long before that time, of the comming of Byrnane wood to Dunſinnane Caſtell, was likely to bee now fulfilled. Neuertheleſſe, he brought hys men in order of battell, and exhorted them to doe valiantly, howbeit his enimies had ſcarcely caſt from them their boughes, when Makbeth perceiuing their numbers betok him ſtreight to flight, whom Makduffe purſued with great hatred euẽ till he came vnto Lunſannain, where Makbeth perceiuing that Makduffe was hard at his back, leapt beſide his horſe, ſaying, thou traytor, what meaneth it that thou ſhouldeſt thus in vaine follow me that am not appoynted to be ſlain by any creature that is borne of a woman, come on therefore, and receyue thy rewarde which thou haſt deſerued for thy paynes, and therewithall he lyfted vp his ſworde thinking to haue ſlaine him. But Makduffe quickly auoyding from his horſe, ere he came at him, anſwered (with his naked ſworde in his hande) ſaying: it is true Makbeth, and now ſhall thine inſatiable crueltie haue an ende, for I am euen he that thy wyſards haue tolde the of, who was neuer borne of my mother, but ripped out of hir wombe: therewithall he ſtept vnto him, & ſlue him in the place. Then cutting his heade from the ſhoulders, hee ſet it vpon a poll, and brought it vnto Malcolme. This was the end of Makbeth, after he had raigned .xvij. yeares ouer the Scottishmen.

In the beginning of his raigne he accomplished many worthie actes, right profitable to the common wealth, (as ye haue heard) but afterward e by illusion of the diuell, he defamed the same with most terrible cruelti e.

He was slaine in the yeare of the incarnation 1057. and in the .xvj. yeare of king Edwardes raigne ouer the English men. 1057. Io.Ma. 1061. H.B. 8. H.B.

Malcolme.

MAlcolme Canmore thus recouering the realme (as ye haue heard) by support of king Edward, in the .xvj. yeare of the same Edwards raign, he was crowned at Scone the .xxv day of Aprill, in the yeare of our Lorde. 1057.

A Parliament at Forfair.

Immediately after his coronation, he called a Parliament at Forfair, in the which he rewarded them with landes and liuings that had assisted him agaynst Makbeth, aduaunceing them to fees and offices as he saw cause, and commaunded that specially those that bare the surname of any office or landes, shoulde haue and enioye the same.

He created many Earles, Lordes, Barons, and Knightes.

Thanes changed into Earles.

Many of them that before were Thanes, were at this time made Earles, as Fife, Menteth, Atholl, Leuenor, Murray, Cathnes, Rosse, and Angus. These were the first Earles that haue beene heard of amongest the Scottishe men, (as their hystories make mention.) Many new surnames were take vp at this time amongst them, as Cauder, Lokart, Gordon, Seyton, Lauder, Wawane, Meldrun, Schaw, Leirmouth, Libertoun, Strachquhen, Cargill, Rattrey, Dundas, Cockbourne, Myrtoun, Menzeis, Abercrumby, Lesly, with many other that had possessions giuen to them, which gaue names to the owners for the time.

Surnames.

Others got their surnames by offices, as Stewarde, Durwarde, and Banerman.

Also the proper names of many valiant captaynes were turned into generall surnames, as Kennedy, Graham, Hay, with dyuerse other to long here to rehearse. So that it came to passe then, as it hath done many tymes sithence, that new surnames haue worne the olde out of vse.

In the foresayde Parliament thus holden at Forfair, in the beginning of his raign, there were many holesome ordinances established, both apperteyning to ciuill administration, and also to the ecclesiasticall iurisdiction.

Makduffes Earle of Fife his aduancement.

In rewarde also of Makduffes seruice, who (as ye haue heard) chiefly ayded him to the atteyning of the crowne, he honoured him and his posteritie with three sortes of priuiledges.

Priuiledges graunted to Makduffes lynage.

First that the Earle of Fife for the tyme being, at the coronation of a king should by his office set the crowne on the kings head. The second was, that when the king should giue battaile to his enimies, the same Earle should leade the bauntgard of his host: The thirde, that the lynage of Makduffe should enioy regall authoritie and power within al their landes & rowmthes, as to appoynt officers and iudges for the hearing and determining of all matters and controuersies (treason onely excepted) and that if any of their men or tenants were called to answere in any Court out of their circuit, they might appeale to their owne iudges to bee appoynted as before is expressed.

Iohannes Maior.

Iohannes Maior writeth in his Chronicle, that the thirde priuiledge which Malcolme graunted vnto this Makduffe and his posteritie, was this, that for euery Gentleman that any of the should hap to kill by chaunce medley, and not vpon pretensed malice, for the summe of .xxiiij. markes, he should ſhould redeeme his puniſhment due for the ſame: & for the caſuall ſlaughter of a meaner perſon, he ſhould be fined at. xij. Markes, ſo that murtherers were wont to ſay, that if they were able to pay that ſumme vnto the Kynboc, they ought to be releaſed of further punition by Makduffes priuiledge. But this third priuiledge, togither with the other two former grauntes, the ſayde Maior fore reproueth, and not without cauſe, as maye appeare, conſidering the naturall inclination of that people vnto murther, which by this meanes nouriſhing ſecrete hatred and malice in theyr hearts, might vnder the cloke of caſuall falling out, ſlea whom they luſted.

It was ordeyned alſo at this Parliament, that Barons which had liberties within theſelues, ſhould make gybbets whereon men that deſerued death ſhoulde ſuffer execution: and alſo drawe Welles, wherein women that were condemned ſhould be drowned, according to the order of the ciuill lawes vſed in Scotland.

Moreouer, all the lawes that Makbeth had ordeyned, were abrogate at this Parliament.

Thus whileſt Malcolme was buſied in ſetting orders amongſt his ſubiects, tydings came that one Lugtake ſurnamed the fole, being eyther the ſonne, or as ſome write, the couſin of the late mentioned Makbeth, was conueyed wyth a great number of ſuch as had taken part with the ſayde Makbeth vnto Scone, and there by their ſupport receyued the Crowne, as lawfull inheritor thereto.

To appeaſe this buſineſſe, was Makduffe Earle of Fife ſent with full commiſſion in the kings name, who encountering with Lugtake at a village called Eſſen in Bogdale, ſlue him, and diſcomfited his whole power ordring the matter with them in ſuch wiſe, that afterwardes there was no more trouble attempted in that behalfe.

After this, the realme continued in peace certaine yeares, till it chaunced a great number of theeues and robbers aſſembling themſelues togither at Cockburne pethes, did much hurt by robbing and ſpoyling the people in the countreys of Mers and Louthian howbeit at length one Patryke Dunbar of Dunbar, by commaundement of the king fought with them, ſlue their captaine, with ſix hundred of his companie, and toke fourſcore priſoners, the which he cauſed to be hanged. And thus hauing deliuered the countrey of thoſe pyllers, with loſſe of fortie of his owne men, hee returned to the king, with the head of the captain of that route, ſo that for his manhood herein ſhewed, he was made by the king Earle of March, and for the maintenaunce of his eſtate, had the landes of Cockburne pethes, giuen to him and his heyres for euer, vpon this condition, that in tymes comming, the Earles of March ſhoulde purge Mers and Louthian of all theeues and robbers. In memorie whereof, hee was commaunded to beare in his armes a fellons heade ſprinckled with bloud. The heade of a theefe or felon giuen in armes.

Shortly after he got knowledge, howe there were certaine Gentlemen that had conſpired to ſlea him, and therefore taking occaſion to goe a hunting, where this act ſhould haue bene executed, he calleth the chiefe authour of the conſpiracie apart into a certaine valley, which was cloſed on euery ſide with thick woods, and there brake the matter vnto him, in reproouing him right charply for that hee had ſo trayterouſly conſpired hys death, whoſe preſeruation hee ought chiefly to haue wiſhed, conſidering the manifolde benefites he had receyued at his handes. And herewith leaping from his horſe, drew his ſword, commaunding the other likewiſe to draw his, that now hauing conuenient time and place thereto, they might trie the matter betwixt them, who ſhould be thought moſt worthie of life, by open force of knightly prowes. A conſpiracie. The manly courage of K. Malcolme.

The conſpirator hearing theſe wordes, as a man altogither aſtoniſhed, fell downe vpon hys knees at the kings feete, beſeeching his grace of mercie for his wicked purpoſe and haynous offence, who ſeeing him thus penitent, bad him ariſe, and ſayde, Iam content hereupon to forgiue thee, ſo that thou be not of counſell hereafter in any ſuch trayterous practiſe.

Whyleſt things paſſed thus in Scotlande, great and marueylous chaunces came to paſſe within the Realme of Englande. For after the death of king Edward ſurnamed the Confeſſor, Harold the ſonne of Earle Ewdwin toke vpon him the kingdome. But William baſtard Duke of Normandie, pretending tytle to the crowne of Englande, at length inuaded the land, & ſleaing Harold in fielde, made a full conqueſt of the realme, and was crowned king at London by Eldred Archbiſhop of Yorke. Here ye haue to vnderſtand, that king Edwarde in his life time had ſent for his nephew Edwarde, the ſonne of his brother Edmonde Ironſide, to come home forth of Hungarie, whither after his fathers deceaſſe, he and his brother Edwin had beene ſent away, as in the Hyſtorie of Englande it appeareth more at large. See more here of in England.

This Edwarde had maried the daughter of the Emperour Henrie, named Agatha, ſiſter to the Queene of Hungarie, and not the king of Hungaries daughter, although the Scotiſhe writers do ſo affirme. By hir he had iſſue a ſonne named Edgar and two daughters, the one named Margaret and the other Chriſtyne. King Edward ment that his nephew the ſayd Edwarde ſhoulde haue ſucceeded him, and as ſome write, he would in his life time haue reſigned the crown William Malmesbury. Hector Boetius.

vnto him. But he (a thing worthie of admiration) vtterly refuſed it, and would not once meddle therewith during his vncles life tyme, and as it chaunced he died whileſt his vncle king Edward was yet liuing. His ſonne Edgar therefore to whom it ſeemed that the crowne was due when he ſawe the realme conquered by the Normans, diſpairing to recouer it out of their hands, got a ſhip, and determined with his mother and ſiſters to paſſe ouer into Germanie to his friends and kinſfolk there: but by contrary winds he was driuen a ſhore in the Forth, at a place called vnto this day the Queenes ferrye.

The Queenes Ferrye.

Malcolme being at the ſame time at Dunfermeling, when he heard of the arriuall of this ſhip, and vnderſtoode what they were that were aboard in hir, he reſorted thither with an honourable cõpanie about him, to viſit them for honors ſake, vpon fauour he bare towards them, for that they were diſcended of that noble Prince king Edwarde, in whom afore time he had founde ſo much gentleneſſe and friendſhip.

Finally when he vnderſtood their eſtate, hee brought thẽ home with him to his palace, ſhewing them all the loue and friendſhip he could deuiſe: and in the end cõſidering the excellent beautie, wiſdome, & noble qualities of the lady Margaret, eldeſt ſiſter vnto the ſame Edgar, he required of Agatha hir mother to haue hir in mariage, whereunto Agatha gladly condiſcended. Shortly after with an aſſemble of all the nobles of Scotland this mariage was made & ſolemniſed after the Octaues of Paſch, in the yeare 1067. with al ioy and triumph that might be deuiſed.

Malcolm Canmore marieth Margaret ſiſter to Edgar Atheling.

1067. H.B.

King William the Conqueror of England, being enformed hereof, feared leaſt this alliance betwixt Malcolm and Edgar might breed ſome trouble & diſquietneſſe to his eſtate, ſith the ſame Edgar had many friendes through all the partes of England. To preuent therfore the occaſions of inteſtine trouble, he confined all the lynage of the foreſayd Edgar, by reaſon whereof, a great number of Engliſhe men came into Scotlande vnto king Malcolme, and many of them obteyning liuings at his handes, remayned there continually during their liues, leauing to their poſteritie their names and poſſeſſions. Amongſt whõ were theſe; Lindſey, Vaus, Ramſay, Louell, Towris, Preſtoun, Sandeclãs, Billart, Sowlis, Wardlaw, Marwel, with diuerſe other.

Engliſh men fled into Scotlande.

There came diuerſe alſo oute of Hungarie with Queene Margaret, who likewiſe left theyr names to their families, which yet remaine euen vnto this day, as Creichtoun, Fotringham, Sifkart, Weluil, Boythwike, and other.

Surnames of Hungarians.

Alſo there haue come at ſundrie ſeaſons out of Fraunce diuerſe ſurnames into Scotlande as Fraſeir, Sinclare, Boſwell, Mowtray, Mountgummery, Campbel, Boys, Betoun, or Betuin, Taillefer, and Bothwell, beſides ſundrie other whiche were but ſuperfluous to rehearſe at this tyme.

But to the order of the Hyſtorie: It is recorded by writers, that theſe (which at this time came out of Englande vnto Edgar) brought great quantitie of golde and ſiluer with them; alſo many relikes of Saints, and amongſt other that blacke croſſe which king Dauid gaue vnto the Abbey of holy Rood houſe in Louthia, which he foũded at his owne charge.

The blacke croſſe.

Shortly after the proſcriptiõ of theſe Engliſh men, William the Conqueror ſent an heralde at Armes vnto king Malcolme, demaunding to haue Edgar deliuered into his hands, and threatning that if he refuſed to deliuer him, he would ſurely fetch him, and that ſhortly for Malcolmes commoditie.

William Conqueror threateneth king Malcolme.

But Malcolme though he vnderſtode that he

he ſhoulde bee ſure of warres at king Williams handes, for his denial declared plainly to the herauld, that his maiſters requeſt was vnreaſonable, and therefore he minded not in any wiſe to gratifie him therein.

King William receyuing this anſwere from Malcolm, proclaimed open warre againſt Scotland. In the meane time all Northumberlande toke part with king Malcolme, for that he was their Earles ſiſters ſonne.

Whereupon king William ſent a valiaunt Captaine, a Norman borne named Roger, to inuade Northumberlande. Whiche Roger gathering a power of men, came haſtily into that Countrey, howbeit he abode ſhort time there in honor, for by the Scots and Northumberlande men his army was diſcomfited, and he himſelfe trayterouſly ſlaine by his owne ſouldiers.

But king William nothing diſcouraged with this ouerthrow, ſent one Richard Erle of Glouceſter (whom amongeſt all the Engliſh men he had moſte in truſt) with a mightie armie into Cumberlande. Againſt whome were ſent the Earles of March and Menteith, who defended the Countrey right manly from the inuaſion of the ſayde Earle, ſo that he was not able to take any aduauntage of them.

King William aduertiſed hereof, waxed wonderfull wroth, that no more good was done againſt his enimies, whereupon hee ſent a newe power thither with all ſpeede, vnder the leading of his brother Odo, who was both Biſhoppe of Bayeux, and Earle of Kent.

By this laſt army, the countrey of Northumberlande, was ſore ſpoyled, and a great number both of Scottes and Northumberland men diſcomfited and ſlain. But as Odo was preparing to returne, there came Malcolme with all the power he might make, and giuing an onſet vpon his enimies, ſlue a great number of them, and recouered al the bootie which Odoes men had got in the countrey, and ſo right ioyfull of that victorie, returned into Scotlande.

Malcolmes enterprice againſt his enimies.

King William yet nothing abaſhed for theſe miſhappes, ſent his ſonne called Robert with a farre greater power than at any time he had ſent before, into Northumberland, who remaining a long ſeaſon in campe neare to the riuer of Tine, attempted no notable enterpriſe, ſauing that he repayred and newly fortified the towne of newe Caſtell, whiche ſtandeth vpon the ſame ryuer of Tine, and then at length a peace was concluded betwixt the two Kings vnder theſe conditions, that king Malcolme ſhoulde enioy that part of Northumberland which lyeth betwixt Tweede, Cumberland, and Stainmore, & to do homage to the king of England for the ſame.

In the middeſt of Stanemore there ſhall be a Croſſe ſet vp, with the king of Englandes Image on the one ſide, and the king of Scotlands on the other, to ſignifie that the one is marche to England, and the other to Scotland.

This Croſſe was called the Recroſſe, that is to ſay, the Croſſe of the kings.

The Recroſſe.

Moreouer it was concluded that Waltheof or Uoldoſius (as the Scottiſh writers name him) ye ſonne of Sywarde Earle of Northumberlande, ſhould marry king Williams neece, borne of his daughter, and to be free from all payments and exactions due to the king by any maner of prerogatiue or meanes, for the ſpace of. xx. yeares next enſuing.

Syward Earle of Northumberlande.

In the neck of this peace thus concluded betwixt ye kings, hapned new trouble in Scotlād by reaſō of inteſtine rebellio, for the people of Galloway, & the Iſlād mē, roſe in great nūbers & ſpoiled ye borders of their neighbors, not ſparing frō ſlaughter in al parts, where they were any thing reſiſted.

Rebellion in Galloway.

Againſt

Walter the ſonne of Fleance.

Againſt theſe rebelles was ſent by king Malcolme, Walter the ſonne of Fleance (of whome there is mention made before) with a conuenient armie, who at his comming into Galloway, firſt gaue the people of that Countrey an ouerthrow, and ſlue their chiefe captaine Makglaue: Then afterwards fighting with them of the Iles, he ſubdued them in ſuch wiſe, that al things were pacified euen at commaundement. For whoſe high prowes and diligence in this peece of ſeruice ſhewed, he was created by Malcolm high Steward of the realme, ſo that afterwardes both he and his poſteritie euer ſithence haue borne that ſurname, euen vnto theſe our dayes.

Makglaue.

Walter created high Steward of Scotlande.

After the quieting of this buſineſſe, there ſprang a newe tumult more daungerous than the former, for the Murrey lande men procuring them of Roſſe and Cathnes, with diuerſe other to ioine with them in confederacie, did not onely ſlea the kings ſeruants, and thoſe that were appoynted vnder him to ſee iuſtice miniſtred, but through ſupport of one Makduncane, whom they choſe to be their captaine, they alſo waſted and deſtroyed the kings poſſeſſions, with more crueltie than euer had beene heard of before. Wherefore to puniſh theſe trayterous attempts, Makduffe was ſent with an armie into Mar.

A new rebellion in Murrey lande.

Makduffe.

But the traytors doubting leaſt they ſhould not be able to withſtande his puiſſance, thought nothing more anaylable than to ſtop him wyth money: but in the meane time came the king himſelfe in good ſeaſon vnto Monimuſke, where hee was aduertiſed, that in maner all the north partes of Scotland with the Iles, were confederate with the Murrey land men againſt him.

The king aſtoniſhed ſomthing at theſe newes, vowed to giue the Barronnie of Monimuſke, (which he vnderſtoode to be landes perteyning to the crowne) vnto the Church of Saint Andrew in Fife, if it might pleaſe God to ſend him victorie ouer his enimies.

The kings vow.

At length comming vnto the water of Spey, he beholde his enimies on the further ſide in greater number, and in better furniture for armor thã hee thought had beene poſſible to haue founde in all Scotlande, he perceyued alſo that his ſtandardbearer began to ſhrinke, and not to ſhew the like chearefull countenance, as he ought to haue done. Wherefore he pulled the Banner from him, and gaue it to ſir Alexander Carron, who with this his new office obteyned ſundrie faire landes and poſſeſſions, to him and to his heyres for euer: but his ſurname was afterwardes chaunged, and called Skrimgeour, of the which is diſcended a noble houſe, continuing yet in great honour in the ſame ſurname and office. When the king was once paſſed the water, and the armies on both ſydes readie to haue ioyned, through mediation of Byſhoppes and other vertuous men, the matter was taken vp, and peace made on theſe conditions, that the commons that toke part with the rebelles, ſhould returne home out of hande, and the Gentlemen to ſubmit themſelues to the kings pleaſure, their liues and landes ſaued:

The ſubmiſſion of Gentlemen.

howbeit many of them were kept in perpetuall priſon during their liues, and al their goodes confiſcate to the kings vſe.

All ciuill trouble and commotion being thus quieted, king Malcolm (ſpecially by the good admoniſhment & exhortation of his wife Queene Margaret, a woman of great zeale vnto the religion of that time) gaue himſelfe in maner altogither vnto much deuotion, and workes of mercie, as in doing of almes deedes, by prouiding for the poore, and ſuch like godly exerciſes, ſo that in true vertue hee was thought to excell all other Princes of his time. To be briefe herein, there ſeemed to be in maner a certaine ſtrife betwixt him, him, and that vertuous Queene his wife, which of them ſhould be moſt feruent in the loue of god, ſo that manye people by the imitation of them were brought vnto better life. Agatha and hir daughter Chriſtine alſo by the example of theſe two holy liuers, renoūced the pompe of the court, and got them to a priuate & ſolitarie life, wherein they gaue thēſelues wholy to diuine cōtēplation.

King Malcolm through exhortation of his wife, giueth himſelfe to deuotion.

Furthermore Malcolme by the letting on of the Queene his wife, ceaſſed not to ſet his endeuor wholy to the aduauncement of the chriſtian religion, and to reſtore things that were decayed by the negligence of his predeceſſors. Therefore whereas before his time, there were but four Biſhops Seas in Scotland, as Saint Androwes, Glaſgew, Galloway, and Murthlake, and two of them, that is to ſay, Saint Androwes and Murthlake, remayning onely in good reparation (the other being decaied) he reſtored the other two to their former beauties, and furthermore erected two other of new, as Murrey, and Cathnes, placing men of ſingular vertue and pureneſſe of life in the ſame. But to proceede. It is ſayd, that ſuch outrageous riot entred at this time, and began to growe in vſe amongeſt the Scotiſhmen, togither with the language and maners of the Engliſh nation, by reaſon that ſuch a multitude of the ſame, flying out of their Countrey, were dayly receyued as then into Scotlande to inhabite there, as before is ſhewed) that diuerſe of the nobles perceiuing what diſcommoditie & decay to the whole realme would enſue of this kinde of intemperancy, came to the king, lamenting grieuouſly the caſe, for that this venemous infection ſpred ſo faſt ouer the whole realme, to the peruerting and vtter remouing of the auncient ſobrietie of diet vſed in the ſame: wherefore they beſought him to prouide ſome remedie in time, before hope of redreſſe were paſt, that the people might be againe reduced vnto their former frugalitie, who hitherto vſed not to eate but once in the day, and then deſiring no ſuperfluous meates & drinkes to be ſought by ſea & land, nor curiouſly dreſſed or ſerued forth with ſauces, but onely feeding to ſatiſfie nature, and not their greedy appetites.

Through which their ſober fare, with the exerciſing of their bodies herewith in continual trauaile, they grew more ſtrong and greater of bodie, than their offſpring are founde to be in theſe dayes: for they were more in reſemblance like vnto Giantes than vnto men of our time, with great and huge bodies, mightie armes and limbs, preſſing vppon their enimies like fierce Lions, bearing downe all before them, without dread of any daunger, for that they exceeded all humane ſtrength and power.

Herevpon king Malcolme toke great paines to haue redreſſed this infectiue poyſon, and vtterly to haue expelled it forth of his realme, howbeit the nature of man is ſo prone & ready to embrace all kinds of vice, that where the Scottiſhe people before had no knowledge nor vnderſtanding of fine fare or riotous furfet, yet after they had once taſted the ſweete poyſoned bait thereof, there was now no meane to be found to reſtrain their licorous deſires. And yet thoſe corrupted abuſes and riotous ſuperfluities (which came into the realme of Scotland with the Engliſhmen planted therin by the dayes of king Malcolme, are not to bee compared in exceſſe with things vſed in our time, for in thoſe dayes, as yet the nature of man was not ſo ouercome with the abuſe of ſuperfluities, as it is now adayes, for then though they were gone frō the auncient ſparenеſſe of diet, they yet did not eate paſt twice a day, and had but two diſhes at a meale: but nowe the greedie taſt of mens inſatiable luſt is ſuche, that no kinde of fleſhe, fiſhe, fruite, or whatſoeuer maye be gotten, is vneth able to quenche their gluttonous appetite and rauenous gurmandize: ſo that neyther lande, Sea, nor ayre, is left vnſought to ſatiſfie the ſame, as though they were worthie of moſt high cōmendation that may deuoure moſt: wherein they may be iuſtly compared to greedie Wolues and Cormorants.

Mans nature prone to vice.

The greedie taſt of mens inſatiable luſt.

Men compared to Wolues & Cormarāts.

But to bewaile that in wordes which cannot be amended in deedes, is but a folly, for the infection is ſo entred into the inner partes of the intrayles, that neither with purging, cutting, nor ſearing, it may be holpen. Sooner ſhall you deſtroy the whole Nation than remoue this vice.

In the meane tyme, whyleſt things thus paſſed in Scotlande, King William the Conquerour dyed in the .xxj. yeare of his raigne, and after the incarnation. 1087. 1086. H.B.

About whiche time King Malcolme cauſed the olde Church of Durham to be plucked down and buylded vp anewe, beginning euen at the firſt ſtone. In which ſeaſon, one Egelwyn or William (as the Scottiſhe writers haue) was Biſhop of that Sea, and Prior of the Abbay was one Turgot, who afterwarde was made Biſhop of Saint Androwes, and wrote the liues of Queene Margaret and Malcolme hir huſbande in the Scottiſh tongue.

Afterwarde hee deceaſſed in Saint Androwes, but hys body was brought vnto Durham, and there buryed, becauſe hee was firſt Prior thereof.

King Malcolme by perſwaſion of this Turgot, builded alſo a Church in Dunfermling, dedicated to the Trinitie, ordeyning frō thenceforth that the common ſepulture of the kings ſhoulde be there, in like maner as it had bin afore time in the Ile of Iona at the Abbay of Colmekill.

Amongeſt other vertuous ordinances alſo which were deuised & made by king Malcolme, (through exhortation of his wife Queene Margaret) mentioned by Turgot in the booke which he wrote of their liues, this is not to be forgotten, that he abrogated that wicked lawe, & established by king Ewyn the thirde, appointing halfe a marke of siluer to bee payde to the Lorde of the soyle in redemption of the womans chastitie, which is vsed to be payed yet vnto this day, & is called the marchets of women, where otherwise by tenour of king Ewins lawe, the Lord had the vse of theyr bodyes, for the first night after theyr maryage.

King Ewyns law abrogated or rather altered.

King William surnamed the Red, the seconde sonne of king William the Conquerour, and successour to him in the kingdome of Englande, not wel contented nor pleased in his mind, that the Scottes shoulde enioy a great portion of the north partes of England, aunciently belonging to his crowne as parcell thereof, he rayled a great army, and before any denouncing of war by him made, inuaded Northumberland, & tooke the Castell of Anwike, putting all suche to the sworde as were founde in the same.

The castell Anwike by the Englishmen.

King Malcolme to withstande such exploytes attempted by his enimie, leuied a great hoste of his subiectes, and comming with the same into Northumberlande, besieged the sayde Castell of Anwike. And nowe when the keepers of the hold were at poynt to haue made surrender, a certaine English knight conceiued in his mind an hardie and daungerous enterprise, mounted on a swift horse without armor or weapon, sauing a speare in his hand, vpon the poynt whereof he bare the keyes of the castel, & so issued forth at ỹ gates, riding directly towardes the Scottish campe.

The castell of Anwike besieged by the Scottes.

They that warded, mystrusting no harme, brought him with great noyse and clamor vnto the kings tent. Who hearing the noyse, came forth of his pauilion to vnderstande what the matter ment.

The Englishman herewith couched his staffe as though it had beene to the ende that the king might receyue the keyes whiche he had brought. And whilest all mens eyes were earnest in beholding the keyes, the Englishe man ranne the king through the left eye, and sodainly dashing his spurres to his horse, escaped to the next wood out of all daunger.

An hardie enterprice.

The poynt of the speare entred so farre into the kings head, that immediately falling downe amongst his men, he yeelded vp the ghost.

K. Malcolme is slaine.

This was the ende of king Malcolme in the middest of his armie.

It is sayde that king William chaunged the name of this aduenturous knight, and called him Pers E, and for that he stroke king Malcolme so right in the eye, and in recompence of his seruice gaue him certaine landes in Northumberlande, of whom those Percees are discended, whiche in our dayes haue enioyed the honourable tytle of Earles of Northumberlande.

The name the Percees had not beginning they came forth of Normandie at conquest. Earles of Northumberland.

The Scottes after the slaughter of their king brake vp theyr campe, and buried his bodie within the Abbay of Tynmouth in England. But his sonne Alexander caused it to be afterwardes taken vp, and buryed in Dunfermling before the Aulter of the Trinitie.

K. Malcolme buryed at Tynmouth.

The same tyme was Scotlande wounded with an other misfortune. For Edwarde the Prince of Scotlande, eldest sonne to king Malcolme, dyed of a hurt which he receyued in a skirmish not farre from Anwike, and was buryed in Dunfermeling, the fyrst of the bloud royall that hadde hys bones layde in that place.

Edward prince of Scotland dyed.

Queene Margaret being aduertised of the death death both of hir husbande and sonne, as then lying in Edenbourgh Castell, hir disease encreased through griefe thereof so vehemently, that within three dayes after she departed out of this life vnto an other more ioyfull and blessed.

King Malcolme was slaine in the yeare of our redemption 1092. on the.xiij. day of Nouember, and in the. xxxvj. yeare of hys raigne.

In the same yeare manye vncouth things came to passe and were seene in Albion.

By the highe spring Tydes whiche chaunced in the Almaine Seas, many Townes, Castels, and Woodes were drowned, aswell in Scotland as in England.

After the ceassing of which tempest, the lands that sometime were Earle Godwines (of whom ye haue heard before) lying not farre from the towne of Sandwich, by violent force and drift of the Sea, were made a sande bed, and euer sithence haue beene called Godwine sandes.

The people haue thought that this vengeance came to that peece of grounde being possessed by his posteritie, for the wicked slaughter of Alured, which he so trayterously contriued.

Moreouer sundrie Castelles and Townes in Murrey lande were ouerthrowne by the sea Tydes.

Such dreadfull thunder happened also at the same time, that men and beastes were slaine in the fields, and houses ouerturned euen from their foundations.

In Louthian, Fife, and Angus, trees and corne were burned vp by fire, kindled no man knew how, nor from whence.

In the dayes of this Malcolme Cammore, liued that famous hystoriographer Marianus a Scottish man borne, but professed a Monke in the Monasterie of Fulda in Germany. Also Veremond a Spanish priest, but dwelling in Scotland, florished about the same time, and wrote the Scottish historie, whome Hector Boetius so much followeth.

Malcolme had by his wife Queene Margaret (otherwise called for hir holinesse of life S. Margaret) vj. sonnes, Edward (as is said) was slain: Etheldred, which died in his tender age, and was buried in Dunfermling: and Edmond which renounced the world, & liued an holy life in England: the other three were named Edgar, Alexander and Dauid. There be that write how Edmond was taken, and put to death in prison by his vncle Donalde Bane, when he inuaded the kingdome, and vsurped the crowne, after the decease of his brother king Malcolme, and so then was Edgar next inheritour to the crowne.

This Donald Bane, who (as before is mentioned) fled into the Iles to eschue the tyrannical malice of Makbeth, after he once heard that his brother king Malcolme was dead, returned into Scotland by support of the K. of Norway, vnto whom he couenanted to giue the dominion of all the Iles, if by his meanes and furtheraunce hee might obteyne the crowne of Scotland.

Donalde Bane returneth into Scotlande.

His couenant for the gift of the Iles to the king of Norway.

Herevpon landing with an armie in the Realme, he founde small resistance, and so with little adoe receyued the crowne, for many of the people abhorring the riotous maners and superfluous gurmandice brought in amongst them by the English men, were willing inough to receiue this Donalde for their king, trusting bycause hee had beene brought vp in the Iles with the olde customes and maners of their auncient Nation, without tast of the English lykerous delicacies, they shoulde by his seuere order in gouernment, recouer againe the former temperancie of theyr olde progenitors.

The respect that the people had to receyue Donald Bane for their king.

As soone as Edgar Adeling brother to Queen Margaret was aduertised that Donalde Bane had thus vsurped the crowne of Scotland, he sent secretly for his three nephewes, Edgar, Alexander, and Dauid, with two sisters which they had, to come vnto him into England, where he had not kept thē any long while, but that a knight whose name was Organ, or Orgar, accused him of treason, alledging howe he nourished his sisters sonnes and daughters within the realme, in hope to make them inheritors to the crowne: but the malice of this false surmise remayned not vnpunished, for one of Edgars friends, taking in hand to Darraine battaile with Organ, in defence of Edgars innocencie, slue him within lystes.

K. Malcolmes sonnes sent for into England by Edgar their vncle.

Orgarus, or one Organ accuseth Edgar Atheling of treason.

Organ is slaine within lystes.

After that Donalde had receyued the crowne at the Abbay of Scone, he perceyued that some of the nobles grudged at his preferment, shewing by some tokens that they had more affection vnto king Malcolmes children, than vnto him, and therfore he cast out a worde amongst his familiers, that ere ought long the nobles shoulde repent them of their doings, if they applyed not themselues the more to his opinion. Which wordes being marked, & deepely imprinted in some of their harts, turned afterwards to his great displeasure. For shortly after came Duncan, the bastard son of king Malcolme out of Englande into Scotlande, supported with an armie of men appointed by king William the Red, to place him in the Kingdome, & to expulse Donald out of the same by force of armes, if he attempted any resistance.

Donald threatneth.

Duncan Malcolmes bastard sonne.

Nowe when Donald approched with his puissance in purpose to haue giuen battaile, the most part of his people did forsake him, and drewe vnto Dūcanes side, so that Donald thus abādoned of thē that shuld haue ayded him, was cōstrained for his refuge to flee again into ỹ westerne Iles: & so Duncan then cōming vnto Scone, receyued

the crowne of Scotlande, but for that he had bin trayned the moſte part of his life in the warres both in England and France, he had ſmall ſkill in ciuill gouernment, iudging that thing onely to ſtande with iuſtice, wich was decided with ſpeare and ſhielde. By reaſon whereof Scotland was ſhortly filled with newe troubles and ſeditious deuiſions.

Duncane lacked skill in ciuil gouernment.

Donalde Bane being aduertiſed of all thoſe things, that hereby happened in Scotland, ſolicited Makpẽder Earle of Mernes to take his part, & by ſome meanes to ſlea king Duncane, which enterpriſe Makpender taking in hand, at length (in Menteth) accompliſhed the ſame in the night ſeaſon, when he had eſpied ſuch aduauntage and opportunitie of time, that not ſo muche as one man was founde to purſue him.

Makpender Erle of Mernes ſlayeth king Duncane.

But to ſay the truth, Duncane was ſo farre out of the peoples fauour, that mo reioyced than were ſorie for his death.

After he was thus diſpatched, his vncle Donalde was reſtored againe to the kingdome, chiefly by ſuppорte of the forenamed Makpender, after his nephewe the foreſayde Duncane had raigned one yeare and an halfe, where Donalde himſelfe had raigned before he was expulſed by his ſayde nephewe, the ſpace of ſixe Monethes, and nowe after he had recouered the Kingdome, he continued in the regiment therof three yeares, not without greate trouble and inteſtine commotions: for the moſte part of the Lordes maligning his aduauncement, ſought occaſions dayly to depoſe him.

Donalde Bane is reſtored to the crowne.

In the meane tyme the Ilande men made ſome ſturre, neyther did the warres with Englande ceaſſe, (though without anye greate exployte or enterpriſe worthie of remembrance) ſauing a fewe light ſkirmiſhes betwixt the parties as occaſion ſerued.

At length came Magnus king of Norway with a great fleete, and ſayling aboute the Weſterne Iles, garniſhed all the ſtrengthes within them in moſt defencible wiſe, with men, munition and vitayles, vſurping the dominion as ſoueraigne Lord of the ſame Iles: and at the ſame time ordeyned thoſe lawes and conſtitutions which are vſed there amongſt the inhabitants euen vnto theſe dayes.

Magnus king of Norway cõmeth into the weſterne Iles.

The Scottiſh men hauing great indignation that the Iles being auncientlye parcell of the crowne, ſhould be thus alienated from the ſame, ſent oratours vnto Edgar (who was as ye haue herd the fourth ſonne of king Malcolm) deſiring him moſt inſtantly to come into Scotlãd, to recouer his fathers heritage and crowne of Scotland out of the vſurpers handes.

Edgar king Malcolms ſon is ſent for.

Edgar ſendeth meſſengers to Donalde.

Edgar taking deliberate aduice touching this requeſt, firſt ſent ambaſſadors vnto Donald promiſing that if he woulde be contented to reſtore vnto him the crowne being due to him by lawful ſucceſſion, he woulde gladly reward him with great Lordſhips and reuenues in Louthian: but Donald was ſo far from minding to do him reaſon in this behalf, that cauſing the which brought this meſſage to be put in priſo, he finally ſlue the.

Donald ſlayeth Edgars meſſengers.

Then Edgar by counſell of his vncle Edgar Atheling, purchaſing ayde of men at the hands of king Willia Rufus, ſet forward toward Scotland. At his comming to Durham, he was admoniſhed by a viſion in his ſleepe, that if he toke with him the Baner of Saint Cutbert, he ſhould haue victorie.

Edgar is aydd by king William Rufus.

Saint Cutbert Baner.

On the morrow after, he came into the Abbey Churche, where firſt hearing diuine ſeruice, when the ſame was ended, he diſplayed the foreſayde Baner, and cauſed it to be borne before him in that iourney. Neuertheleſſe king Donalde met him with a mightie armie, and after long fight, was chaſed into the Iles, where he was taken and brought vnto Edgar.

King Donald diſcomfited and chaſed to the Iles.

King Donald is taken.

Some ſay that when the battayles were readie to haue ioyned, his men beholding the Baner of Saint Cutbert ſpred agaynſt them, immediately forſoke him, ſo that he beeing deſtitute of ſuccour, fled, in purpoſe to haue ſaued himſelfe in ſome one of the Weſterne Iles, but being apprehended by the Inhabitants, was brought (as is ſayde) vnto Edgar, by whom he was (howſoeuer the hap of his taking chaunced) caſt immediatly into priſon, wherein he ſhortly after dyed.

King Donald dieth in priſon.

The victorie thus atchieued, Edgar went vnto Edenburgh, and from thence vnto Dunfermeling to viſite the Sepultures of his mother and brethren.

Edgar.

Afterwardes cõming to ỹ Abbey of Scone and aſſembling the Lordes of the Realme, he receyued ỹ crown, and ſhortlye after was annointed by the Archbyſhop of Saint Andrewes named Godrike, in the yeare of our redemption. 1101. For his mother Queene Margaret purchaſed a little before hir death of Vrbane the Pope, that from henceforth all the Kinges of Scotlande ſhoulde bee annoynted.

Edgar is crowned and annoynted.

A priuiledge for the Scottiſh kings to be annointed.

This priuiledge was confirmed afterwardes by Pope John the ſeconde of that name.

The firſt King that was annoynted according to that graunt, was this Edgar in the yere aforeſayde.

Edgar the firſt anointed king of Scotland.

About

About two yeares before, that Edgar thus recouered the Crowne of Scotlande, was that generall paſſage made into the holy lande vnder Godfrey of Bullion, and other Chriſtian Princes.

Amongeſt them as one of the chiefe, Robert Duke of Normandie went, and ſhould haue bin created king of Jeruſalem, had he not at the ſame time heard howe his brother William Rufus king of England was ſlain by chaunce through glauncing of an arrow, ſhot at a Deare in ye new Foreſt, & then hoping to ſucceed him in the kingdome of England, he preferred that honor to the other, wherein he ſawe to be more trauaile than gaine. But at his comming home he found that his yongſt brother Henrie ſurnamed Beauclerke was placed in the kingdome of England, and ſo was Duke Robert his hope fruſtrate of both the kingdomes, and that worthily (as moſte men thought,) for that he refuſed ſo neceſſarie a dignitie, wherein he might haue ſerued the common cauſe of the chriſtian common wealth.

Vnto Henry Beauclerke in the ſeconde yeare of his raigne king Edgar maried the one of hys ſiſters called Maulde.

The other named Marie, hee coupled wyth Euſtace Earle of Bulloigne: Of the whiche mariage was borne a daughter that was the only heyre of the ſame Euſtace in the Countie of Bulloigne, the which when ſhe came to womans ſtate, was maried vnto Stephen Earle of March in England, & of Mortaigne in France, Nephew to Henrie Beauclerke by his ſiſter.

The king of Englande Henrie, had iſſue by Queen Mauld, two ſonnes and two daughters, William and Richard, Euſamie and Maulde.

But now to returne to king Edgar, to ſhew ſome token of thanks towards ſaint Cutbert for his ayd ſhewed as was thought in the battaile againſt his vncle Donalde, he gaue vnto the Monkes of Durham the lands of Coldingham: and to the Biſhop of Durham called Canulph, he gaue the towne of Berwike, but for that the ſame Biſhop wrought afterwardes treaſon againſt him, he loſt that gyft, and the king reſumed that towne into his handes againe.

I do not finde that Edgar had any warres any way forth during all the time of his raigne, a prince rather reuerenced than dred amongſt hys ſubiects for his ſingular equitie & vpright dealing

He departed out of this life at Dundee, in the ix. yeare of his raigne, and after the byrth of our Sauiour 1107.

After the deceaſe of this Edgar, ſucceeded his brother Alexander the fierce, ſo called for his rigorous valiancie in purſuing of theeues and robbers. In the beginning of his raigne, the inhabitants of Murrey lande and Roſſe, beholding him to bee moſte an ende in the Church at his prayers, and diuine ſeruice, after the maner of his parents, ſuppoſed he would proue no great quick iuſticier in puniſhing offenders, & therupon moſt preſumptuouſly they began to rob and reaue on eche ſide, not ſparing to kill and ſlea all ſuche as came in their handes without reſpect to age or ſere, in ſomuche that the yong infants ſmyling vpon the murtherers, beeing aboute to execute their deteſtable crueltie, paſſed by the Swoorde as well as the reyſters: ſuche rooted malice remayned in theyr beaſtly heartes, which vpon renuing theyr olde grudges they now accordingly ſhewed. Theues of Murrey land and Roſſe. The crueltie of theeues.

King Alexander therefore aduertiſed hereof, came into thoſe parties with a competent armie, and apprehending the chiefe authours and captaynes, ſtroke of their heades. Execution.

As he returned backe through the Mernes, there came a woman vnto him weeping in lamentable ſoote, who fell vppon hir knees at his feete, beſeeching him to pitie hir caſe, hauing loſt both hir huſbande and ſonne, by the tyrannous crueltie of the maiſter of Mernes, who for that they had called him afore a iudge in an action of debt, had ſlaine and murthered as well the one as the other. The Earle of Mernes ſonne.

The king moued with this deteſtable kinde of iniurie, lyght beſide his Horſe, and would not alight vp againe, till hee had ſeene the Authour of that heynous treſpaſſe hanged vppon a Gybet. A righteous Iuſticier.

After this comming into Gourie, hee toke in hande to finiſhe and make vp the Caſtell of Baledgar, the foundation whereof his brother Edgar had begun, that it might be an ayde to chaſtice a ſoort of theeues & robbers which haunted the Woodes thereaboutes, to the great diſquiet of all the Countrey. He gaue alſo to the maintenance of that houſe certain landes, which the Earle of Sowrie had giuen him at the Font ſtone when he became his godfather. The Caſtell of Baledgar.

Whileſt he was thus buſie about the furtherance of that worke, diuerſe of thoſe theeues that were acuſtomed to liue by robberies in thoſe parts, perceiuing that this caſtell which the king was about to build, ſhoulde turne vnto their deſtruction, they conſpired his death, & winning by rewards & promiſes, the help of the kings chamberlain to the accõpliſhing of their traiterous and moſt diueliſhe practiſes, they entered one night through a priuie into his lodging, in purpoſe to haue ſlaine him as he had ſlept in his bed chãber: but he by Gods prouidence hauing knowledge of their cõming, ſtarted out of his bed, & caught a ſword which hung neare at hand, wherewith he ſlue firſt his chamberlain that had brought them in, and then diſpatched a ſix of the other traitors, (which were alreadie entred his chamber) with ſingular force & manhood: the other fearing leaſt with the noyſe, his ſeruants that lodged within the houſe, ſhould haue bin raiſed, & ſo haue haſted to aſſaile thẽ on the backs, fled in all haſt poſſible.

Treaſon of conſpirators to haue ſlaine the king.

The kings manhood.

Neuertheleſſe, ſuche purſute was made after them, that many of them were apprehended, and vpon their examination, beeing brought before the king, they declared plainly howe they were encouraged to worke that treaſon whiche they had gone aboute, by ſundrie great Barons and gentlemen of the countrey. Finally, the matter was ſo handled with them, that they diſcloſed the names of thoſe that had thus procured them to the treaſon. Wherevpon the king gathering an army, he marched forth to purſue them, but before he came vnto the water of Spay, the conſpirators had gotten togither their power, & were lodged on the further ſide of the ſame water to ſtop him from paſſing ouer.

The water of Spay.

The king ſeeing them thus aſſembled to impeach his paſſage, ſent his Banner man ſir Alexander Carron with a choſen part of his army to paſſe the water, and to fight with his enimies, where, by the hardie onſet of the ſayde ſir Alexander, they were quickly put to flight, & many of them that were taken in the chaſe, ſuffered death according as they had well deſerued.

Sir Alexander Carron.

The Rebels are vãquiſhed.

The realme after this execution done of theſe offenders, continued many yeares after in good tranquilitie.

This Alexander Carron alſo for that he was ſeene in the kings ſight that day to fight moſte manfully in ſleaing diuers of the rebelles with a crooked ſworde whiche he had in his hande (of whiche ſort many were vſed in thoſe dayes) he was highly rewarded at the kings handes, and euer after named Skrimgeour, that is to meane, an hardie fighter. He had alſo his armes encreaſed with a rampaunt Lion holding a crooked ſword, as is to be ſeene in the armes of his poſteritie vnto this day.

Skrimgeour.

Other there be that ſay he got the ſurname of Skrimgeour, becauſe he ſlue an Engliſh man in a ſingular combate.

The principall of this ſurname in our time helde the Conſtableſhip of Dundee, bearing in hys armes a crooked Sworde in faſhion of an hooke.

After that king Alexander had appeaſed the inteſtine commotions thus within his Realme, he ſet in hande to repayre the Abbey of Scone, wherein he placed regular Chanons, dedicating the Church in the honour of the Trinitie, and Saint Michael.

The Abbey Scone.

Not long after this alſo he chaunced to come into Saint Colmes Inche, where he was conſtrayned to abide three dayes togither through violent rage of weather and tempeſtes: and becauſe he founde ſome reliefe of meate and drinke, by meanes of an hermit that dwelled within the ſame Inche and kept a Chappell there dedicate to Saint Colme, he made of that Chappell an Abbey of regular Chanons, in the honor of ſaint Colme, endowing it with ſundrie landes and rents for the maintenance of the Abbot and conuent of that houſe.

The Abbey Dunfirmling

Moreouer the Abbey of Dunfirmling was finiſhed by king Alexãder, and endowed with ſundrie landes and poſſeſſions.

Whileſt king Alexander was thus occupied in buylding and repayring of religious houſes, his brother Dauid liued in Englande with hys ſiſter Queene Maulde, and through fauor which the king hir husbande bare towardes him, he obteyned in mariage one Maulde, daughter vnto Woldoſius, or rather Waltheof Earle of Huntington and Northumberland, begot of his wife the ladie Judith that was neece vnto king William ỹ Conquerour, & for ỹ the ſayd Woldoſius or Waltheof had no other iſſue to inherite his lands, Dauid in right of his wife Mauld enioyed the ſame, and was made Earle of Huntington & Northumberland, & had iſſue by his wife a ſonne named Henrie, by whom the lands of Huntington, & ſome part of Northũberland were annexed vnto the crown of Scotlãd, as after ſhal appeare.

had by his wife (surnamed for hir singular bountefulnesse, the good Queene Matilde) in comming forth of France to repasse into England, perished in the sea by a tempest, to the great dolour of the king their father, and to all other his subiects of eche estate and degree.

Their mother the sayde Maulde was before that time departed out of this life. It was not long after, but that Alexander deceassed also, and was buryed in Dunfermling byfydes hys fathers sepulture, in the .xvij. yeare of his raigne complete, and from the incarnation of Chriſt A.D. 1125. yeares.

In the dayes of this king Alexander, the kynred of the Cummings, had their beginning, by one John Cumming a man of great prowes and valiancie, obteyning of the king in reſpect thereof certaine ſmall portions of landes in Scotlande.

The houſe of theſe Cummings roſe in proces of time thus from a ſmall beginning to highe honour and puiſſance, by reaſon of the great poſſeſſions and ample reuenues which they afterwardes atteyned.

At length (as often happeneth) the importable height of this lynage was the onely cauſe of the decay and finall ruine thereof, as in the ſequell of this Hyſtorie ye may at full perceyue.

Alſo in the dayes of king Alexander, the order of knights of the Rodes had their beginning, and likewiſe the order of white Monkes, the authour whereof was one Nodobert.

About the ſame time liued that holye man Richard de Sancto Victore, a Scottiſh man borne, but dwelling for the more part of his time at Paris in Fraunce, where he dyed, and was buryed within the Cloyſter of the Abbey of Saint Victor, being a brother of the ſame houſe.

But nowe to proceed with the hyſtorie. After the deceaſſe of Alexander the fierce, and firſt of that name, his brother Dauid came vnto Scone, and there receiued the crowne, as lawfull heyre to his brother, for that he left no heyre behinde him.

This Dauid according to the enſample of his noble Parents, ſet his whole care about the due miniſtring of Juſtice, to the honour of almightie God, and the weale of his realme.

He had no trouble by warres with any forraine enimies, ſo long as king Henrie Beauclerke liued.

Therefore hauing opportunitie of ſuch a quiet time, he rode about all the parties of his realme, and vſed to ſit in hearing of iudgement himſelfe, ſpecially cõcerning poore mens cauſes and matters, but the controuerſies of the Lordes and barrons he referred to the hearing of other Judges.

The care of king Dauid for the poore.

If he vnderſtode that any man were endomaged by any wrongful iudgement, he recõpenſed the partie wronged, according to the value of his loſſe & hinderance, with the goods of the iudge that pronounced the iudgement.

A righteous iudge.

Thus in the firſt yeares of his raigne, hee did many things to the aduauncement of the common welth, and baniſhed ſuch banketting cheare as was vſed amongſt his people after the enſample of the Engliſhe men, perceyuing the ſame to breede a great weakning and decay of the auncient ſtoutneſſe of ſtomacke, that was wont to remaine in the Scottiſh nation.

Banketting cheare baniſhed.

He buylded the number of .xv. Abbeyes, part of them in the beginning of his raigne before the warres were begon which he had with the Engliſhe men, and part after the ſame warres were ended.

King Dauid buylde .xv. Abbeyes.

The names of thoſe Abbeyes are as followeth: Holy Rode houſe, Kelſo, Jedburgh, Melroſſe, Newbottell, Holmecultrane, Dundranane, Cambuſkenneth, Kynlois, Dunfirmling, Holme in Cumberland: alſo two Nunries, the one at Carleil, & the other at north Barwike: with two Abbays beſide Newcaſtel, ỹ one of S. Benedicts order, and the other of white Monks.

The names of the Abbeys buylded by king Dauid.

He erected alſo foure Biſhoprikes within his Realme, Roſſe, Brechin, Dunkeld, and Dublane, endowing them with riche rentes, fayre landes, and ſundrie right commodious poſſeſſions.

Foure Biſhops ſeas erected in Scotland.

Moreouer he tranſlated the Biſhops Sea of Murthlake vnto Aberden, for ſundrie aduiſed conſiderations, augmenting it with certaine reuenues, as he thought expedient.

There goeth a fond forged tale, that this king Dauid being in the Caſtel of Edenburgh, on the holy Rood day in Haruell, otherwiſe called the Exaltation of the croſſe, it chaũced that through erecting of certaine yong Lordes and Gentlemen, after he had beene at Churche, hee toke his horſe and rode forth into the next woddes to hunt the Harte, for in thoſe dayes all that countrey was full of Woods and waſt grounds, repleniſhed with Deare and wilde beaſtes, ſmall tyllage as then being vſed in any part of the Realme, for all the people in maner were giuen to breeding of Cattell, more than to any other trade of liuing.

A tale.

The Countrey about Edenburgh in olde time full of Wood.

The king therefore being paſſed through the dale or valley whiche lyeth plaine Eaſt from the ſayde Caſtell (where nowe ſtandeth Cannogate. the Cannogate) the Houndes were caſt off, and great noyſe rayſed what with their opening and blaſt of hornes, that all the wilde beaſtes were ſone on foot for dread thereof, and diuerſe of them freyght had in chaſe. And nowe was the King come to the foote of the hyll, and all his nobles ſeuered here and there from him, when ſodenly appeared to his ſight the faireſt Hart that euer man ſet eye vpon: The pynne or noyſe of this Hart comming towardes the king with his full courſe, made the kings horſe ſo afrayde, that he was not able to ſtay him with the reigne, but that he ran quite away with him, through thicke and thin, the Hart ſtill following ſo faſt and with ſuche violence, that at length hee bare both horſe and man to the grounde: And as the king caſt backe his handes betwixt the tyndes of this Hart, to defende himſelfe from hurt, there ſlipped a croſſe into his handes after a myraculous ſort, and immediately therewith the Hart ruſhed away with great violence, and could neuer after be ſeene.

A croſſe falling into the kings handes.

This was in the ſame place where nowe ſpringes a fountaine called the Rood Well.

There is no man that could tell of what matter this Croſſe was made, whether of mettall, ſtone, or of tree.

A dreame.

He was admoniſhed alſo, (as the report goeth) in his ſlepe the next night after, that he ſhould buylde an Abbay in the ſame place where thys chaunce happened. Wherupon he ſent for workmen into Fraunce and Flaunders, and ſet them in hande to buyld this Abbey of Chanons regular, as he was admoniſhed, dedicating it in the honor of the Croſſe.

Holy Rood houſe builded

The foreſayde Croſſe remayned in this Abbey, til the dayes of king Dauid Bruce, who loſt it to the Engliſh men at Durram field where he was taken priſoner. But inough of the Monkiſh deuiſes.

Many prudent men blame greatly this immeaſurable liberalitie of king Dauid, thus by him vſed towards the Church, in diminiſhing ſo hugely the reuenues of the Crowne, being the cauſe that manye noble Princes his ſucceſſours haue come to their final endes, for that they haue beene conſtrayned through want of treaſure to maintayne their royall eſtates, to procure the fall of ſundrie great houſes, to poſſeſſe theyr landes and liuings.

Liberalitie of king Dauid toward the Church reproued.

Alſo to rayſe payments and exactions of the common people, to the vtter impoueriſhment of the realme.

And ſometime haue they bene conſtrayned to inuade Englande by warres as deſperate men, not caring what came of their liues.

Otherwhiles haue they beene inforced to ſtampe naughtie money, to the great preiudice of the common wealth.

All which miſchiefes haue followed ſithe the time that the Church hath beene thus enryched, and the crowne empoueriſhed.

The Church enriched, and the crowne empouerished. The ſaying of king Iames the firſt. A ſory Saint.

Therfore king Iames the firſt, when he came to king Dauid his Sepulture at Dunfirmling, he ſayd, that he was a ſory Saint for the crown, meaning that he left the Church ouer riche, and the Crowne too poore.

For he toke from the crowne (as Iohn Maior wryteth in his Chronicles) lx. thouſand pound Scottiſh of yearely reuenues, which he endowed thoſe Abbayes with. But if king Dauid had conſidered the maner how to nouriſh true religion, he had neyther endowed Churches with ſuch riches, nor buylt them with ſuch royall magnificence: for the ſuperfluous poſſeſſions of the Church (as they are now vſed) are not only occaſion to cuill Prelates to liue in moſte inſolent pompe and corruption of life, but alſo an aſſured net to drawe all maner of gold and ſiluer out of

Io. Maior. Lx. M. pounde in landes giuen to the church.

Superfluous poſſeſſions of the Church.

the realme: howbeit leſſe domage would follow if the Abbays were at the proulſion of their ordinaries without any diſpenſation from theyr habite and religion, and the ordinaries to be placed and admitted by their paymate without exemption, and the paymate by the councel prouincial: for within theſe .lxx. yeares ſayth the tranſlator of Hector Boetius his Chronacles (meaning from the time that he wrote, whiche was aboute the yeare of our redemption .1530.) no benefices at all were fetched from Rome, ſaue onely Biſhoprickes.

Sithe whiche time it is knowen wel inough (ſayth he) what golde and ſiluer hath gone forth of the realme for the purchaſing of ſpirituall promotions.

And therfore it is (as he alſo ſaith) to be doubted, leaſt the realme ſhal be brought to irrecouerable pouertie by continuall promotion of Prelates within theſe fewe yeares, ſo as it ſhal be an eaſie pray to the enimies, ſithe it may not ſuſtayne ſo great charges, nowe (by reaſon hereof) in time of warres as it hath done in the dayes of our elders. Thus muche haue I taken forth of the ſaide tranſlators wordes, and of Iohn Maior his booke, touching the abuſe of ſpirituall mes poſſeſſions, the which both of them do earneſtly lament with many moe wordes in the place before alledged, where they make mencion of king Dauid his great munificēce towards the church.

But nowe to returne where I left, touching the hiſtorie, ye ſhall note that as I ſayde before, king Dauid had by his wife Mauld inheritour to parte of Northumberland, Cumberland and Huntington, a ſonne named Henry, who maried the Erle of Warrannes daughter, a lady of high parentage, as diſcended of moſt noble bloud both French and Engliſh. On whom he begat three ſonnes, Malcolme, William, and Dauid: alſo three daughters, Adhaina, Margaret, & Maulde.

But now in the meane time whileſt the eſtate of the common wealth in Scotland, ſtood in high felicitie, vnder the proſperous gouernmēt of king Dauid, there happened to him an heauie loſſe: for the Queene his wife the foreſayd Mauld deceaſſed in hyr flouriſhing age, a woman of paſſing beautie and chaſtitie, whiche two poynts (as is thought) commende a woman aboue all the reſt.

King Dauid therefore toke ſuche griefe for hyr death, that he woulde neuer after giue his minde to marie any other, but paſſed the reſidue of his life without companie of all women. She was buried in Scone, in the yeare of our lorde God. 1132.

Whileſt theſe things came thus to paſſe in Scotland, Henry Beauclerke king of England, cauſed all the nobles of his realme to take theyr othes, that after his deceaſſe they ſhould receyue his daughter Mauld the Empreſſe for their ſouereine Ladie and Queene. Mauld the Empreſſe.

She was as then returned into England: for hyr huſbande the Emperoure was lately before deceaſſed.

King Dauid alſo toke this othe, and therefore when king Stephan (who vſurped the crowne of England after king Henries deceaſſe againſt the ſaide Empreſſe) ſent vnto king Dauid to come and to do his homage for the Erledomes of Northumberlande, Cumberlande and Huntington (according as by his tenure he was bounde to do) with intimation that if he refuſed, king Stephan woulde inuade him with open warre: King Dauid anſwered, that he had giuen his faith once afore hand for thoſe landes vnto the Empreſſe Maulde, which he minded not to breake for the threatening wordes of any new inuaſours. King Stephan. Homage is required.

King Stephan moued with this anſwere, ſent a power of men to the bordures of Northumberland (whiche as then was vnder the dominion of the Scottes) to make a rode vpon the inhabitants of that countrey. They that had the charge of this enterpryſe, entring into the landes of theyr enimies, put all to the fire and ſworde that came in theyr way. The Engliſhmen inuade Northumberland.

The Scottes kindled with that diſpleaſure, roded into England, and did the like diſpleaſures and hurtes there. The Scottes make rodes into England.

For the yeare after, the Earles of Marche, Menteth, and Angus entred into England with a great armie, againſt whom came the Earle of Glouceſter, and giuing them batayle at Northallertoun, loſt the fielde, and was taken pryſoner himſelfe with diuers other nobles of England. The Earle of Glouceſter Robert was againſt K. Stephā, but there might be ſome other happely, vnto whom K. Stephan had giuen that title.

King Stephan therefore, conſtreyned to redeeme the captiues, gaue not onely a great ſomme of money for them, but alſo made reſignation of all ſuch title, clayme and intereſt as eyther he or any of his ſucceſſours might make or pretend to the counties of Northumberland and Cumberland. A reſignatiō.

Howbeit his nobles were no ſooner returned home, but that repenting him of that reſignatiō, he gathered his puyſſance againe, and entring into Northumberland, fought with the Scottes that came forth to reſiſt him, and obtayning the victorie, toke a great parte of the countrey into his poſſeſſion. King Stephan repenteth.

King Dauid to redreſſe theſe iniuries, gathered a mightie army, with deliberate minde, either to expell the Engliſhmen out of all the bounds of his dominions, or els to die in the payne.

But ſhortly after, Thurſtane Archbiſhop of Yorke came vnto Roxburgh called in thoſe dayes Marken, to treate for a peace, where a truce was concluded for three monethes, with Roxburgh in old time Marken. A truce.

condition that the Englishmen should deliuer vp the dominion of Northumberland vnto the lord Henry king Dauid his sonnes.

But for so muche as this couenant was not perfourmed on king Stephens side, king Dauid inuaded that part of the cuntrey which the Englishmen helde, making greate slaughter of all them that he found there about to resist him.

King Dauid inuadeth Northumberland.

King Stephan moued herewith, leuied his people, and came in puissant aray vnto Roxborough: but for that he had secrete knowledge that some of the nobles in his armie soughte hys destruction, hee was constrayned to returne without atchieuing of any worthie enterprise.

King Stephan passeth vnto Roxbourgh.

King Stephan returneth.

The yeare next ensuyng, a peace was talked vpon, the Archbishops of Cantozbury & Yorke appointed commissioners in the treatie therof on the behalfe of king Stephen, and the bishops of Glasgewe, Aberden, and Saint Andrews on the partie of king Dauid. But Maulde queene of Englande, the daughter of Eustace Earle of Boloigne, and neece to king Dauid by his sister Marie, was the chiefest doer in this matter, to bring them to agreement.

The one of the kings, that is to say Stephen, lay at Duresme with his nobles, and the other, that is to say Dauid, lay at Newcastell, during all the time of this treatie, which at length sorted to the conclusion of a peace, on these conditions, that the counties of Northumberland and Huntingdon shoulde remaine in the gouernement of Henry Prince of Scotland, as heire to the same by right of his mother:

A peace.

Couenants of agreement.

But Cumberlande shoulde be reputed as the inheritance and right of his father king Dauid.

And for these landes and seigniories the forenamed Prince Henry and his successours Princes of Scotlande should doe homage vnto kyng Stephen and his successours kings of England for the tyme being.

Homage.

The peace thus ratified betwixt the two kinges and their subiectes, kyng Stephen returned into Kent, and king Dauid repaired into Cumberland, where he fortified the towne of Carleile with new walles and dyches.

Carleil was repaired by William Rufus K. of England, about the yeare of our Lorde. 1092.

Thus passed the three first yeres of king Stephens reigne.

In the fourthe yeare came Maulde the Empresse into Englande to clayme the crown therof (as in the Englishe historie more playnely may appeare.

But whylest Englande was sore tormented with warres by contrarye factions of the nobles for the quarelles of those two persones, no small sorrow happned to Scotland for the death of Herie the prince of that land, and onely sonne vnto king Dauid, who died at Kelso, and was buried in the Abbey church there, in the yeare of our redemption. 1152.

The death of Henry prince of Scotland.

His death was greatly bemoned aswel of his father the king, as of all other the estates and degrees of the realme, for such singular vertue and noble conditions as appeared in hym. 1152.

But yet for that he lefte issue behynd him. iij. sons and. iij. daughters (as before is mencioned) the Realme was not thoughte vnprouided of heires.

Prince Henr his issue.

The king also being mortified from the world, toke the death of his sonne very patiently, considering that al men are subiect vnto death by the lawe of nature, and are sure no longer to remaine here, than their day appointed by the eterne determination of him that giueth and taketh away lyfe and breath when pleaseth him, as by daply experience is most manyfest.

The lawe of nature.

Therfore that king Dauid wayed the losse of his sonne in suche balance, it maye appeare by an Oration which hee made to his nobles, at what tyme after his sonnes decease, they came to comforte hym. For he perceyuing them to be ryghte heauie and sorowfull for the losse whiche he and they had susteyned by the death of so towardly a prince, that was to haue succeeded him, if God had lent him lyfe thereto: in the ende of a royall feast the whiche he made vnto those nobles that came thus to visite hym, hee beganne in this wyse.

An oration.

Howe great your fidelitie and care is whiche you beare towards me, although oftetimes heretofore I haue proued it, yet this present day I haue receyued most ample fruite therof: for now do I plainely see, that you lament no lesse for the losse of my late deceassed sonne, than if you had buried some one of your own sonnes, & are therefore come to your great trauaile & paine to comfort me, whom you esteeme to be sore afflicted for the ouer timely death of my sayde moste obedient sonne: but to let passe for this time due yelding of thanks to you for the same, till occasion and leysure may better serue thereto: this nowe may suffice, that I acknowledge my self to be so much beholden to you, that what soeuer thing I haue in the worlde, the same is ready to do you pleasure. But cõcerning the cause of your comming hither in shewing your courtesies therein, you shall vnderstande, that my parentes whom I truste to be in heauen, and (as Saintes) enioy the fruytes of theyr vertuous trauayles here taken on earth, did so instruct me from my tender youth, that I should worshipp with all reuerence the most wise creatour & prouident gouernour of all things, and to thinke that nothing was done by him in vaine, but that the same is prouided & ordeyned to some good vse by his highe and inscrutable counsell, and therefore whylest day and nighte I haue and do reuolue and call to rememremembraunce the preceptes and inſtructions of my parents, what ſo euer hath chaunced eyther touching aduerſitie or proſperitie, good happe or bad, the ſame hath ſeemed to me (at the firſte) receyuing all things with equall and thankefull minde, and interpreting them to the beſte, farre more light than they commonly ſeeme to others, and leſſe they did diſquiet me, ſo as with ble I haue learned at length, not onely patiently to beare all aduerſities that may happen, but alſo to receyue the ſame as things pleaſant and euen to be deſired. And verily my happe hath bene to be greatly exerciſed in this behalfe, for I haue firſte ſeene my father, more deare to me thã any earthly treaſure, and no leſſe profitable than greatly deſired of all the people, and yet neyther the loue of the people, nor of his kinſmenne and frendes might warrant him from this fatall neceſſitie of death. I haue knowen my mother right famous in the worlde for hyr ſinguler vertue to paſſe hence in like maner. My bretherne that were ſo louing, and againe ſo greatly beloued of me, alſo my wife whom I eſteemed more than all other creatures, are they not gone the ſame way, and compelled to beare deaths harde ordinaunce? So verily ſtandeth the caſe, that no man might yet at any time auoyde the violence of his force when he commeth, for we all alike owe this life vnto him, as a due debte that muſte needes be payd. But this is to be receyued with a thankfull minde, in that the bountifull beneuolence of our God hath graunted that we ſhall be all immortall, if we our ſelues through vice, and as it were ſpotted with filthie diſeaſes of the minde, do not fall into the danger of eternall death. Wherfore of right me thinke I haue cauſe to reioyce, that God by his ſingular fauour hath graunted to me ſuche a ſonne, whiche in all mens iudgement was worthie to be beloued whileſt he was here amongſt vs; and to be wiſhed for now, after he is departed from hence: but ought we to take it heauily, that he to whom he belonged, and who had lent him vnto vs, ſhould call for him again, and take him that was his owne? For what iniurie is it, if when I ſee occaſion I ſhall aſke that againe whiche you haue poſſeſſed through my benefite as lent to you for a time? Neyther do I truſte to want him long, if God ſhalbe ſo mercyfull vnto me as I wiſhe him to be, for I hope ſhortly to be called hence by commaundement of that moſt high king, and to be caried vp to reſt among that felowſhippe of heauenly ſpirites, where I ſhall finde my father and mother, my bretherne, wife, and ſonne in far better eſtate than here I knew thē. Therfore that I may repete it once againe I reioyce (I ſay) to haue obtained in my ſon, by ẏ grace of ẏ ſupernal God, ẏ I am aſſured by faith, he is already in ẏ place to the whiche all we do earneſtly wiſhe that we may attayne, and do endeuour by all meanes, that when the time cõmeth in whiche our ſoules are to be louſed forth of theſe frayle bodies of ours as out of pryſons, they may be found worthie of that companie, in which our cõfidence is, that he now moſt bliſſefully is remayning. Except any man may thinke that wee are ſo enuious, that therefore we do lament, bicauſe as yet we ſticke faſt ouerwhelmed & drowned in ſuche fylthye myres and combered in ſuche thornye thickets and buſhes, oute of the whiche he (beeing now deliuered of all cares) hath eſcaped. But let vs rather by followyng the fote ſteppes of him and other vertuous perſons that are gone afore vs, labour both day & night, that at length through heauenly fauour, wee may come to the place where we do reckon that by deuine power he is alreadie arriued. After that the king had made an end of his Oration, and thankes giuen to God for his bountifull munificence, they roſe from the table and departed to theyr lodgings, they all greatly marueyling at the kings highe prudence and godly wiſedome.

Malcolme the ſonne of Henry proclaimed prince of ſcotlande.

After this was Malcolme the eldeſt ſonne of the before mencioned prince Henry, proclaymed in his place prince of Scotlande, and conueyed through the moſte partes of the realme by Duncane Earle of Fyfe, and other of the nobles appointed, to attende vpon and to receyue the othes of all the Barons for theyr allegiaunce in his name. William the ſecond ſonne of prince Henry was conueyed into Northumberland by the foreſayde nobles, and there proclaimed and created Erle of that countrey.

Erle of Northumberlande.

Then went king Dauid himſelfe vnto Carleile, where he met with Henry the ſonne of the Empreſſe, who receyued the order of knighthood there at his hands. This was a little before that the ſame Henry came to an agreemẽt with king Stephen, whereby he was admitted to the poſſeſſion of halfe the realme of Englande, and promiſed by othe of aſſurance (as the Scottiſh writers ſaye) that he ſhoulde neuer be aboute to take the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Huntingdon from the crowne of Scotland.

Henry the emperoſſe hir ſon receyueth the order of knighthode.

Shortly after was king Dauid taken with a ſore diſeaſe and maladie, which continued wyth him to the ende of his lyfe.

And ſo when hee perceyued himſelfe to waxe faynte and feeble, he required to be borne to the Churche, where he receyued the ſacrament of the Lordes bodie and bloud, with moſt ſolemne reuerence, and then being brought againe to hys chamber, he called together his nobles, and commending vnto thē his yong nephewes, the ſonnes of his ſonne the forenamed prince Henry, he kiſſed eche one of them after an other, moſt inſtantly

The exhortation of king Dauid to his nobles.

ly desiring them in the honour of almighty God, to seeke the preseruation of common quiet, to the aduauncement of the publike weale.

King Dauid departeth out of this life.

This done, he departed out of this life in the xxix. yeare of his raigne, or rather in the .xxx. yere if he reygned .xxix. and two moneths, as Iohn Maior hath.

1153.

His body was buried in Dunfermeling, after the incarnatiō of Christ our sauiour .1153. yeares.

His singuler pitie towardes the poore.

Howe farre this prince king Dauid excelled in noble vertues and sober conuersation of lyfe, I haue thought it better to passe ouer with silence, than to go about in few wordes to comprehende that, wherein if I shoulde spende muche time, I were not able yet in any wise worthily to performe: for where in suche cases fewe things are slenderly shewed, the residue may seeme to be omitted through fault of the writer: but yet this is not to be forgotten that where his singuler pitifull regard whiche he had towardes the releefe of the poore, passed all other his notable vertues, King Dauids court.

he purged his court also in suche wise of all vicious rule & misordered customes, ỹ his whole family was giuen onely to the exercise of vertue, no riotous banqueting nor surfeting cheare was vsed amongst them, no lasciuious worde heard come forth of any mans mouth, nor yet any wanton signes shewed to prouoke sensuall luste or carnall concupiscence.

King Dauids seruantes.
